The decree commences, "Artaxerxes, king of kings, unto Ezra the priest, a scribe of the law of the God of heaven, perfect peace and at such a time, I make a decree," &c.; and after granting certain favors to the house of God at Jerusalem, it closes in the following words: "And thou, Ezra, after the wisdom of thy God, that is in thine hand, set magistrates which may judge all the people that are beyond the river, all such as know the laws of thy God, and teach ye them that know them not. And whosoever will not do the law of thy God, and the law of the king, let judgment be executed speedily upon him, whether it be unto death, or to banishment, or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment."

What could be required more ample than this commission to establish the government, enforce the observance of the law of God, and punish those who transgressed? At any rate no other instance of a decree so comprehensive as this can be found since the captivity.

"Sir Isaac Newton justly observes * that the dispersed Jews became a people and a city, when they returned into a body politic; and that was in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, when Ezra by the king's commission, elected magistrates all over the land, to govern the people according to the law of God and of the king; under Ezra they first became a polity or city by a government of their own."

However much stress may be laid upon the expression to build the city, nothing can be urged from it as an objection against the decree in question; for that Ezra understood himself fully empowered to proceed with the building of the city and the wall is evident from his prayer, as recorded in chap. ix. 9; and that he understood further that the conditional prophecies concerning his people were then fulfilled in that restoration is evident from the closing words of that prayer, when he says, "Should we again break thy commandments and join in affinity with the people of these abominations, wouldst not thou be angry with us till thou hadst consumed, so that there should be no remnant nor escaping."

But further, seven weeks (49 years) are allotted to the building of the street and wall in troublous times. The reckoning of the time can of course only commence with the commencement of the work; and the work did not commence till the Autumn of that year in which Ezra went up; for it was not until the [†] Advers. Shield, No. 1. Art. Prophetic Chronology.

* Scott's note on Dan. ix. 25-27.

* Analysis Sacred Chronology, pp. 141, 142.

fifth month that he reached Jerusalem. Ez. vii, 8. And in just forty-nine years from this time the work was completed in the last act of reformation by Nehemiah, recorded in the last chapter of his book.

Says Pridaux † under the year a. c. 409, "In the fifteenth year of Darius Nothus ended the first seven weeks of the seventy weeks of Daniel's prophecy. For then the restoration of the church and state of the Jews in Jerusalem and Judea was fully finished, in that last act of reformation, which is recorded in the thirteenth chapter of Nehemiah, from the twenty-third verse to the end of the chapter, just forty-nine years after it had been first begun by Ezra in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus."

It is said that the surest way to root out error, is to plant in the truth; and as we have found a decree which in its extent, fully includes the work contemplated in the prophecy, and makes the most perfect harmony in the commencement, intermediate dates and termination of the seventy weeks which were to be dated from it, it would hardly seem necessary to dwell further on this point. But as the commission of Nehemiah in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, thirteen years after the decree to Ezra, has been by some zealously and confidently claimed as the starting point of the seventy weeks and 2300 days, it demands a passing notice. Far be it from us to say anything derogatory of Nehemiah or of his work. He was a holy man, and his work an important one; but the utter impropriety of making it the data for the commencement of the prophetic periods will be seen when we consider that it was but a continuation of the work with which Ezra had been commissioned, and which he had commenced thirteen years before. And that it was but a continuation of that work is evident from the following facts:

1. The occasion of Nehemiah's petition to the king for permission to go up to Jerusalem was the report which certain ones, returning, had brought from thence, that those in the province were in great affliction and reproach, that the wall of Jerusalem also was broken down, and the gates thereof burned with fire. Neh. i. Whose work were these walls and gates that were broken down and burned with fire? Evidently the work of Ezra and his associates; for it cannot for a moment be supposed that the utter destruction of the city by Nebuchadnezzar, 144 years previous to that time, would have been reported to Nehemiah as a matter of news, or that he would have considered it, as he evidently did, a fresh misfortune calling for a fresh expression of his grief. A decree therefore authorizing the building of these, had gone forth previous to the grant to Nehemiah.

2. Those who contend for this decree, lay much stress on the phrase, "to build," as though the literal building of the city was all that was involved in the prophecy, and this Nehemiah got express permission to perform. But we have already seen that walls and gates were built and broken down previous to his going up. We have also seen that if we are confined to the literal building of the city, the decreed of Cyrus has the preference to all others; and this is a sufficient refutation of the idea. But further, we find in Nehemiah, chap. vi, 15, that the work of building which he went to perform was all accomplished in fifty-two days; whereas for the building of the city in the sense of the prophecy there are allowed seven weeks or forty-nine years.

3. There is not a specification in the grant to Nehemiah which is not included in the decree to Ezra; while the latter is much more full. It is therefore utterly inadmissible to pass over the greater event, and fix upon a subsequent one of less importance, to mark the commencement of an important era in prophecy.

4. Reckoning from the commission to Nehemiah, a. c. 414, the dates throughout are entirely disarranged; for from that point the troublous times which were to attend the building of the street and wall did not last seven weeks or forty-nine years. Reckoning from that date the 87 weeks or 483 years which were to extend to the Messiah the Prince, bring us to a. d. 39-40; but Jesus was baptized of John in Jordan and the voice of his Father heard from heaven declaring him his Son, in a. d. 27, thirteen years before. According to this calculation, the midst of the week which is marked by the crucifixion is placed in a. d. 44; but the crucifixion took place in a. d. 31, thirteen years previous. And lastly the 70 weeks or 490 years, dated from the twentieth of Artaxerxes, extend to a. d. 47, with absolutely nothing to mark their termination. Hence if that be the year, and the grant to Nehemiah the event, from which to reckon, the prophecy has proved a failure.

5. We have no evidence that the permission given to Nehemiah was anything but verbal. We have no record of there being anything given to him but certain letters to the keeper of the king's forest, the governors beyond the river, &c; and if these constitute the decree, the prophecy should read decrees; for there were more than one. But these letters were not addressed to Nehemiah; and of so little importance were they considered by the sacred historian, that he has seen fit to preserve no copy of them, but simply to state their import. While on the other hand, the decree to Ezra was one decree, it was expressly called a decree, it was addressed directly to Ezra, and the Holy Ghost has thought proper to transmit a copy of the original document to the present time.

With these facts in view, no one can long hesitate between the respective commissions of Ezra and Nehemiah, as to which properly marks the commencement of an important prophetic period. Previous to 1844 no Advent believer thought of contending for the latter commission, but since the passing of that time, there has existed in some minds a seeming necessity for the removal of the original dates; and as "necessity is the mother of invention," so it gives some the power of magnifying molehills into mountains.

The application of the argument, thus far, on the 70 weeks and 2300 days remains for our next.

† Connexion, Vol. I, p. 322.

SUMMARY OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 11.

THE 70 WEEKS AND 2300 DAYS (CONCLUDED.)

We have now examined the four grants that were made by the kings of Persia in favor of the Jews, which are the only events to which we can look for the decree to restore and to build Jerusalem. We have seen that the first, second and fourth do not contain the essential features necessary to constitute that decree; but that the third, the decree to Ezra, harmonizes with the conditions of the prophecy in every particular:

1. It contained all the elements necessary to constitute such a decree, and when carried out, resulted in the thorough restoration of the Jewish state. It answered to the prophecy fully in this respect.

2. From the commencement of the work by Ezra, to the last act of reformation by Nehemiah were just forty-nine years, which is the exact period allowed in the prophecy to this work.

3. As this decree went forth a. c. 457, the sixty-nine weeks or 483 years which were to extend to the Messiah the Prince, reckoned from the commencement of the work in the Autumn of that year, bring us to the Autumn of a. d. 27, when our Lord was baptized by John in Jordan and went forth preaching "the time is fulfilled." Mark i. Three and a half years from this, to the midst of the seventieth week, bring us to the Spring of a. d. 31, where it has been demonstrated that the crucifixion took place. Three and a half years more, the last half of the week, terminate the 70 weeks or 490 years in the Autumn of a. d. 34.

Here then we stand at the end of this great period which Gabriel in his explanation of the 2300 days, told Daniel was cut off upon Jerusalem and the Jews. There is this one grand fact yet to be noticed: If the first 490 years terminated in the Autumn of a. d. 34, the whole period ends in the Autumn of a. d. 1844. For 490 taken from 2300, leave 1810; and 1810 added to a. d. 34, where the 400 terminate make 1844.

Previous to 1843 the light concerning the going forth of the decree in a. c. 457, had been clearly set forth. The end of the 2300 days was therefore confidently expected in 1843; for 457 years before Christ, and 1843 after, make just 2300 years. But the fact was overlooked that it takes 457 full years and 1843 full years to make 2300; and that, consequently, if the period had commenced with the very first day of 457, a. c. it would not end till the very last day of 1843, and that therefore, if a portion of the year a. c. 457 had elapsed before the 2300 days commenced, they would cover, before they terminated, a corresponding portion of the year 1844. And when it was taken into consideration that the midst of the seventieth week was marked by the crucifixion, which was in the first Jewish month in the Spring of 31, and that the 70 weeks would therefore end in the seventh month, Autumn of 34, it was at once seen that the days began, not with the starting of Ezra from Babylon in the Spring, but with the commencement of the work at Jerusalem, which it is not probable could be earlier than the seventh month, Autumn, of 457; and commencing at that point they must extend to a corresponding point in the year following 1843, and consequently end in the seventh month, Hebrew reckoning, in the Autumn of 1844.

Such was the chronological argument upon which the preaching of the Advent doctrine of 1844 was based. It was good then; it is good now. Notwithstanding all the efforts that have been made to remove the dates, Honyat is at last compelled to let them stand as they were then placed. There are no Sampsons in the land who can pluck away these pillars of the temple of truth.

With the great fact before us that the 2300 days would end in the Autumn of 1844, we reasoned as follows: 1. The Sanctuary, according to the prophecy, is then to be cleansed. 2. The earth, or the land of Palestine, is the Sanctuary. 3. Its cleansing is to be by fire at the revelation of the Lord Jesus. 4. In the "example and shadow of heavenly things," the high priest on the tenth day of the seventh month, entered the holiest of the earthly sanctuary, to make an atonement and came forth to bless the people. We therefore confidently expected that our great High Priest would descend from heaven in flaming fire and bring deliverance to his people, on the tenth day of the seventh month of that year in which the 2300 days should end.

We need not mention how painful was the disappointment, or how the hopes of God's expectant people were as effectually crucified as were those of the early disciples when they beheld their Master bleeding upon the cross. There had been a mistake somewhere: where or how was it? was the mystery to be solved. Not a few made a precipitous retreat into the world again; and some flew off in the line of a tangent into the most extravagant fancies. But independent of those, three general divisions have arisen from the body of believers as it then existed, each claiming to give a reason why we did not at that time realize our hope.

1. The reason offered by the first class is that the seventy weeks are no part of the 2300 days; that the two periods have different starting points; and that the former affords no key to the explanation of the latter. It requires but a glance to see that this view sets aside entirely the important period of the 2300 days; for if the seventy weeks do not mark its commencement, we challenge the world to tell us where it does commence, or of what possible use it can be on the Sacred Page. So much then of revelation, yet remains unrevealed.

2. The second class have attempted to re-adjust the 2300 days by tearing up the original dates, astronomy and history to the contrary notwithstanding, and so arranging them as to make the point for the cleansing of Palestine or the burning of the earth fall in the future, as it is quite evident that neither of these events have taken place in the past.

3. The third class take the position that the conceptions at first entertained concerning the Sanctuary and its cleansing were incorrect.

The Advent Herald has from time to time since 1844 been putting forth unanswerable vindications of the original dates. But its position hereby became extremely embarrassing; for to admit that the days had ended, and that the earth was not burned, would, according to its own premises, involve the word of God in a positive failure. In order therefore that the days may be indefinitely extended to the future, it has denied the connection between them and the seventy weeks, by which alone we have any clue to their commencement, and thus set them adrift. We learn this from a series of questions addressed by a correspondent to the Editor of the Herald, and his answers as follows:

"Question. In your 'Chronology' the cross is placed in A. D. 31. What are the principal objections which bear against its being placed in A. D. 39?"

"Answer. 1. The absence of any evidence placing it there. 2. The contradiction of the wonderful astronomical, chronological and historical coincidences which show beyond the shadow of controversy that the 7th of Artaxerxes was in B. C. 457-8, that the birth of Christ was B. C. 4-5, that the thirtieth year of Christ was 483 years from the 7th of Artaxerxes, that the crucifixion was in A. D. 31, and that that was the point of time in the last week when the sacrifice and oblation should cease.

"Ques. If the 70 weeks of Dan. ix do not commence in the 20th of Artaxerxes, how can the 2300 days begin at the same time with them, and yet terminate in the future?"

"Ans. They cannot.

"Ques. Must we not henceforth consider that they have different starting points?"

"Ans. Yes."—Advent Herald, May 22d, 1852.

We must now call the reader's attention to that portion of the "original Advent faith," which once formed a part of a standing notice in the Advent papers, under the head of "Points of difference between Us and our Opponents." It is as follows:

"We claim that the ninth of Daniel is an appendix to the eighth, and that the seventy weeks and the 2300 days or years commence together. Our opponents deny this."—Signs of the Times, 1843.

The Herald itself has now denied this, and thus abandoned its original position, and gone over to the ground of its opponents.

Again: "The grand principle involved in the interpretation of the 2300 days of Dan. viii, 14, is, that the 70 weeks of Dan. ix, 24, are the first 490 days of the 2300 of the eighth chapter."—Advent Shield, p. 40. Art., Rise and Progress of Adventism.

"If the connection between the 70 weeks of Dan. ix, and the 2300 days of Dan. viii, does not exist, the whole system is shaken to its foundation; if it does exist as we suppose, the system must stand."—Harmony of Prophetic Chronology, p. 38.

From these extracts it will be seen how serious a departure from the "original Advent faith," is this denial of the Herald's, and of how grave a character. It is taking the position of the opponents of the Advent faith; it is ignoring the "grand principle involved in the interpretation of the 2300 days;" it is yielding a point by which "the whole system is shaken to its foundation." Thus has the Herald turned traitor to its first principles, and ignominiously abandoned the Gibraltar of the prophetic periods to the hands of the enemy. And yet, "We are the Adventists," is the presumptuous claim which it still puts forth. And what are the reasons for all this? Simply these:

"We have no new light respecting the connection between the 70 weeks and the 2300 days. The only argument against their connection is the passing of the time. Why that has passed is a mystery to us, which we wait to have revealed."—Ad. Herald, Sept. 7th, 1850.

Conclusive testimony to show the connection of the 70 weeks and 2300 days has in its place been offered; and we submit to the judgment of the reader if the reasons above alleged are sufficient to disprove it, or to justify so glaring a departure from just rules of interpretation. Even the seeming objection against their connection has been since 1844 thoroughly removed, as will in due time be noticed.

Another class have attempted to re-adjust the reckoning of the days by assigning a later date for the seventy weeks. They took the commission of Nehemiah, in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, as the starting point, and gave it such a date as to make the whole period terminate in 1854. This was the basis of the recent excitement on time that has existed in some parts of the land. The merits of Nehemiah's commission have been already examined. We have seen that it will neither answer the import of the prophecy, nor harmonize with a single date. But 1854 has passed; and even allowing the 20th of Artaxerxes its proper date, B. C. 444, the 2300 days reckoned therefrom could only extend to 1857, which is also passed. That theory therefore has fallen; and those who have rested upon it have been doomed to failure and disappointment which they might have avoided. And now that the utmost limit has passed to which the days can possibly be extenuated, we may hope that some will be willing to view the matter in its true light and admit that the mistake must lay, not in the original reckoning of the time, but in the event to occur at the end of the days.

We have seen the desperate position adopted by the Herald on account of the passing of the time in 1844; we must call attention also to the position assumed by the World's Crisis, so far as we have been able to ascertain it, since the passing of the latter time. We had supposed that the majority of its supporters might as a last resort adopt the conclusion of the Herald, that the periods were not connected. How many of them privately entertain this view we cannot say; but we have not seen it publicly advocated: a prudent silence having for the most part been maintained concerning the prophetic periods.

The last that has come under our notice on the subject is an article from I. C. Wellcome, in the Crisis of Oct. 28, 1857, in which he says:

"That those periods are intended to enlighten our minds and direct our faith in regard to the end of the gospel age, I fully believe. But not that we should so locate their commencement and terminus by historic events as to form a basis for full faith, such as we are required to have in the statements of the gospel. Gospel truths are clear and certain requiring our implicit confidence. But human calculations and historic applications, as connected with prophetic times (though important and useful when used modestly and carefully) may not demand such confidence."

He then proceeds to throw out some suggestions in regard to the prophetic periods in the form of questions, as follows:

"First. Is the definite year of Christ's advent clearly revealed in the Scriptures alone?

"Second. Can all intelligent Christians understand the principle of prophetic reckoning and arguments by which to determine confidently and certainly at what point of time the periods end?

"Third. Can all Christians accurately compute sacred chronology and definitely determine the age of the world?

"Fourth. Are all Christians in circumstances which will permit them to gain access to historical and chronological works, and have capacity and time to study them and gain all the light which may be obtained by able and energetic students?

"Fifth. Are children, young converts, and believers of small capacity required by the gospel to put full confidence in the deductions of more able men on prophetic times and historic research?"

The import of these questions none can fail to perceive. It is to throw an uncertainty over prophetic reckoning; to foster the idea that the periods cannot be understood; and hence to discourage their study, and take the edge from those great truths that are built upon them. It is akin to that popular idea, that much of the word of God is beyond our comprehension and cannot be understood; or, in other words, that revelation is not revelation; which is infidelity. If what was a prophetic period with both ends in the fog? For what were they given, if there is no definiteness to be attached to them? No: all Scripture is profitable; and those prophecies and periods of years which leads us down to scenes connected with the end, are within the easy comprehension of all "able and energetic students," of whom there are not a few, and they can bring them within the comprehension of every child. So it is with the 2300 days. With the data which the Bible gives, and the plain records of history, which are entitled to universal confidence, there need be no hesitation in the application. It is easy, natural, clear, harmonious and definite. There stands that great period in the past like a monument of truth; and no efforts have been able to shake its foundations or to overthrow its structure. Beware then of those who would endeavor to obscure or remove the ancient landmarks. It is a fearful thing to err from truth. If the light in you become darkness how great is that darkness. It is not strange, after all the wild work that has been made by those who have compassed themselves with sparks of their own kindling, that some should have but little confidence in anything. But truth is not responsible for all this, and it is none the less clear, and the prophetic periods are none the less definite and certain on this account.

The idea that if the termination of the prophetic periods is known, the time of the second advent is also known, is a conclusion drawn without warrant; for there is no prophetic period that reaches to the coming of the Saviour as will be hereafter proved. But yet they do bring us to events which it is not safe to lose sight of.

Perhaps some are ready to remind us here that we have not yet explained what did take place in 1844, nor accounted for the passing of the time. The patience of such we must request a little further, as, previous to that, there are other prophetic periods which we wish to notice and apply.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 12.

THE 1290 AND 1335 DAYS.

APPROX important prophetic period upon which the Advent doctrine is based, is the 1335 days of Dan. xii, with which the 1290 days are so intimately connected. These two periods are introduced to us as follows:

"And from the time that the daily (sacrifice) shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days. But go thou thy way till the end be; for thou shalt rest and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." Dan. xii, 11-13.

The questions at once arise, Can we tell what the events are, from which these periods are to be dated; and if so, can we tell when they took place? We first enquire, What is the "daily" (sacrifice) and the "abomination that maketh desolate"? It will be noticed that the word, sacrifice, is in italics; denoting that it is a supplied word. The same will be noticed in the other instances of its occurrence in the book of Daniel, viz., chap. xi, 31 and xiii, 11-13. Let us briefly refer to this latter chapter. In verse 13 it will be observed that two desolations are brought to view; the daily (desolation,) and the transgression of desolation. This fact is made so plain by J. Litch that we cannot do better than quote his language:—

"The daily sacrifice" is the present reading of the text; but no such thing as sacrifice is found in the original. This is acknowledged on all hands. It is a gloss or construction put upon it by the translators. The true reading is, 'the daily and the transgression of desolation'; daily and transgression being connected together by 'and'; the daily desolation and the transgression of desolation. They are two desolating powers which were to desolate the Sanctuary and the host."

From this it is evident that the "daily," can have no reference to the Jewish worship to which it has been applied by the older, and more prevalent opinion; and this is further evident from the consideration that if these periods, taken either literally or figuratively, be dated from any taking away of this worship, they do not bring us to any event whatever worthy of note.

The daily and the abomination then, are two desolating powers which were to oppress the church; can we ascertain what these powers are? We have only to adopt Wm. Miller's method of reasoning on this point to arrive at the same conclusion with him. He says:

"I read on, and could find no other case in which [the daily] was found but in Daniel. I then [by the aid of a concordance] took those words which stood in connection with it, 'take away'; he shall take away the daily; 'from the time that the daily shall be taken away; &c. I read on and thought I should find no light on the text. Finally I came to 2 Thess. ii, 7, 8, 'For the mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way, and then shall that wicked be revealed.' &c. And when I had come to that text, O, how clear and glorious the truth appeared! There it is! That is 'the daily!' Well, now, what does Paul mean by 'he who now letteth' or hindereth? By 'the Man of Sin,' and the 'wicked,' Popery is meant. Well what is it which hinders Popery from being revealed? Why it is Paganism. Well, then, 'the daily' must mean Paganism."

We see from Dan. viii, that it is the little horn, which succeeded the goat, or Grecian empire, that takes away the "daily," and it is the only power brought to view after the division of Alexander's kingdom down to the time when the Sanctuary should be cleansed at the end of the 2300 days. This little horn we have in its proper place showed to be Rome taken as a unit, corresponding with the fourth kingdom of Daniel's other visions. Now it is a fact that a change did take place in the Roman power from Paganism to Popery. Paganism from the days of the Assyrian kings down to the time of its mutilation into Popery, had been the daily, or as Prof. Whiting renders it, "the continual" desolation, by which Satan had stood up against the cause of Jehovah. In its priests, its altars and its sacrifices, it bore resemblance to the Levitical form of Jehovah's worship; but when the Levitical gave place to the Christian form of worship, Satan, in order to successfully oppose the work, must change also his form of opposition; hence the temples, altars and statues of Paganism are baptized into the blasphemous of Popery.

But the daily, Paganism, is said in the prophecy, to have a sanctuary, and the place of its sanctuary was to be cast down. That a sanctuary is frequently connected with idolatry and heathenism, as the place of its devotion and worship, is evident from the following scriptures: Isa. xvi, 12; Amos vii, 9, 13, margin. Exo. xxviii, 18. Concerning the sanctuary of the daily of Dan. viii, we offer the following from Apollon Hale:—

"What can be meant by the 'sanctuary' of Paganism? Paganism, and error of every kind, have their sanctuaries, as well as truth. These are the temples or asylums consecrated to their service. Some particular and renowned temple of Paganism may, then, be supposed to be here spoken of. Which of its numerous distinguished temples may it be? One of the most magnificent specimens of classic architecture is called the Pantheon. Its name signifies the 'temple or asylum of all the gods.' The place of its location is Rome.† The idols of the nations conquered by the Romans were sacredly deposited in some niche or department of this temple, and margin. Exo. xxviii, 18. Concerning the sanctuary of the daily of Dan. viii, we offer the following from Apollon Hale:—

"What can be meant by the 'sanctuary' of Paganism? Paganism, and error of every kind, have their sanctuaries, as well as truth. These are the temples or asylums consecrated to their service. Some particular and renowned temple of Paganism may, then, be supposed to be here spoken of. Which of its numerous distinguished temples may it be? One of the most magnificent specimens of classic architecture is called the Pantheon. Its name signifies the 'temple or asylum of all the gods.' The place of its location is Rome.† The idols of the nations conquered by the Romans were sacrilegiously deposited in some niche or department of this temple, and in many cases became objects of worship by the Romans themselves. Could we find a temple of Paganism that was more strikingly 'his sanctuary'?"

† Advent Manual, p. 66.

* Advent Manual, p. 66.

* Prophetic Exposition, Vol. 1, p. 127.

Having now ascertained that the daily is Paganism, and the transgression of desolation, or "the abomination that maketh desolate," is the Papacy, and that the especial sanctuary of Paganism was the Pantheon, and that the "place" of its location was Rome, we inquire further,

1. Was Paganism "taken away" by the Roman civil power? The following statement of an important and well-known fact in the history of the church and world, we think answers to the prophecy. It refers to Constantine the first Christian emperor, and says:

"His first act of government was the despatch of an edict throughout the empire, exhorting his subjects to embrace christianity."‡

2. Was Rome the city or place of his sanctuary, (the Pantheon,) cast down by the authority of the State? The following extract answers:

"The death of the last rival of Constantine had sealed the peace of the empire. Rome was once more the undisputed queen of nations. But, in that hour of elevation and splendor, she had been raised to the edge of a precipice. Her next step was to be downward and irrecoverable. The change of the government to Constantinople still perplexes the historian. It was an act in direct repugnance to the whole course of the ancient and honorable prejudices of the Roman mind. It was the work of no luxurious Asiatic, devoted to the indulgences of eastern customs and climates, but an iron conqueror, born in the west, and contemptuous, like all Romans, of the habits of the orientals; it was the work of a keen politician, yet it was impolitic in the most palpable degree. Yet Constantine abandoned Rome, the great citadel and throne of the Caesars, for an obscure corner of Thrace, and expelled the remainder of his vigorous and ambitious life in the double toil of raising a colony into the capital of his empire, and degrading the capital into the feeble honors and humiliated strength of a colony."*

This record from the pen of the historian, is too plain to need comment. The place of his sanctuary was cast down, says the prophecy; and after a statement of facts like the above, the most fastidious is prophetic interpretation must be satisfied of its application.

From the time that the daily shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred five and thirty days. With the facts before us that the daily is Paganism, that the abomination that maketh desolate is the Papacy, that there was a change from the former to the latter in the Roman power, and by the authority of State we have but to inquire further when this took place in a manner to fulfill the prophecy; for if we can ascertain this, we have the starting point from which the prophetic periods in the text before us are to be dated. Therefore,

3. When did the event referred to in the prophecy take place? Let it be observed, the question is not, when were the saints given into the hands of the Papacy, but when had the change of religion from Paganism to Papacy been so far effected as to make the latter the national religion, and place it in a condition to start upon its career. This, like all other great revolutions, was not the work of a moment. Its incipient workings were manifest long before. Paul said that even in his day the mystery of iniquity, the Man of Sin, the "abomination that maketh desolate," was already at work. And it is in the light of this scripture that we must understand our Lord's words in Matt. xxiv, 15, concerning the abomination of desolation, where he makes evident reference to Dan. ix, 27. For although Paganism had not given place to the Papacy in the year 70 when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, we do understand that the power which then appeared modified somewhat in name and form, was the very power that should, as the abomination of desolation, wear out the saints and desolate the church of the Most High.

Up to the time of the conversion of Clovis, king of France, which took place in 496, the French and other nations of western Rome were Pagan; but subsequent to that event the efforts to convert idolaters to Christ were crowned with great success. It is said that the conversion of Clovis gave rise to the custom of addressing the French monarch with the title of Most Christian Majesty, and Eldest Son of the Church† "Between that time and a. d. 508, by alliances, 'capitulations' and conquests, 'the Arvernici,' the 'Roman garrisons in the west,' Brittany, the Burgundians and the Visigoths, were brought into subjection."‡

"Paganism in the western Roman Empire, though it doubtless retarded the progress of the Christian faith, especially in those nations which were molested, as in the case of England, by the inroads of the barbarous clans, who continued idolaters, hopesforth had not the power, if it had the disposition to suppress the Catholic faith, or to hinder the encroachments of the Roman Pontiff. From that time, the Papal abomination was triumphant, so far as Paganism was concerned. Its future contests were with the other Christian sects, who were always treated as heretics; and with princes who were always treated as rebels or dividers of the body of Christ. The prominent powers of Europe gave up their attachment to Paganism only to perpetuate its abominations in another form; for Paganism needed only to be baptized to become Christian in the Catholic sense; and when the interests or vengeance of its prevailing minister made the demand, their possessions and thrones,—perhaps their lives,—must be laid on the altar."§

† "Goodrich's Universal Hist. and Geog."

‡ Croley, p. 86.

* Croley, pp. 207, 8.

† Mosheim Ch. Hist. Vol. I, pp. 132, 133.

‡ Ad. Manual, p. 73.

§ Ibid. pp. 76, 76.

In England, Arthur, the first christian king, founded the Christian worship on the ruins of the Pagan.* Rapin, who claims to be more exact in the chronology of events in his history, states that he was elected monarch of Britain in 508. Book ii, p. 120.

What was the condition of the See of Rome at this time? "Symmachus was Pope from 498 or 9 to 514. His pontificate was distinguished by these remarkable circumstances and events:

"1. He 'left Paganism' when he entered the 'church of Rome.'

"2. He found his way to the Papal chair by striving with his competitor even unto blood. Du Pin.

"3. By the adulation paid to him as the successor of St. Peter.

"4. By the excommunication of the Emperor Anastasius †

"How much," says Mosheim, "the opinions of some were favorable to the lordly demands of the Roman Pontiffs, may be easily imagined from an expression of Ennodius, that infamous and extravagant flatterer of Symmachus, who was a prelate of ambiguous fame. This parasitical panegyrist, among other impertinent assertions maintained that the Pontiff was constituted judge in the place of God, which he filled as the Viceroy of the Most High."‡

By the strength secured to the Catholic cause in the west, by these successes, and the agency of the vicars, and other agents of the See of Rome, the Papal party in Constantinople were "placed" in a position to justify open hostilities in behalf of their master at Rome. "In 508 the whirlwind of fanaticism and civil war swept in fire and blood through the streets of the eastern capital."

Gibbon, under the years 508-514, speaking of the commotions in Constantinople, says "The statues of the emperor were broken, and his person was concealed in a suburb, till, at the end of three days, he dared to implore the mercy of his subjects. [Popery is triumphant.] Without his diadem, and in the posture of a suppliant, Anastasius appeared on the throne of the circus. The Catholics, before his face, rehearsed the genuine Trisagion; they exulted in the offer which he proclaimed by the voice of a herald, of abdicating the purple; they listened to the admonition, that, since all could not reign, they should previously agree in the choice of a sovereign; and they accepted the blood of two unpopular ministers, whom their master, without hesitation, condemned to the fons. Those furious but transient seditions were encouraged by the success of Vitellius, who with his army of Huns and Bulgarians, for the most part idolaters, declared himself the champion of the Catholic faith. In this pious rebellion he depopulated Thracia, besieged Constantinople, exterminated sixty-five thousand of his fellow christians, till he obtained the recall of the bishops, the satisfaction of the Pope, and the establishment of the council of Chalcedon, an orthodox treaty, reluctantly signed by the dying Anastasius, and more faithfully performed by the uncle of Justinian. And such was the event of the first of the religious wars which have been waged in the name, and by the disciples, of the God of Peace."§

With the following extract from Apollon Hale, we close the testimony on this point: "We now invite our modern Gamaliels to take a position with us in the place of the sanctuary of Paganism (since claimed as the 'patrimony of St. Peter') in 508. We look a few years into the past, and the rude Paganism of the northern barbarians is pouring down upon the nominally Christian empire of Western Rome—triumphing everywhere—and its triumphs everywhere distinguished by the most savage cruelty. . . . The empire falls and is broken into fragments. One by one the lords and rulers of these fragments, abandon their Paganism and profess the Christian faith. In religion the conquerors are yielding to the conquered. But still Paganism is triumphant. Among its supporters there is one stern and successful conqueror.

(Clotius.) But soon he also bows before the power of the new faith and becomes its champion. He is still triumphant, but, as a hero and conqueror, reaches the zenith at the point we occupy, A. D. 508.

"In or near the same year, the last important subdivision of the fallen empire is publicly, and by the coronation of its triumphant 'monarch' christianized.

"The pontiff for the period on which we stand is a recently converted Pagan. The blood, contest which placed him in the chair was decided by the interposition of an Arian king. He is bowed to and saluted as filling 'the place of God on earth.' The senate is so far under his power, that, on suspicion that the interests of the See of Rome demand it, they excommunicate the emperor. . . . In 508 the mine is sprung beneath the throne of the Eastern Empire. The result of the confusion and strife it occasions is the humiliation of its rightful lord. Now the question is, At what time was Paganism so far suppressed, as to make room for its substitute and successor, the Pagan abomination? When was this abomination placed in a position to start on its career of blasphemy and blood? Is there any other date for its being 'placed,' or 'set up' in the room of Paganism, but 508? If the mysterious enchantress has not now brought all her victims within her power, she has taken her position, and some have yielded to the fascination. The others are at length subdued, 'and kings, and peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues,' are brought under the spell which prepares them, even while 'drunken with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus,' to 'think they are doing God service,' and to fancy themselves the exclusive favorites of heaven, while becoming an easier and richer prey for the damnation of hell!"

We have the date. The "daily" was taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up in 508. Dating from this point the 1260 days or years terminate in 1768 where, as has already been shown, the civil power was stricken from the Pope by the arm of Buonaparte. The 1335 days bring us 45 full years this side of that event.

But some may say, How is it that you make the periods terminate in the past? Does it not read that Daniel should rest and stand in his lot at the end of the days? Certainly; and we believe it. But what is it for Daniel to stand in his lot? This point will come under consideration when we come to an explanation of the passing of the time, and an examination of the events that did take place at the end of the days. Meanwhile we here cast anchor till another week.

* Encyclopædia, Art. Arthur.

† Ad. Manual, p. 78.

‡ Church Hist. Vol. I, p. 162.

§ Decline and Fall, Vol. iv, p. 526.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH. No. 13.

THE ANGEL ON LAND AND SEA.

With our last paper we closed the examination of the prophetic periods. We have seen that they are all fulfilled and in the past. Before passing to the events to which they brought us, we wish to notice briefly the movement among the people of God which marked this important period, and the prophecies which foretold it.

John saw, as we are informed in the Xth of Revelation, a mighty angel come down from heaven. . . . And he had in his hand a little book open, and he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot on the earth, and cried with a loud voice as when a lion roareth. . . . "And the angel which I saw," says John "stand upon the sea and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to heaven, and swear by him that liveth forever and ever, . . . that there should be time no longer. But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God shall be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets."

Let this angel and his testimony be particularly noticed: 1st. He swears to time. 2d. He has in his hand a little book open. 3d. He stands with one foot on the sea and the other on the land.

1. He swears to time, and declares that it shall be no longer. What kind of time does he refer to? It must be one of three kinds: literal, probationary, or prophetic. But it cannot be literal time as measured off by months and years; for the angel immediately after speaks of the days of the voice of the seventh angel: no doubt meaning years, as in other prophecies. And we have further a period of 1000 years measured off, even after the resurrection. Rev. xx. It cannot therefore be what we understand by literal time. But does it not mean probationary time? We answer, No; for the angel declares to John, who doubtless personates the church, that he must "prophesy again before many peoples and nations and tongues and kings. Probation then still lingers after this angel utters his oath. These considerations compel us to the conclusion that it is prophetic time to which he refers. In other words, he declares that with his testimony the prophetic periods end. Look carefully, reader, at this subject. Walk all around it. Look in every direction and see if you can find an avenue to any other conclusion than is here presented. An angel swears that time—some kind of time—shall be no longer. He immediately speaks of days (years) to succeed, and he tells John, and through him the church, to prophesy again before many peoples, showing that there is yet mercy to plead for them, and yet room to receive them. Now as it is certain that some time ends, according to the angel's oath, and as it is certain that only three kinds can be referred to, and as the angel by his testimony settles the matter in regard to two kinds, that he does not refer to them, it is certain that he must refer to the only other kind remaining, and that is prophetic time. This will appear further as we consider the next item.

2. He has in his hand a little book open. As his testimony relates to prophetic time, it must be based on that portion of the Word which treats of prophetic time, and that is pre-eminently the book of Daniel. But what did the angel tell Daniel concerning his book? Said he, [Dan. xii, 4, 9,] "Shut up the words and seal the book even to the time of the end." . . . "The words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end." But the angel has in his hand a little book open. This little book doubtless represents the book of Daniel, which contains the very points concerning which the angel testifies, and as it is open when he bears his testimony, we have a clue to the chronology of his work. We know that it is in the time of the end that he proclaims his solemn message from land and sea; for not till then is the book opened and the prophecy unsealed. But when is the time of the end?

This may be easily ascertained by comparing Dan. vii, 25, with chap. xi, 35. The tribulation of the saints in this last quotation is evidently the same as their oppression by the little horn, the Man of sin; and they were to be given into his hand until a time, times, and the dividing of time, which we have already shown to be 1260 years, commencing in 538, and terminating in 1798. This date therefore marks the commencement of the time of the end; and since that period we must locate the angel on the land and sea.

In Rev. xiv, an angel is also brought to view who has a message of time, based on the same foundation as the proclamation of chap. x; namely, the time of the end and the unsealing of the prophecies. He is thus introduced by John: [xiv, 6:] "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and kindred and tongue and people, saying, Fear God and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come."

This is called "another angel," because John had before seen an angel flying through heaven, after the fourth angel had sounded, announcing three war trumpets to come. We call him the first angel, because he is the first of the series of the three angels, of this XIVth chapter; and his message, therefore is designated as the first angel's message. He has the everlasting gospel to preach, which we understand to be the same as the "gospel of the kingdom" mentioned by our Saviour in Matt. xxiv, 14. But it is not in the order of God to employ literal angels to preach the gospel. This has been committed unto men. This angel must therefore be a symbol of the church; and his message must be a special proclamation by God's people, the true church, to be made at the point of time where this message is located.

Upon its chronology, we shall offer but a word. We remark, 1st. that such a message as this was not given by the apostles. They did not preach that the hour of God's judgment had come, or was coming in their day; but they reasoned of a judgment to come. See Acts xvii, 31; xxiv, 25; 2 Thess. ii, 3. 2d. It was not given by the reformers. They did not preach, the hour of God's judgment is come. Martin Luther placed the judgment about 300 years in the future from his time. 3d. Being a message of time, it must be based on the prophetic periods; but no message based on the prophetic periods, can be given till the book containing those periods is unsealed; and the book was not unsealed, according to the testimony of the angel to Daniel, till the time of the end, the commencement of which the prophecy locates in 1798. We cannot therefore look for the angel with the judgment-hour cry, till subsequent to that date. And this makes the chronology of this angel the same as that of the angel in chap. x. And since their work is also the same, and based upon the same foundation, and there cannot be a double fulfillment of the same work at the same time, we conclude that the angels of chap. x, and xiv, 6, are identical.

We have already seen that the prophetic periods cannot extend beyond 1844; and we have now the fact before us that the time of the end, to which the book containing those periods, was closed up and sealed, could not commence earlier than 1798: between this point, therefore, and 1844, we must listen for the oath of the mighty angel, that time shall be no more, and the solemn message that the hour of his judgment is come. Has such a message gone forth? and in the right time? We answer, Yes; and testimony on this point, brings us to the remaining item to be noticed in reference to this angel; namely,

3. He had one foot on the sea, and the other on the land. That just such a movement as has of late years taken place on the Advent question, is contemplated in the prophecy, we cannot doubt. If any are disposed to question this conclusion, let them consider the matter, and tell us what kind of a move they would expect in fulfillment of those prophecies. Let them tell us how a proclamation of the close of the prophetic periods, and the coming of God's judgment hour, would differ from the work there brought to view. But a proclamation has gone forth embodying both these particulars. A mighty movement has taken place, based upon the evidence that the prophetic periods were about to close. It came up at the right time, being subsequent to the unsealing of the book, in the time of the end. It commenced years previous, but culminated in 1844. The Advent movement! The world witnessed it; and the world has not forgotten it. In the city and in the country, in the towns and in the villages, in the quiet districts, and in the crowded wards, in cars and coaches, and in ships and steamers, as they coursed in every direction over the mighty deep, the sound was going forth, The hour of his judgment is come. It sped on till it encircled the globe. Truly the angel had one foot on the sea, as well as on the land. It has been stated that there was not, at that time, a missionary station on the globe, to which the message did not penetrate. [For a full discussion of this subject the reader is referred to the work entitled, The Three Angels of Rev. xiv, by J. N. Andrews, published at this Office.]

It will be no infringement upon the design of these articles not to speak particularly of the second angel of Rev. xiv, after referring the reader to the above work. Suffice it to say that he follows the first with a solemn announcement. "Babylon is fallen," is the cry that is heard from his lips. This also has been fulfilled in our day. It is a fact that the confused sects of the present day, which we think the Holy Spirit here designates by the term Babylon, mixture, confusion, (since it is true of them in fact,) did meet by the rejection of the doctrine of the Lord's speedy advent, whom they profess to love, and whose appearing they ought therefore also to love;—it is a fact, we say, that by the rejection of this truth, they did meet with a moral fall, a declension in every department of religion, piety and virtue. Although all may not agree with us in the cause, the fact of this change is no assertion of our own. Out of their own mouth we judge them in this respect. It has been acknowledged and deplored by almost every organ of the religious world. As a result of this movement in 1844, it has been computed that fifty thousand left her communion. And we verily believe that a testimony is now ripening, which, in fulfillment of Rev. xviii, 1-4, will bring from her ranks every child of God.

We have thus briefly noticed the move that took place, and such as we might expect would take place to mark the close of the prophetic periods. The days have ended, and a mighty angel has sworn to the fact. No man may undo his testimony. By this we are brought to the autumn of 1844. The testimony that centers upon this point from the infallible witnesses of the Word is this: Then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed: then will prophetic time be no longer: then is the hour of God's judgment come. Has this failed in any particular? Let none conclude so, till we have pursued our investigations still further. We are now brought to the subject, which from this point onward is the golden key to unlock the portals of the future.

NOTE.—The above illustration is projected on a scale of four cubits to an inch, from the size of the tabernacle as erected by Moses in the wilderness. It is true that the large cherubim were not erected in the Most Holy Place, (iii) it was permanently located in Solomon's temple, where the proportions of the Sanctuary, in length, breadth and height, were enlarged to double the size in which they had formerly existed. We have chosen however to take the dimensions of the tabernacle for a standard, and reduce the cherubim to one half their size to correspond, in order to give more prominence to the furniture. We have not represented the high priest in his yearly ministration before the ark, since as he entered in from the Holy Place he would only present his back to the beholder, and necessarily hide the ark from view.

AN INQUIRY CONCERNING THE SANCTUARY.

We have now reached a point in the course of our investigation, where we are led to inquire, What is the Sanctuary, and what is the nature of its cleansing? We have briefly noticed the mass of testimony that clusters about, and centers in, 1844, as the termination of the prophetic periods; and whatever were our expectations of the events to transpire at that time, it is certain that all the ground we had upon which to base them was the declaration of the angel to Daniel, "Then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed," or the announcement of that messenger of the Apocalypse, "The hour of his judgment is come."

We have seen that the evidence which determines the commencement and the reckoning of the 2300 days, so as to bring their termination in the year 1844, can neither be annulled nor evaded; consequently the efforts that have been made by two classes, the one to remove the original date for the commencement of the days, and the other to render them null and void, by disconnecting them from the 70 weeks, have no light nor truth in them. We say, therefore, that the subject of the Sanctuary as it was then held, demands a reconsideration.

The course of reasoning, by which we were led to look for the personal appearing of the Lord at the end of the days, by considering the earth, or some part of it, the Sanctuary, and its cleansing a regeneration by fire, to be preceded by the coming of the Son of man, has been already noticed. Was this incorrect? In determining this, the first thing to be ascertained is,

What is the Sanctuary? To learn what the Sanctuary now is, it will be necessary to go back to the fountain head of revelation and see what has been recognized by the Bible as the Sanctuary, in times past. The apostle Paul in his epistle to the Hebrews, introduces the subject fairly before us. In chap. viii, he contrasts two covenants, the first and the second, the old and the new, under the latter of which we now live. He then opens in chap. ix, as follows:

"Then verily the first covenant, had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary. For there was a tabernacle made; the first, wherein was the candlestick, and the table and the shew-bread; which is called the sanctuary; and after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the Holiest of all; which had the golden censer, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant; and over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat," &c. Verses 1-5.

The Apostle here tells us that the tabernacle, thus ordained, was the sanctuary of the first covenant. Turning back to the records of the times during which the first covenant was in force, do we find any mention of such a building, as is here described by Paul? Yes, the most explicit. Let us briefly notice it:

The word of promise which God had left for the children of Israel, while buried in Egyptian bondage, that he would surely visit them, and bring them out of the land of Egypt, [Gen. 1, 24,] had been fulfilled, and they were delivered. In the song of triumph which Moses sang upon that occasion, he said, The Lord is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation: he is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation. Ex. xv, 2. In this we receive the first intimation of that building which God would afterwards cause to be erected, that he might dwell among his people. In verse 17 of the same chapter, is the first occurrence of the word Sanctuary which we find in the Bible.

Pursuing the sacred record we find in the twenty-fifth chapter of Exodus and onward, more definite information respecting the sanctuary; namely, the commission which God gave to Moses for its erection. In the third month after their departure from Egypt, the children of Israel came to the wilderness of Sinai. There Moses was summoned up into the mount to an audience with his Maker. He remained there forty days and forty nights. During this time he was shown the pattern of the Sanctuary and all its sacred vessels, and received full instructions concerning them.

A particular description of the tabernacle, as erected by Moses, we need not enter into. It is minutely set forth in Exodus, chaps. xxv-xxx. Suffice it here to say that it was a structure of extraordinary magnificence formed of upright boards overlaid with gold, thirty cubits long, about ten in width, and ten in height. At the east end, which was the entrance, there were five pillars of shittim wood, whose chapiters and filets were overlaid with gold, having hooks of gold, standing on five sockets of brass. Over the tabernacle thus erected were thrown four different coverings. The first and inner curtain was composed of fine linen embroidered with figures of cherubim, in blue, purple and scarlet. This formed the magnificent ceiling. The second covering was made of goat's hair; the third of ram's skins dyed red; and the fourth and last, of badgers' skins. The east end was enclosed with a richly embroidered curtain, suspended from the pillars before mentioned.

The sacred tent was divided into two apartments by means of a veil suspended from four pillars of shittim wood overlaid with gold, set in sockets of silver. In what proportion the Sanctuary was thus divided, we are not informed, but it is supposed to be the same as was afterwards observed in the temple. 1 Kings vi.

In the first apartment, or holy place, were three things worthy of notice; the golden candlestick, the table of showbread, and the altar of incense. In the second apartment or most holy place, were also three things to claim attention: the ark, the mercy-seat, and the cherubim. It was above the ark, over the mercy-seat, between the cherubim, that God manifested his presence, and from whence he communicated with his people. Ex. xxv, 22. And so David prays, "Thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth." Ps. lxxx. 1.

It is to be observed that neither the holy nor most holy place had any window; hence in the first apartment there was need of the candlestick with its seven lamps; and in regard to the second where God dwelt, Solomon said, "The Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness." 1 Kings viii, 12.

Before the door of the tabernacle was placed the brazen laver, and the altar of burnt offering, and around the whole was erected the court with its curtains of fine twined linen.

In the second year after Israel had departed from Egypt, in the first month, on the first day of the month, the tabernacle was reared up. And Moses spread abroad the tent over the tabernacle, and he put the testimony (the tables of ten commandments) into the ark, and the mercy-seat upon it, and brought it into the tabernacle, and set up the veil; he placed the table of showbread, and golden candlestick, in the first apartment, and lighted the lamps before the Lord; he put the golden altar of incense before the veil and burnt sweet incense thereon; and on the altar before the door of the tabernacle he offered the burnt-offering and the meat offering, as the Lord commanded. Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. Ex. xl.

We have now before us the sanctuary as Moses erected it in the wilderness of Sinai 1490 years before Christ. With its ark of the covenant, its mercy-seat, and glorious Shekinah, it constituted the heart and center of Israel's religious worship, under that typical system.

The children of Israel were at this time in the period of their wandering; and therefore the sanctuary as first given to them was adapted to their condition: being so constructed that it could be easily taken down and borne with them in their journeys, and immediately erected wherever the Divine Presence, which accompanied them in a cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night, should direct them to pitch their camp. Num. ix, 15-23.

The Levites were consecrated to the service of the sanctuary, and were commanded to bear it and all its sacred vessels, when the camp set forward. Thus it was with them during the forty years in which they journeyed in the wilderness. During this time this building which God claimed as his dwelling-place, and where his service was performed, is fifty-six times called the Sanctuary in the following instances: Ex. xxv, 8; xxx, 13, 24; xxxvi, 1, 3, 4, 6; xxxviii, 21-27; Lev. iv, 6; v, 15; x, 4; xii, 4; xvi, 33; xix, 30; xx, 3; xxi, 12, (twice,) 23; (plural;) xxvi, 2; xxvii, 3, 25; Num. iii, 28, 31, 32, 38, 47, 50; iv, 12, 15, (twice,) 10; vii, 9, 13, 10, 25, 31, 37, 43, 49, 53, 61, 67, 73, 79, 85, 86; viii, 10; x, 21; xviii, 1, 3, 5, 16; xix, 20.

From its entrance into Canaan, it is easy to trace the history of this building till it was embodied in the larger and more glorious structure of the temple of Solomon. We trace it down to the period when it was overthrown by Nebuchadnezzar, and suffered to remain in ruins during the 70 years of the Babylonian captivity. From the time that it was rebuilt by Zerubbabel, we follow it, until the days of our Saviour, by whom it was declared forever desolate. We trace it, after this event, through its brief, but nominal existence, to the year A. D. 70, when we forever lose sight of it in that destruction, by which it was overwhelmed through the violence of the Roman soldiers.

This was the sanctuary of the first covenant. There can be no doubt on this point with any who yet have confidence in divine revelation. It is directly declared to be such by the apostle Paul; and of the one hundred and forty-two times of the occurrence of the word in the Old Testament, it refers in almost every instance to this building. The main question at issue then, is, What is the Sanctuary of the second or new covenant? This next claims consideration.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH. No. 15.

THE SANCTUARY. (CONTINUED.)

We closed last week with the inquiry on our hands, What is the Sanctuary of the new covenant? When Paul speaks of a first covenant, [Heb. ix.] he necessarily implies a second; and when he connects with that first covenant a Sanctuary and ordinances of divine service, he as clearly implies that the second will have a Sanctuary with divine service also. But on this point we draw direct testimony from the prophecy of Daniel. There was a period of 2300 years revealed to him, at the end of which the Sanctuary should be cleansed; but only 490 of those years were allotted to the first covenant, to the worldly Sanctuary, and to the Jewish church. At the end of that period, the confirmation of "the covenant," (the now or second covenant) should, according to the prophecy, be finished. Then should the old covenant have passed away, and the new one have been introduced. Then should the services of the worldly Sanctuary have forever ceased. Then the Jewish church should no longer have pre-eminence as the children of God, above any other people. But 1810 years still remain before 2300 are completed, and yet at the end of that period, the Sanctuary is to be cleansed. Therefore the second covenant has a Sanctuary and ordinances of divine service also.

As we pursue our inquiries to ascertain what constitutes this Sanctuary, the opinions that already exist upon the subject, demand attention; for we have no right to deviate from opinions already existing upon any question, provided they are sound and true; and we have no right to introduce any new views upon them till we have first shown the fallacy of the old.

Entering the field to search for truth on this point, four prominent views rise up before us. It is claimed by some that the land of Canaan is now the Sanctuary. Others contend that it comprises the whole earth. Still others there are, who take the word in a more spiritual, but no less unauthenticated sense, and say that it means the Church. While the fourth view, which draws largest on our imagination and marvellousness, makes out this rolling earth to be only the first apartment of the new-covenant Sanctuary, and all heaven the second.

If we would form correct views on this question, there is one thing which we must keep constantly before us, and that is, the relation which the Sanctuaries of the two covenants sustain to each other; namely, that of type and antitype. By keeping our eye steadfastly fixed upon this, it will be almost as hard to arrive at wrong conclusions, as it would be easy, were we to lose sight of it.

To this end we call attention to the numerous instances in which the worldly Sanctuary is declared to be a pattern of the true. "Let them make me a Sanctuary," said the Lord to Moses, "according to all that I show thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it." Ex. xxv, 8, 9. "And look that thou make them after their pattern which was showed thee in the mount." Verse 40. "And thou shalt rear up the tabernacle according to the fashion thereof which was showed thee in the mount." Chap. xxvi, 30. "As it was showed thee in the mount, so shall they make it." Chap. xxvii, 8. "Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speaking unto Moses that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen." Acts vii, 44. "While as the first tabernacle was yet standing, which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices," &c. Heb. ix, 8, 9. "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true." Verse 24.

From this testimony but one conclusion can be drawn; namely, that the true Sanctuary is the pattern from which the earthly tabernacle was erected, and that whatever object we may find of which this earthly sanctuary was a true type or figure, that object is the Sanctuary of the better covenant under which we now live, and the cleansing of which the unerring word of the Lord locates at the termination of the 2300 days. We are therefore prepared for the following questions:

1. IS THE EARTH THE SANCTUARY? To this question, we reply emphatically in the negative. It is not; and if we are requested to prove a negative, we offer in its support, the following reasons: 1st. The word Sanctuary occurs 146 times in the Bible and is not in a single instance applied to the earth. Now if it was really the intention of the Holy Ghost to teach us that the earth was the Sanctuary, it seems that it ought, at least once to have called it so. 2d. The definition of the term, sanctuary, according to Walker, Webster, Cruden and the Bible, is, A holy place, a sacred place, a dwelling place for the Most High; but every one knows that the earth is neither a dwelling place for God, nor yet a holy, or sacred place. This fact alone should forever exclude the idea of its being the Sanctuary. But 3d. Take into consideration the typical and antitypical nature of the Sanctuary, and the absurdity of this view will appear in a still stronger light. The earthly Sanctuary was a type or figure of the true; but pray tell us in what respect it prefigured this rolling earth. Can it for a moment be supposed that Moses, when in the mount, was shown this earth, as the pattern from which he was to erect the Sanctuary, and that the nearest resemblance he could make of it, was an oblong building ten cubits in width and three times that number in length? And we might pursue this train of thought still further and inquire what on earth answers as antitype to the golden candlestick. Is it the leaning tower of Pisa, or the pyramids of Egypt? And what to the altar of incense? Is it mount Vesuvius, or Hecla? And what to the table of shewbread? The plateau of South America, or the Steppes of Russia? But we need not spend time longer to write, nor trouble the reader longer to read, concerning a view so manifestly absurd.

2. IS THE LAND OF CANAAN THE SANCTUARY? The arguments which show that the earth is not the Sanctuary of the new covenant, bear with equal force against that view which would claim that honor for the land of Canaan. But as there are, out of the 146 times of the occurrence of the word sanctuary in the Bible, some two or three texts which are urged in favor of this view, we will examine them and see if they will bear the meaning which they have been supposed to convey. The first is Exodus xv, 17, and reads as follows: "Thou shalt bring them in and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the Sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established." Before it is decided however that this text fixes the application of the Sanctuary to the land of Canaan, let the Psalmist's commentary on this very passage be taken into consideration. He says: "And he led them on safely, so that they feared not, but the sea overwhelmed their enemies. And he brought them to the border of his Sanctuary, even to this mountain which his right hand had purchased, and he built his Sanctuary like high palaces, like the earth which he hath established forever." Ps. lxxviii, 68, 69. On these passages we offer the following extract from "The Sanctuary," by J. N. A.:

"The first of these texts, it will be noticed, is taken from the song of Moses, after the passage of the Red Sea. It is a prediction of what God would do for Israel. The second text was written about five hundred years after the song of Moses. What Moses utters as a prediction, the Psalmist records as a matter of history. Hence the Psalm is an inspired commentary on the song of Moses. If the first text be read without the other, the idea might be gathered that the mountain was the Sanctuary, though it does not directly state this. Even as one might get the idea that the tribe of Judah was Mount Zion, were they to read only the expression, 'but chose the tribe of Judah, the Mount Zion which he loved,' [Ps. lxxviii, 68,] and omit those texts which inform us that Mount Zion was the city of David, a part of Jerusalem, [2 Sam. v, 6, 7,] and was located in Judah, as one of its cities. Ezra i, 3; Ps. lxxix, 35. But if the second text be read in connection with the first, it destroys the possibility of such an inference. The Psalmist states that the mountain of the inheritance was the border of the Sanctuary. And that God, after driving out the heathen before his people, proceeded to build his Sanctuary like high palaces. See 1 Chron. xxi, 1. 1. The land of Canaan was the mountain of the inheritance. Ex. xv, 17. 2. That mountain was the border of the Sanctuary. Ps. lxxviii, 69. 3. In that border God built his Sanctuary. Ps. lxxviii, 69. 4. In that Sanctuary God dwelt. Ps. lxxiv, 7; Ex. xxv, 8. 5. In that border the people dwelt. Ps. lxxviii, 54, 55. These facts demonstrate that the same Spirit moved both those 'holy men of old.'"

Listen also to the distinction between the land of Canaan and the Sanctuary as pointed out by a king of Judah: "Art not thou our God, who didst drive out the inhabitants of this land before thy people Israel, and gavest it to the seed of Abraham thy friend forever. And they dwell therein and have built thee a Sanctuary therein for thy name, saying, If, when evil comes upon us, as the sword, judgment or pestilence, or famine, we stand before this house, and in thy presence (for thy name is in this house) and cry unto thee in our affliction, then thou wilt hear and help." 2 Chron. xx, 7-9.

There is another text claimed by some as proof that Canaan is the Sanctuary: Isa. lxxiii, 18. "The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little while: our adversaries have trodden down thy Sanctuary." It is by no means certain that the land is here referred to, since anything else may be trodden down as well as the land. Nothing therefore but an inference can be drawn from it; and one plain fact is sufficient to demolish this to its lowest foundations: when God's people were driven out of the land of Canaan (as the prophet here predicts, using the past tense for the future) they were not only dispossessed of their inheritance, but the Sanctuary of God built in that land was laid in ruins. This fact is plainly stated in 2 Chron. xxxvi, 17-20, which divests the passage of all mystery.

Only one text more remains to be urged in favor of the land of Canaan. As such we present it. "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir-tree, the pine-tree and the box together, to beautify the place of my Sanctuary; and I will make the place of my feet glorious." Isa. lx, 13. Had the distinction ever been kept in view, between the Sanctuary and the place of the Sanctuary, we should have had no occasion to notice this text. But if people persist in ignoring this distinction, we would remind them that the same text calls the place of the Sanctuary, the place of the Lord's feet also; and if by being the place of the Sanctuary it becomes the Sanctuary itself, by being the place of his feet, it becomes, by a parity of reasoning, his feet also. When any just grounds can be shown for avoiding this conclusion, it will be time to notice the passage further. We can only conclude then, not that the land of Canaan is the Sanctuary, but that it is simply the place where the typical Sanctuary was located.

3. There is a third class (if they are numerous enough to warrant the term) who contend that the first apartment of the Sanctuary embraces the whole earth, and that it takes all heaven to make the second. How it is that persons with common proportions of intellect and honesty, can adopt a view which draws so largely on our imagination and marvellousness, we are at a loss to understand. On this point the reader is referred to the remarks already made upon the earth. A part of its absurdity is there shown; the other part will be noticed when we come to treat upon the ministration and service with which the Sanctuary stands connected.

4. IS THE CHURCH THE SANCTUARY? We answer, It is not. Do you ask for our reasons? One fact alone is sufficient to annihilate the idea: It is never once in the word of God called the Sanctuary. Another definite object is invariably called the Sanctuary, and the church is uniformly connected with that object as the host or worshippers; the Sanctuary itself being the place of that worship, or towards which their prayer was directed. There is one text that may be urged on this point and we therefore notice it: "When Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language, Judah was his Sanctuary, and Israel his dominion." Ps. cxiv,

1. This would however only prove that one of the twelve tribes was the Sanctuary and that the whole church was not. But if the fact be remembered that God chose Jerusalem which was in Judah, as the place of his Sanctuary, we think the following from another psalm will fully explain the connection between Judah and the Sanctuary of God, and show that Judah was the tribe with which God designed to locate his habitation: "But chose the tribe of Judah the mount Zion which he loved. And he built his Sanctuary like high palaces (see 1 Chron. xxix, 1) like the earth which he hath established forever." Ps. lxxviii, 68, 69. But could a single text be produced in favor of the view that the church is the Sanctuary, it could not even then be the Sanctuary of Dan, viii, 13, 14; for the church is there represented by the word "host." This none will deny. "To give both the host and the Sanctuary to be trodden under foot." The church and the Sanctuary then, are two things.

We have now seen that the earth is not the Sanctuary; that the land of Canaan is not the Sanctuary, but simply the place where the typical Sanctuary was located; and that the church is not the Sanctuary, but simply the worshippers connected with it. We now inquire,

6. WHAT IS THE SANCTUARY? Turn to the revelation of St. John, and while bearing continually in mind that he is looking not to any spot on earth, nor to the church, but into heaven, mark some of the objects which he there beholds. First, he beholds a door opened in heaven. Chap. iv, 1. Mark, he does not say that he saw heaven opened, but he saw a door opened in heaven. He then soon sees lamps of fire burning before the throne. Verso 5. He sees again and beholds an angel with a golden censer offering incense upon the golden altar which was before the throne. Again, he sees the temple of God opened in heaven, (mark, he does not see heaven opened, but the temple of God opened in heaven) and there beholds the ark of his testament. But we know nothing of the golden candlestick, the golden censer, the altar of incense, and the ark of the testament, only as they are connected with the Sanctuary. We are therefore justified in the conclusion that these are the patterns from which the earthly vessels were formed; and, as they are inseparable from the Sanctuary, that there exists in heaven a literal Sanctuary, also, the antitype of the earthly building.

But we may as well come to direct testimony since we have it in the word of God abundantly furnished to our hand. We take it for granted that the reader is well acquainted with at least the first seven chapters of the book of Hebrews. Paul there discourses upon the new covenant and the superiority of Christ's priesthood over that of Aaron's. He then opens in the eighth chapter as follows: "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens; a minister of the Sanctuary and of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man." He declares plainly in chapter ix, 23, 24, that the holy places made with hands were "figures of the true," and that the earthly tabernacle and its sacred vessels, were "patterns of things in the heavens."

Here is positive testimony that there is a tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, and that this tabernacle is in the heavens, (not heaven itself,) of which Christ is the minister. What! perhaps some are ready to exclaim, Do you believe that there are literal things in heaven, that there is a real Sanctuary there? Just as much as we believe that a real one ever existed on this earth. Just as literal and real as we believe the antitype of the offerings connected with the Sanctuary to be, namely Jesus, who offered himself the great sacrifice for the world on Calvary,— so literal and real do we believe the antitype of the Sanctuary itself, to be. We know that the fumes of the wine of the fornication of the mother of harlots, with which the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk, [Rev. xvii, 2,] have so beclouded their spiritual intellects, and so long clothed heaven and heavenly things in fog and vapor, that many are ready to start at the idea; but we choose rather to take the word of God, unstrained through the "coal-sack" of the fathers, or the traditions of the church.

With a few Scripture testimonies concerning the existence of this temple in heaven, and a few of its declarations that it is the great original of which the earthly was but a type, figure or pattern, we close this part of the subject.

Rev. xi, 19. "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. xiv, 17. "And another angel came out of the temple which is in heaven." Rev. xv, 5. "And after that I looked and behold the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened." Rev. xvi, 17. "And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven from the throne, saying, It is done." Ps. xi, 4. "The Lord is in his holy temple: the Lord's throne is in heaven." Heb. ix, 11, 12. "But Christ being come an High Priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered in once into the holy place having obtained eternal redemption for us." Heb. viii, 1, 2, has already been quoted. This heavenly Sanctuary is called by Jesus "my Father's house;" [John xiv, 2,] by David, Habakkuk and John, "the temple of God in heaven;" [Ps. xl, 4; Hab. ii, 20; Rev. xi, 19,] God's "holy habitation." Zech. ii, 13; Jer. xxv, 30; Rev. xvi, 17. See also Ps. cii, 19; Jer. xvii, 12; 2 Sam. xxii, 7; Ps. xviii, 6; Isa. vi, 1-6; Rev. vii, 15; xiii, 6; xiv, 15, 17; xvi, 1, 7. If after this testimony any yet doubt respecting the existence of this building in heaven, we know not what more we can say to them. If those texts can be set aside, any number of similar ones might be. But if the word of the Lord has any authority in settling such questions, this question is settled.

This "more perfect tabernacle," this "true Sanctuary" which the Lord pitched and not man, is the great antitype of the earthly building. The word of God declares it; and we therefore believe it. There is one declaration of Paul's to which we would call particular attention. Speaking of the priests that ministered in the earthly tabernacle he says: "Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God, when he was about to make the tabernacle; for so, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount." Heb. viii, 5. Paul here declares that the priests served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things; and how does he prove it? By a reference to the building and the command that Moses had to make it according to the pattern. His argument is this: The priests served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, just as the tabernacle, built according to the pattern shown to Moses, was a shadow and example of heavenly things; and just as this tabernacle was a shadow of the heavenly building, just so the priests served unto the example of heavenly things.

Here, then, Paul calls the tabernacle erected by Moses, a shadow of heavenly things. One distinguishing feature of this tabernacle was that it had two apartments, a holy and a most holy place. The heavenly Sanctuary therefore has the same; for a Sanctuary in heaven with only one apartment would not cast a shadow upon earth with two. And if the pattern had but one holy place, and Moses erected a building with two, he did not follow the pattern; for there would then have been a great dissimilarity. But Moses did build it according to the pattern. Accordingly we hear Paul speaking of the holy places (plural) of the heavenly Sanctuary. See Heb. ix, 8, 12; x, 19. The word rendered, holiest, or holy place, in each of these texts is in the original in the plural, and is so rendered in many translations; (holy places.)

But Paul makes use of expressions still stronger on this point. Speaking of the earthly tabernacle and its instruments of service, he says: [Heb. ix, 23.] It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; that is with the blood of calves and goats. What was cleansed by these? The two departments of the earthly Sanctuary, and the altar. See Lev. xvi. And Paul explicitly tells us that these were patterns of things in the heavens. But there is a still stronger expression which yet remains to be noticed. "For Christ," says Paul, "is not entered into the holy places made with hands [the earthly Sanctuary] which are figures of the true."

It is in view of such plain testimony as this that we reject those fantastical notions which would make all heaven but the second apartment of the Sanctuary, and all earth the first, or which would make the two apartments of the earthly building typify the two dispensations, Jewish and Christian. The Bible teaches us, if language is capable of doing it, that there is in heaven a greater and more perfect tabernacle, a true Sanctuary which the Lord pitched and not man, of which the earthly was a correct and true shadow, type or figure.

When the old covenant gave place to the new, then the typical Sanctuary was succeeded by the true. The type cannot reach beyond its antitype; the shadow ceases when the substance comes. The offering of goats and calves was no longer serviceable when the great offering for the world had died on Calvary. Christ declared to the Jews as he departed from the temple, "Behold your house is left unto you desolate." Mark xiii, 37, 38. And when amid the terrible scenes of the crucifixion day, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from top to bottom, it was a solemn demonstration that its services were forever finished. That blood was then shed that was to be ministered for us in the heavenly Sanctuary, and there, from henceforth, the world was to look for salvation and pardon.

The way into the heavenly holy places, says Paul, "was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing." Heb. ix, 8. That is, God did not during the typical dispensation, lay open the true tabernacle, but gave to the people a figure or pattern of it. But when the time came that the services of the worldly Sanctuary ended, when the dying Saviour cried with a loud voice, It is finished; and darkness overspread all the land, and the earth quaked, and the rocks burst, then the way of the temple of God in heaven was laid open. The true church has had since that time neither Sanctuary nor priesthood in old Jerusalem, but it has had both in heaven.

We have before shown that only 490 years of the 2300 belonged to the Jews and the earthly Sanctuary. Gabriel, in his instructions to Daniel concerning the events to transpire at that time, shows him, first, that the earthly Sanctuary should be destroyed shortly after their rejection of the Messiah, and never be built, but be desolate till the consummation. Dan. ix, 26, 27. Second, he brings to view the new covenant: "He (the Messiah) shall confirm the covenant with many for one week. Verse 27. Third, he brings to view the new-covenant church, or host, namely, the "many" with whom the covenant is confirmed. Fourth, he brings to view the new-covenant sacrifice, namely, the cutting off of the Messiah, but not for himself. He brings to view also the Mediator of the new covenant. Verse 25; chap. xi, 22; Heb. xii, 24. And, fifth, he brings to view, lastly, the new-covenant Sanctuary; viz., "to anoint the Most Holy." Verse 24. This has reference, doubtless, to an act preparatory to the commencement of the ministration of the Sanctuary, which was, to anoint both the holy places and all the sacred vessels. Ex. xl, 9-11. On this point we quote the following from the Advent Shield, No. 1, p. 75:

"And the last event of the 70 weeks, as enumerated in verse 24, was the anointing of the 'Most holy,' or the 'Holy of holies,' or the 'Sanctum sanctorum.' Not that which was on earth, made with hands, but the true tabernacle, into which Christ, our High Priest, in for us entered. Christ was to do in the true tabernacle, in heaven, what Moses and Aaron did in its pattern. See Heb. vi; vii; viii; ix; Ex. xxx, 22-30; Lev. viii, 10-15."

So far, we trust, the subject is clear to all minds. There can be no doubt concerning the object which the angel had in view when he said, "Unto 2300 days, then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed." What this cleansing is, and how it is to be accomplished, be assured the Bible will not withhold from the honest inquirer.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 10.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY. (CONTINUED.)

HAVING become satisfied of the existence of a Sanctuary in heaven, a true tabernacle which the Lord pleased and not man, the subject of its ministration and cleansing can furnish little ground for dispute. On this point, as on every other concerning the glorious heavenly things, and the more excellent ministration of the Melchisedec priesthood, in the person of our Lord, we must reason from type to antitype, from earth to heaven.

The priests on earth, says Paul, serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. This being so, it follows that the work connected with the earthly tabernacle, was the example and shadow of a like work in heaven. Listen, then, to a brief and simple statement of

The Ministration and Cleansing of the earthly Sanctuary. This ministration was accomplished by the Levitical order of priesthood, and consisted of two great divisions: the daily ministration in the holy place, and the work in the most holy place at the end of the year. The daily ministration embraced the regular morning and evening burnt offering, [Ex. xxix, 38-43,] the burning of sweet incense on the golden altar, every morning when the high priest dressed the lamps, and every evening when he lighted them; [Ex. xxx;] also, the additional work appointed for the Sabbath of the Lord, and the annual sabbath, new moons and feasts, [Num. xxviii; xxix,] besides the particular work to be accomplished for individuals as they should present their offerings throughout the year.

This latter was an important part of the service and was performed as follows: Whoever had sinned brought his victim, that was to be offered up for him, to the door of the tabernacle. He then laid his hand upon the head of the victim which signified that his sin was transferred to it; it was then slain on account of that transgression, and the blood borne in by the priest and sprinkled in the Sanctuary. Lev. i; ii; iv. Thus the sin of the individual was transferred first to the victim, and then through his blood to the Sanctuary itself.

In this manner went the typical service forward throughout the year. Day after day, week after week, month after month, we behold the victim of expiation brought up before the door of the tabernacle. We see the transgressor confessing over him his sin, and thus transferring to him his guilt. He hereby acknowledged that he had sinned and was worthy of death. The law demands the life of the transgressor. But a substitute was provided. The guilt was imputed to the victim and his life paid the forfeit. The priest took of his blood (and the blood of it is the life thereof, Lev. xvii, 11, 14,) and bore it within the tabernacle, and sprinkled it before the Lord, before the veil of the Sanctuary. Lev. iv. The Sanctuary thenceforth became the receptacle of the offender's sin. A continual transfer of sins from the people to the Sanctuary, thus went on through the year.

But what at length became of these sins? Were they suffered to remain in the Sanctuary? They were not. There was another ministration at the close of the year, by which they were forever removed from the Sanctuary, and a final disposition made of them. This was the yearly ministration or the cleansing of the Sanctuary. Lev. xvi. It took place on the tenth day of the seventh month. Verse 20. To accomplish this, the work of the high priest was changed from the holy place, to the most holy, within the veil. Here he entered with the blood of a bullock as a sin-offering for himself. Verse 3. He was then to take of the congregation of the children of Israel, (verse 5,) two kids of the goats for a sin-offering. Upon these he was to cast lots, (verse 8,) one lot for the Lord and the other for the scape-goat. He then offered up the goat upon which the lot fell for the Lord, for a sin-offering for the people, (verse 15,) and bore his blood within the veil, and sprinkled it with his finger upon the mercy-seat eastward, and before the mercy-seat seven times.

This blood was offered for two purposes: 1. To make an atonement for the transgression of the children of Israel in all their sins. 2. To cleanse, or make atonement for the holy Sanctuary. This fact is plainly stated in Lev. xvi, 15-22, a part of which we here transcribe:

Verse 15. "Then shall he kill the goat of the sin-offering that is for the people, and bring his blood within the veil, and do with that blood as he did with the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it upon the mercy-seat, and before the mercy-seat.

Verse 16. "And he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins; and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation.

Verse 17. "And there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place, until he come out, and have made an atonement for himself, and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel.

Verse 20. "And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat:

Verse 21. "And Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness.

Verse 22. "And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited."

Tradition has it, that the goat thus led away, was hurled from a precipice and so killed. With this act the yearly round of service was completed. The work of the priest is again summed up in verses 33, 34, as follows:

"And he shall make an atonement for the holy Sanctuary, and he shall make an atonement for the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar; and he shall make an atonement for the priests, and for all the people of the congregation. And this shall be an everlasting statute unto you, to make an atonement for the children of Israel, for all their sins, once a year."

In the foregoing testimony, we have presented before our reader a general outline of the ministration and cleansing of the earthly Sanctuary. This was performed unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. From this, therefore, we are to reason concerning

The ministration and cleansing of the heavenly Sanctuary. If the reader has seen no cause to disagree with us, in any of the positions thus far taken, he will see none, we trust, while this point is under investigation. We are not left to our own reasoning on this subject. Paul in his divine commentary on the typical system, has drawn the parallels between that and the more excellent ministry of the Melchizedec priesthood, to the satisfaction, it should be, of every one. We refer to the book of Hebrews. Let us notice his testimony.

1. The earthly Sanctuary meets its antitype in the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, of which, with its two holy places, it constituted a correct pattern or shadow. Chap. viii, 2, 5; ix, 8, 12, 23, 24.

2. The typical offerings meet their antitype in the great offering of Calvary. Chap. vii, 27; ix, 11-14, 26; x, 10, 12, 14.

3. The typical priesthood meets its antitype in the priesthood of our Lord. Chap. ix, 14; vii, 23, 24; viii, 1, 2; ix, 11, 24, 25.

4. As they had offerings to make, it is necessary that he also have somewhat to offer. Chap. viii, 3.

5. The work of the priests in the earthly tabernacle meets its antitype in the ministry of our Lord in the Sanctuary above. Chap. viii, 5, 6.

We shall now show that Christ commences his ministry in the first apartment of the heavenly Sanctuary. It is necessary to keep this point in view to guard against the erroneous theories which some have been led to adopt, by either losing sight of or denying it. That Christ is our High Priest cannot be denied; that he has ascended to heaven is also beyond dispute; and that he there ministers for his people, they cannot call in question. But what is their next position? They claim that there is in the antitype only a most holy place, and that is all heaven; consequently our High Priest ministers in but one apartment.

They pretend to draw proof for this position from the manner in which the new covenant Sanctuary is introduced; namely, "to anoint the most holy." Dan. ix, 24. But are they aware that in thus bringing up this text to support such a position, they have it by the blade, and not by the handle? For it directly refutes their assumption, and is good testimony in favor of the point for which we argue.

1. Bear in mind, then, that the Levitical priesthood, before they began to minister in the earthly Sanctuary, anointed the whole building, the most holy, as well as the holy. And after this was accomplished, what then? Did the ministration commence in the most holy? No; in the holy, in the first apartment. And this, be it remembered, was the example and shadow of heavenly things.

2. We have already proved that the temple of God in heaven consists of two holy places, or it can a most inexplicable shadow upon earth. But who will explain the anomaly of there being two holy places in the heavenly Sanctuary, and yet a ministry performed in only one.

3. The text, "This man after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, forever sat down on the right hand of God," [Heb. x, 12] has been urged as forbidding the idea of his ministering in two holy places. We answer, that so far as the idea of sitting is concerned, it would be equally proper to represent him as standing on the Father's right hand. Act vii, 55, 56. And then we reply further, that even when he is seen coming in the clouds of heaven, he is said to be "sitting on the right hand of power." Matt. xxvi, 64; Mark xiv, 62. Then he can certainly be at the Father's right hand in both the holy places. But Paul bears direct testimony on this point. He says that Christ is a minister of the Sanctuary; and the word here rendered Sanctuary is in the plural number, and signifies the holy places. This none can deny. It is by the Douay Bible rendered, "the holies;" and by Macnight, "holy places." We therefore justly conclude (1.) that our Lord can be a minister of the two holy places, and yet be at the Father's right hand; and (2.) that he must minister in both the holy places, or Paul's testimony that he is a minister of the holies (plural) is not true; for a priest that should minister simply in the holiest of all, would not be a minister of the holy places.

4. Again: Heb. ix, 8, and also x, 19, are by some urged to prove that Christ ministers only in the most holy place. These texts both speak of the holiest as though it were in the singular number; but we have already observed that the words thus rendered are not in the singular, but plural: not "hagia hagion," holy of holies, as in chap. ix, 8, but simply "hagion," holies, plural, the same as is rendered Sanctuary in chap. viii, 2. Also the phrase in chap. ix, 12, 25, rendered "into the holy place," is the same as is in verse 24 literally rendered into the holy places, (plural.) These texts therefore instead of sustaining what they are often quoted to prove, viz., that Christ has but one apartment in which to minister, furnish positive testimony to the reverse, by showing that there are holy places in the heavenly Sanctuary, and that Jesus ministers in them both.

5. Three hundred and sixty-four days of that service which was performed unto the "example and shadow of heavenly things," was accomplished in the first apartment, or holy place, and only one day out of the year, in the most holy. If therefore, Christ ministers only in the most holy place, the first, and by far the greater part of the earthly ministration is without an antitype.

6. The ministration in the most holy at the end of the year, was only performed for the purpose of cleansing the Sanctuary; and it in the antitype, Christ only ministers in the most holy place, it follows that he performs only the antitype of this service; consequently the cleansing of the Sanctuary commenced at the ascension of our Lord. But the cleansing of the Sanctuary, according to the type, must be preceded by a long ministration; and who will tell us, in this case, when it took place. Again: the 2300 days extend to the cleansing of the Sanctuary, and with this view, they should have terminated in A. D. 31, at our Lord's ascension. But, as we have already seen, they did not terminate till 1813 years this side of that event.

We have referred to the view that calls heaven and earth the Sanctuary. We call attention to it again for the sake of noticing another of its erroneous features. Says L. L. Howard in the World's Crisis of Dec. 30, 1857:

"It seems to me that the figurative tabernacle was in the wilderness and at Jerusalem, while Christ is the true minister of the true house of God, which is heaven and earth; heaven being the holy of holies, and earth the other part where Christ and his people minister, where the candlestick, table and show-bread are."

The writer of the above seems to be blind to two fundamental points involved in this question. 1st. No part of Christ's ministry can be performed on the earth; and 2nd. The antitype of the ancient priestly service, is performed by Christ, and him alone. To the first point the Apostle bears direct testimony, when he says, "For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law." Heb. viii, 4. That is, all the service to be performed on earth in connection with the Sanctuary, is performed by those who offer gifts according to the law, that is, by the typical priesthood. The ministry of Christ is performed entirely and completely in another place. We can hardly restrain a word of astonishment, that any person should fall into an error, on this point, which the Apostle has taken such pains to guard against. The second principle to be kept in view, is, that the antitype of all the ancient offerings, and all the ministration of the ancient priesthood, is found in Christ alone. He performs it independent of, and separate from, his people. There is nothing in the services of Christians which answers to the ancient Sanctuary service. They perform no part of the antitypical ministration. Christ is the priest, and they, as suppliants and sinners, seek pardon through his mediation.

The priesthood of Christ is a superior priesthood in which the imperfections of the earthly priesthood find no analogy. We will notice this in a few of its particulars:

1. Christ is a priest after the order of Melchisedec, and not after the order of Aaron. Heb. v, 6.

2. Perfection was not of the Levitical priesthood; for if it had been, says Paul, what further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not after the order of Aaron. Chap. vii, 11.

3. Those priests were many; because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death; but this man continueth ever and hath an unchangeable priesthood. Verses 23, 24.

4. It was necessary for the priests of the house of Levi, to offer up sacrifices daily, embracing all the various offerings that were made by those who had transgressed. But all this Christ did by one act when he offered up himself. Chap. ix, 25, 26, 28; x, 10, 12, 14.

5. The round of service in the earthly tabernacle was many times repeated; but the ministry of Christ is accomplished once for all. Heb. ix, 11, 12, 24, 25; x.

6. All the blood which was offered in the former dispensation, was offered for past transgression only, and made no provision for the future; while the merits of that blood which was shed on Calvary applied not to the past alone, but to the future also. Heb. ix, 14, 15.

7. As the blood of Christ is the only blood ministered in connection with the heavenly Sanctuary, whether by actual presentation, or by virtue of its merits we need not inquire, the same blood must be ministered in both apartments.

8. As long as Christ fills the office of priest so long he is mediator between God and man.

The prophets John and Isaiah had each a view of our Lord's position and ministry in the heavenly Sanctuary. John saw a door opened in heaven. This must have been the door of the heavenly tabernacle; for it disclosed to John's view the throne of God, which was in that temple. Rev. iv, 1, 2; xvi, 17. That it was the door of the first apartment is evident from the objects which he there beheld; [Rev. iv, 5; viii, 3;] and the second apartment which contains the ark of the testament, or ten commandments, is not opened till the sounding of the seventh angel. Rev. xi, 19. Read also Isaiah's description of the same place: Isa. vi, 1-6. That he and John were both viewing the same place will appear from a comparison of the following Scriptures: Isa. vi, 1, with Rev. iv, 2. Isa. vi, 2, with Rev. iv, 6-8. Isa. vi, 3, with Rev. iv, 8. Isa. vi, 6, with Rev. viii, 3; ix, 13.

The Lord here carries forward his great work which he commenced with the act of bearing the sins of the world at his death, by pleading the cause of penitent sinners, through his blood shed in their behalf; and thus their sins are, by his mediation, transferred to the heavenly Sanctuary. There is nothing strange or fanciful in this. Every one can easily understand it. Such was the service of the type, which was a shadow of heavenly things; and such, therefore, is the heavenly ministration itself. Thus are the sins of God's people transferred to the Sanctuary. But are they to remain there? No. They are to be removed, just as they were in the type, and the heavenly Sanctuary is to be cleansed even as was the earthly.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 17.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY. (CONTINUED.)

MANY are ready to meet with an outburst of contempt the idea of a work of cleansing to be performed in the heavenly Sanctuary. What! say they, is there anything in heaven that needs cleansing, anything that is impure? And without further investigation they are ready to spurn the whole theory, on account of this, to them, unpardonable feature. But let us look at the idea, and meet it fairly. Was there not a work of cleansing to be performed in the earthly Sanctuary? There was. Where was the necessity for this? Into the most holy place, for instance, no man entered, except the high priest, and he but once a year. Was there anything there physically impure? You are obliged to confess there was not. And yet it had to be cleansed, the most holy, as well as the holy place. Why was this? Because the sins of the people had been transferred to it, and from them it must be freed. The work of cleansing was not the removal of physical uncleanness, but simply a ceremony by which the sins of the people were removed and borne away forever. So in the antitype. There is nothing literally impure or unclean in the heavenly Sanctuary; but the sins of those who have sought pardon through the merits of Jesus, have been transferred there, and all the cleansing it is to undergo, is the removal of those. Simply this, and nothing more. No mind need fail to understand, and none need revolt at such an idea. There is here not even a "grain" of absurdity at which they can strain, much less a "camel," which they make such ludicrous contortions in attempting to swallow.

If anything more is needed to make this view agreeable to the intellectual palates of our opponents, we have it in the writings of Paul. He states in plain and unequivocal terms, that the heavenly Sanctuary must be cleansed. Listen to his language. Heb. ix, 21-24. "Moreover he [Moses] sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry. [Referring to the ancient Sanctuary and its service.] And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood there is no remission. It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these, [the blood of goats and calves, verse 19,] but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these."

Nothing can be, we say it emphatically, nothing can be, plainer than this. The "tabernacle and vessels of the ministry," "patterns of things in the heavens," were cleansed with the blood of calves and goats. We have already noted its performance, through the ministry of the priesthood. It was necessary, says the Apostle, that it should be cleansed with these. Why? Because without the shedding of blood there is no remission. Remission, and not physical uncleanness, is the burden of the Apostle's argument. The Sanctuary must be cleansed; the imputed guilt must be removed. He then goes on to argue that for the same reason, the heavenly things themselves, of which the earthly were a figure, must be cleansed or purified, but with better sacrifices than those of the type. What is this better sacrifice? The Sacrifice of our Lord himself. Heb. ix, 13, 14, 26. Why was a better sacrifice needed? Because the blood of bulls and goats could not take away sin; [chap. x, 4;] but yet the law was satisfied with that service for the time being, in anticipation of the great and effectual sacrifice which was thus prefigured. The blood of this better sacrifice does take away sin. It is this blood that is ministered in the heavenly Sanctuary in behalf of man, and by this at last that the heavenly holy places themselves are to be purified and cleansed.

And now why do not those who make such an ado about the idea of cleansing the heavenly Sanctuary—why do they not flare up over this language of Paul's? Why do they not about the book of Hebrews because Paul talks therein of heavenly things to be purified? Just as though there was anything in heaven impure! Heavenly things to be cleansed! Nonsense! But let it be understood that as often as they endeavor to throw contempt and ridicule upon the idea of the cleansing of the heavenly Sanctuary, they do thus treat the language of the Apostle. And be it understood moreover, that in such cases the controversy is not between them and us, but between them and the apostle Paul. We take his language as it reads, and we believe it; for it is the word of God.

There is another idea which may lie with weight in some minds against the existence of a Sanctuary in heaven; and that is the fact, that Daniel speaks of its being trodden under foot. How, it has been asked, can a Sanctuary in heaven be trodden under foot? And it has been urged as one of the greatest recommendations of the view that the earth or land of Canaan is the Sanctuary, that they are both eminently susceptible of being in that condition. We inquire, then, How much does the prophecy comprehend in the term, "to tread under foot"? Does it mean the literal treading under our feet, as we would tread a piece of land by walking on it? If so, the land of Canaan was, in a greater degree, trodden under foot in the days of its prosperity, than it has been since; for there were then more feet to tread upon it. So we see that the expression cannot be taken in its most literal acceptation. But the same text [Dan. viii, 13] speaks of treading the host [the worshippers connected with the Sanctuary] under foot also. Does this mean that people would literally get them under their feet and stamp upon them? By no means. What then does the expression mean? We shall define it, to oppress or perform any act prejudicial to the interests of another; and this definition the following quotations will sustain; 1. The same prophecy [Dan. viii] represents the little horn as casting the truth to the ground, and casting down the stars, and stamping upon them. We all know what this means; or if not, verse 24 of the same chapter furnishes an explanation; namely, "he shall destroy wonderfully the mighty and the holy people." 2. Paul shows us that wicked men, apostates, even tread "under foot" (this is his expression) the Son of God, who is minister of the heavenly Sanctuary. Heb. x. 29. They do it by setting him at nought, counting the blood of the covenant wherewith they were sanctified, an unholy thing, and doing despite unto the Spirit of grace. Why may not the heavenly Sanctuary itself, in an equal sense, and in an equal degree, be trodden under foot also? There is nothing illogical or unscriptural in affirming it.

The agencies through which Satan has all along stood up against the worship of God are the daily, and transgression of desolation, which we have before shown to be Paganism and Papacy. He has done this by erecting rival sanctuaries to the Sanctuary of Jehovah, and endeavoring to turn mankind away from the worship of the true God to the unsanctified rites of heathenism. For instance, in the days of Samuel and the Judges, one of Satan's rival sanctuaries was the temple of Dagon where the Philistines worshiped. Jud. xvi, 23, 24. After Solomon had erected the glorious temple upon mount Moriah, Jeroboam erected a rival sanctuary at Bethel, and drew away ten of the twelve tribes to the worship of golden calves. 1 Kings xii, 26-33. In the days of Nebuchadnezzar, the rival sanctuary of Satan was found in the temple of old Belus at Babylon; and great was his triumph when he was able to deposit the sacred vessels of Jehovah's tabernacle in the palace of his heathen deity. 2 Chron. xxxvi, 7. And still later, a sanctuary of the Devil turns up at Rome, under the name of the Pantheon, or "asylum of all the gods." Dan. viii, 11.

And when the gospel dispensation was ushered in, when the shadow reached the substance, and the type gave place to the antitype, and the Sanctuary in heaven took the place of the tabernacle on earth, how did Satan change his mode of opposition? He baptized his heathen deities, and called them Christian. The Pantheon, or "asylum of all the gods," easily became the "sanctuary of all the saints;" and the statue of Jupiter, by an easy metamorphosis became that of Paul or Peter. But more than this: he bore set up a blasphemous bolog, a monster Man of Sin, who should exalt himself above all that is called God, and turn away mankind from the radiation of Christ to the heavenly Sanctuary, by pretending to dispense those favors which are the prerogative of Deity alone. Thus the Papacy has trodden under foot the "host," the "holy city," the Sanctuary above and its minister, by wearing out the saints of the Most High, and lifting up its voice in blasphemy against God, his tabernacle and them that dwell in heaven.

We need not follow this objection further. It has already in the pursuit grown invisible to the naked eye. We therefore turn again to our subject, the cleansing of the Sanctuary. The nature of this cleansing we now understand, and that it is accomplished by blood and not by fire. We understand also the ceremony by which it was performed, through a change in the ministration from the holy to the most holy place. We conclude, then, that at the end of the 2300 days, when it was said the Sanctuary should be cleansed, the ministration in heaven was changed from the holy to the most holy place; in other words, that in 1844, yes, on the tenth day of the seventh month in the autumn of that year, our great High Priest, commenced the last act of his priestly ministration in the most holy place of the tabernacle above. Are there any to whom it seems presumption to pretend to understand what is being accomplished in heaven? Of such then we would inquire, Have not the 2300 days ended? and was it not said that at their termination, the Sanctuary should be cleansed? and are we not to reason concerning the Sanctuary, from those objects and from that work, which the voice of inspiration declares to us, are the shadow which it cast on earth? Of what use is a type if we may not, from it, derive some knowledge respecting its antitype?

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 18.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY. (CONCLUDED.)

Of what infinite importance, must then the cleansing of the Sanctuary be! With this event the great plan and work of salvation closes up. This finished, the final decision will have passed upon all men; the fiat of the Almighty will have gone forth, "He that is filthy, let him be filthy still, and he that is holy let him be holy still." Rev. xxii, 11. Momentous period! May he whose mediation for a rebel world is about to close, deeply impress our hearts, with those emotions which this mighty truth is calculated to inspire.

The ministry in the most holy being finished, it yet remained for the priest to bear out the sins from the Sanctuary, place them upon the head of the scape-goat and send him away by the hand of a fit man into a land not inhabited. Lev. xvi, 20-22. This ceremony as performed in the type we have already noticed. We now inquire, What service connected with the more perfect tabernacle, answers to this, and to what being shall we look, as the one shadowed forth anciently by the literal and typical goat, as, loaded with the sins of Israel, he went forth from the camp to be heard of no more forever? This point demands more particular notice, as here, again, we are led to differ very materially from the views which have generally obtained upon this subject.

Because John says, [chap. i, 29,] "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh, (margin, beareth,) away the sin of the world," and because it is said of the scape-goat that he "shall bear upon him all their iniquities into a land not inhabited." [Lev. xvi, 22], it has been concluded, without further consideration, by some, that the latter is a type of the former; and Dr. Clarke, also, in his note on Lev. xvi, 10, makes this remark: "Did not all this signify that Christ has so carried and borne away our sins, that against them who receive him as the only true atoning sacrifice they should never more be brought to remembrance."

From the view, however, that Christ is the antitype of the scape-goat, we are compelled to differ, for what we consider very plain reasons.

1. If Christ, in bearing the sin of the world, fulfilled the antitype of the scape-goat, he must have accomplished it at the crucifixion; for Peter says of him, "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree." 1 Pet. ii, 24. But in the type the goat was not sent away till after the cleansing of the Sanctuary; hence the antitype of this work cannot be performed till after the termination of the 2300 days; for it is not till after those days have ended that the Sanctuary is cleansed. Dan. viii, 14; Heb. ix, 23. It is therefore impossible to carry this work back to the crucifixion of Christ, which was even before he commenced his ministration in the Sanctuary above; and therefore he cannot be the antitype of the scape-goat.

2. Christ is our great High Priest, the minister of the Sanctuary; but the goat is something to be sent away by the priest: therefore he cannot be the priest himself; in other words, he cannot in this dispensation be Christ; but he must be a being whom Christ, after he has loaded him with the sins borne from the Sanctuary, can send away into a land not inhabited.

3. The goat was sent away from Israel into a land not inhabited, to be heard of no more forever. But Christ will dwell in the midst of his people, the true Israel of faith.

4. It is impossible that two goats, one of which was chosen by the Lord, and is called the Lord's, and was for a sin-offering, while the other is not so called, but was left to perform an entirely different office;—it is impossible that these both should typify the same person.

From these considerations we think it must be evident to every one that Christ cannot be the antitype of the Levitical scape-goat. Who then can be? We answer, The Devil; and our reasons for this position are at hand:

1. We know of only two beings which any one has ever thought could possibly be typified by the scape-goat; and these are Christ and Satan: We have shown above that the goat cannot be a type of Christ; we must therefore look to the Devil for its fulfillment.

2. The Hebrew word for scape-goat, as given in the margin of Lev. xvi, 8, is Azazel. On this verse, Jenks in his Comprehensive Commentary remarks, "Scape-goat. See diff. opin. in Bochart. Spencer after the oldest opinion of the Hebrews and Christians thinks Azazel is the name of the Devil; and so Rosenmire, whom see. The Syriac has, Azazel, the angel (strong one) who revolted." The Devil is here evidently pointed out. Thus we have the definition of the Scripture term in two ancient languages, with the oldest opinion of the Christians in favor of the view that the scape-goat is a type of Satan.

3. In the common acceptation of the word, the term, scape-goat, is applied to any miserable vagabond who has become obnoxious to the claims of justice; and while it is revolting to all our conceptions of the character and glory of Christ, to apply this term to him, it must strike every one as a very appropriate designation of the Devil, who is styled in Scripture, the accuser, adversary, angel of the bottomless pit, Beelzebub, Belial, dragon, enemy, evil spirit, father of lies, murderer, prince of devils, serpent, tempter, &c., &c.

4. Our fourth reason for this position is the very striking manner in which it harmonizes with the events to transpire in connection with the cleansing of the heavenly Sanctuary, as far as revealed to us in the Scriptures of truth.

We behold in the type, 1. The sin of the transgressor imparted to the victim. 2. We see that sin borne in by the priest in the blood of the offering, into the Sanctuary. 3. On the tenth day of the seventh month we see the priest with the blood of the sin-offering for the people, remove all those sins from the Sanctuary, and lay them upon the head of the scape-goat. 4. The goat bears them away into a land not inhabited.

Answering to these events in the type, we behold in the antitype, 1. The great offering for the world made on Calvary. 2. The sins of all those who avail themselves of the merits of Christ's shed blood, by faith in him, in that blood are borne into the Sanctuary. 3. After Christ, the minister of the true tabernacle, [Heb. viii, 2.] has finished his administration, he will remove the sins of his people from the Sanctuary, and lay them upon the head of their author, the antitypical scape-goat, the Devil. 4. The Devil will be sent away with them into a land not inhabited.

If we want a description of this event in plain terms we find it in Rev. xxi, 1-3: "And I saw an angel come down from heaven having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be fulfilled."

Now we would ask, What could be more fitting than that the author and instigator of all sin should receive the guilt of those transgressions which he has incited mortals to commit, but of which they have repented, back upon his own head? And what could be a more striking antitype of the ancient ceremony of sending away the scape-goat into the wilderness, than the act of the mighty angel in binding Satan and casting him into the bottomless pit at the commencement of the thousand years.

This is a point of transcendent interest to every believer. Then the sins of God's people will be borne away to be remembered no more forever. Then he who instigated them, will have received them back again. Then the serpent's head will have been bruised by the seed of the woman. Then the "strong man armed," (Satan,) will have been bound by a stronger than he, (Christ,) and the house of the strong man (the grave) spoiled of its goods, the saints. Matt. xii, 29; Heb. ii, 14. Then will the work of the enemy, in sowing tares among the wheat, [Matt. xiii, 24-43.] be forever remedied: the tares will have been gathered into bundles to burn, and the wheat gathered into the garner. Then our great High Priest will have come forth from the Sanctuary to pronounce the everlasting blessing upon his waiting people. Then shall we have come unto mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels. Then will the redeemed, placing the feet of triumph upon the world, the flesh and the Devil, raise their glad voices in the song of Moses and the Lamb. O glorious day! May the Lord hasten it in his good time. Who would not, in view of this, take up the petition of the beloved John, "Even so, come Lord Jesus!"

These are scenes to which the children of hope in this lower world love to look forward. On these hang their brightest anticipations. These are the very portals to the glorious city, and to their eternal inheritance.

We are aware that some will be ready to say that sins cannot be suffered for but once, and that it is absurd that Satan should suffer for those sins for which Christ has already suffered. But how long will such hold to this position? Let us see. For whom did Christ die? for a chosen few only, or for all? Evidently for all, otherwise all could not have an opportunity of repentance. "Well then," says one who is wedded to the pleasures of sin, "if sin can be suffered for but once, and Christ has suffered for my sins, what have I to fear? There is no suffering for sin for me to endure. I will therefore quit all the enjoyment I can from the pleasures of this world, and on the threshold of eternity I will take my stand beside the holiest saint that ever lived, and claim an equal right with him to the glories of heaven; for Christ suffered for me as well as for him; and therefore I am as free." This is exactly the issue of the view taken; but the staunchest Universalism would require nothing better. Unless therefore we wish to yield the specific teachings of the Bible and become Universalists at once, we must abandon this theory. But its advocates may still contend that the wicked are exceptions, but that certainly sins that have been pardoned can never after be occasion of suffering to any being. But if when sins are pardoned that is the last of them, we would inquire how it happens that those very sins are transferred to the Sanctuary, and impurity imputed to it on their account. That this is so is one of the plainest teachings of the Bible. It is also certain that these sins are to be removed from the Sanctuary; and we would ask those who endorse the theory under consideration, what then is to be done with them, unless they are to be laid upon the head of their old author, the Devil.

From the fact that our sins when forgiven are only transferred through the blood of Christ to the Sanctuary, we learn that the pardon of our sins is only removing from us their guilt, by imputing to us the righteousness of another. But we are not the originators of sin. Behind all our transgressions there stands a guilty instigator; and why should it be thought more incredible or unscriptural that the guilt of those sins of which we repent, should be imputed to him who prompted us to commit them, than that the righteousness of Christ, upon our repenting, should be imputed to us? Rom. ii, 22; 2 Cor. v, 21.

Why it was anciently that the sins of Israel were borne into the Sanctuary and finally carried away on the head of the scape-goat into the wilderness, and why our sins are now transferred to the Sanctuary through the blood of Christ, to be laid finally upon the head of the great antitypical scape-goat, the Devil—why this arrangement was made instead of some other, is not for us to inquire into nor question. It is among the "mysteries of godliness;" [2 Tim. iii, 16;] and, says the Prophet, [Deut. xxix, 26.] "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong to us and to our children forever."

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 19.

REFLECTIONS ON THE SANCTUARY.

The Sanctuary! Momentous subject! Grand nucleus around which cluster the glorious constellations of present truth! How it opens to our understanding the plan of salvation! How it lifts the veil from the position of our Lord in heaven! What a halo of glory it throws upon his ministry! What a divine harmony it establishes in the word of God! What a flood of light it pours upon past fulfillment of prophecy! How it fortifies the mighty truths of these last days! What a glory it sheds upon the future! With what hope and joy and consolation it fills the heart of the believer! Glorious subject! Its importance can neither be overdrawn nor overestimated. It is as though a new apartment of the heavenly temple were suddenly opened before us, filled with all the divine splendor, the majesty and the beauty of eternal truth.

We venture the assertion that it is impossible for a person to entertain correct and scriptural views on the subject of the Sanctuary, and yet be at variance with any of the fundamental points of what we consider Present Truth; and perhaps no one fact can serve to place its importance in a stronger light than this. It is the great safeguard against all those bewildering errors, which since the passing of the time in 1844, have torn and scattered the once harmonious body of Advent believers. An application of this fact in a few particulars may be well.

The wild and disastrous work that has been made by some during the past thirteen years, in setting so many erroneous times for the second advent of the Saviour, growing out of the idea that the prophetic periods must reach to the coming of the Lord, in the light of the Sanctuary might have been avoided. That shows us at once that those periods were not designed to extend to that event. The most important one, perhaps, any where given in the Scriptures, is expressly declared to reach only to the cleansing of the Sanctuary. Dan. viii, 14. The 2300 days ended in 1844. We believe that then our great High Priest entered into the most holy of the heavenly Sanctuary, and commenced the work of its cleansing, as the prophecy declared, and that no lot nor tittle of what we were warranted to expect at that time, has in any wise failed.

That any of the prophetic periods extend beyond the termination of the 2300 days we have no evidence. The 1335 days will doubtless here recur to the mind of the reader, and the inquiry will arise if Daniel's standing in his lot at the end of the days does not mean his rising in the resurrection, and if therefore those days do not extend to the coming of the Lord. The difficulty lies in the expression, "stand in thy lot." The lot is taken to mean the "lot of his inheritance," and the sentence is supposed to refer to the resurrection. The Englishman's Hebrew Concordance however shows that this is not its meaning.

The Hebrew word from which lot is Dan. xii, 13 is translated, in "goh-rah." This word occurs, and is translated lot, seventy-six times in the Old Testament. That the reader may be able to determine its signification we give the instances of its use.

- "Lev. xvi, 8. Aaron shall cast lots.
one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for the scape-goat.
9. upon which the Lord's lot fell.
10. on which the lot fell.
Num. xvi, 55. the land shall be divided by lot.
50. according to the lot shall the.

See also Num. xxxiii, 54; xxxiv, 13; xxxvi, 2, 3; Josh. xiv, 2; xv, 1; xvi, 1; xvii, 1, 14, 17; xviii, 6, 8, 10, 11; xix, 1, 10, 17, 24, 32, 40, 51; xxi, 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 20, 40; Jud. i, 3; xx, 9; 1 Chron. vi, 54, 61, 63, 66; xxiv, 6, 7, 31; xxv, 8, 9; xxvi, 13, 14; Neh. x, 34; xi, 1; Est. iii, 7; ix, 24; Ps. xvi, 5; xlii, 18; cxv, 3; Prov. i, 14; xvi, 33; xviii, 18; Isa. xvii, 14; xxxiv, 17; lvii, 6; Jer. xii, 25; Eze. xxiv, 6; Dan. xii, 13; Joel iii, 3; Obad. 11; Jonah i, 7; Micah ii, 5; Nah. iii, 10.

The definition of the word lot, as given by Webster, 1. "That which in human speech, is called chance, hazard, fortune, but, in strictness of language, is the determination of Providence; as, the land shall be divided by lot. 2. That by which the fate or portion of one is determined; that by which an event is committed to chance, that is, to the determination of Providence; as, to cast lots; to draw lots."

There is another word [goh-rah] which is translated, region, country, lot of inheritance, &c., as in Deut. iii, 4, 13, 14; xxxii, 9; Josh. xvii, 5, 14; xix, 0, 29. But it not being the word used in Dan. xii, 13, all ground for the objection usually raised on that point, is removed. It will hence be seen that Daniel does not stand in the "lot of his inheritance," as it has been expressed, at the end of the 1335 days, but he stands in his lot in the decisions of the judgment of the righteous dead. He stands in his lot, with all the righteous dead, in the person of his Advocate. And such we believe has been his position since the ending of the days. The vexed question of Daniel's standing in his lot is therefore thus reduced to a finality. The word that is used, determines it with a precision, from which there is no appeal.

Being satisfied with regard to the termination of the prophetic periods, we are guarded also, by this subject, against giving up the past Advent movement, as a delusion, or ignoring the divine agency that produced it. We are prevented from misapplying the first and second messages of Rev. xiv, as they were but proclamations preparatory to the Sanctuary work; and we are as firmly fixed upon the third, since that work is its very root and foundation.

But we call attention more particularly to the connection which this subject has with a practice which constitutes one of our distinguishing features as a people—we mean the observance of the Lord's Sabbath.

We read in Revelation, "that the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Chap. vi, 19. This ark of the testament, whether contemplated on the earth, as man was connected with it under the former dispensation, or in heaven as it is here introduced to us, is equally an object of interest.

Considering that the Sanctuary of the first covenant was but a type or shadow of the Sanctuary of this, which now exists in heaven, who may tell us that the ark of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, differs from the former, either in the purposes for which it was used, or the things which it contains? The ark of the earthly Sanctuary was called the ark of the testimony, or testament. Ex. xxv, 22. It contained the tables of stone, on which were engraved by the finger of God the ten commandments, and just as he engraved them. Ex. xxv, 16; xxxi, 18. The ark of the heavenly Sanctuary, called also the ark of his testament, as in the text above quoted. [Rev. xi, 19,] must also contain similar tables, also it was not prefigured by the former.

The ark, then, under whatever dispensation we view it, suggests to our mind the same idea: the commandments of God, as he uttered them from Sinai, and engraved them with his own finger.

But who can suppose that thoughts of the ark, or the writing it contained, suggested to the mind of a Jew, the observance of the first day of the week as a day of rest? Neither does it suggest such an idea to our minds; but quite another, according to the reading of the fourth commandment contained in it, which says, The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God, &c.

Such are some of the considerations which naturally connect themselves with the ark of God. But, says the Revelation, "The temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament;" therefore considerations like these have been, and are still, agitating the minds of the people; and as we have seen by faith, through the declarations of his word, those tables of the law carefully preserved in the holy temple of the Highest, overwhelming impressions of its immutability and perpetuity have rolled over us, till we could do no otherwise than turn our feet to the keeping of all those holy commandments.

Here is a nail in a sure place. The tables of the testimony are enthroned in heaven. There they exist without liability of change or decay. Men may legislate and hold councils, and pass decrees, and vent their rage against those who will acknowledge the claims of the royal law, but they cannot touch the law: as high as heaven from earth it still remains above their reach. What must men do to change it? He must ascend to heaven, dethrone Jehovah, burst through the angel guards into the sacred temple, wrest from the ark the mercy-seat, and with his own would-be omnipotent finger, change the writing of the imperishable tables.

And yet people will talk about the change of the law as a very little thing! or even proceed further and speak of its abolition! They might as well talk of abolishing earth and heaven!

The temple has been opened in heaven, and there is seen the ark of his testament. I have not before thee an open door, says Jesus, and no man can shut it. Rev. iii, 8. Men may endeavor with all their energies to obscure the claims of the law, but they cannot obscure them. They may raise all the stir they please amid the dust and dirt of earth, and joy over the portion they succeed in throwing into their own eyes; but we have only, as it were, to look away to the heavenly Sanctuary, and behold therein the ark of his testament, and in that ark the tables of the commandments, safely deposited beneath the eye of Him who slumbers not nor sleeps.

We now perceive a beauty, before unnoticed, in the work of redemption. Sin is the transgression of the law. The law is deposited in the ark. The cover of the ark is the mercy-seat. Ex. xxv, 21. Before the mercy-seat Christ pleads his blood for sinful man. Before the eyes of our Mediator therefore lies the law which we have transgressed, and which is the test of our characters. And now, reader, what think you? Can you with confidence approach the throne of grace, and plead with the Minister of the Sanctuary for mercy until you are conscious that you are at least striving to keep every one of those commandments, just as they are engraved upon those tables which repose beneath the mercy-seat before which he ministers? Think well upon this point; and may the Lord help you to seek in a consistent manner remission of your sins, and justification by faith in Christ.

Thus the Sanctuary becomes a great bulwark of the truth on every hand. We do not say that a person cannot keep the Sabbath unless he believes in it; but we do say that a person cannot believe in it, and yet consistently, we may say honestly, refuse to observe the Sabbath.

Never lose sight of the Sanctuary. When the carnal heart is venting its spite against the law of God, look to the Sanctuary. Amid all the opposition of "unreasonable men" against the commandments of God, look to the Sanctuary. In hours of darkness, trial, temptation and persecution, look to the Sanctuary. There is light and glory there. There help has been laid upon one that is mighty. There our High Priest ministers for us; and thither our hope has entered, within the veil. Heb. vi, 19, 20.

RH April 1, 1858

US

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 20.

THE JUDGMENT!

We beseech the reader to approach this subject with that seriousness which its importance demands. From early and general teaching we have been taught to look forward to a day of judgment, a brief period when a general and indiscriminate multitude of all who have ever lived, would be gathered before the bar of their Judge, to hear from his lips the decision of their characters, and receive from his hands the reward of their deeds. It is not the design of these remarks to detract in any degree from the solemnity which we have been wont in our minds to attach to this event. And we trust that it will have no such effect upon any, but rather move them to new and earnest efforts in the work of preparation, as we proceed to show that its unalterable decisions are already passing upon the human race! A moment's consideration of the events connected with the close of this dispensation will reveal to us the fact that the line of distinction between the righteous and the wicked must be drawn before our Saviour makes his appearance; and that consequently the work of investigating the characters of mankind, and determining to which class they respectively belong, whether to the righteous or the wicked, must take place ere probation closes.

There are plainly brought to view in the Scriptures two resurrections, first, of the righteous, second, of the wicked. "The dead in Christ," says Paul, "shall rise first." 1 Thess. iv, 16. Again, it was shown John that a certain class would be raised to reign with Christ, and that a thousand years thereafter the "rest of the dead" should come upon the breadth of the earth, compass the camp of the saints, and be destroyed by fire. Rev. xx. He tells us moreover that the living righteous at the coming of Christ will be changed to immortality in the twinkling of an eye, and caught up to meet the Lord. 1 Cor. xv. 51-54. In each of these cases, if previous to the time of their resurrection or change, there has been no investigation of the characters of the sleeping or living multitude, how is it determined who are "the dead in Christ," who among the living provide that through the earth are worthy of immortality, and who should be abandoned to the dreary, hopeless slumber of a thousand years?

One fact will here be apparent to every mind. It is that after the righteous dead are raised, the living saints changed and caught up to meet the Lord in the air, there exists no necessity for any further judgment in their case, unless it be admitted that there may possibly have been some mistake in the matter, and the holy garb of immortality been bestowed upon some unworthy object from whom it must be torn again; or that some unanointed character has been called from his dusty bed, whose only portion should have been the second resurrection and the second death. To suppose, we say, a judgment on the righteous after it has been decided who are righteous, and they have been raised, is to admit the possibility of a mistake in the matter. But from casting such an imputation on the divine government, we at least, must be excused.

There are some texts supposed to prove a general and promiscuous judgment, which perhaps are entitled to a passing notice. Space will not permit an extended discussion of them; but there are certain general principles in accordance with which they may all be harmonized.

1. Whenever we read of men's receiving their desert according to the deeds done in the body, the testimony presupposes a judgment upon their characters previous to that time, and an allotment to them of rewards and punishments. Such texts as 2 Cor. v, 10, therefore furnish no aid to the popular theory.

2. Whenever a text speaks of all nations' being gathered before their Judge, it must be shown that the expression includes all who have ever lived, before it can be urged in support of a general and indiscriminate judgment; for the expression, all nations, or its equivalent, is sometimes applied to those simply who will be alive on the earth when Christ comes. See Matt. xxiv, 30: "Then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." Yet the wicked dead have no participation in this scene; for we are assured in Rev. xx, that they do not live till a thousand years subsequent to that event. Since therefore the expression, "all nations," may be limited to those living on the earth at any one time, such texts as Matt. xxv, 31, 32, are easily explainable.

3. If the Judgment is anywhere spoken of simply as occurring after any specified point, for instance, death, that expression alone is altogether too indefinite to determine its chronology. If we would understand the definite time of its occurrence, we must find other texts that tell us how long after the specified event, it takes place. Paul tells us in Heb. ix, 27, that it is appointed unto men once to die, and after death the Judgment. This is usually supposed to prove that an individual is judged immediately at death. But when we look at the declarations of the Scriptures of a Judgment located near the second coming of the Saviour, we cannot admit that a Judgment has previously been passed upon mankind at death, unless we admit that the first Judgment was liable to mistakes, making a second necessary to correct the errors of the first—an absurdity from which we washed our hands in the first part of this article.

Seeing that no Judgment takes place at death, and Paul simply tells us in Heb. ix, 27, that after death is the Judgment, consistency compels us to let other texts come in, and tell us how long after death the event occurs. Its chronology and character we will now consider.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 21.

THE JUDGMENT! (CONTINUED.)

Peter in his first epistle [chap. iv, 4-6] speaks of a certain class "who shall give account to Him that is ready to judge the quick (living) and dead. For for this cause," he continues, "was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to (Gr., kata, in the same manner as) men in the flesh, but live according to God in the Spirit." This testimony is important. It furnishes positive proof that some are judged while they are dead, and others while they are living; and that consequently a Judgment passes upon the human race, before the resurrection. And the next verse shows us the chronology of this work: it is when "the end of all things is at hand."

It may be asked how those in their graves can be judged. We answer, It is from the books of record which are kept of all men's actions. We read in Dan. vii, 10, that the Judgment was set, and the books were opened. And again, [Rev. xx, 21,] the books were opened and the dead were judged out of those things written in the books. A variety of texts also inform us that every man shall be rewarded according to his works. See Matt. xvi, 27; Rom. ii, 6; 2 Cor. v, 10; 11 Pet. ii, 23; xxii, 12. From this testimony we learn that a record is kept of the acts of all men, and from that record their reward is given them according to their desert. There is no judgment in this sense of the term, independent of those books of record. But "the time is come," says Peter, "that judgment must begin at the house of God; and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?"

We now inquire, What event must be pointed out by this testimony? The answer is, The closing ministration of the Sanctuary! The work of cleansing the earthly Sanctuary was a work of judgment. The high priest went into the most holy place, bearing the breast-plate of judgment, on which were the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel, to make an atonement for the holy Sanctuary and for all the people of the congregation. Ex. xxviii, 15-30; Lev. xvi, 33. And whosoever did not afflict his soul upon that day of atonement, was to be cut off from among his people. Obap. xxiii, 29.

This could only prefigure one solemn fact, namely, the great time of judgment and decision that should pass upon the human race in the closing work of the heavenly Sanctuary. In the type, the cleansing of the Sanctuary was atoning for, and removing, sins. In the antitype it is blotting them out. "Repent ye therefore," says Peter, "and be converted that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." Acts iii, 19. When is this? Ans. When he is about to send Jesus Christ. Verse 20.

In the type a round of service was repeated and completed every year. In the antitype it is accomplished once for all. When the last act of cleansing is accomplished, the plan of salvation is ended—the result is told! From that decision there is no appeal; for there is thenceforth no more offering for sin. Heb. x, 18. Then the decree goes forth, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Rev. xxii, 11. All cases are then decided; judgment has passed upon the human race! And the chronology of this decision is also revealed to us in the verse following, where the Saviour continues after pronouncing the above sentence, "And behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me."

In the type atonement was made for the people of Israel as a body. Now it has to do with individuals; for as individuals we must stand condemned or acquitted at the judgment-seat of Christ. It is but a just conclusion therefore that the lives of the children of God, not only those who are living, but all who have ever lived, whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life, will during the closing of the Sanctuary service, pass in final review before that great tribunal. It is thus that judgment begins at the house of God. It is thus that the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and all the people of God, stand in their lot. The merits of that blood which was shed on Calvary looked back as well as forward, and reached transgressions under the first covenant, as well as those committed since that time. Heb. ix, 15.

We now understand the import of that angel's message who proclaimed on land and sea, The hour of his Judgment is come. With his message it did come. The proclamation ceased, and our High Priest entered upon his last office for the salvation of men.

That there is a Judgment after Christ comes is evident. The time allotted to it is one thousand years. But this can have no connection with the saints who enter upon their reward previous to that time, as we have already shown. Who then are the subjects of this Judgment? We answer, The wicked. Our Lord told Peter, and through him the twelve apostles, that in the regeneration, when he should sit upon the throne of his glory, they also should sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Matt. xix, 28. This must refer to the wicked of the tribes of Israel; for the righteous are then entered upon the fruition of their hope. But the tribes of Israel are not alone concerned in this matter. Paul writes to his Corinthian brethren, "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" 1 Cor. vi, 2, 3. The reference here must of course be to the wicked of the world and to the fallen angels who are reserved to judgment. Jude 6. And this judgment of the wicked passes upon them while they are yet in their graves; for we read in Rev. xx, that those who have part in the first resurrection live and reign with Christ a thousand years; and it is during this thousand years, while they are reigning with Christ that they are judging the wicked, as we learn from Matt. xix, 28. Rev. xx, 4, also says that judgment was given (committed) unto them. After the thousand years are ended, the wicked are raised, come up around the camp of the saints, and the judgment which during that time had been allotted to them is executed upon them.

RH April 8, 1858 - 2- 06

In the Judgment that is now passing in the heavenly Sanctuary, since it has to do with transgressions under the first testament, the natural order would be that the cases of the dead should first come up, and the living last. Thirteen years and over have now elapsed since the work commenced. In the very nature of the case it must soon be finished. The interests of a perishing world now center there. All have an interest there; for the cases of each personally and singly must come up and be forever decided.

Brothren, we are satisfied that this is the great subject for this time. The Judgment! The Judgment! Would that a voice might continually remind us that its solemn council is now in session, and its unalterable decisions passing upon our race. Reader, how does your case stand? Have you an interest in the Advocate who is pleading the cases of his children before his Father? Are you aware of a charge that yet stands against you unrepented of and unforgiven? Pass not over this subject lightly. Eternity is bound up in it. An endless and glorious life, or an eternal death, hang upon the issue. May the Lord help us to feel over it, and feeling to act—so act that our sins may be blotted from the book of his remembrance; and our names, though unworthy, still stand in the golden characters of the book of life.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 24.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB.

Like a person placed in a great arena with avenues leading in all directions, so we are introduced, by the great question of the Sanctuary, to a variety of subjects, closely and intimately connected. The Judgment; the marriage of the Lamb; the parable of the virgins; the message from the Sanctuary, or the last warning to the world; the Commandments of God and the Faith of Jesus; and, lastly, the solemn warning of the faithful and true Witness to his lukewarm people; are themes, which, as the subject opens before us, present almost equal claims to immediate consideration. But we cannot consider them all at once. The order therefore which we are compelled to observe in their investigation, should not give rise to the idea in the mind of the reader, that there is a like succession of time with the events themselves. The cleansing of the Sanctuary, the Judgment on the house of God, and the marriage of the Lamb, we consider to be synonymous events, during the accomplishment of which, the long suffering of God sends forth a final warning to the church and world. On the cleansing of the Sanctuary, and the Judgment, we have already briefly spoken. In the present paper we propose to offer a few thoughts on the Marriage of the Lamb.

Says John, [Rev. xix, 6, 7.] "I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice and give honor to him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come and his wife hath made herself ready." A definite event is here brought to view. It is the marriage of the Lamb. When does this particular event, located at a particular time in the fulfillment of a chain of prophecy, take place? We understand that the same event is elsewhere frequently referred to in the Scriptures. See Matt. xxii, where the kingdom of heaven is likened unto a certain king who made a marriage for his son, and sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden, &c. By the king's son is evidently meant the Son of God, and by his marriage the marriage of the Lamb. The same essential events seem to be brought to view in Luke xix, 11, 12. "And as they heard these things he added and spake a parable, because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear." The parable then which the Saviour is about to relate is concerning the kingdom of God, and designed to correct some erroneous impressions which his disciples had received concerning its immediate establishment. What is the parable? It is this: "A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return." Verse 12. Who is designated in this parable by the nobleman? Christ. What is meant by his going into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom? His ascension to heaven after the close of his earthly mission, there to sit upon the right hand of the throne of the Majesty on high. And it is while he is thus absent that he receives the kingdom; and having received it, he returns. It is also just previous to his return of the nobleman from a far country, that his marriage takes place. For in our Saviour's admonition to his little flock, recorded in Luke xii, 32, he says: "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their lord when he will return from the wedding." We are thus exhorted to be ready and waiting for the second coming of our Lord from heaven; and when he thus appears the second time, it is at his return from the wedding. The marriage of the Lamb has then taken place; the nobleman has also received his kingdom; for it is after he has received his kingdom, that he returns; and that this reception of the kingdom that is to be given to the Son of God, and the marriage of the Lamb, are identical, we think can be made plainly to appear.

Says Daniel, [chap. vii, 13, 14.] "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

What event is here brought to view? Is it the Lord's second coming to earth in the clouds of heaven? We think not. It is to the Ancient of Days that one like the Son of man comes. Unless therefore the Ancient of Days (God the Father) is located on the earth, it cannot be the coming of Christ to the earth, that is here referred to. Scott, in his comments on this passage notices particularly this fact; and this, together with the other fact, that he appears before the Ancient of Days to receive a kingdom has led him to a wrong conclusion on this point. His words are as follows: "The prophet further saw one like the Son of man coming with, or in, the clouds of heaven; that is, with divine majesty and glory; this must point out Christ to us, as the eternal Son of God, appearing in human nature, ascending to heaven, the throne of God, to receive the kingdom covenanted to him. Ps. ii, 6, 9. He came to the Ancient of Days, who sat on the throne, and was brought in before him by the angelic attendants; and he received a glorious, universal and everlasting kingdom, which would never vanish, or be subverted, or succeeded by any other." He then quotes from MacLaurin as follows: "This passage not only shows that the setting up of the everlasting kingdom, was to happen in the times of the fourth or Roman monarchy, but also that it would happen when the Son of man would ascend from earth to heaven."

That the coming of the Lord to the earth is not referred to in Dan. vii, 13, is evident; but the view of Scott and MacLaurin, as above, is by no means a necessary conclusion from that fact. We have already shown that the kingdom of God, as brought to view in Dan. ii, vii, &c., could not have been set up at the first advent, and that it is not a spiritual kingdom in the hearts of believers. To what then can Dan. vii, 13, 14, refer? Ans. To the entrance of our Lord from the holy into the most holy place, as he changes his ministration in the heavenly Sanctuary. From his ascension in A. D. 31, to the close of the 2300 days in 1844, our Lord ministered in the first apartment of the heavenly Sanctuary. The time then came for the cleansing of the Sanctuary; he therefore entered into the most holy place and took his position before the ark of God, to finish his ministry. And where is God represented as dwelling? Above the cherubim of the mercy-seat, which is the cover of the ark. Ex. xxv, 22; Ps. lxxx, 1. This move of our High Priest, consequently might justly be described by the language, that one like the Son of man came to the Ancient of Days and was brought near before him.

It is here that he receives the kingdom. "Ask of me," says God to his Son, (Ps. ii, 8, 9,) "and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." What will the Son then do with them? Convert them all? No; but dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel. This he accomplishes by his second advent and its accompanying judgments. And this is the time, as represented in the parable of Luke xix, when the nobleman having received his kingdom, and returned, causes those his enemies who would not have him to reign over them to be brought forth and slain in his presence.

Thus the question, when the nobleman receives his kingdom, or when the marriage of the Lamb takes place, is easily determined. It is the closing event of his priestly office. The inquiry, Who is the Bride, may seem to some more difficult of solution.

RK April 22, 1858

US

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH. No. 23.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB. (CONTINUED.)

There are but two positions, at least we know of but two, taken on the question, Who is the bride? One is that it is the church; the other, that it is Jerusalem above. As we seek for information concerning it, the mind naturally turns to the testimony of John in Rev. xxi. "And there came to me," says he, "one of the seven angels which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me, saying, Come hither, I will shew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife. And he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God."

The angel made a positive declaration to John that he would show him the bride, the Lamb's wife. The only thing he did show him was the great city, the holy Jerusalem. Now did the angel fulfill his promise? None will have the hardihood to contend that he did not. Then the city, whatever that may be, is called by the angel, the bride, the Lamb's wife. There is therefore only one way in which those who hold the church to be the bride, can make their position appear; and that is, to show us that the great city, the Jerusalem above, of which John speaks, is the church. But this cannot be shown conformably to that plain and literal mode of interpretation to which the Bible is entitled. And how can the language which John applies to the city, possibly be made applicable to the church? If the church and the city of Rev. xxi, are the same thing, the former may be substituted for the latter. Verses 12-16, will then read as follows: And the church "had a wall great and high, and had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels, and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel. On the east, three gates; on the north, three gates; on the south, three gates; and on the west, three gates. And the wall of the church had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb. And he that talked with me, had a golden reed to measure the church, and the gates thereof, and the wall thereof. And the church is foursquare, and the length is as large as the breadth: and he measured the church with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs. The length, and the breadth, and the height of it are equal." It will be sufficient to add that any view which would transform the language of scripture into such nonsense, is inadmissible.

But it will be asked if Isaiah does not call the church the bride; if it is not in reference to the church that the Lord speaks by the Prophet, "For thy Maker is thy husband, the Lord of hosts is his name." Isa. liv, 4. A reference to Paul's commentary on this passage, is our reply. It is found in Gal. iv, under his contrast of the two covenants. He says, "But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all." Verse 26. He then proceeds to support his declaration by a direct appeal to the scriptures: "For it is written," says he, "Rejoice thou barren that bearest not," &c. For it is written. Where is it written? In Isa. liv, and there only: the very chapter now in hand. Then Paul applies Isa. liv, not to the church, but to the Jerusalem above. We think we are as safe in taking his application, as we should be in adopting that of any modern and uninspired commentator. But does not Paul mean the church when he says Jerusalem? No; for he speaks of the church in contradistinction, as the children. "But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all, (the church.)"

Jer. iii, 14; xxxi, 32; Eze. xvi, 8; Hos. ii, 18, 20; John iii, 20; 2 Cor. xi, 2; Eph. v, 23-33, may be supposed by some to teach an opposite doctrine. One fact kept steadily in view, will give us the true bearing of all these texts. We must remember that the marriage of the Lamb is a definite event to take place at the end, and nowhere else. That the union between Christ and his people is illustrated by the marriage covenant and the union between man and wife, we readily admit. But Christ has had a church in all ages; and we inquire in reference to the first four texts quoted, Has the marriage of the Lamb been going on for about six thousand years? And on John iii, 29, we inquire again, Did the marriage of the Lamb take place, or had it taken place, when our Lord was upon earth? And further, in regard to 2 Cor. xi, 2, Was the marriage of the Lamb consummated by Paul in Corinth? Such questioning as this, instituted in regard to these texts, or any of their kind, place them at once in their true light; for although in each of these instances the figure of marriage may be used to illustrate the union between Christ and his people, it shows us that they have no reference whatever to the marriage of the Lamb, and consequently have no bearing on the question as to who or what constitutes the bride, the Lamb's wife, in that particular event.

But there are further considerations on this point. If the church is the bride, who are the guests? For "Blessed are they who are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb," is the testimony of the angel. Rev. xix, 9. It would be singular indeed to represent the bride as an invited guest at her own marriage supper! Again, if the church is the bride, and is represented by the city in Rev. xxi, who are the nations of the saved who are to walk in the light of it? For, says the angel, speaking of the city, which he calls the bride, the Lamb's wife, "And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it, and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor into it." Verse 24. Certainly, those who walk in the light of the city, must be distinct from the city itself. Again, Christ is represented as the Father of his people; [Isa. ix, 6;] but if the church is the bride, who are the children? The bride, or the mother, and the children, cannot be identical.

From the testimony adduced, though it is by no means exhausted, we see that the church cannot be the bride. We must then look to the holy city, the New Jerusalem which the angel plainly calls the bride, and which Paul says is the mother of us all. But here many are ready to meet us with ridicule. What! say they, the city the bride? and Christ married to a mass of inert matter, to the walls and buildings and foundations of a great city? Well, we know not how gross their ideas of the marriage of the Lamb may be, or what particulars they may insist upon having carried out. But if we are to particularize, how much better, or how much freer from absurdity, is the view that the bride is an innumerable number of subjects? Those who hold it thus, will be obliged to confess, that the marriage is only indicative of a special union that takes place between Christ and some other object. No one will attempt to carry it any further. We only ask an equal privilege. And the objects between which this union takes place, are, Christ and his kingdom. When Christ ascended, he took his station on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; [Heb. viii, 1;] or, in other words, upon the throne of his Father, where he has been ruling conjointly with him. Rev. iii, 21. But he is promised the throne of his Father David, or his own throne; and when he takes this throne and commences his reign thereon, of his kingdom there will be no end. Luke i, 32; Isa. ix, 7. This reception of the kingdom is what is brought to view in Dan. vii, 13, 14; and its chronology is shown by the place it occupies in the vision of that chapter. With his throne he will of course receive the metropolis of his kingdom, the holy city, the New Jerusalem. Here is the glorious beginning of his reign. How appropriate that it should be represented as the bride. The earth, the territory of the kingdom, has after this to be renewed from the curse, and purged from sinners. And that this is accomplished after he receives the kingdom, is evident from the fact that when he comes for the accomplishment of this work, he has on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings, and Lord of lords. Rev. xix, 15.

Then you believe, says one, that the marriage of the Lamb has taken place? No; but we believe that he went in to the marriage, on the change of his ministration from the holy to the most holy of the heavenly Sanctuary, when he was brought by his angelic attendants near before the Ancient of days, to receive a kingdom, glory and dominion. The marriage takes place, or he ascends his own throne, of course at the end of his ministration, when he lays off his priestly habit for a kingly robe.

Then you believe, says one, that the marriage of the Lamb has taken place? No; but we believe that he went in to the marriage, on the change of his ministration from the holy to the most holy of the heavenly Sanctuary, when he was brought by his angelic attendants near before the Ancient of days, to receive a kingdom, glory and dominion. The marriage takes place, or he ascends his own throne, of course at the end of his ministration, when he lays off his priestly habit for a kingly robe.

Truth is always harmonious. So in the subject before us: We have Christ the everlasting Father of his people. [Isa. ix, 6;] we have the New Jerusalem above, the bride, the Lamb's wife, the mother of us all, [Rev. xxi; Gal. iv, 26;] and we have the church, the guests, those who are called to the marriage supper, the nations of the saved who will walk in the city's light. Luke xii, 37; xix, 9; xxi, 24.

Thus another momentous event is shown to be in process of consummation. Our Lord has gone in to the marriage. Matt. xxv, 10. The work is going forward. Brethren, what is our condition? Are our loins girded about, and our lights burning? Are we like men in waiting for their Lord when he shall return from the wedding? Blessed are those servants whom their Lord when he cometh, shall find so doing.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH. No. 24.

THE TEN VIRGINS.

We are now prepared for the application of the parable of the ten virgins of Matt. xxv.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them; but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil: for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready, went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily, I say unto you, I know you not." Verses 1-12.

In the light of the facts already established, and the points already proved by our investigation thus far, the application of this portion of Scripture will not be difficult. The phrase, kingdom of heaven, is used in different places to signify different things. We believe all are agreed in the present instance in its application to the church. There are then certain events to take place in the church's history, which may be likened to some of the events of an eastern marriage. The adverb, then, by which the parable is introduced, shows that it is at a particular and definite time that this comparison is to be instituted. When is it? We answer, it must be after the events themselves have taken place. No comparison of course can be drawn between the ceremonies of an eastern marriage, and certain events in the history of the church, before those events come to pass. The church therefore must have come down this side of all transactions specified in the parable before the language can have its application. "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened," &c.

Many have consoled their ignorance of the ceremonies and proceedings of an eastern marriage. If we only knew the history of an eastern marriage, they have said, we should then know how to make the application; and so they have hesitated to make any, on account of some imaginary knowledge which they did not possess. But there is no necessity for this. Our Lord has given all necessary particulars. He does not say, "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened to an eastern marriage," and leave us to search up the history of that ancient ceremony, and make the application for ourselves; but he specifies all the particulars to which the history of the church would bear resemblance. They are, the going forth of the virgins; the taking of oil by the wise, and the lack of it with the foolish; the tarrying of the bridegroom, and the slumbering and sleeping of the virgins; the cry at midnight; the arising of the virgins; the departure of the foolish to buy oil; the coming of the bridegroom, and the entrance of those who are ready with him to the marriage; and finally the return of the foolish virgins too late for admittance. Now it would be of no advantage to us, if we had a minute and accurate history of a thousand eastern weddings. The above are all the main particulars to which the experience of the church is to bear a resemblance; and these are all given.

We believe these particulars are now all worked out in our history, and that the time has come for the application. If we mistake not, it is as follows:

The virgins took their lamps. The word, says the Psalmist, is a lamp unto my feet. But a lamp is useless without oil. So the word of God would be but darkness to our path, unless we had faith in the same. The wise virgins took both their lamps and oil in their vessels with their lamps.

They went out to meet the bridegroom. Roused by the increasing light on the prophecies which showed the end of all things at hand, the people of God in 1843 and previous, went forth to proclaim and prepare for the coming of the Lord from heaven.

While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. After 1843 passed, there was a seeming tarry. That year, according to Bible reckoning, extended to the spring of 1844. Before that time passed it was confidently believed that the Lord would come. The cause of that mistake we have already explained, and need not repeat. As the time went by, darkness settled upon the prophecies, and drowsiness upon the people.

And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh. Midway between this and the tenth day of the seventh month, light came which showed the ending of the 2300 days in the autumn of 1844, instead of the year 1843. Then indeed there was a cry made, as had never been heard before. Behold, the bridegroom cometh.

Then all those virgins arose and trimmed their lamps. No better description could be given of the movement that then took place in the Advent body. All who were so fortunate as to have a personal experience in that work can testify to this. They can also bear witness to the course of the foolish virgins while the cry was going forth. Perhaps the terms, provident and careless, would better express the force of the original words in this instance, than wise and foolish. The provident took oil in their vessels with their lamps; the careless neglected this. Their faith in the word of God was weak, and their understanding darkened as to its fulfillment; and they sought of their brethren such assistance as it was not their province to confer.

And while they went to buy the bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage. The proclamation was, that on the tenth day of the seventh month, the Lord would come. The day came. The 2300 days ended; and what then? The Lord did not appear in the clouds of heaven as was expected; but he did change his position in the Sanctuary from the holy to the most holy place. Did this move answer to the coming of the bridegroom in the parable? We answer, Yes; for mark, it is not the coming of the Lord to the earth that is referred to, but only his going in to the marriage; and it has already been shown that the marriage takes place before the Lord comes. It is at the change of his ministration in the Sanctuary that one like the Son of man is brought by his angelic attendants near before the Ancient of Days, as seen by Daniel. He appears there to receive a kingdom, power and glory; and this reception of the kingdom, constitutes, as already shown, the marriage of the Lamb. At the appointed time therefore the Bridegroom went in to the marriage; and the cry, Behold the Bridegroom cometh, referring as it did only to this event, was no false alarm. No other event can be pointed to, as the going in of the Bridegroom to the marriage, except the change of ministration in the heavenly Sanctuary. Let this be remembered. Then he who takes the position that Christ has not yet gone in to the marriage, must admit that he has not yet changed his position in the heavenly Sanctuary; and that consequently its cleansing is not now going on. But to admit this, is to demolish the main and central pillar of present truth, and precipitate the whole structure to irrecoverable ruin. Being satisfied that there is no other place for Christ to go in to the marriage, except when he changed his ministration at the end of the 2300 days, we are to remember in connection with this, another fact, namely, that it is when the Bridegroom goes in to the marriage, and not a score or so of years afterwards, that

The door is shut. What event can be pointed out by this language? This we must determine in the light of the facts already established. What the marriage of the Lamb is, we know; what the going in of the Bridegroom to the marriage is, we know; and when this took place, we also know. But when he goes in, the door is shut. What is this? Says Christ to the Philadelphia church, [Rev. iii, 7.] speaking of himself, "These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth." He then tells them in the next verse, that he has set before them an open door. But he shutteth as well as openeth. And from the significant connection of this transaction with the phrase, "He that hath the key of David," that is, the power to take the throne and government of David, we conclude that it has some connection with that event. The assumption of David's throne is the marriage of the Lamb. He that hath the key of David openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth. When the bridegroom went in to the marriage, the door was shut. At the same time says he to the church of Philadelphia, I have set before thee an open door. From this it is evident that when the door, or when one door, is shut, another is opened. Now if the door that is shut, is, as some have called it, the door of mercy; that is, if there is no more mercy for the human race after it is closed, what is that door which is opened? We understand that by the open and shut doors is simply brought to view the change of ministration in the Sanctuary. The ministration in the first apartment was finished and closed: Christ entered within the veil and the ministration of the most holy opened. But how does this affect the condition of the human race? Much every way; for a consistent faith in Christ involves the necessity of an understanding of his position and of his work; here therefore a restriction must be made. Light enough has been given us in the Word to trace our Saviour through all his characters as Prophet, Priest and King, and we must keep our eye fixed upon him. He says, "I am the way, the truth and the life;"

and unless we heed the light which reveals to us his position and work, he witnesses against us when he says, "Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." To come to him therefore at the present time, and to exercise an effective faith in him, we must have an understanding of his present position. We come to him therefore as our great High Priest, performing his last and special work, pleading his blood before the mercy-seat, beneath which repose God's righteous law, a violation of which has made his sacrifice and mediation necessary; and as the scene is thus presented before us, we see the necessity of keeping that law in all its requirements. Those who therefore, with the present light on this subject, shall attempt to find in Christ a Saviour, while living in violation of that holy law, or shall seek him as minister in the first apartment of the Sanctuary, will find that he has withdrawn himself from them, and knows them not. That door is shut.

But while Christ exercises the office of Priest, he is a mediator between God and man, and those who will come unto him may avail themselves of his mediation. He is Priest in the second apartment as well as the first. If we confess our sins, he is as "faithful and just to forgive us our sins." But as surely as Babylon is fallen, and evil men and seducers are waxing worse and worse, and all are being drawn into the absorbing whirlpool of spiritualism, so surely his Spirit and sympathy is withdrawn from them as a body. Some may here call us bigoted and exclusive; but they may as well say the same of the whole plan of salvation, because it contains prescribed conditions with which man must comply, or they can never be saved.

It has been claimed by some that the doors of both apartments of the heavenly Sanctuary are now open. This is simply to adopt the absurdity that a ministration is carried on in both apartments at the same time; for the expressions, open, and shut door, as applied to either apartment of the heavenly Sanctuary, must mean simply that the ministration of that apartment is either going on or is finished. The going in of the Bridegroom to the marriage, can be located nowhere else but at the change of the ministration in the Sanctuary; and the door that was shut when he went in to the marriage, can only be the door of the first apartment, the ministration of which then and there closed.

Again, some have inquired, Can any of those who have been wise virgins be lost? Can any of the foolish be saved? and what of those who were once included in neither class? The only difficulty that can arise here is from allowing the virgins to represent individuals instead of a class. Representing, as we think they do, the latter, we see that an individual may, without difficulty, though belonging at one time to one class, at another, help compose the other.

Let us, brethren, who have by faith followed the Bridegroom in to the marriage, see to it that our loins are girt about, and our lights burning, and that we are like unto men who wait for their lord when he will return from the wedding.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH, No. 25.

THE MESSAGE FROM THE SANCTUARY.

We have now briefly noticed some of the more important chains of events that have brought us down step by step to the great work of our High Priest in the tabernacle above. We have seen the door of that inner temple thrown open before us, and have obtained a deeper insight into the mysteries of salvation, and the plan and work of redemption, while beholding the entrance of our great High Priest therein, and his last act of ministration for rebellious man. While this is accomplishing, a last and final warning goes forth to a guilty world. Solemn thought! How few will avail themselves of the privileges now within their reach, till they are forever past!

The first two angels of Rev. xiv. brought us down to the commencement of the second division of the Sanctuary work. But a third angel follows them. Verse 9. The inclusion of this angel therefore is accomplished while this last work of the Sanctuary is closing: an examination of his message will show us that it has for its foundation this very work:

"And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation: and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name. Here is the patience of the saints: here are they that keep the Commandments of God and the Faith of Jesus." Rev. xiv. 9-12

A denunciation of wrath more terrible cannot be found in the sacred Word. It becomes us every one therefore to examine it carefully, if we may ascertain against whom these threatenings stand. And hence the inquiries will arise, What is the beast? what is his image? what is his mark? and what is his worship? since it is the worshippers who will be the objects of God's unmingled displeasure; and further, why is there, in contradistinction to these, a little company spoken of, who keep the Commandments of God and the Faith of Jesus? These are inquiries which will each command our consideration.

Upon the chronology of this message we need not here speak; for whatever determines the time of the first and second messages of Rev. xiv. is equally applicable to any other which immediately follows; and upon their chronology we have already spoken. In order to an investigation of the other queries, the reader is requested to turn with us to the XIIIth chapter of the Revelation.

We have brought to view in this chapter, a power under the symbol of a great Red Dragon.

PAGAN ROME.

From the part which this power acts in reference to the man-child (verses 4, 5,) we understand it to be a symbol of Pagan Rome. Without any controversy Christ is brought to view by the man-child. It was Pagan Rome who stood before the woman to devour him as soon as he was born. It was Herod who sent forth and slew all the children in Bethlehem and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under. It was Pagan Rome that did finally nail Jesus Christ to the cross. But says one, the dragon is said to be the Devil. Verse 9. Very true; and we understand that Pagan Rome was represented by such a symbol for the very reason that it was so far controlled by and under the influence of that old serpent, the Devil.

In the following chapter we have another symbol brought to view; namely, a beast with the body of a leopard, feet of a bear, and mouth of a lion, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns. To this beast the Dragon gives his seat, his power and great authority. To whom did Pagan Rome give its seat (the city of Rome) and power, and great authority? Ans. To the Papacy. This fact alone is sufficient to prove to us that the Papacy is here introduced; but there are at least ten other specifications which furnish evidence to the same end:

PAPAL ROME.

1. The beast rises from the sea—the sea denoting "peoples, multitude, nations and tongues." 2. It has seven heads, denoting the seven forms of government which have existed in the Roman empire. 3. It has ten horns, showing it to be identical with the fourth beast of Dan. vii, which all know symbolizes Rome. 4. The horns had each a crown, showing that the governments which sprung from the Roman empire would be monarchical. 5. This beast has the characteristics of the three first beasts of Dan. vii; namely, a leopard's body, a bear's feet, and a lion's mouth, showing its existence to be after those beasts had passed away, and making it again identical with the fourth of the series there presented. 6. It has power to make war with, and overcome the saints, the same as the little horn of Dan. vii, 25. 7. It opens its mouth in blasphemy, which is also said of the little horn. 8. It was to continue forty and two months, 1200 days, (years.) Just this length of time the Papacy did continue from its establishment in 538, till 1798, when it was for a time suppressed by the French. 9. This beast has one of its heads wounded to death. Thus was the Papacy wounded in the event just alluded to, when Berthier, a general of Bonaparte, took prisoner the Pope then occupying St. Peter's chair, and carried him into exile, where he died. 10. The deadly wound was to be healed. This was accomplished in Bonaparte's restoring the Papacy, but not to its former power.

These items are sufficient to fix the application of this symbol. But by reading on in the chapter [Rev. xiii] from verse 11, we find another beast in-introduced, having two PROTESTANT AMERICA. horns like a lamb. This beast is cotemporary with the one just spoken of; for it says [verse 12] that he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him: the word, before, signifying, in the presence of, in the sight of; which is the literal meaning of enopion, from which it is rendered.

Not to dwell at length on a subject which is explicitly treated of in our publications, we will only say that we have here a symbol of the United States of America. This will be apparent by considering, 1. Its location. 2. The manner of its rise. 3. The time of its rise. 4. Its character. 5. The form of its government, and, 6. Its acts. Its two horns may fitly denote the two great branches of power that exist in this country, commonly designated, Ecclesiastical and Civil, Religious and Political, Protestantism and Republicanism, or Church and State. These both are mild and lamb-like in appearance, but dragonic in their acts.

In regard to the two beasts brought to view in Rev. xiii, let one fact be borne in mind; and that is, that the Papal beast is always called the beast, or the first beast, while the two-horned beast is never designated by the term, beast, except in verse 11 where it is introduced as "another beast." It is thenceforward represented by the pronoun, he. It is this two-horned beast which causes an image to be made to the first or Papal beast. The Papal beast was a church clothed with civil power, or authority to punish and correct heretics. An image to the beast must bear some resemblance to it. It would be carried out in every respect by a Protestant Church endowed with similar privileges. Thus we gain a knowledge of some of the characters which act a part of the First Angel's Message.

SYNOPSIS OF THE PRESENT TRUTH. No. 28.

[Concluded.]

THE LAST WARNING TO THE CHURCH.

The cleansing of the Sanctuary reveals to us a solemn and important work, the closing events of the plan of salvation. How important have been its events as it has progressed to the present time; but how transcendently important its final scenes! How anxiously have angels watched it from its commencement till now; but with what intense anxiety must they behold it as it draws to its final issue! With what interest must they regard the children of men to ascertain their state of preparation for the momentous and final crisis! It is about to be told how many the Saviour's blood has rescued from the jaws of death! It is about to be known how many have laid hold on the inextinguishable sacrifice made for rebellious and fallen man! The last transaction connected with the "offering for sin" will soon be finished. No wonder then that a special messenger is sent forth, as the final act commences, to warn mankind of their fearful condition. No wonder that as a new flash of light, in the onward development of truth, is thrown upon the world, the Third Angel's Message is heard enforcing upon the mind the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, through obedience to which alone we are to gain an entrance through the gate into the everlasting city.

But not to the world alone is a special warning given. It must be apparent to every one from a contemplation of the Sanctuary work, that a period of deepest moment to the living church on earth would eventually come: a time when their cases would come up before the great tribunal of heaven, and when they must be all prepared, though here in this mortal state, to stand acceptance there, and stand without a mediator. It has already been remarked that as Christ shed his blood for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, as well for those under this, the cases of the dead would naturally first come up for decision, and the living last. As this momentous period approaches, shall the living be warned thereof? We think they are. What is this warning? A counsel to buy of the True Witness gold tried in the fire, white raiment and eye salve. Rev. iii, 14-22. And what if we do not heed this? I will spue thee out of my mouth, is his solemn avowal.

The nature of this judgment we think is intimated in verse 5 of the above named chapter: "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life." Peter speaks of a time of blotting out also. Acts iii, 16. It is evident then that with all mankind the case will finally stand thus: either their sins will be blotted from the book of God's remembrance, or their names will be blotted from the book of life. The closing work of the Sanctuary is a work of cleansing from or blotting out sins; hence it is here also that the blotting from the book of life of all those names which are not found worthy, also takes place. How appropriate then, how timely, yea how merciful, the warning, as we approach the time when the cases of the living are to come up for decision, to be zealous and repent, to seek the gold white raiment and eye salve, lest we be spued out of the mouth of the Lord, or in other words have our names blotted from the book of life.

Again, we read in the marriage of the king's son, (Matt. xxii,) that when the king came in to see the guests, he found there a man not having on a wedding garment. He was taken by the king's servants, bound hand and foot and cast into outer darkness. This parable has been already alluded to as signifying the marriage of the Lamb, which takes place at the close of his ministry as priest, and to which he went in, when he entered the Most Holy Place in the fall of 1844. How do the guests go in to the marriage? By faith. And what is signified by the king's coming in to see the guests? We answer, the inspection of our individual cases, as they come up for examination before the great tribunal of the heavenly Sanctuary. It appears that some are found therein not having on a wedding garment. Some embrace the truth; but they receive it in theory only. It convinces the judgment, but they do not let it subdue the will. It affects the head, but they do not let it sanctify the affections. They lack holiness of heart; they do not reflect the image of Jesus; they lack a preparation to stand the decision of the judgment; they are without the wedding garment. How timely then, as the period approaches when the king shall come in to see the guests, that the True Witness sends forth his counsel, to buy of him the white raiment that they may be clothed. What is this white raiment? The righteousness of saints; [Rev. xix, 8;] and what is this but the wedding garment of the guests in the parable of Matt. xxii? Thus is the church notified of the approach of the time when the king shall come in to see the guests; thus is she counseled to procure the wedding garment, in preparation for that event.

As the Third Angel's Message is the last warning to the world, so we believe the counsel to the Laodiceans to be the last to the church. If fully heeded, they will prepare a people to stand upon Mt. Zion with the Lamb; and if these will not rouse men to action in behalf of their eternal welfare, what threats of judgment, or promises of reward would be able to do this?

To those who have followed us through this series of twenty-eight articles, if any have had patience thus to do, we would briefly say, If the important events which we have shown to be already transpiring and about to transpire in heaven and on earth; and if the great chains of truth which we have hastily traced, showing that they all centre upon this very generation;—if these things will not arrest the attention of the careless, awaken the sinner, and stimulate the church, what more could God do? It is not his purpose to use compulsion. He compels no man to be saint or sinner. But he employs motives. He denounces judgments on the one hand and promises blessings on the other; and every man is left to his own free choice. Death as a motive has aroused its thousands. Death to be sure is around us and in our midst; and it is well to be prepared for its nearest approach; but a more powerful motive, to lead men to prepare for eternal scenes, is now presented to the world; the end of all things, attested by the Scriptures of truth, and by the signs in the natural moral and political worlds, throws its all-absorbing shadow immediately across our pathway. Were we left to the natural course of our lives, we might look forward to twenty, forty or fifty years; and it is natural to the human heart to put off the unwelcome period of death as far as possible. But the coming end will not allow us so long a prospect. It presses on with a certainty from which there is no appeal. Louder than the claims of death, it calls upon us to prepare to meet our God.

But not only do we see the end approaching, but the position of our High Priest in the heavenly Sanctuary is opened before us. We see him performing the last act of his ministration for the sins of men. We see the plan of salvation drawing to its close. We see all things tending rapidly to the time when that fearful sentence shall go forth, "He that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still!" What do we say? We see the judgment already passing upon the human race, decisions which shall be for eternity.

And what more need be said? There is no man who can look at these things in the light of God's word, and yet in his right mind expect, or plan for, long time to come in this present life. How much time have we, brethren, in view of these things, to devote to worldly plans and worldly prospects? How much inducement to lay up treasure here? How much room for covetousness and worldly-mindedness? How much time to add land to land, or house to house? How much time to give ourselves up to the cares of this life, and yet be safe? Shall we not find a worthier object upon which to place our affections, in that inheritance of which Peter speaks, "incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us?"

We have not written these articles thinking to say anything that has not been said before, or to do it in a better manner, but only to endeavor to heed in a measure the injunction of Peter, "not to be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them and be established in the present truth." We commend the thoughts offered to the careful and serious attention of the reader, with our fervent desire that the Author of all truth may impress upon the heart its inextinguishable importance and value, and the necessity of speedily giving heed thereto.

DANIEL, CHAPTER VIII.

It is characteristic of the different chains of prophecy, that each succeeding one introduces particulars not furnished in any, previously given. The seventh of Daniel, after covering the general field symbolized by the image of chap. ii, instructs us more particularly concerning the development of the little horn, or man of sin. In the eighth chapter we are again conducted over a portion of the world's great highway, with additional particulars concerning the mighty kingdoms that stand as waymarks along our journey. On the symbols of this chapter, the ram, he-goat, and horn which waxed exceeding great, the prophet received the following instruction:

"The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia." Verse 20. The Persian division of the empire was the highest and came up last. The ram with the two horns was the well-known emblem of the Medes and Persians. "It was usual for the Persian kings to wear a diadem made like a ram's head of gold." Scott.

RAM.

GOAT.

was born B. C. 356, decided the fate of Persia at the battle of Arbela, B. C. 331, and died eight years thereafter in a drunken fit, at the age of 33, B. C. 323.

"And whereas the great horn being broken, four came up in its stead," "four kingdoms," said the angel, "shall stand up out of the nation." Verse 22.

These were Macedonia, Thrace, Syria and Egypt, into which the empire was divided shortly after Alexander's death, governed respectively by Cassander, Ly-
 443

THE FOUR HORNS.

"And out of one of them came forth a little horn." Verses 9, 23-27.

Rome was not connected with the people of God, and hence is not introduced into prophecy, till after the conquest of Macedonia, one of the horns of the goat; hence it is represented as coming forth from one of those horns. That this little horn which waxed exceeding great was Rome, the following considerations prove:

1. It was to rise in the latter part of their kingdom, that is, of the four kingdoms. So did Rome, so far as its place in the prophecy is concerned. Its connection with the Jews commenced B. C. 161. 1 Mac. viii. Josephus' Antiq., B. xii, c. x, sec. 6. Pictanz, Vol. ii, p. 108. 2. It was little at first. So was Rome. 3. It waxed "exceeding great, towards the east and towards the south." So did Rome. It conquered Macedonia B. C. 168; Syria, &c., to the river Tigris, B. C. 66; Egypt, B. C. 30. "From this horn's increasing towards the south and east particularly, Sir Isaac Newton infers that it arose in the north-west corner of the goat's dominion, i. e., in Italy; which points directly to the Romans. 4. "It cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground." So did Rome; persecuting the disciples and ministers of Jesus as no other power ever did. 5. "He magnified himself even to the Prince of the host." Thus did Rome, when both Herod and Pontius Pilate conspired against Jesus. 6. "He shall destroy wonderfully . . . the mighty and the holy people." Let from 60 to 100 millions of martyrs make good this charge against persecuting Rome. See Religious Encyclopedia. 7. It was the only power that succeeded the four kingdoms which waxed exceeding great. 8. In this vision Greece succeeds Medo-Persia, just as it had been seen twice before; and it is absurd to suppose that the power which follows them in this vision is a different power from the one which twice before had been seen succeeding them, in chapters ii and vii; and that power was Rome. 9. "He shall be broken without hand." How clear a reference to the stone cut out without hand which smites the image upon its feet. Chap. ii, 34.

THE 2300 DAYS.

Through the symbols of governments contained in Dan. viii, there is a definite period of time brought to view, which claims attention. As recorded in verse 13, Daniel heard one saint ask another the question, how long the vision should be concerning the daily [sacrifice] and the transgression of desolation to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot. The angel then addressed himself to Daniel and said, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed. Waiving for the present the question as to what may constitute the sanctuary, we wish to ascertain if possible the nature, the commencement, and termination, of this period of time. There are two kinds of time to be met with in the Bible: literal and symbolic. In symbolic time a day signifies a year. Num. xiv, 34; Eze. iv, 6. To which class do the 2300 days belong? Being brought in in connection with acknowledged symbols, it would be both easy and natural to infer that they partook of the nature of the rest of the vision and were symbolic, presenting us with a period of 2300 years. And that such is the case is further evident from the fact, as is shown in the investigation of Dan. viii, that the field of the prophet's vision, was the empire of Persia, Greece and Rome. The 2300 days there given cannot therefore be literal days; for literal days (nearly six years and a half) would by no means cover the duration of any one of these empires singly, much less embrace so nearly the whole of their existence put together, as they evidently do. They must consequently denotes 2800 years. Can we now ascertain the commencement of this period? We answer, Yes; the key to the matter being found in the ninth chapter of Daniel, between which and the eighth there is an unmistakable connection, as we shall now endeavor to show.

After their mention in verse 14, the 2800 days are not again spoken of in chap. viii. All the other parts of the vision are there fully explained; it must have been therefore, this point concerning the time, that troubled the mind of the prophet, and in reference to this, solely, that he exclaims at the end of the chapter, "I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it."

It was in the third year of Belshazzar, B. C. 568, that Daniel had this vision of chap. viii. Fifty-three years previous to this time, Jerusalem had been taken by Nebuchadnezzar, and the seventy years' captivity commenced; and thirty-five years before this, the Chaldeans had utterly demolished the city, broken down its walls and burnt the house of God with fire. 2 Chron. xxxvi, 19. Daniel had learned from the prophecy of Jeremiah, [chap. xxv], that the seventy years of captivity were drawing near their close, in the first year of Darius, B. C. 538, as we read in the first verses of Dan. ix; and it is evident that he so far misunderstood the period of the 2800 days as to suppose that they ended with the seventy years of Israel's servitude; therefore turning his face toward the prostrate city and the ruined temple of his fathers, he prays God to cause his face to shine upon his sanctuary which is desolate. Verse 17.

"And while I was speaking and praying," says he, [chap. ix, 20-23], even the man Gabriel whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. And he informed me and talked with me, and said, O, Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. At the beginning of thy supplication, the commandment came forth, and I am come to show thee; for thou art greatly beloved; therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision. Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city." &c.

That this is a continuation of the explanation of the vision of chap. viii, would seem sufficiently evident without the aid of any special argument to prove it so. But as there is a vital point that hinges upon this fact, we will offer a few reasons which place it beyond the limits of contradiction.

1. Gabriel had received a charge [chap. viii, 16], to make Daniel understand the vision; but at the end of that chapter, Daniel says he was astonished at the vision, but none understood it. Gabriel therefore did not complete his mission in chap. viii: the charge still rested upon him, "Make this man to understand the vision."

2. The being who came to Daniel at the time of his supplication, was the very same who had appeared to him in the vision at the beginning; namely, Gabriel. And that he had now come to undeceive him concerning his application of the time, is evident in that he says, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. Why did he not give him a full understanding of the vision at first? Because, we answer, he revealed to him all that he was then able to bear; for he fainted and was sick certain days.

3. Direct reference is made to the vision at the beginning; and if that is not the vision of chap. viii, it is impossible to find it. And again, if Gabriel does not explain in chap. ix, what he omitted in chap. viii, it is impossible for any man to show wherein Gabriel fulfilled his commission to make this man understand the vision. But a position which will lead to such a result, is utterly allowable.

4. When Gabriel commenced his further explanation he did not explain the symbol of the ram; for that he had already explained; he did not explain the goat; for he had likewise explained that; neither did he commence about the little horn; for he had made that plain also in chap. viii. What then did he explain? The very point there omitted; namely, time: "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people," &c. These facts are sufficient to show the connection of Dan. ix, with the vision of chap. viii.

But how do the words of Gabriel, "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people," &c., explain the period of the 2800 days? The answer is, The word rendered, determined, signifies literally, cut off. Gesenius in his Hebrew Lexicon thus defines it: "Properly, to cut off; tropically, to divide, and so to determine, to decree." The Englishman's Hebrew Concordance says, "Determined, literally, divided."

From what period are the seventy weeks divided, or cut off? From the 2800 days; for there is no other period given from which they can be taken; and this is placed beyond a doubt by the connection of the two chapters, which has already been proved.

Having now ascertained that the 70 weeks of Dan. ix, are the first 490 years of the 2800 days, and that consequently the two periods commence together, we further learn that this period of weeks dates from the going forth of a commandment to restore and build Jerusalem.

Dan. ix, 25. If then we can definitely locate this commandment, we have the starting point for the great period of the 2800 years. The Bible furnishes us with four tests by which to determine when the true date is found: 1. From the time of the commandment, 49 years were to witness the completion of the street and wall of Jerusalem, Dan. ix, 26. 2. Three scores and two weeks from this time, or, in all, 69 weeks, 483 years, were to extend to Messiah the Prince. Id. 3. Sixty-nine and a half weeks were to extend to the crucifixion—the cessation of sacrifice and oblation in the midst of the week. Verse 27. 4. The full period of 70 weeks was to witness the complete confirmation of the covenant with Daniel's people. Id. In the 7th of Ezra, we find the decree for which we seek. It went forth in B. C. 457. Much concerning this decree and the date of its promulgation, for brevity's sake we are compelled to pass. Concerning it, we can only remark,

1. It contained all the elements necessary to constitute such a decree, and when carried out, resulted in the thorough restoration of the Jewish state. It answered to the prophecy fully in this respect.

2. From the commencement of the work by Ezra, to the last act of reformation by Nehemiah were just forty-nine years, which is the exact period allowed in the prophecy to this work.

8. As this decree went forth a. c. 457, the 68 weeks or 488 years which were to extend to the Messiah the Prince, reckoned from the commencement of the work in the autumn of that year, bring us to the autumn of A. D. 27, when our Lord was baptized by John in Jordan and went forth preaching "the time is fulfilled," Mark i. Luke III, 22, margin. Three and a half years from this, to the midst of the seventieth week, bring us to the spring of A. D. 31, where, according to Dr. Hales, the Council of Nicaea A. D. 106, the Alexandrian Chronicle, &c., the crucifixion took place. Three and a half years more, the last half of the week, terminate the 70 weeks or 490 years in the autumn of A. D. 84, where Hales, Usher and Pearson place the martyrdom of Stephen, the first persecution, and the formal rejection of the gospel by the Jewish Sanhedrim.

Here then we stand at the end of this great period which Gabriel in his explanation of the 2300 days, told Daniel was cut off upon Jerusalem and the Jews. There is this one grand fact yet to be noticed: If the first 490 years terminated in the autumn of A. D. 84, the whole period ends in the autumn of A. D. 1844. For 400 taken from 2800, leave 1810; and 1810 added to A. D. 84, where the 400 terminate, make 1844. For the application of this argument, and the event to mark the termination of the days, see article on the sanctuary.

THE SANCTUARY.

1. SANCTUARY is defined to be a holy or sacred place. Cruden, Walker, Webster. It is a dwelling-place for the Most High. Ex. xxv, 8.

2. It cannot therefore be the earth; for the earth will not bear one of the above defilements; and of the 146 times of the occurrence of the word sanctuary in the Bible, it is not once applied to the earth.

3. It is not the land of Canaan. Substantiate "the land of Canaan" for "the earth," and read the above. See also Josh. xxiv, 26. For an explanation of Ex. xv, 17, see Ps. lxxviii, 58, 54, 60.

4. It is not the church; if it is, who are the "host," or worshippers that are invariably connected with it. Dan. viii, 18. Compare Dan. ix, 20, with Matt. xvi, 18.

5. It was built by the children of Israel. Ex. xxv, 8, 9; xxv-xi; 2 Chron. xx, 6.

6. It had two apartments—the holy place and the most holy place. Ex. xxvi, 33, 34; Lev. xvi, 2. In the first apartment were the candlestick, the table of shew-bread, and the altar of incense. In the second, were the ark which contained the tables of the covenant, and the cherubim. Heb. ix, 1-5. That the covenant here referred to is the ten commandments, see Ex. xxxi, 18; xxxii, 16, 10; xxxiv, 28; Dent. iv, 18; ix, 9-11; x, 4.

7. In this Sanctuary the priests ministered. Ex. xxviii, 41, 48; xxxix, 80; xxv, 19; Lev. iv, 6, 7, 16, 17; xvi, 2-9; Heb. ix, 6, 7; xiii, 11, &c.

8. The transgressor confessed his sin over the head of his victim, thus transferring his guilt to it. The victim was slain and the blood bearing that guilt was sprinkled by the priest within the sanctuary. From there also, thus transferred to it, the sanctuary had to be freed once a year; and this service was called its cleansing. Lev. i, 4, 6; iv, 6; xvi, 16, 33; Heb. ix, 7; Eze. xlv, 18.

9. This cleansing was performed with blood. Lev. xvi, 16, 18, 19, 32, 33; Ex. xxxix, 30, 37; Eze. xlv, 18-20; Heb. ix, 22, 28.

10. This sanctuary was not an original building, but was made after the pattern of a greater and more perfect tabernacle, which must therefore be the great antitype of this earthly building, and must take its place when the latter has served its purpose. Ex. xxv, 9, 40; xxi, 30; Acts vii, 44; Heb. viii, 6. When the tabernacle of Moses gave place to the temple of Solomon, it was still according to the pattern. 1 Chron. xiviii, 10-18, 19.

11. This was the sanctuary of the first covenant [Heb. ix, 1], and was destroyed by Titus in A. D. 70. Dan. ix, 20. For a historical record of this event, see Josephus' Wars, Book vi, chap. iv, sec. 5.

12. This was a type or figure of the sanctuary of the New Covenant, WHICH IS IN HEAVEN. Heb. viii, 1-5; ix, 23, 24; Ps. cii, 19.

The heavenly sanctuary resembling the earthly in that,

1. It has two holy places. Heb. ix, 24. See also verses 8 and 12, and chap. x, 19, in each of which texts the words rendered "holiest," and "holy place," are plural in the original, and should be so rendered, holy places, as they are in many translations. Compare also Ex. xxvi, 31-36, and xxx, 1, 6, with Rev. iv, 1, 2, 6; viii, 8-5; xi, 19.

2. It contains the law (covenant or testament). Rev. xi, 19. Here is brought to view the ark, in the temple or sanctuary in heaven; and the ark was used as the depository of the tables of the covenant or ten commandments. Ex. xxv, 21, 22; xxi, 33, 34; xl, 20, 21; 1 Kings viii, 6-9; Heb. ix, 1-4.

3. It has a service of priesthood. Heb. vi, 19, 20; viii, 1-5; ix, 21; x, 19-21.

4. Christ bore our sins in his own body on the tree [1 Pet. ii, 24]; and through his ministration our sins when we confess them to him, are transferred to the sanctuary above, rendering it in this sense only impure. Nothing less can be argued from the type.

5. It is therefore to be cleansed. Dan. viii, 14. This text must refer to the heavenly sanctuary; for the earthly was destroyed only 620 years after the 2300 commenced. This cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary is accomplished with blood. Heb. ix, 11, 12, 23, 24.

6. When the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle, or temple, in the type, there was no ministration. Ex. xl, 34, 35; 1 Kings viii, 10, 11. So it will be in the antitype. Rev. xv, 6.

7. The most holy place in the type was entered only on the day of atonement. Lev. xvi, 2, 12-15, 29, 30; Heb. ix, 7. So it is in the antitype. Rev. xii, 18. Cleansing the sanctuary, and making the atonement, are identical works.

From the foregoing testimony we see that we were only warranted to expect from the declaration, "Then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed," [Dan. viii, 14], that at the end of the days our great High Priest, in the heavenly sanctuary would enter within the veil into the most holy place, to perform before the ark of ten commands, the last act in his ministration. Having since his ascension, ministered in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary as foreshadowed by the ministration of the priests in the earthly tabernacle, we believe that at the end of the days in 1844, he entered the most holy place, and commenced, according to the prophecy, that work which is called the cleansing of the sanctuary.

What more befitting than that a work of such momentous importance, the last ministration of mercy by our great High Priest, the closing up of the work of salvation for the world, should be introduced by the termination of a great prophetic period? What point of more thrilling interest and importance could be made known than the commencement of the great though brief period of examination and decision of the characters of men? When this is finished the great decree of Rev. xii, 11, will go forth: "He which is filthy let him be filthy still, and he that is holy let him be holy still."

The Sanctuary--An Objection Considered.

TO THE BROTHERS CONCERNED WITH THE REVIEW: I write you for the purpose of gaining, if possible, instruction concerning a certain matter wherein a difference exists between your views and those of others on the same point. It is relative to the "Sanctuary." While I am conversant with your views thereon, I am held in check by what has been published by Dr. John Thomas, with whose writings I judge you are acquainted. In his work, "Anatolia," or "Russia Triumphant," &c., he renders the query, "How long the vision," appealing to, and relying on, the original, "Until when the vision (kashon) the evening-morning sacrifice, tsamid, and the rebellion causing desolation, to give both the holy (kodush) and the army a treading down?" He replies, "The original is not yahmin, 'days'; it is ere boker, an evening-morning." He says further, "'Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed,' was no part of the answer given in Daniel's hearing. The words he heard were ve-nitsdak kodush. The word kodush is not 'sanctuary,' but holy; designating what is holy connected with Judah, such as the Holy City, called emphatically 'The Holy,' and the Holy Land. Again, as to nitsdak, rendered cleansed in the common version, this is not its meaning. It signifies to be vindicated from injury and violence, or to be avenged. The word for to cleanse is tahhar, and is used several times in the sense of to cleanse Judah from the putrefying bodies of the slain in the prophecy of the Autocrat of Russia's overthrow in the breaking of the Luluo-Greek Babylonian power. Ezek. xxxix, 12, 14, 16. 'I am the Holy shall be avenged,' is the only proper rendering of which the original is susceptible in this place." Pp. 24, 25.

Now, with due deference to all my superiors, when an author like Dr. John Thomas comes out with the original and declares before the world that the original is not susceptible of any other rendering, and subjects the character of his scholarship to the severest test, I have to stand back and wait to see if there is to be found a David who can meet this Goliath, and make a better disposition of this matter. If the above be true, then a great and irreparable rent is made in the theory of our "Advent Review" friends. But we are confident if there can be produced any counter understanding that may successfully contravene this position, they will with pleasure make it known for the benefit of their readers. We wait to see what may come to hand for our relief.

A remnant here in this city, in the temporary absence of our esteemed Bro., M. O. Kellogg, are striving for the unity of the faith of the gospel, and the keeping of the commandments of God.

Yours in the one hope of the gospel.

A. H. OTIS.

San Francisco, California.

REPLY. We are glad Bro. Otis has called attention to this subject, as others may be troubled on the same point. The criticism of Dr. Thomas has reference principally to the import of the original words used in Dan. viii, 18, 14. If we understand him, the only points which he endeavors to make are these: 1. That the vision has reference to the daily, evening and morning, sacrifice of the Jews. 2. That the word days, should be translated evening-mornings. 3.

That the word rendered sanctuary does not mean sanctuary, but "the holy," referring especially to the holy city or the holy land. And 4. That the word cleansed means only "to be vindicated from injury and violence," referring also to the land. Let us look at these points in their order:

1. "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily [sacrifice] and the transgression of desolation," &c. Dan. viii, 18. By referring to this scripture the reader will see that the word sacrifice, is not in the original, but is a supplied word. Now unless there can be shown some necessity for supplying this word, we may set it down as settled, that the vision does not relate to the daily sacrifice of the Jews.

First, then, it is not implied in the word "daily," (tsamid) which Dr. T. renders the "evening-morning sacrifice." By the aid of the Englishman's Hebrew Concordance we trace this word through the Old Testament, and find every instance of its use. It is rendered "always, continual, continually, perpetual, ever," and in a few instances "daily." Its usual and almost universal rendering is "continual." This word is used where such expressions as continual burnt offerings, perpetual incense, &c., occur; but where it refers to sacrifice or offering, the word sacrifice or offering is in every instance expressed. The word used above, as in Dan. viii, 18, never signifies an offering or sacrifice, according to the concordance; and it is more frequently applied to other things than to sacrifices and offerings.

Second. There is nothing in the context to demand that the word sacrifice should be supplied. The word first occurs in verse 11, where, speaking of the little horn that waxed exceeding great, Daniel says, "Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily [sacrifice] was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down." Here the "daily" is introduced to us as a power, or something, that was in possession of a sanctuary. It would be altogether improper to apply the pronoun "his" to the daily sacrifice of the Jews, and represent it as in possession of a sanctuary where it worshiped. Again, verse 12, "And an host was given him against the daily [sacrifice]." This represents that the daily was something, against which a host must be given in order to supplant it. But this, again, could not properly be applied to the daily sacrifice of the Jews; for any power that was to overthrow that people, would be represented as coming against the people, and against one of their many ceremonies and sacrifices. This would be singular if not absurd. It is evident, then, that there are two great and opposing powers brought to view from verse 11. These appear face to face in verse 18, the one styled "the daily," the other the "transgression of desolation." The daily what? Sacrifice? No. There is nothing about sacrifice, nor any allusion to it, either in this verse or in the context. Then what? Answer, Desolation. We claim that the natural construction of the language demands that this word be supplied. Then we have, as the two powers brought to view, the daily [desolation] and the transgression of desolation.

What powers are referred to by these expressions? All must agree, or if not, it can be easily proved, that the little horn introduced in verse 9, is the Roman power. And as there is no new symbol of earthly governments brought to view in the chapter, but this reaches to the end, we conclude that the two antagonistic forces subsequently mentioned, represent the two great phases of the Roman power, namely its pagan and papal forms. When it first assumed the reins of empire, it stood forth as the embodiment and representative of paganism. Subsequently, in the same empire, paganism was obliged to yield to the papacy. And under these two divisions may be summed up the oppression of the people of God. Paganism and papacy are the two great desolating powers that have trodden under foot the church. The first, the "daily" or continual desolation, paganism, having from time immemorial oppressed and desolated the church; the latter, the transgression of desolation, papacy, finally supplanting the former, and imbruing its lauds still deeper in the blood of the saints. Concerning these two powers, then, paganism and papacy, and not the daily sacrifice of the Jews, the vision is given, and the question is asked, How long shall the sanctuary and the host be trodden under foot by them?

2. The original in Dan. viii, 14, unto 2300 days, is not ya'min, "days," but erev-boker, evening-morning. Granted; the margin says the same; but what of that? There is no allusion in this to the evening and morning sacrifice. Taken alone, these words never mean that. Whenever the idea of offering and sacrifice is connected with them, it is always expressed, as in the case of the word daily, above examined. These are the words used to express the duration of a day in Gen.

1. The evening and the morning (erev-boker) were the first day (yom). As denoting duration, then, we may set down erev boker as the equivalent of yom. What matters it, therefore, which words are used in Dan. viii, 14? It matters not a particle. Under the word evening, Gesenius, in his Hebrew Lexicon, says: "Erev boker, evening and morning, a day and night, i. e., the civil day of 24 hours. Dan. viii, 14." From this it must be evident to all that "days" is the correct rendering; and being given in connection with a symbolic prophecy, covering so long a period of both paganism and papacy, they must be symbolic, each day standing for a year. But,

3. "The word kodesh," says Dr. T., "is not sanctuary, but holy; designating what is holy connected with Judah, such as the holy city, called emphatically, 'The Holy,' and the Holy Land." Let us look at this. It is true that the word kodesh means holy; it also means sanctuary. Dr. Thomas to the contrary notwithstanding. The first three definitions of the word given by Gesenius are as follows: "1st. Holiness, sanctity. 2d. Consecrated, a holy thing, something sacred, consecrated, opposed to profane. 3d. A holy place, sanctuary, as the tabernacle, Ex. xxviii, 48; xxix, 30; xxxv, 19; xxxix, 1; the temple, Ps. xx, 2; Dan. viii, 14. 4th. Spec. of the temple itself as distinguished from its courts," &c. The word occurs in the Old Testament four hundred and twelve times, and is sixty-seven times rendered sanctuary, referring to the typical sanctuary of the Jews, and thirty-eight times holy or most holy (place), referring also to the temple. It is the word that is used when God speaks of his holy name, his Holy Spirit, holy city, holy land, holy mountain, &c.; but in every instance of this kind, the words name, Spirit, city, land, mountain, &c., are expressed. This word used alone as it is in Dan. viii, 14, is never used in the Bible to signify holy city, holy mountain, or holy land.

An instance cannot be found. But it is used alone as in Dan. viii, 14, one hundred and five times to signify the sanctuary, or holy place of the sanctuary, the place where the Jews offered their sacrifices, and the priests performed their typical service. So far, therefore, as the definition of the word is concerned, Dr. T. certainly mistakes, in thinking that there is any reference in Dan. viii, 14, to the city of Jerusalem, or the land of Palestine.

Again, admitting that the word should be rendered simply "the holy," and that it was once used to signify Jerusalem and Judah, could it signify that now? It could not; for God has cast off that people, rejected that land, and disordered that city; and they are no longer "holy" unto him. What Dr. Thomas' views of the ending of the 2300 days, are, we do not know; but most of that class of Adventists place their termination still in the future. Very well. The text speaks of something called the sanctuary, or the holy, which is to be cleansed at the termination of those days; and if God does not now regard the city or land of the Jews as holy unto him, they cannot be the objects that are then to be cleansed.

But some are continually dwelling upon old Jerusalem, Judah and the Jews, as the especial favorites of Heaven, when God declares expressly that he regards them not. Such might much more appropriately be styled "Judahizers" than Seventh-day Adventists. How must God regard such a course? Let us test it by an illustration. Suppose a certain king for a good and just cause legally divorces his queen, and declares her separated from him forever. Suppose that before she had forfeited all her rights under the marriage relation, he had regarded her highly, and bestowed upon her magnificent favors, and still more magnificent promises. And suppose that after he had put her away, and thoroughly made known the fact, a class of persons should rise up and harangue the people from one end of his kingdom to the other, setting forth how highly he regarded the woman he had put away, what a favorite she was with him, and the magnificent promises he was going to fulfill for her benefit. How would he regard this? It would be a continual insult to him. No less so to the majesty of Heaven, to have people continually setting forth Jerusalem, Judah, and the Jews as objects of special affection with God, when he has declared that he has cast them off, and they are no longer his people. There is now neither Jew nor Greek. Jesus Christ has leveled to the ground all these distinctions. A new covenant is made. A new bond of union is formed. Those only who are in Christ are now the heirs of the promises; and his name alone prevails, to procure for any person, be he Jew or Gentile, the favor or regard of the Almighty. Jerusalem or Judah now holy to God? No more so than Detroit or Michigan.

Once more: There is a "host" connected with this sanctuary to be trodden under foot. This host, all must admit, are the people who are connected with that object called the sanctuary whatever it is. But if the sanctuary is the land, on what ground shall we account for the host's being mentioned in connection with it? For let us inquire what it is to tread under foot a land. A land is literally trodden under foot by those who dwell upon it, be they friends or foes. This then, is not the sense in which it is used in the text under notice. It must be taken to denote the injury or oppression that is inflicted upon it. But how is a land oppressed? It is not by oppressing the stones and dirt that compose the country, but the people who inhabit it. But here are the "host" spoken of besides. Then from the Dr.'s view of Dan. viii, 13, we draw the following: The word sanctuary means the holy land. To tread it under foot means to oppress the people of the land. The host means the people, and treading them under foot means to oppress them. So the question that Daniel heard, divested of all figure, would be simply this: "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily and the transgression of desolation, to give both the people and the people to be trodden under foot?" This would be a nonsensical tautology of which the Scriptures are never guilty. Therefore, again, the word sanctuary in that scripture does not mean the land of Palestine.

But further: It being admitted that the host are the people that are connected with the sanctuary, let us inquire what people constitute this host. Verse 11 speaks of the "prince of the host." We know who this is; it is Jesus of Nazareth, against whom (margin) the little horn, the Roman power, magnified itself when it nailed him to the cross. If, then, Christ is the prince of the host, who are the host? Answer. His people: not the Jews, that is, the literal seed, but those who are Jews inwardly, true Christians. Christ is not the prince of the Jews, since his first advent; for they have rejected him, and been rejected themselves, in consequence. But what connection have Christians with the land of Palestine? None. Therefore, we conclude, again, that Christians being included in the "host" of Dan. viii, 13, the land of Palestine is not the sanctuary of that verse.

4. But, continues Dr. T., the word rendered cleansed does not mean cleansed, but "vindicated from injury and violence;" and this too he applies to the land of Canaan. But there is no more difficulty, except for himself, on this than on the other portions of his criticism. This word occurs forty-one times. Eleven times it is rendered righteous, twenty-eight times justice and justify, once cleansed, Dan. viii, 14, and once clear ourselves. From its use we see that there is an idea of freedom from guilt involved in the word which could not well be applied to the land of Judea.

The word kaphar, which he says is the word for "to cleanse," and which he declares "is used several times in the sense of to cleanse Judea from the putrefying bodies of the slain," &c., occurs ninety-nine times. Sixty-eight times it is rendered atonement. Only once, and that in Num. xxxv, 83, is it used in reference to cleansing the land; and there there is no allusion whatever to putrefying dead bodies. But this is not the word which is rendered cleansed in Dan. viii, 14. And the word there rendered cleansed, never has any reference to cleansing the land in any sense.

In the light of these facts, which any one having a copy of the Hebrew concordance can easily verify, the reader can judge for himself of the correctness of the Dr.'s position and statements.

Of our own views of the sanctuary, the transfer from the type to the antitype in Heaven, how is it trodden under foot, and how and when cleansed, it has not been our object here to speak. On these points we refer the reader to our published works on this subject. We have aimed simply to follow Dr. T.'s criticism, and instead of concluding with him that the rendering, "Then the Holy shall be avenged," is the only proper one "of which the original is susceptible," we conclude rather that it is by no means an allowable one in the sense in which he gives it.

Hard Pressed for Dates.

Two great periods of 2800 days is beyond controversy the most important, if not the most prominent, prophetic period brought to view in the Scriptures. This period has been a source of infinite perplexity to those who have shut their eyes to the daylight of the 1844 movement, and are endeavoring to make their way through these speculative days of error in the light of the sparks of their own kindling. This period must by some means be adjusted. No Advent theory could so much as claim to be looked at, if so important an item as this was ignored, or even did not occupy a prominent place therein. Hence the scores of conjectures, and the incessant tinkering over this period since 1844. The subject is of course up again in connection with the new-time movement of 1868. And what do you imagine, reader, is their starting-point this time, and the reasons they give for it? We will state it as recently advocated through the Voice of the West, by Wm. Sheldon, and argued at length by the editor of the World's Crisis, in a late issue of the latter sheet.

In the language of the Crisis it is stated thus: "As the 2800 days cover the entire length of the vision, till we arrive to the point where it may be said, 'the sanctuary' is 'cleansed,' it follows, of course, that the period dates from the first event in the vision. The vision begins with the work of 'the ram;' and his first and principal act is expressed in the following language: 'I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward,' &c."

Here, then, a point is found in the vision of Dan. viii, for the commencement of the 2800 days. Eld. Grant well argues that it was the subject of time which Daniel did not understand in his eighth chapter; that it was to explain this point that Gabriel was sent to him as recorded in chapter nine; that the seventy weeks are apart of the 2800 days, and that the two periods commence together. But here the matter ends; for Eld. G. holds that the sixty-two weeks, the seven weeks, &c., are no part of the seventy weeks, but different periods entirely. Hence Dan. ix contains no intimation of the commencement of the seventy weeks, and none, consequently, of the commencement of the 2800 days, for that is determined by the seventy weeks; and so it follows that Gabriel, after all, did not give to Daniel the information which he came to give, namely, concerning the 2800 days; and we are compelled, according to this theory, to fall back into the eighth chapter to find the starting-point for that period. This is a little odd, as it assumes that we are able to ascertain the point in question from promises on which Daniel could not, thus making us wiser than Daniel; and it is also rather hard on the angel Gabriel, by virtually representing that he utterly failed in the ninth chapter to give Daniel the information which he was sent to give him. And further, if all needed information is given in the eighth chapter, Gabriel, on his second visit, instead of introducing seventy weeks, and dropping them before giving either commencement or end, and then introducing three other periods that had nothing to do with the subject, should have told Daniel that he need not have been astonished at the vision, nor so void of understanding on the time; for he should know and understand that the days were to commence from the pushing of the ram west, north, and south. But the angel said no such thing, which is to us good presumptive evidence that the pushing of the ram has no connection with the commencement of the days.

But what does this new theory make out the pushing of the ram to be? Is it an act that took place at some specific point of time, so as to furnish a definite commencement for a great prophetic period? Yes, we are told, this pushing was against the children of the Lord, the Jews, scattered through the Persian empire, and took place when the decree went out at the instigation of Haman that all the Jews should perish in one day.

Ezth. iii, 18. And the reason given for applying the pushing to this decree against the Jews, is because "It is not found that the Medo-Persian empire was ever pushing westward, northward, and southward" at any one time, so that no government could stand before it." But does the prophecy say that the pushing of the ram was all done at one time? We find no such idea there. Comic writers, to be sure, have indulged in the hyperbolic expression of a man's running seven ways at once; but we very much doubt whether the prophet saw the ram pushing three ways at once!

But let us read the prophecy, Dan. viii, 4: "I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand, but he was according to his will, and became great." If this language does not describe the march of a nation up to the height of universal empire, there is none in the sacred record which does.

But suppose we try to apply this to the decrees against the Jews, above referred to. At that time king Ahasuerus ruled over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces. Ezth. i, 1. We conclude there had already been some "pushing" on the part of the Medo-Persian empire, else these hundred and twenty-seven provinces extending as far westward as Ethiopia, would not have been brought under its jurisdiction. At this time the Jews were a company of trembling captives scattered through all the provinces of the empire. A decree goes forth for their destruction. Was this the pushing of the ram? Daniel represents as the result of that pushing that none could stand before him, none could deliver out of his hand, he did according to his will, and became great. How was it in case of the Jews? Ans. Through the exertions of Mordecai and Esther, the Jews were given permission to defend themselves. And when the day for the execution of the decree arrived, they did defend themselves, and instead of the Persians' accomplishing their desire upon the Jews, the Jews overcame them with a great triumph!

To get over this point, we are told that the king did do according to his "will;" that his will was reversed; and hence the triumph of the Jews over their Persian enemies was the ram doing according to his will!

What a subterfuge is this! The laws of the Medes and Persians could not be "reversed." We are assured that they changed not. All that could be done was to let that decree stand, and issue a counter one, permitting the Jews to defend themselves. But the "will" of the empire still stood in the decree for their extermination. And when the day arrived, their enemies "hoped" to have power over them. Esth. ix, 1. But God wrought for the Jews. The fear of them fell upon the people. The fear of Mordecai so fell upon the rulers of the provinces, the lieutenants and deputies, that they helped the Jews, and they obtained a complete victory over their Persian enemies, slaying three hundred men at Shushan, the palace, and seventy and five thousand throughout the empire. Chap. ix, 2, 8, 15, 16. And this, according to the new theory, was in fulfillment of the prophecy that no one could stand before the ram! that no one could deliver out of his hand! This was his doing according to his will! and beginning year!!! And this is the commencement of the 2300 days! and—perhaps Heaven knows what next! If anything can exceed the folly of such interpretation, we have yet to see it.

The Review and Herald.

"Revels them through the truth, the word is truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., THIRD-DAY, JUNE 18, 1894.

URIAH SMITH, EDITOR.

The 3500 Days.

BRO. W. BAUM writes: "I have troubled myself for some time about Daniel viii, 14. I could not feel at home with your calculations, and the theory based upon them. I find in the Hebrew not days, as in chapter xii, 11, 12, years, but evening and morning, (erev boker) as in verse 26, where it is literally translated in the English version the evening and the morning. The same we meet in Gen. 1, 5; literally, and it had been (erev) evening, and it had been (boker) morning, the first day! So we get, according to the original, 1150 literal days! Not prophetic days! How is that?"

REMARKS.

On the question here introduced, there are a number of sources from which light may be obtained. If the expression "evening and morning" is synonymous with the word "day," then we can attach to it a prophetic signification, the same as to the latter, and it becomes a matter of complete indifference which is used.

1. On the definition of these words we find the following in Gesenius. Under the word evening, he gives the expression "evening and morning" (geh-ree boh-ker, according to the spelling given in the Hebrew Concordance) and defines it, "a day and night, that is, the civil day of 24 hours. Dan. viii, 14." The word "day" (yohm) is defined by the same author as follows: "Day, so called from the diurnal heat. Spoken of the natural day from the rising to the setting of the sun, opp. the night; also of the civil day, or 24 hours which includes the night."

2. Gesenius makes the expression "evening and morning" as above, equivalent to the Greek νύκτερας, a word which Liddell and Scott define as meaning, "A day and night, the space of 24 hours."

3. The Greek word for day, ἡμέρα corresponding to the Hebrew yohm, is defined by Robinson thus: "A day, i. e., the time from one sunrise or sunset to another, the same as νύκτερας."

4. In Gen. 1, 5, we read that the evening and the morning (geh-ree boh-ker) were the first day (yohm).

5. Dr. Hales in his Analysis of Chronology, Vol. i, p. 10, says: "The earliest measure of Time on record is the Day. In that most ancient and venerable account of the Creation by Moses, the process is marked by the operations of each day. The evening and the morning were the first day," &c. Gen. i, 6. &c. Here the word 'day' denotes the Civil or Calendar day of 24 hours, including 'the evening' or natural night, and 'the morning' or natural day; while the sun is either below or above the horizon of any place, in the course of the earth's diurnal rotation, between two successive appulses of the same meridian to the sun: corresponding, therefore, to a solar day in astronomy."

"It is remarkable, that the 'evening,' or natural night, precedes the 'morning,' or natural day, in the Mosaic account. Hence the Hebrew compound 'Evening-morning,' is used by the prophet Daniel, to denote a civil day, in his famous chronological prophecy of the 2300 days, Dan. viii, 14. And also the Greek compound νύκτερας, to denote the same. And hence Hesiod, the eldest of the Greek poets that have reached us, represents the occultation of the Pleiades as lasting νύκτα τε καὶ ἡμέρα τεσσαράκοντα, 'forty nights and days,' i. e., calendar days. And following the primordial order, the ancient Gauls and Germans, counted times and seasons by the number of nights, not of days; as we learn from Caesar and Tacitus; a usage still retained by their descendants; for in old French, seuit signifies 'to-day;' and in English, sevensnight, fortnight, 'seven days,' 'fourteen days.' Thus is sacred history verified by primitive tradition, handed down to the present times; 'the night seeming to usher in the day.'"

6. The Septuagint in Dan. viii, 14, expresses the word days in the text, the same as in verses 11 and 12 of chap. xii, showing how the seventy learned Jews understood the original Hebrew, two hundred and eighty-five years before Christ.

From all these authorities, it is impossible to conclude otherwise than that, although the literal Hebrew of Dan. viii, 14, is "evening morning," according to the margin, it means precisely the same as though the other expression for day (yohm) had there been used. That the expression is symbolic, each day standing for a year, is proved by two considerations: 1. Being in the midst of a symbolic prophecy, the days must be considered symbolic, unless we have the most positive reasons to show that they are literal; which we have not. 2. The days are evidently given to cover very nearly the whole duration of all the kingdoms mentioned in the prophecy; but taken as literal days, amounting to about six years and a half, they would not cover a portion that would be worth mentioning of the existence of even the first empire. They must therefore denote 2300 years, as all expositors agree.

A WORK OF JUDGMENT.

In Daniel vii, 9, 10, the prophet says: "I beheld all the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened."

The work of judgment here referred to, and the time when it takes place, is usually supposed to be what is termed the last judgment, and the casting down of the thrones is generally thought to refer to the destruction of all earthly governments by the Son of man. It was doubtless the idea that such must be its meaning, that led the translators to render by the words, "were cast down," a term which literally and primarily signifies just the opposite, namely, to set up, or place. The Hebrew word, r'mah, Gesenius defines as follows: "To place, to set, e. g., thrones, Dan. viii, 9;" and he further says that it is akin to the word remah, a name given to several towns because they were situated on elevated or high places. The Septuagint has τίθημι, a word which according to all the lexicons, signifies, not to overthrow or cast down, but to set up, place, establish. The Orling Bible says that Wile and Boothroyd give it the sense of "were placed." Dr. Clarke, although he thinks the common version a proper one, nevertheless says that the sentence, "The thrones were cast down," might be translated, The thrones were "erected; so the Vulgate, positi sunt, and so all the versions." Dr. Hales translates it, "were erected."

From the authorities here cited, it is sufficiently evident that the meaning is that thrones were erected or placed and that the language refers to a time when some special work of judgment was opened, some special tribunal commenced its sitting.

At what time was this to take place? By looking at events to transpire in connection, one of which is given in verses 18 and 19 of Dan. vii, we have light on this point: "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

The "coming of the Son of man" here spoken of, is not his second advent to earth in the clouds of heaven; for he comes to the Ancient of days, God, the Father; but God the Father is not located here upon earth. And this coming takes place before his second advent to earth; for in this passage he comes, that is, is brought near before God, to receive from him a kingdom, and dominion. This is a gift from the Father to the Son: "Ask of me and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." 1st. ii, 8. And the Lord receives this dominion and kingdom before his second advent to earth; for in the parable, Luke xix, 12, in which Christ is represented by the nobleman, he goes into a far country to receive a kingdom, and, after having received it, to return.

The propositions thus far stated are beyond dispute. We therefore inquire, When does Christ receive his kingdom? Certainly not while he occupies the office of a priest; and certainly, just as soon as his work in that capacity is completed. But he comes before the Ancient of days before he receives the kingdom, for it is after this coming that a kingdom and dominion are given him. This, therefore, must take place in the closing up of his priestly work. We therefore inquire again, Do we find any event in the close of Christ's priestly work, answering to the movement and change of position here ascribed to the Son of man? We do; and herein we have a most striking harmony in the prophetic word. According to the type, Christ commenced his ministry, when he ascended, in the first apartment of the "true tabernacle," the sanctuary in Heaven. The closing part of the sanctuary work, called its cleansing, involved a change in the ministrations from the holy to the most holy place. About six hundred years before the complete and final destruction of the earthly sanctuary, it had been announced to Daniel that unto two thousand three hundred days, then the sanctuary should be cleansed. This must of course refer to the heavenly sanctuary, as the earthly was destroyed nearly eighteen hundred years ago. The twenty-three hundred days are shown by arguments which have thus far stood the test of the severest criticism, to have ended in 1844. Then the time came for the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary to commence; and at that point of time we are just as sure that our great High Priest, in accordance with the type, changed his position from the holy to the most holy place of the sanctuary above to finish his priestly work, and close up the plan of salvation, as we are sure that there is any confidence to be placed in type and antitype, or that there is any correspondence between the old dispensation and the new.

Just before this period was reached, the announcement had gone forth, symbolized by an angel flying through mid heaven, crying with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come. And at that point one like the Son of man, came, not the second time to earth, but to the Ancient of days, and was brought near before him; and this was the change in our Lord's position from the first to the second apartment of the heavenly sanctuary to perform the last acts of his office as priest-king on the throne of his Father. Zech. vi, 13; Rev. iii, 21. It was then that the thrones were erected, and the heavenly tribunal commenced its session. Then the judgment was set and the books were opened.

That such a scene must transpire and such a work of investigative judgment be accomplished before the Lord appears, is evident; for at that time the cases of all have been examined so far as to cause it to be decided who among the living are then to be changed, and who among the dead are to have a part in the first resurrection.

The time of the cleansing of the sanctuary, then, is a period of judgment; and in that period we are now living. We are past the opening of the awfully sublime scene described by the prophet in Dan. vii, 9 and 10. It is as yet to us a matter of faith and not of sight; but the result will soon be declared. Solemn moment! Do we realize the issue? Are we living so that in a little from this, the decision in our case will be, "Let them be holy still?"

THOUGHTS ON THE BOOK OF DANIEL.

CHAPTER VII, CONTINUED.

VERSE 9. I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of Days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. 10. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; the Judgment was set, and the books were opened.

A sublimer description of a sublimer scene is not to be found in the English language. But not only on account of the grand and lofty imagery introduced should it arrest our attention; the nature of the scene itself is such as to demand most serious consideration. The Judgment is brought to view; and whenever the Judgment is mentioned, it ought to take an irresistible hold upon every mind; for all have an interest in its eternal issues.

By an unfortunate translation in verse 9, a wrong idea is almost sure to be conveyed. The words "cast down" are from a word which in the original signifies just the opposite, namely, to set up. Dr. Clarke says "that it might be translated erected; so the Vulgate positi sunt [were placed]; and so all the versions." The Septuagint has σκηνοσεν [iridhosen] which is defined to mean "to set, put, place, to set up, to erect." The thrones are not the thrones of earthly kingdoms which are to be thrown down at the last day, but thrones of Judgment which are to be set up, just before the end.

The "Ancient of Days," God the Father, takes the throne of Judgment. Mark the description of his person. Those who believe in the impersonality of God are obliged to admit that he is here described as a personal being; but they console themselves by saying that it is the only description of the kind in the Bible. We do not admit this latter assertion; but granting that it were true, is not one description of this kind as fatal to their theory as though it were repeated a score of times? The thousand thousands who minister unto him, and the ten thousand times ten thousand who stand before him, are not sinners arraigned before the Judgment seat, but heavenly beings who wait before him attendant on his will. An understanding of these verses involves an understanding of the subject of the sanctuary, to works on which subject we refer the reader. The closing up of the ministration of Christ our great High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary is the work of the Judgment here introduced. It is an investigative Judgment. The books are opened, and the cases of all come up for examination before that great tribunal, that it may be determined beforehand who are to receive eternal life, when the Lord shall come to confer it upon his people. John, as recorded in Rev. v, had a view of this same place, and saw the same number of heavenly attendants engaged with Christ in the work of investigative Judgment. Looking into the sanctuary, as we learn that he was from Rev. iv, in chapter v, 11, he says, "And I beheld and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts and the elders; and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands."

It will appear from the testimony of chapter viii, 14, that this solemn work is even now transpiring in the sanctuary above.

VERSE 11. I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld, even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame. 12. As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time.

There are persons who believe in a thousand years' triumph of the gospel and reign of righteousness over all the world before the Lord comes; and there are others who believe in probation after the Lord comes, and a mixed millennium, the immortal righteous still proclaiming the gospel to mortal sinners, and turning them into the way of salvation. But both of these systems of error are completely demolished by the verses before us.

1. The fourth terrible beast continues without change of character, and the little horn continues to utter its blasphemies, and hold its millions of votaries in the bonds of a blind superstition, till the beast is given to the burning flame; and this is not its conversion but its destruction. See 2 Thess. ii, 8.

2. The life of the fourth beast is not prolonged after its dominion is gone, as were the lives of the preceding beasts. Their dominion was taken away, but their lives were prolonged for a season. The territory and subjects of the Babylonish kingdom still existed, though subjected to the Persians. So of the Persian kingdom in respect to Grecia, and of Grecia in respect to Rome. But what succeeds the fourth kingdom? No government or state in which mortals have any part. Its career ends in the lake of fire, and it has no existence beyond. The lion was merged into the bear; the bear into the leopard, the leopard into the fourth beast; and the fourth beast into what? Not into another beast, but into the lake of fire, which is its final destruction till the second death. Then let no one talk of probation or a mixed millennium after the Lord comes.

VERSE 13. I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days, and they brought him near before him. 14. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

The scene here described is not the second advent of Christ to this earth; unless the Ancient of Days is on this earth; for it is a coming to the Ancient of Days. There in the presence of the Ancient of Days, a kingdom, dominion and glory are given him. The Son of Man receives his kingdom before his return to this earth. See Luke xix, 10-12, and onward. This is a scene, therefore, which transpires in the heavenly temple, and is closely connected with that brought to view in verses 9 and 10. He receives the kingdom at the close of his priestly work in the sanctuary. The people, nations, and languages, that shall serve him are the nations of the saved, Rev. xxi, 24, not the wicked nations of the earth; for those are dashed in pieces at the second advent. Some out of all the nations, tribes and kindreds of the earth will stand themselves at last in the kingdom of God, to serve him there with joy and gladness forever and ever.

Verse 15. I Daniel was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body, and the visions of my head troubled me. 16. I came near unto one of them that stood by, and asked him the truth of all this. So he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things. 17. These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth. 18. But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever, even for ever and ever.

No less anxious should we be than was Daniel, to understand the truth of all this. And whenever we inquire with equal sincerity of heart, we shall find the Lord no less ready now, than in the days of the prophet, to lead to a correct knowledge of these important truths. The beasts, and the kingdoms which they represent, have already been explained. We have followed the prophet down through the course of events even to the complete destruction of the fourth and last beast, the final subversion of all earthly governments. What next? Verse 18 tells us: "The saints shall take the kingdom." The saints! those of all others held in low esteem in this world, despised, reproached, persecuted, cast out; those who were considered the least likely of all men ever to realize their hopes; these shall take the kingdom, and possess it forever. The usurpation and misrule of the wicked shall come to an end. The forfeited inheritance shall be redeemed. Peace shall be restored to its distracted borders, and righteousness shall reign o'er all the fair expanse of the renovated earth.

June 15, 1869 U.S.

THOUGHTS ON THE BOOK OF DANIEL.

CHAPTER VII, CONCLUDED.

Verses 19. Then I would know the truth of the fourth beast, which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, whose teeth were of iron, and his nails of brass; which devoured, brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet; 20; and of the ten horns that were in his head, and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows.

Of the first three beasts of this series, Daniel had so clear an understanding, that he had no trouble in reference to them. But he was astonished at this fourth beast, so unnatural and dreadful; for the farther we come down the stream of time, the farther is it necessary to depart from nature in forming symbols to accurately represent the degenerating governments of earth. The lion is a production of nature; but it must have the unnatural addition of two wings to represent the kingdom of Babylon. The bear we also find in nature; but as a symbol of Media-Peria, an unnatural ferocity must be denoted by the insertion of three ribs into its mouth. So the leopard is a beast of nature; but to fitly represent Grecia, there is a departure from nature only in respect to wings, and the number of heads. But nature furnishes no symbol which can fitly illustrate the fourth kingdom. A beast, the likeness of which never was seen, is taken; a beast dreadful and terrible, with nails of brass, and teeth of iron, so cruel, rapacious and fierce, that from mere love of oppression, it devoured, and brake in pieces, and trampled its victims beneath its feet.

Wonderful was all this to the prophet, but something more wonderful still appears. A little horn comes up, and, true to the nature of the beast from which it springs, thrusts aside three of its fellows; and let the horn has eyes, not the uncultivated eyes of the brute, but the keen, shrewd, intelligent eyes of a man; and stranger yet, it has a mouth, and with that mouth, it utters proud sayings, and puts forth preposterous and arrogant claims. No wonder the prophet made special inquiry respecting this monster, so unearthly in its instincts, and so splendid in its works and ways. In the following verses some specifications are given respecting the little horn, which enable the student of prophecy to make an application of this symbol, without danger of mistake.

Verses 21. I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; 22; until the Ancient of Days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom.

The wonderful wrath of this little horn against the saints particularly attracted the attention of Daniel. The rise of the ten horns, or the division of Rome into ten kingdoms, between the years A. D. 846 and 880, has already been noticed. See on chap. ii, 41. As these horns denote kingdoms, the little horn must denote a kingdom also, but not of the same nature, because it was diverse from the others. They were political kingdoms. And now we inquire, What kingdom has arisen among the ten kingdoms of the Roman empire, since A. D. 880, and yet diverse from them all? The answer is, The spiritual kingdom of the Papacy. This answers the symbol in every particular; nothing else will do it. Can there then be any mistake here?

Daniel beheld this horn making war upon the saints. Has this been true of the Papacy? Fifty millions of martyrs, with a voice like the sound of many waters, answer, Yes. Witness the cruel persecutions of the popes of Rome against the Waldenses, the Albigenses, and Protestants in general. It is stated, on good authority, that the persecutions, massacres, and religious wars, excited by the church and bishop of Rome, have occasioned the shedding of far more blood of the saints of the Most High, than all the enmity, hostility, and persecutions, of professed heathens from the foundation of the world.

In verse 22 three consecutive events seem to be brought to view. Daniel, looking onward from the time when the little horn was in the height of its power, to the full end of the long conflict between the saints, and Satan with all his agents, notes three prominent events that stand as mile posts along the way: 1. The coming of the Ancient of Days; that is, his providential judgments upon the little horn, the same as the sitting of the judgment and the taking away of his dominion, of verse 26. This is the first blow upon the Papacy. 2. The judgment that is given to the saints. This is the time when the saints sit with Christ in judgment a thousand years, apportioning the punishment due to the wicked. Then the martyrs will sit in judgment upon the great antichristian, persecuting power, which, in the days of their trial, hunted them like the beasts of the desert, and poured out their blood like water. 3. The time that the saints possess the kingdom; that is, the time of their entrance upon the possession of the new earth. Then the last vestige of the curse, of sin, and of atonement, root and branch, will have been removed away, and the territory so long misruled by the wicked powers of earth, the enemies of God's people, will be finally taken by the righteous, to be held by them forever and ever.

Verses 23. Thus he said, The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms; and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. 24. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise; and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings. 25. And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time. 26. But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and destroy it unto the end.

We have here further particulars respecting the little horn.

1. He shall speak great words against the Most High. Has the Papacy done this? Look at a few of his self-assumed titles: "His Holiness," "Viceroy of the Son of God," "Our Lord God, the Pope," "Another God upon earth," "King of the world," "King of kings, and Lord of lords." Said Pope Nicholas to the emperor Michael, "The Pope, who is called God by Constantine, can never be bound or released by man; for God cannot be judged by man." Is there need of bolder blasphemy than this? Listen also to the adulation the popes have received from their followers without rebuke: A Venetian prelate in the fourth session of the Lateran, addressed the Pope as follows: "Thou art our Shepherd, our Phylax, in short, a second God upon earth." Another bishop called him "the lion of the tribe of Judah, the promised Saviour." Lord Anthony Flood, in the fifth Lateran, said to the Pope, "The sight of thy divine majesty does not a little terrify me; for I am not ignorant that all power both in Heaven and in earth is given unto you; that the prophetic saying is fulfilled in you, 'All the kings of the earth shall worship him, and nations shall serve him." Again, Dr. Clarke, on verse 25 says: "He shall speak as if he were God." So St. Jerome quotes from Symmachus. To none can this apply as well or so fully as to the pope of Rome. They have assumed infallibility, which belongs only to God. They profess to forgive sins, which belongs only to God. They profess to open and shut Heaven, which belongs only to God. They profess to be higher than all the kings of the earth, which belongs only to God. And they go beyond God in pretending to loose whole nations from their oath of allegiance to their kings, whose such kings do not please them. And they go against God, when they give indulgences for sin. This is the worst of all blasphemies."

June 15, 1869 -2- US

5. And shall wear out the saints of the Most High. Has the Papacy done this? For the more information of any student of church history, no answer need here be given. All know that for long years the Papal church has pursued its relentless work against the true followers of God. Chapter after chapter might be given, would our limited space permit. Wars, cruelties, massacres, inquisitions, and persecutions of all kinds—these were their weapons of extinction. And fifty millions of martyrs—these will rise up to the resurrection, as witnesses against her bloody work. Pagan Rome persecuted relentlessly the Christian church; and it is estimated that three millions of Christians perished in the first three centuries; yet it is said that the primitive Christians prayed for the continuance of Imperial Rome; for they knew that when this form of government should cease, another far worse persecuting power would arise, which would literally, as this prophecy declares, "wear out the saints of the Most High." Pagan Rome could slay the infants, but spare the mothers; but Papal Rome slew both mothers and infants together. No age, no sex, no condition in life, was exempt from her relentless rage. "When Herod died," says a forcible writer, "he went down to the grave with infamy, and earth had one murderer, one persecutor, less, and hell one victim more. O Rome! what will not be thy hell, and that of thy votaries, when thy judgment shall have come!"

8. And shall "think to change times and laws." What laws? and whose? Not the laws of other earthly governments; for it was nothing marvellous nor strange for one power to change the laws of another, whenever it could bring such power under its dominion. Not human laws of any kind; for the little horn had power to change these so far as its jurisdiction extended; but the times and laws in question were such as this power should only think to change, but not be able. They are the laws of the same Being to whom the saints belong, whom it wars out with persecution; namely, the laws of the Most High. And has the Papacy attempted this? Yes, even this. It has expunged the second commandment, to make way for its adoration of images. It has divided the tenth, to make up the number. And, more audacious than all! it has taken hold of the fourth commandment, torn from its place the Sabbath of Jehovah, the only memorial of the great God ever given to man, and erected in its place a rival institution to serve another purpose. See Catholic catechisms, What Changed the Sabbath, and works on the Sabbath and Law, published at the Review Office.

4. "And they shall be given into his hands until a time and times and the dividing of time." The pronoun "they" embraces the saints, the times, and the laws just mentioned. How long a time were they to be given into the hands of this power. A time, as we have seen from chap. iv, 23, is one year, two times, the least that could be denoted by the plural, two years and the dividing of time, or half a time (Apoc. 12:14) half a year. We thus have three years and a half for the continuance of this power. We must now consider that we are in the midst of symbolic prophecy; hence this measurement is not literal, but prophetic. The inquiry then arises, how long a period is denoted by three years and a half of prophetic time? The only rule given us in the Bible is, that when a day is used as a symbol, it stands for a year. Eze. iv, 6; Num. xiv, 34. The ordinary Jewish year, which must be used as the basis of reckoning, contained three hundred and sixty days. Three years and a half contained twelve hundred and sixty days. Each day standing for a year we have twelve hundred and sixty years for the continuance of this horn. Did the papacy possess dominion that length of time? The answer again is, Yes. The edict of the emperor Justinian, dated A. D. 528, made the bishop of Rome the head of all the churches. But this edict could not go into effect till the Arian Ostrogoths, the last of the three horns that were plucked up to make room for the Papacy, were driven from Rome, and this was not accomplished till A. D. 588. The edict would have been of no effect had this latter event not been accomplished; hence from this latter year we are to date, as this was the earliest point where the saints were in reality in the hands of this power. From this point did the Papacy hold supremacy for twelve hundred and sixty years? Exactly. For in the year 1708, Berthier, a general of Napoleon's, entered Rome, proclaimed a Republic, took the pope prisoner, and for a time abolished the Papacy. It has never since enjoyed the privileges and immunities which it possessed before. Thus again this power fulfills to the very letter, the specifications of the prophecy, which proves beyond question that the application is correct.

Here the judgment, a judgment like other national judgments of which the Bible speaks, see Acts vii, 7, &c., met upon the Papacy. Its dominion was taken away, that is, its supremacy was broken, and a consuming process there commenced which is to continue till the end of time. Yet the papacy will exist, though with but a shadow of its former prestige, till the appearing of Christ, to be consumed with the spirit of his mouth, and destroyed by the brightness of his coming.

How accurately verse 26 has been fulfilled, since 1798, and is being fulfilled to-day, is evident even to the casual observer of passing events. This is doubtless to be understood more particularly in a national sense. Individuals are still its zealous devotees; but everywhere it has lost and is losing, national recognition and support.

Verse 27. And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him. 28. Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me; but I kept the matter in my heart.

After beholding the dark and desolate picture of Papal oppression upon the church, the prophet once more turns his eyes with delight upon the glorious period of the saints' rest, when they shall have the kingdom free from all oppressive powers, in everlasting possession. What could the children of God do in this present evil world, sighing over the misrule and oppression of the governments of earth, and the abominations that are done in the land, if they could not look forward to the kingdom of God, and the return of their Lord, with full assurance that the promises concerning them both, shall certainly be fulfilled, and that speedily?

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.
(Continued from REVIEW Vol. xxviii, No. 25.)

CHAPTER VIII.

Verse 1. In the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar a vision appeared unto me, even unto me Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first.

One prominent characteristic of the sacred writings, and one which should forever shield them from the charge of being works of fiction, is the frankness and freedom with which the writers state all the circumstances connected with that which they record. This verse states the time when the vision recorded in this chapter was given to Daniel. The first year of Belshazzar is set down as B. C. 555. His third year, in which this vision was given, would consequently be 553. If Daniel, as is supposed, was about twenty years of age when he was carried to Babylon, in the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, B. C. 600, he was at this time about seventy-three years of age. The vision he speaks of as the one "which appeared unto him at the first," is doubtless the vision of the seventh chapter, which he had in the first year of Belshazzar.

Verse 2. And I saw in a vision; and it came to pass, when I saw, that I was at Shushan in the palace, which is in the province of Elam; and I saw in a vision, and I was by the river of Ulai.

As verse 1 states the time when, this verse gives the place where, the vision was given. Shushan, as we learn from Prideaux, was the metropolis of the province of Elam. This was then in the hands of the Babylonians, and there the king of Babylon had a royal palace. Daniel, as minister of State, and employed about the king's business, was accordingly in that place. About three years after this time, Abradates, viceroy or prince of Shushan, revolted to Cyrus, and the province was joined to the Medes and Persians; so that, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, 21: 2, Elam went up with the Medes to besiege Babylon. Under the Medes and Persians it regained its liberties which it had been deprived of by the Babylonians, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah 49: 39.

Verse 3. Then I lifted up my eyes, and saw, and behold, there stood before the river a ram which had two horns; and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beast might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great.

In verse 20, an interpretation of this symbol is given us in plain language: "The ram which thou sawest, having two horns, are the kings of Media and Persia." We have only therefore to consider how well the symbol answers to the power in question. The two horns represented the two nationalities of which the empire consisted. The higher came up last. This represented the Persian element, which from being at first simply an ally of the Medes, came to be the leading division of the empire. The different directions in which the ram was seen pushing, denote the directions in which the Medes and Persians carried their conquests. No earthly powers could stand before them while they were marching up to the exalted position to which the providence of God had pointed them. And so successfully were their conquests prosecuted that in the days of Abasuerus (Esth. 1: 1), the Medo-Persian kingdom extended from India to Ethiopia, the extremities of the then known world, over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces. The prophecy almost seems to fall short of the facts as stated in history, when it simply says that this power did according to its will, and became great.

Verse 6. And as I was considering, behold, an he goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground; and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes. 6. And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power. 7. And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns; and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him; and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand.

"As I was considering," says the prophet; and in this he sets an example for every lover of the truth, and all who have any regard for things higher than the objects of time and sense. When Moses saw the burning bush, he said, "I will now turn aside and see this great sight." But how few are willing at the present time to turn aside from their pursuits of business or pleasure, to consider those important themes to which both the mercy and the providence of God are striving to call their attention.

The symbol here introduced is also explained by the angel to Daniel. Verse 21: "And the rough goat is the king [or kingdom] of Grecia." Concerning the fitness of this symbol to the Grecian or Macedonian people, Bishop Newton observes that, "two hundred years before the time of Daniel, they were called Agadæ, the goat's people; the origin of which name is said to be as follows: Caranus, their first king, going with a multitude of Greeks to seek a new habitation in Macedonia, was advised by an oracle to take the goats for his guide; and afterward, seeing a herd of goats flying from a violent storm, he followed them to Edessa, and there fixed the seat of his empire, and made the goats his ensigns or standards, and called the place Æge or Ægæ, the goats' town, and the people Ægædæ, the goats' people; names which are derived from αἶς, ai's, a goat. The city of Æge or Ægæ, was the usual burying-place of the Macedonian kings; and in reference to this origin, Alexander called his son by Roxana, Alexander Ægæus, Alexander the goat. All this shows the very great propriety of the symbol here used."

The goat came from the west. Grecia lay west of Persia.

"On the face of the whole earth." He covered all the ground as he passed; that is, he swept everything before him; he left nothing behind.

He "touched not the ground." Such was the speed and celerity of his movements that he did not seem to touch the ground, but to fly from point to point with the speed of the wind; the same feature is brought to view by the four wings of the leopard in the vision of chapter 7.

The notable horn between his eyes. This is explained in verse 21 to be the first king of the Macedonian empire. This king was Alexander the Great.

Verses 6 and 7 give a concise account of the overthrow of the Persian empire by Alexander. The contests between the Greeks and Persians are said to have been exceedingly furious; and some of the scenes as recorded in history are vividly brought to mind by the words of the prophecy, a ram standing before the river and the goat running unto him in the fury of his power. Alexander first vanquished the generals of Darius at the river Granicus, in Purygia; he next attacked and totally routed Darius, at the straits of Issus in Cilicia, and afterward at the plains of Arbela in Syria. This battle occurred in c 331, and marks the conclusion of the Persian empire; for by this event Alexander became complete master of the whole country. "One can hardly read these words," says Bp. Newton, "'the ram which I had seen standing by the river,'" and of the goat that he "'ran unto him in the fury of his power,'" without having the image of Darius' army standing and guarding the river Granicus, and of Alexander on the other side, with his forces plunging in, swimming across the stream and rushing on the enemy, with all the fire and fury that can be conceived."

The language of verse 7 sets forth the completeness of the subjection of Medo-Persia to Alexander. The two horns were broken, and the ram cast to the ground and stamped upon. Persia was subdued, the country ravaged, its armies cut to pieces and scattered, its cities plundered, and the royal city of Persopolis, the capital of the Persian empire, and even in its ruins one of the wonders of the world to the present day, was sacked and burnt. Thus the ram had no power to stand before the goat, and there was none that could deliver him out of his band.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER VIII. (CONTINUED.)

Verse 8. Therefore the he goat waxed very great: and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven.

The conqueror is greater than the conquered. The ram, Medo-Peria, became great: the goat, Grecia, became very great. And when he was strong, the great horn was broken. Human foresight and speculation would have said, When he becomes weak, racked by intestine commotions, or paralyzed by luxury, then the horn will be broken and the kingdom shattered. But Daniel saw it broken in the very prime of its strength, and the height of its power, when every beholder would have exclaimed, Surely the kingdom is established, and nothing can overthrow it. Thus it is often with the wicked: The horn of their strength is broken when they think they stand firm; but the righteous, even when they think themselves ready to perish, often find that, through the sustaining power of God, the bruised reed is not broken, and the smoking flax is not quenched.

The kingdom was strong. It was not broken by external foes. No opposing power could touch it. It was broken by the suicidal debauch of the king. Alexander fell in the prime of life. See on verse 39 of chapter 2. After his death there arose much confusion among his followers respecting the succession. It was finally agreed, after seven days' contest, that his natural brother, Philip Arridæus, should be declared king. By him and Alexander's sons, Alexander Agæus and Heracles, the name and show of the Macedonian empire was for a time kept up; but these were all soon murdered; and the royal family being then extinct, the chief commanders of the army, who had gone into different parts of the empire as governors of the provinces, assumed the title of kings. They thereupon fell to leaguings and warring with each other, to such a degree that within the short space of fifteen years from Alexander's death, the number was reduced to—how many? Five? No. Three? No. Two? No. But four; just the number specified in the prophecy; for four notable horns were to come up toward the four winds of heaven, in place of the great horn that was broken. These were, 1. Seleucus, who had Syria and Babylon, and from whom came the line of kings known as the Seleucids, so famous in history. 2. Lysimachus, who had Asia Minor. 3. Ptolemy, son of Lagus, from whom sprang the Lagids; and 4. Cassander who had Greece and the neighboring countries. These held dominion toward the four winds of heaven. Cassander had the western parts, Lysimachus had the northern regions, Ptolemy possessed the southern countries, and Seleucus had the eastern portions of the empire. These four horns may therefore be named Macedonia, Thrace (which then included Asia Minor, and those parts lying on the Hellespont and Bosphorus), Syria and Egypt.

Verse 9. And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land. 10. And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. 11. Yea he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. 12. And a host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it practiced, and prospered.

A third power is here introduced into the prophecy. In the explanation which the angel gave to Daniel of these symbols, this one is not described in language so definite as that of Medo-Peria and Grecia. Hence a flood of wild conjecture is at once let loose. Had not the angel positively, and in language which cannot be misunderstood, stated that Medo-Peria and Grecia were denoted by the ram and the he-goat, it is impossible to tell what application men would have given us of these symbols. Probably they would have applied them to anything and everything but the right objects. Leave men a moment to their own judgment in the interpretation of prophecy, and we immediately have the most sublime exhibitions of human folly.

There are two leading applications of the symbol now under consideration, which are all that need be noticed in these brief thoughts. The first is that the little horn here introduced denotes Antiochus Epiphanes; the second is, that it denotes the Roman power. It seems to us an easy matter to test the claims of these two positions.

Does it mean Antiochus? If so, this king must fulfill the specifications of the prophecy. If he does not fulfill them, the application cannot be made to him. The little horn came out of one of the four horns of the goat. It was then a separate power, existing independently of, and distinct from, any of the horns of the goat. Was Antiochus such a power?

1. Who was Antiochus? From the time that Seleucus made himself king over the Syrian portion of Alexander's empire, thus constituting the Syrian horn of the goat, until that country was conquered by the Romans, twenty-six kings ruled in succession over that territory. The eighth of these, in order, was Antiochus Epiphanes. Antiochus, then, was simply one of the twenty-six kings which constituted the Syrian horn of the goat. He was for the time being that horn. Hence he could not be at the same time a separate and independent power, or another and remarkable horn, as the little horn was.

2. If it were proper to apply the little horn to any one of these twenty-six Syrian kings, it should certainly be applied to the most powerful and illustrious of them all; but Antiochus Epiphanes did not by any means sustain this character. Although he took the name Epiphanes, that is, The Illustrious, he was illustrious only to name; for nothing, says Prideaux, on the authority of Polybius, Livy, and Diodorus Siculus, could be more alien to his true character. For on account of his vile and extravagant folly, some thinking him a fool and others a madman, they changed the name of Epiphanes, The Illustrious into Epimanes, The Madman.

3. Antiochus the Great, the father of Epiphanes, being terribly defeated in a war with the Romans, was enabled to procure a peace only by the payment of a prodigious sum of money, and a surrender of a portion of his territory; and as a pledge that he would faithfully adhere to the terms of the treaty, he was obliged to give hostages, among whom was this very Epiphanes, his son, who was carried to Rome. The Romans ever after maintained this ascendancy.

4. The little horn waxed exceeding great; but this Antiochus did not enlarge his dominion except by some temporary conquests in Egypt, which he immediately relinquished when the Romans took the part of Ptolemy, and commanded him to desist from his designs in that quarter. The rage of his disappointed ambition he vented upon the unoffending Jews.

5. The little horn, in comparison with the powers that preceded it, was exceeding great. Persia is simply called great, though it reigned over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces. Esth. 1:1. Grecia being more extensive still, is called very great. Now the little horn which waxed exceeding great, must surpass them both. How absurd then to apply this to Antiochus who was obliged to abandon Egypt at the dictation of the Romans, and to whom he paid enormous sums of money as tribute. The Religious Encyclopedia gives us this item of his history: "Finding his resources exhausted he resolved to go into Persia to levy tribute, and collect large sums which he had agreed to pay to the Romans." It cannot take long for any one to decide the question which was the greater power, the one which evacuated Egypt, or the one which commanded that evacuation; the one that exacted tribute, or the one which was compelled to pay it.

6. The little horn was to stand up against the Prince of princes. The Prince of princes, here means, beyond controversy, Jesus Christ. Dan. 9:26; Acts 3:16; Rev. 1:5. But Antiochus died one hundred and sixty-four before our Lord was born. The prophecy cannot therefore apply to him; for he does not fulfill the specifications in one single particular. The question may then be asked how any one has ever come to apply it to him. We answer, Romanists take that view, to avoid the application of the prophecy to themselves; and many Protestants follow them, in order to oppose the doctrine of the second advent.

It has been an easy matter to show that the little horn does not denote Antiochus. It will be just as easy to show that it does denote Rome.

1. The field of vision here is substantially the same as that covered by Nebuchadnezzar's image, of chapter 2, and Daniel's vision of chapter 7. And in both those prophetic delineations we found that the power which succeeded Grecia, as the fourth great power, was Rome. The only natural inference would be that the little horn, the power which in this vision succeeds to Grecia, as an exceeding great power, is also Rome.

2. It comes forth from one of the horns of the goat. How, it may be asked, can this be true of Rome? It is unnecessary to remind the reader that earthly governments are not introduced into prophecy till they become in some way connected with the people of God. Rome became connected with the Jews, the people of God at that time, by the famous Jewish League a. c. 161. 1 Maccabees 8; Josephus' Antiq. B. 12, chap. 10, sec. 6; Pridmore, vol. 2, p. 166. But seven years before this, in a. c. 168, Rome had conquered Macedonia, and made it a part of itself. It is therefore introduced into prophecy just as, from the conquered Macedonian horn of the goat, it is preparing to go forth to new conquests in other directions. It therefore appeared to the prophet, or may be properly spoken of in prophecy, as coming forth from out of the horns of the goat.

3. It waxed great toward the south. Egypt was made a province of the Roman empire, and continued such for some centuries.

4. Toward the east. Rome conquered Syria, and made it a province.

5. Toward the pleasant land. Judea is so called in many scriptures. The Romans finally made this a province, and eventually destroyed the city and the temple, and scattered the Jews over the face of the whole earth.

6. It waxed great even to the host of heaven. The host of heaven when used in a symbolic sense in reference to events transpiring here upon earth, must denote persons of illustrious character, or exalted position. The great red dragon, Rev. 12:4, is said to have cast down a third part of the stars of heaven to the ground. The dragon was there interpreted to symbolize Pagan Rome, and the stars it cast to the ground were Jewish rulers. We think it is the same power and the same work that is here brought to view.

7. He magnified himself even to the prince of the host. In the interpretation, verse 26, this is called standing up against the Prince of princes. How clear an allusion to the crucifixion of our Lord, under the jurisdiction of the Romans.

8. By him the daily sacrifice was taken away. We understand that the little horn symbolizes Rome in its entire history including the two phases of pagan and papal. These two phases are elsewhere spoken of as the "daily" (sacrifice is a supplied word) and the "transgression of desolation;" the daily [desolation] signifying the pagan form, and the transgression of desolation, the papal. In the actions ascribed to this power, sometimes one form is spoken of, sometimes the other. "By him," the papal form, the daily, the pagan form, was taken away. Pagan Rome gave place to papal Rome. And the place of his sanctuary, or worship, the city of Rome, was cast down. The seat of government was removed to Constantinople. The same transaction is brought to view in Revelation 18:2, where it says that the dragon, pagan Rome, gave to the beast, papal Rome, his seat, the city of Rome, and power and great authority, the whole influence of the empire.

9. A host was given him against the daily. The barbarians that subverted the Roman empire, in the changes, attritions and transformations of those times, became converts to the Catholic faith, and the instruments of the dethronement of their former religion. From being the conquerors of Rome, they became the persecutors of the same empire in another phase. And this was brought about by reason of transgression, by the working of the mystery of iniquity. The papacy is the most God-dishonoring system of iniquity ever devised, because in his name it commits its abominations, and practices its orgies of hell in the garb, and under the pretense, of pure and undefiled religion.

10. It cast the truth to the ground and practiced and prospered. This describes, in few words, the work and career of the papacy. The truth is by it hideously caricatured; it is loaded with traditions; it is turned into mummary and superstition; it is cast down and obscured. And this antichristian power has practiced—practiced its deceptions upon the people, practiced its schemes of cunning to carry its own ends, and aggrandize its own power. And it has prospered. It has made war with the saints and prevailed against them. It has run its allotted career, and now is about to be broken without hand, to be given to the burning flame, and perish in the consuming glories of the second appearing of our Lord.

Rome meets all the specifications of the prophecy. No other power does. Hence Rome, and no other, is the power in question. And the word of God, describing the character and history of this monstrous system, has been most strikingly and accurately fulfilled.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER VIII. (CONTINUED.)

Verses 18. Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? 19. And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.

The Time. These two verses close the vision proper of chapter 8; and they introduce the one remaining point which of all others would naturally be of the most absorbing interest to the prophet, and to all the church; namely, the time the desolating powers previously brought to view were to continue. How long shall they continue their course of oppression against God's people, and of blasphemy against High Heaven? Daniel, if time had been given, might perhaps have asked this question himself; but Heaven is ever ready to anticipate our wants, and sometimes to answer, even before we ask. Hence two celestial beings appear upon the scene, holding a conversation, in the hearing of the prophet, upon this question which it is so important that the church should understand. Daniel heard one saint speaking. What this saint spoke at this time we are not informed; but there must have been something either in the matter or the manner of this speaking, which made a deep impression upon the mind of Daniel, inasmuch as he uses it in the very next sentence as a designating title, calling the angel "that certain saint which spake." He may have spoken something of the same nature as that which the seven thunders of the Apocalypse uttered, Rev. 10: 4, and which, when John was about to write, he was restrained, for some good reason, from so doing. But another saint asked this one that spake an important question: How long the vision? and both the question and the answer are placed upon record; which is prima facie evidence that this is a matter which it was designed that the church should understand. And this view is further confirmed by the fact that the angel did not ask this question for his own information, inasmuch as the answer was addressed to Daniel, as the man whom it chiefly concerned, and for whose information it was given. "And he said unto me," said Daniel, recording the answer to the angel's question: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

The Daily Sacrifice. We have proof in verses 18 that sacrifice is the wrong word to be supplied in connection with the word daily. If the daily sacrifice of the Jewish service is here meant, or in other words, the taking away of that sacrifice, as some suppose, which sacrifice was at a certain point of time taken away, there would be no propriety in the question, How long the vision concerning it? This question evidently implies that these agents or events to which the vision relates, occupy a long series of years. Continuance of time is the central idea. And the whole time of the vision is filled by what is here called the daily, and transgression of desolation. Hence the daily cannot be the daily sacrifice of the Jews, the taking away of which, when the time came for it, occupied comparatively but an instant of time. It must denote something which occupies a series of years.

The word here rendered, daily, occurs in the Old Testament, according to the Hebrew Concordance, one hundred and two times, and is, in the great majority of instances, rendered continual, and continually. The idea of sacrifice does not attach to the word in all. Nor is there any word in the text which signifies sacrifice. It is wholly a supplied word, the translator putting in that word which their understanding of the text seemed to demand. But we think they took a erroneous view, and that the sacrifices of the Jew are not referred to at all. We therefore suggest, a being more in accordance with both the construction and the context, that the word daily refers to a desolating power, like the transgression of desolation with which it is connected. Then we have the daily, or continual, desolation, and the transgression of desolation; the daily or continual desolation, signifying paganism, and the transgression of desolation, the papacy.

From a religious point of view, the world has presented only these two phases. Hence although three earthly governments are introduced in the prophecy, as oppressors of the church, they are here ranged under two heads: the daily, and the transgression of desolation. Medo-Persia was pagan; Greece was Pagan; Rome in its first phase was pagan; these all composed the daily; then comes the papal form, which was to be the leading persecuting power to the end of time, a marvel of satanic craft and cunning, an incarnation of selfish bloodthirstiness and cruelty. No wonder the cry has gone up from suffering martyrs, from age to age, How long, O Lord, how long? And no wonder the Lord, in order that hope might not wholly die out of the hearts of his down-trodden, waiting people, has lifted before them the veil of futurity, showing them the consecutive events of the world's history, till all these persecuting powers should meet an utter and everlasting destruction, and giving them glimpses beyond, of the unfading glories of their eternal inheritance.

The Lord's eye is upon his people. The furnace will be heated no hotter than necessary to consume the dross. It is through much tribulation we are to enter the kingdom; and the word tribulation is from tribulum, a threshing sledge. Blow after blow must be laid upon us, till all the wheat is beaten from the chaff, and we are made fit for the heavenly garner. But not a kernel of wheat shall be lost. Says the Lord to his people, Ye are the light of the world, the salt of the earth. In his eyes there is nothing else of consequence or importance on the earth. Hence the peculiar question here asked, How long the vision respecting the daily and transgression of desolation, concerning what? The glory of earthly kingdoms? the skill of renowned warriors? the fame of mighty conquerors? the greatness of human empire? No; but concerning the sanctuary and the host, the people and worship of the Most High. How long shall they be trodden under foot? Here is where all Heaven's interest and sympathy are enlisted. He who touches the people of God, touches not mere mortals, weak and helpless, but Omnipotence; he opens an account which must be settled at the bar of Heaven. And soon all these accounts will be adjusted, the iron heel of oppression will be lifted, and a people will be brought out of the furnace prepared to shine as the stars forever and ever. To be one who is an object of interest to heavenly beings, one whom the providence of God is engaged to preserve while here, and crown with immortality hereafter—what a privilege! Reader, are you one of the number?

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER VIII. (Verses 18, 14, CONTINUED.)

Ensnaring the 2600 days, introduced for the first time in verse 14, there are no data in this chapter from which we can determine their commencement and close, or tell what portion of the world's history they cover. We are obliged, therefore, for the present, to pass them by. Let the reader be assured, however, that they are not left in this indefinite condition. The declaration respecting them is a part of a revelation which is given for the instruction of the people of God, and is consequently to be understood. They are spoken of in the midst of a prophecy which the angel Gabriel was commanded to make Daniel understand; and which instruction we may be certain that the angel at some time carried out, and hence that somewhere the necessary information is given respecting this important period. We shall look for something further on this point in subsequent portions of the prophecy of Daniel; and we shall find that the mystery which hangs over these days in this chapter, is dispelled in the next.

The Sanctuary. Connected with the 2600 days is another object of equal importance, which may at this point be legitimately made a subject of inquiry; namely, the sanctuary and its cleansing. As we examine this subject we shall see the importance of having an understanding of the commencement and termination of the 2600 days, that we may know when the important event called the cleansing of the sanctuary is to transpire; for all the inhabitants of earth, as will in due time appear, have a personal interest in that solemn work.

Several objects have been claimed by different ones as the sanctuary here mentioned: 1. The earth. 2. The land of Canaan. 3. The church. 4. The sanctuary, the "true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man," which is "in the heavens," and of which the Jewish tabernacle was a type, pattern, or figure. Heb. 8:1, 2; 9:23, 24. These conflicting claims must be decided by what the Scriptures say on the subject; and fortunately its testimony is neither meager nor ambiguous.

1. The word sanctuary occurs in the Old and New Testaments one hundred and forty-six times; and from the definitions of lexicographers, and its use in the Bible, we learn that it is used to signify a holy or sacred place, a dwelling-place for the Most High. If, now, the earth is the sanctuary, it will answer to the definition, and the Bible will somewhere speak of it as such. But we do not find a single characteristic pertaining to this earth which will satisfy the definition. It is neither a holy nor a sacred place, nor is it a dwelling-place for the Most High. It has no mark of distinction except as being a revolted planet, marred by sin, and scarred and withered by the curse. Moreover it is nowhere in all the Scriptures called the sanctuary. Only one text can be produced in favor of this view, and that only by a false application. Isa. 60:18, says: "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary; and I will make the place of my feet glorious." This language undoubtedly refers to the new earth; but even that is not called the sanctuary, but only the place of the sanctuary, just as it is called the place of the Lord's feet; an expression which probably denotes the continual presence of God with his people, as it was revealed to John when it was said, "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God." Rev. 21:3. All that can be said of the earth, therefore, is, that when renewed it will be the place where the sanctuary of God will be located. It can present not a shadow of a claim to being the sanctuary at the present time, or the sanctuary of the prophecy.

2. Is the land of Canaan the sanctuary? So far as we may be governed by the definition of the word, it can present no better claim than the earth to that distinction. If we inquire where in the Bible it is called the sanctuary, a few texts are brought forward which seem to be supposed by some to furnish the requisite testimony. The first of these is Ex. 15:17. Moses in his song of triumph and praise to God after the passage of the Red Sea, exclaimed: "Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established." A writer who urges this text, says, "I ask the reader to pause, and examine and settle the question most distinctly, before he goes further—What is the sanctuary here spoken of?" We think it would be safer for the reader not to attempt to settle the question definitely from this one isolated text, before comparing it with other scriptures. Moses here speaks in anticipation. His language is a prediction of what God would do for his people. Let us see how it was accomplished. If we find, in the fulfillment, that the land in which they were planted is called the sanctuary, it will greatly strengthen the claim that is based upon this text. If, on the other hand, we find a plain distinction drawn between the land and the sanctuary, then Ex. 15:17, must be interpreted accordingly. We turn to David, who records as a matter of history what Moses uttered as a matter of prophecy. Ps. 78:58, 59. The subject of the psalmist here, is the deliverance of Israel from Egyptian servitude, and their establishment in the promised land; and he says: "And he [God] led them on safely so that they feared not; but the sea overwhelmed their enemies. And he brought them to the border of his sanctuary, even to this mountain which his right hand had purchased." The "mountain" here mentioned by David, is the same as the "mountain of thine inheritance" spoken of by Moses, in which the people were to be planted; and this mountain David calls, not the sanctuary, but only the border of the sanctuary. What then was the sanctuary? Verse 60 of the same psalm informs us: "And he built his sanctuary like high palaces, like the earth which he hath established forever." The same distinction between the sanctuary and the land is pointed out in the prayer of good king Jehoshaphat. 2 Chron. 20:7, 8: "Art not thou our God who didst drive out the inhabitants of this land before thy people Israel, and gave it to the seed of Abraham, thy friend, forever? And they dwell therein, and have built thee a sanctuary therein for thy name." Taken alone, the inference might be drawn from Ex. 16: 17, that the mountain was the sanctuary; but when we take in connection with it the language of David; which is a record of the fulfillment of Moses' prediction, and an inspired commentary upon his language, such an idea cannot be entertained; for David plainly says that the mountain was simply the border of the sanctuary; and that in that border or land, the sanctuary was built like high palaces, reference being made to the beautiful temple of the Jews, the center and symbol of all their worship. In view of this testimony, we must attribute the peculiar phraseology of Ex. 16: 17 to the supposition either that in the first flush of his great triumph, or the freedom of poetic license, Moses applies the word sanctuary to the mountain where it was to be located, just as the tribe of Judah is called Mount Zion, because Mount Zion was the all-important place in that tribe, Pa. 76: 68; or he uses the word sanctuary in an indefinite sense, to denote simply a consecrated place, or a hallowed spot, which is one of the definitions of the word hagiasma which the Septuagint here use.

The three texts, Ex. 16: 17; Pa. 76: 64, 69, are the ones chiefly relied on to prove that the land of Canaan is the sanctuary; but, singularly enough, the two latter in plain language clear away the ambiguity of the first, and utterly disprove the claim that it is based thereon.

Having disposed of the main proof on this point, it would hardly seem worth while to spend time with those texts from which only inferences can be drawn. As there is, however, only one even of this class, we will refer to it, that no point may be left unnoticed. Isa. 66: 18: "The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little while; our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary." This language is as applicable to the temple as to the land; for when the land was overrun with the enemies of Israel, their temple was laid in ruins. This is plainly stated in verse 11 of the next chapter: "Our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee, is burned up with fire." The text therefore proves nothing.

Respecting the earth, or the land of Canaan, as the sanctuary, we offer one thought more. If they constitute the sanctuary, they should not only be somewhere described as such, but the same idea should be carried through to the end, and the purification of the earth, or of Palestine, should be called the cleansing of the sanctuary. The earth is indeed defiled, and it is to be purified by fire; but fire, as we shall see, is not the agent which is used in the cleansing of the sanctuary; and this purification of the earth, or any part of it, is nowhere in the Bible called the cleansing of the sanctuary.

8. Is the church the sanctuary? The evident mistrust with which this idea is suggested is a virtual surrender of the argument, before it is presented. One solitary text is adduced in its support: Pa. 114: 1, 2: "When Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language, Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion." Should we take this text in its most literal sense, what would it prove respecting the sanctuary? It would prove that the sanctuary was confined to one of the twelve tribes; and hence that a portion of the church only, not the whole of it, constitutes the sanctuary. But this, proving too little for the theory under consideration, proves nothing. Why Judah is called the sanctuary in the text quoted, need not be a matter of perplexity when we remember that God chose Jerusalem, which was in Judah, as the place of his sanctuary. "But choose," says David, "the tribe of Judah, the Mount Zion which he loved. And he built his sanctuary like high palaces, like the earth which he hath established forever." This clearly shows the connection which existed between Judah, and the sanctuary. That tribe itself was not the sanctuary; but it is once spoken of as such when Israel came forth from Egypt, because God purposed that in the midst of the territory of that tribe, his sanctuary should be located. But even if it could be shown that the church is anywhere called the sanctuary, it would be of no consequence to our present purpose, which is to determine what constitutes the sanctuary of Dan. 8: 18, 14; for the church is there spoken of as another object: "To give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot." That by the term hagat, the church is here meant, none will dispute; the sanctuary is therefore another and a different object.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER VIII. (VERSE 14, CONTINUED.)

4. There remains but one more position to be examined; namely, That the sanctuary mentioned in the text, is what Paul calls in Hebrews the "true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man," to which he expressly gives the name of "the sanctuary," and which he locates in "the Heavens;" of which sanctuary, we had under the former dispensation, first in the tabernacle built by Moses, and afterward in the temple at Jerusalem, a pattern, type, or figure. And let it be particularly noticed, that on the view here suggested, rests our only hope of ever understanding this question; for we have seen that all other positions are untenable. No other object which has ever been supposed by any one to be the sanctuary, neither the earth, the land of Canaan, nor the church, can for a moment support its claim. If, therefore, we do not find it in the object before us, we may abandon the search in utter despair; we may discard so much of revelation as still unrevealed, and may cut out the numerous passages which speak of this subject, as so much useless lumber on the sacred page. All those, therefore, who, rather than that so important a subject should go by default, are willing to lay aside all preconceived opinions and cherished views, will approach the position before us with intense anxiety and unbounded interest. They will lay hold of any evidence that may here be given us, as a man bewildered in a labyrinth of darkness, would lay hold on the thread which was his only guide to lead him forth again to light, or as the perishing man would leap for the last life-boat that could rescue him from destruction.

It will be safe for us to put ourselves in imagination in the place of Daniel, and view the subject from his standpoint. What would he understand by the term sanctuary as addressed to him? If we can ascertain this, it will not be difficult to arrive at correct conclusions on this subject. His mind would inevitably turn, on the mention of that word, to the sanctuary of that dispensation; and certainly he well knew what that was. His mind did turn to Jerusalem, the city of his fathers, which was then in ruins, and to their "beautiful house," which, as Isaiah laments, was burned with fire. And so, as was his wont, with his face turned toward the place of their once venerated temple, he prayed God to cause his face to shine upon his sanctuary which was desolate. By the the word sanctuary, Daniel evidently understood their temple at Jerusalem.

But Paul bears testimony, which is most explicit on this point. Heb. 9:1: "Then verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary." This is the very point which at present we are concerned to determine: What was the sanctuary of the first covenant? Paul proceeds to tell us. Hear him: Verse 2-6. "For there was a tabernacle made; the first [or first apartment] wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the showbread; which is called the sanctuary [margin, the holy]. And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all; which had the golden censor, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant; and over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercyseat; of which we cannot now speak particularly."

There is no mistaking the object to which Paul here has reference. It is the tabernacle erected by Moses according to the direction of the Lord, with a holy and a most holy place, and various vessels of service, as here set forth. A full description of this building, with its various vessels and their uses, will be found in Exodus, chapter 26, and onward. If the reader is not familiar with this subject, he is requested to turn and carefully examine the description of this building. This, Paul plainly says, was the sanctuary of the first covenant. And we wish the reader to carefully mark the logical value of this declaration. By telling us what did positively for a time constitute the sanctuary, Paul sets us on the right track of inquiry. He gives us a basis on which to work. For a time the field is cleared of all doubt and all obstacles. During the time covered by the first covenant, which reached from Sinai to Christ, we have before us a distinct and plainly-defined object, minutely described by Moses and declared by Paul to be the sanctuary during that time.

But Paul's language has greater significance even than this. It forever annihilates the claims which are put forth in behalf of the earth, the land of Canaan, or the church, as the sanctuary. For the arguments which would prove them to be the sanctuary at any time, would prove them to be such under the old dispensation. If Canaan was ever the sanctuary, it was such when Israel were planted in it. If the church was ever the sanctuary, it was such when Israel were led forth from Egypt. If the earth was ever the sanctuary, it was such during the period of which we speak. To this period the arguments urged in their favor, apply; and if they were not the sanctuary during this time, then all the arguments are destroyed which would show that they ever were, or ever could be, the sanctuary. But were they the sanctuary during that time? This is a final question for these theories; and Paul decides it in the negative, by describing to us the tabernacle of Moses, and telling us that that, not the earth, nor Canaan, nor the church, was the sanctuary of that dispensation.

And this building meets all the requirements of the true sanctuary. 1. It was the earthly dwelling-place of God. "Let them make me a sanctuary," said he to Moses, "that I may dwell among them." Ex. 25: 8. In this tabernacle, which they erected according to his instructions, he manifested his presence. 2. It was a holy or sacred place: "The holy sanctuary," Lev. 16: 33. 3. It is ever and over again called the sanctuary, in the word of God. Of the one hundred and forty-two instances in which the word is used in the Old Testament, it refers in almost every case to his building.

The tabernacle was at first constructed in such a manner as to be adapted to the condition of the children of Israel at that time. They were just entering upon their forty years' wandering in the wilderness, when this building was set up in their midst, as the habitation of God, and the center of their religious worship. Journeying was a necessity, and removals were frequent. It would be necessary that the tabernacle should often be moved from place to place. It was, therefore, so fashioned of movable parts, the sides being composed of upright boards, and the covering consisting of curtains of linen and dyed skins, that it could be readily taken down, conveniently transported, and easily erected at each successive stage of their journey. After entering the promised land, this temporary structure in time gave place to the magnificent temple of Solomon. In this more permanent form it existed, saving only the time it lay in ruins in Daniel's day, till its final destruction by the Romans, in A. D. 70.

This is the only sanctuary connected with the earth, about which the Bible gives us any instruction, or history any record. But is there nowhere any other? This was the sanctuary of the first covenant; with that covenant it came to an end; is there no sanctuary which pertains to the second or new covenant? There must be; otherwise there is no analogy between these covenants; and while one has a system of worship, which, though minutely described, is unintelligible, the other is indefinite and obscure. And Paul the same as asserts that the new covenant, in force since the death of Christ the testator, has a sanctuary; for when, in contrasting the two covenants, as he does in the book of Hebrews, he says, in chapter 9:1, that the first covenant "had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary," it is the same as saying that the new covenant has likewise its services and its sanctuary. Furthermore, in verse 8 of this chapter, he speaks of the worldly sanctuary as the first tabernacle. If that was the first, there must be a second; and as that existed so long as the first covenant was in force, the second must have succeeded to it when that came to its end, and must be the sanctuary of the new covenant. There can be no evading this conclusion.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER VIII. (VERSE 14, CONTINUED.)

When then shall we look for the sanctuary of the new covenant? Paul by the use of the word, also, in verse 1 of Hebrews 9, intimates that he had before spoken of this sanctuary. We turn back to the beginning of the previous chapter and find him summing up his foregoing arguments as follows: "Now of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: We have such an High Priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the Heavens, a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Can there be any doubt that we here have the sanctuary of the new covenant? There is here a plain allusion to the sanctuary of the first covenant. That was pitched by man, erected by Moses; this was pitched by the Lord, not by man. That was the place where the earthly priests performed their ministry; this is the place where Christ, the high priest of the new covenant, performs his ministry. That was on earth; this is in Heaven. That was very properly therefore called by Paul a worldly sanctuary; this is a heavenly.

This view is further sustained by the fact that the sanctuary built by Moses, was not an original structure, but was built after a pattern. The great original existed somewhere else; what Moses constructed was but a type or model. Listen to the directions the Lord gave him on this point: "According to all that I show thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it." Ex. 25:9. "And look that thou make them after their pattern which was showed thee in the mount." Verse 40. To the same end see Ex. 26:30; 27:8; Acts 7:44.

Now of what was the earthly sanctuary a type or figure? Answer. Of the sanctuary of the new covenant, the "true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man." The relation which the first covenant sustains to the second throughout, is that of type to antitype. Its sacrifices were types of the greater sacrifice of this dispensation; its priests were types of our Lord, in his more perfect priesthood; their ministry was performed unto the shadow and example of the ministry of our High Priest above; and the sanctuary, where they ministered, was a type or figure of the true sanctuary in Heaven where our Lord performs his ministry. All these facts are plainly stated by Paul in a few verses to the Hebrews. Chapter 8:4, 6: "For if he [Christ] were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law; who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle; for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount." This testimony shows that the ministry of the earthly priests, was a shadow of Christ's priesthood; and the evidence Paul brings forward to prove it, is the direction which God gave to Moses to make the tabernacle according to the pattern showed him in the mount. This clearly identifies the pattern showed to Moses in the mount, with the sanctuary or true tabernacle in Heaven, where our Lord ministers, mentioned three verses before. In chapter 9:8, 9, Paul further says: The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all [Greek, holy places, plural] was not made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing; which was a figure for the time then present." &c. While the first tabernacle stood, and the first covenant was in force, the ministration of the second tabernacle, and the work of the new covenant, was not of course carried forward. But when Christ came an high priest of good things to come, when the first tabernacle had served its purpose, and the first covenant had ceased, then Christ, ascended to the throne of the majesty in the Heavens as a minister of the true sanctuary, entered by his own blood, says verse 12, "into the holy places [where also the Greek has the plural, the holy places] having obtained eternal redemption for us." Of these heavenly holy places, therefore, the first tabernacle was a figure for the time then present. If any further testimony is needed, he speaks, in verse 22, of the earthly tabernacle, with its apartments and instruments, as patterns of things in the Heavens; and in verse 28 he calls the holy places made with hands, that is, the earthly tabernacle erected by Moses, figures of the true.

This view is still further corroborated by the testimony of John. Among the things which he was permitted to behold in Heaven, he saw seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, Rev. 4:5; he saw an altar of incense, and a golden censer, chapter 8:3; he saw the ark of God's testament, chapter 11:19; and all this in connection with a temple in Heaven; chapter 11:19; 16:8. These objects every Bible reader must at once recognize as implements of the sanctuary. They owed their existence to the sanctuary, and were confined to it, to be employed in the ministration connected therewith. As without the sanctuary, they had not existed, so wherever we find these, we may know that there is the sanctuary; and hence the fact that John saw these things in Heaven in this dispensation, is proof that there is a sanctuary there, and that he was permitted to behold it.

However reluctant a person may have been to acknowledge that there is a sanctuary in Heaven, the testimony that has been presented is certainly sufficient to prove this fact. Paul says that the tabernacle of Moses was the sanctuary of the first covenant. Moses says that God showed him in the mount a great pattern according to which he was to make this tabernacle. Paul testifies again that Moses did make it according to the pattern, and that the pattern was the true tabernacle in Heaven which the Lord pitched and not man; and that of this heavenly sanctuary, the tabernacle erected with hands was a true figure or representation. And finally John, to corroborate the statement of Paul that this sanctuary is in Heaven, bears testimony, as of an eyewitness, that he beheld it there. What further testimony could be required? Nay, more, what further is conceivable?

So far as the question as to what constitutes the sanctuary, is concerned, we now have the subject before us in one harmonious whole. The sanctuary of the Bible—mark it all, dispute it who can,—consists, first, of the typical tabernacle established with the Hebrews at the exode from Egypt, which was the sanctuary of the first covenant; and, secondly, of the true tabernacle in Heaven of which the former was a type or figure, which is the sanctuary of the new covenant. These are inseparably connected together as type and antitype. From the antitype we go back to the type, and from the type we are carried forward naturally and inevitably into the antitype.

We have said that Daniel would at once understand by the word sanctuary, the sanctuary of his people at Jerusalem; so would any one under that dispensation. But does the declaration of Daniel 8: 14, have reference to that sanctuary? That depends upon the time to which it applies. Whatever declarations respecting the sanctuary apply under the old dispensation, they have respect to the sanctuary of that time; and whatever declarations apply in this dispensation, they have reference to the sanctuary of this dispensation. If the 2300 days, at the termination of which the sanctuary is to be cleansed, ended in the former dispensation, the sanctuary to be cleansed was the sanctuary of that time. If they reach over into this dispensation, the sanctuary to which reference is made, is the sanctuary of this time. This is a point which can only be determined by a further argument on the 2300 days. What we have thus far said respecting the sanctuary has been only incidental to the main question in the prophecy. That question has respect to its cleansing. Unto 2300 days then shall the sanctuary be cleansed. But it was necessary first to determine what constituted the sanctuary before we could understandingly examine the question of its cleansing. For this we are now prepared.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER VIII. (VERSE 14, CONTINUED.)

HAVING now learned what constitutes the sanctuary the question of its cleansing and how it is accomplished, is soon decided. It has been noticed that what ever constitutes the sanctuary of the Bible, must have some service connected with it which is called its cleansing. There is no account in the Bible of any such work as pertaining to this earth, the land of Canaan, or the church; which is good evidence that maker of these object constitutes the sanctuary; there is such a service connected with the object which we have shown to be the sanctuary, and which, in reference to both the earthly building, and the heavenly temple, is called its cleansing.

Does the reader object to the idea of there being anything in Heaven which is to be cleansed? Is this a barrier in the way of his receiving the view here presented? Then his controversy is with Paul who positively affirms this fact. But before he decides against the apostle, we ask the objector to examine carefully in reference to the nature of this cleansing, as he is here undoubtedly laboring under an entire misapprehension. The following are the plain terms in which Paul affirms the cleansing of both the earthly and the heavenly sanctuary: "And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood there is no remission. It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the Heavens should be purified with these, but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these." In the light of foregoing arguments, this may be paraphrased thus: It was therefore necessary that the tabernacle, as erected by Moses, with its sacred vessels, which were patterns of the true sanctuary in Heaven, should be purified, or cleansed, with the blood of calves and goats; but the heavenly things themselves, the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, must be cleansed with better sacrifices than calves and goats, even with the blood of Christ.

We now inquire, What is the nature of this cleansing, and how is it to be accomplished? According to the language of Paul, just quoted, it is performed by means of blood. The cleansing is not, therefore, a cleansing from physical uncleanness or impurity; for blood is not the agent used in such a work. And this consideration should satisfy the objector's mind in regard to the cleansing of the heavenly things. The fact that Paul speaks of heavenly things to be cleansed, does not prove that there is any physical impurity in Heaven; for that is not the kind of cleansing of which he speaks. The reason Paul assigns why this cleansing is performed with blood, is because without the shedding of blood there is no remission. Remission, then, that is, the putting away of sin, is the work to be done. The cleansing, therefore, is a spiritual cleansing, a cleansing from sin. But how come these sins attached to the sanctuary, either the earthly or the heavenly? This can easily be ascertained from the ministrations connected with the type, to which we now turn.

The closing chapters of Exodus give an account of the construction of the earthly sanctuary, and the arrangement of the service connected therewith. Leviticus opens with an account of the ministration, which was there to be performed. All that it is to our purpose to notice here, was one particular branch of the service, which was performed as follows: The person who had committed sin, brought his victim to the door of the tabernacle. Upon the head of this victim, for a moment in solemn silence, he placed his hand. By this expressive act, he signified that he had sinned and was worthy of death, but that in his stead he consecrated his victim, and transferred his guilt to it. With his own hand (and what must have been his emotion?) he then took the life of his victim on account of that guilt. The law demanded the life of the transgressor for his disobedience; the life is in the blood; Lev. 17: 11, 14; hence, without the shedding of blood there is no remission; with the shedding of blood remission is possible; for the law demanded life, and its demand is satisfied. The blood of the victim, representative of a forfeited life, and the vehicle of its guilt, was then taken by the priest and sprinkled before the veil in the sanctuary.

The sin of the individual was thus transferred from himself to the sanctuary. Victim after victim was offered by the people; day by day the work went forward; and thus the sanctuary continually became the receptacle of the sins of the congregation. But was this the final disposition of these sins? It was not. This accumulation of guilt was removed by a special service which was called the cleansing of the sanctuary. This service in the type occupied one day in the year; and the tenth day of the seventh month on which it was performed, was called the day of atonement. On this day, while all Israel refrained from work, and afflicted their souls, the priest brought two goats and presented them before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. On these goats he cast lots; one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for the scape-goat. The one upon which the Lord's lot fell, was then slain, and his blood was carried by the priest into the most holy place of the sanctuary, this being the only day on which he was permitted to enter into that apartment, and sprinkled upon the mercy-seat. Coming forth, he was then to lay both his hands upon the head of the scape-goat, confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, and thus putting them upon his head, was to send him away by the hand of a fit man into a land not inhabited, a land of separation or forgetfulness; the goat never again to appear in the camp of Israel, and the sins of the people to be remembered against them no more. This service was for the purpose of cleansing the people from their sins, and the sanctuary and its sacred vessels. Lev. 16: 30, 33. By this process sin was removed, but only in figure; for all that work was typical.

The reader to whom these views are new, will be ready here to inquire, perhaps with some astonishment, what this strange work could possibly be designed to typify; what there is in this dispensation, which it was designed to prefigure. We answer, A work in the ministration of Christ, as Paul clearly teaches. After stating in Hebrews 8, that Christ is the minister of the true tabernacle, the sanctuary in Heaven, he states that the priests on earth served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. In other words, the work of the earthly priests was a shadow, an example, a correct representation, so far as it could be carried out by mortals, of the ministration of Christ above. These priests ministered in both apartments of the earthly tabernacle; Christ therefore ministers in both apartments of the heavenly temple; for that temple has two apartments, or it was not correctly represented by the earthly, and our Lord officiates in both, or the service of the priests on earth was not a correct shadow of his work. But Paul directly states that he ministers in both apartments; for he says that he has entered into the holy place (Greek, plural, holy places) by his own blood. Heb. 9:12. There is, therefore, a work performed by Christ in his ministry in the heavenly temple, corresponding to that performed by the priests in both apartments of the earthly building. But the work in the second apartment, or most holy place, was a special work, to close the yearly round of service, and cleanse the sanctuary. Therefore Christ's ministration in the second apartment of the heavenly sanctuary must be a work of like nature, and constitute the cleansing of that sanctuary.

As through the sacrifices of the former dispensation, the sins of the people were transferred in figure by the priests to the earthly sanctuary, where those priests ministered; so, ever since Christ ascended to be our intercessor in the presence of his Father, the sins of all those who legitimately seek pardon through him, are transferred, in fact, to the heavenly sanctuary where he ministers. Whether Christ ministers for us in the heavenly holy places with his own blood literally or only by virtue of its merits, we need not stop to inquire. Suffice it to say, that his blood has been shed, and through that blood we have remission of sins in fact which was obtained only in figure through the blood of calves and goats. But those sacrifices had real virtue in this respect: they signified faith in a real sacrifice to come; and thus those who employed them have an equal interest in the work of Christ, with those who come to him by faith in this dispensation.

This continual transfer of sins to the heavenly sanctuary, and if they are not thus transferred, will any one in the light of the types, and in view of the language of Paul, explain the nature of the work of Christ in our behalf;—this continual transfer, we say, of sins to the heavenly sanctuary makes its cleansing necessary on the same ground that a like work was required in the earthly.

An important distinction between the two ministrations must here be noticed: In the earthly tabernacle a complete round of service was accomplished every year. For three hundred and sixty-four days the ministration went forward in the first apartment. One day's work in the most holy, completed the yearly round. The work then commenced again in the holy place, and went forward till another day of atonement completed the year's work. And so on year by year. This continual repetition of the work was necessary on account of the short lives of mortal priests. But no such necessity exists in the case of our divine Lord, who ever liveth to make intercession for us. See Heb. 7:23-25. Hence the work of the heavenly sanctuary, instead of being a yearly work, is but once completed. Instead of being repeated year by year, one grand cycle is allotted to it, in which it is carried forward, and completed once for all.

One year's round of service, in the earthly sanctuary, represented the entire work of the sanctuary above. In the type the cleansing of the sanctuary was the brief and closing work of the year's service. In the antitype the cleansing of the sanctuary must be the closing work of Christ our great high priest, in the tabernacle on high. In the type, to cleanse the sanctuary the high priest entered into the most holy place to minister in the presence of God before the ark of his testament. In the antitype, when the time comes for the cleansing of the sanctuary, our High Priest, in like manner enters into the most holy place to make a final end of his intercessory work in behalf of mankind. We confidently affirm that no other conclusion can be arrived at on this subject, without doing despoliation to the holy word of God.

Reader, do you see the importance of this subject? Do you begin to perceive what an object of interest for all the world is the sanctuary of God? Do you see that the whole work of salvation centers there; and that when the work is done, probation is ended and the cases of the saved and lost are eternally decided? Do you see that the cleansing of the sanctuary is a brief and special work by which the great scheme is forever finished? Do you see that if it can be made known when this work of cleansing commences, it is a solemn announcement to the world, that salvation's last hour is reached, and is fast hastening to its close? And this is what the prophecy is designed to show. It is to make known the commencement of this momentous work: "Unto two thousand three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

In advance of any argument on the nature and application of these days, the position may be safely taken that they reach to the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, for the earthly was to be cleansed each year; and we make the prophet utter nonsense, if we understand him as saying that at the end of 2300 days, over six years, even if we take them literally, an event should take place, which was to occur regularly every year. It is the heavenly sanctuary in which the decision of all cases is to be rendered. The progress of the work there, is what especially concerns mankind to know. If people understood the bearing of these subjects on their eternal interests, with what earnestness and anxiety would they give them their most careful and prayerful study.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER VIII. (CONTINUED.)

Verses 15. And it came to pass, when I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning, then beheld, there stood before me as the appearance of a man. 16. And I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which called, and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision.

We now enter upon an interpretation of the vision. And first of all we have mention of Daniel's solicitude, and his efforts to understand these things. He sought for the meaning. Those who have had most experience in reference to prophetic subjects, are not the ones who are unconcerned in such matters. They only can tread with indifference over a mine of gold, who do not know that a bed of the precious metal lies beneath their feet. Immediately there stood before the prophet as the appearance of a man. It does not say it was a man, as some would fain have us think, who wish to prove that angels are dead men, and who resort to such texts as this for their evidence. It says, the appearance of a man, from which we are evidently to understand an angel in human form. And he heard a man's voice; that is, the voice of an angel as of a man, speaking. The commandment given was, to make this man, Daniel, understand the vision. It was addressed to Gabriel, a name that signifies, "the mighty one." He continues his instruction to Daniel in chapter 9; and under the new dispensation he was commissioned to announce the birth of John the Baptist to his father Zacharias, Luke 1: 11, and that of the Messiah to the virgin Mary, verse 26. To Zacharias, he introduced himself with these words: "I am Gabriel that stand in the presence of God." From this it appears that he was an angel of a high order and superior dignity; but the one who addressed him was evidently above him in rank, and had power to command and control his actions. This was probably no other than the archangel, Michael, or Christ, between whom and Gabriel, alone, a knowledge of the matters communicated to Daniel existed. See chap. 10: 21.

Verses 17. So he came near where I stood; and when he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face; but he said unto me, Understand, O son of man; for at the time of the end shall be the vision. 18. Now as he was speaking with me, I was in a deep sleep on my face toward the ground; but he touched me, and set me upright. 19. And he said, Behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation; for at the time appointed the end shall be.

Under similar circumstances to the ones here narrated, John fell down before the feet of an angel; but it was for the purpose of worship; Rev. 19: 10; 21: 8. Daniel seems to have been completely overcome by the majesty of the heavenly messenger. He prostrated himself with his face to the ground, probably as though in a deep sleep, but not really so. Sorrow, it is true, caused the disciples to sleep; but fear as in this case, would hardly seem to have that effect. The angel gently laid his hand upon him, to give him assurance (how many times have mortals been told by heavenly beings to "fear not!"), and from his helpless and prostrate condition set him upright. With a general statement that at the time appointed the end shall be, and that he will make him know what shall be in the last end of the indignation, he enters upon an interpretation of the vision. We understand that the indignation covers a period of time. What time? God told his people Israel that he would pour upon them his indignation for their wickedness; and thus he gave directions concerning the "pious wicked prince of Israel": "Remove the diadem, and take off the crown. . . . I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him." Eze. 21: 26-27, 81.

Here is the period of God's indignation against his covenant people; the period during which the sapientary and host are to be trodden under foot. The diadem was removed and the crown taken off when Israel was subjected to the kingdom of Babylon. It was overturned again by the Medes and Persians, again by the Grecians, again by the Romans, corresponding to the three times the word is repeated by the prophet. And the Jews are now scattered abroad over the face of the earth; and the throne of David is no more, till he who is its rightful heir, the Messiah, the Prince of Peace, shall come, and it will be given him. Then the indignation will have ceased. What shall take place in the last end of this period, the prophet is to make known to Daniel.

Verses 20. The ram which thou sawest, having two horns, are the kings of Media and Persia. 21. And the rough goat is the king of Grecia; and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king. 22. Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power.

As the disciples said to the Lord, so we may here say of the angel who spoke to Daniel, Lo, now speakest thou plainly, and speakest no parable. This is an explanation of the vision in language as plain as need be given. See on verses 8-8. The dialoguing feature of the Persian empire, the union of the two nationalities which composed it, is represented by the two horns of the goat. Greece attained its greatest glory as a unit, under the leadership of as vile a man and as great a king as the world has ever seen. This part of her history is represented by the first phase of the goat, the one notable horn, symbolizing Alexander the Great. Upon his death, the kingdom fell into fragments, but almost immediately consolidated into four grand divisions, represented by the second phase of the goat, the four horns, which came up in the place of the first which was broken. These divisions did not stand in his power. None of them possessed the strength of the original kingdom. These great waymarks in history, on which the historian bestows volumes, the inspired penman here gives us in sharp outline, with a few strokes of the pencil and a few dashes of the pen.

Verses 23. And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. 24. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power; and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practice, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. 25. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many; he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand.

This power succeeds to the four divisions of the goat kingdom in the latter time of their kingdom, that is, toward the termination of their career. It is, of course, the same as the little horn of verse 9, and onward. Apply it to Rome, as set forth in remarks on verse 9, and all is harmonious and clear. A king of fierce countenance. Moses, in predicting punishment to come upon the Jews from this same power, calls it "a nation of fierce countenance." Deut. 28:49, 50. No people made a more formidable appearance in warlike array than the Romans. "Understanding dark sentences." Moses, in the scripture just referred to, says, "Whose tongue thou shalt not understand." This could not be said of the Babylonians, Persians, or Greeks, in reference to the Jews; for the Chaldean and Greek languages were used to a greater or less extent in Palestine. This was not the case, however, with the Latin.

"When the transgressors are come to the full." All along the connection between God's people and their oppressors is kept in view. It was on account of the transgressions of his people that they were sold into captivity. And their continuance in sin brought more and more severe punishment. At no time were the Jews more corrupt, morally, as a nation, than at the time they came under the jurisdiction of the Romans.

"Mighty but not by his own power." The success of the Romans was owing largely to the aid of their allies, and divisions among their enemies, of which they were ever ready to take advantage. "He shall destroy wonderfully." The Lord told the Jews by the prophet Ezekiel that he would deliver them to men who were "skillful to destroy." How full of meaning is such a description, and how applicable to the Romans! In taking Jerusalem they slew eleven hundred thousand Jews, and made ninety-seven thousand captives. So wonderfully did they destroy this once mighty and holy people.

And what they could not accomplish by force they secured by artifice. Their flatteries, fraud and corruption, were as fatal as their thunderbolts of war. And Rome, finally, in the person of one of its governors, stood up against the Prince of princes, by giving sentence of death against Jesus Christ. But it shall be broken without hand; an expression which identifies the destruction of this power with the smiting of the image of chapter 2.

Verse 20. And the vision of the evening and the morning which was told is true: wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days. 27. And I Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days; afterward I rose up, and did the king's business; and I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it.

The vision of the evening and the morning, the 2500 days. In view of the long period of oppression, and the calamities which were to come upon his people. Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days. He was astonished at the vision but did not understand it. Why did not Gabriel at this time carry out fully his instructions and cause Daniel to understand the vision? Because Daniel had received all that he could then bear. Further instruction is therefore deferred to a future time.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER II.

VANAN 1. In the first year of Darius the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans; in the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by books the number of the years, whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem.

The vision recorded in the preceding chapter was given in the third year of Belshazzar, A. C. 563. The events narrated in this chapter, occurred in the first year of Darius A. C. 558. A period of fifteen years is consequently passed over between these two chapters. Although Daniel was numbered with cares and burdens, as prime minister of the foremost kingdom on the face of the earth, he did not let this deprive him of the privilege of studying into things of higher moment, even the purposes of God, as revealed to his prophets. He understood by the books, that is, the writings of Jeremiah, that God would accomplish seventy years in the captivity of his people. This prediction is found in Jer. 25:12; 29:10. The knowledge of it, and the use that was made of it, shows that Jeremiah was early regarded as a divinely-inspired prophet; otherwise his writings would not have been so soon collected, and so extensively copied. Though Daniel was for a time cotemporary with him, he had a copy of his works which he carried with him in his captivity; and though he was so great a prophet himself, he was not above studying carefully what God might reveal to others of his servants. Commencing the seventy years A. C. 606, Daniel understood that they were now drawing to a termination; and God had even commenced the fulfillment by overthrowing the kingdom of Babylon.

VANAN 2. And I set my face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplications, with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes.

Because God has promised, we are not released from the responsibility of beseeching him for the fulfillment of his word. Daniel might have reasoned, God has promised to release his people at the end of the seventy years; and he will accomplish it; I need not, therefore, concern myself at all in the matter. Daniel did not thus reason; but at the time draw near for the accomplishment of the word of the Lord, he set himself to seek the Lord with all his heart. And how earnestly he engaged in the work: with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes. This was the year probably, in which he was put into the lion's den; and the prayer of which we here have an account, may have been the burden of that petition which, regardless of human laws to the contrary, he offered before the Lord three times a day.

VANAN 4. And I prayed unto the Lord my God, and made my confession, and said, O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, and to them that keep his commandments.

We here have the opening of Daniel's wonderful prayer—a prayer expressing such humiliation and contrition of heart, that he must be without feeling who can read it unmoved. He commences by acknowledging the faithfulness of God. God never fails in any of his engagements with his followers. It was not from any lack on God's part in defending and upholding them, that the Jews were then in the furnace of captivity, but only on account of their sins.

VANAN 5. We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts and from thy judgments. 6. Neither have we hearkened unto thy servants the prophets, which spake in thy name to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, and to all the people of the land. 7. O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee, but unto us confusion of face, as it is this day; to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and unto all Israel, that are near, and that are far off, through all the countries whither thou hast driven them, because of their trespass that they have trespassed against thee. 8. O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against thee. 9. To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him. 10. Neither have we obeyed the voice of the Lord our God, to walk in his laws, which he set before us by his servants the prophets. 11. Yea, all Israel have transgressed thy law, even by departing, that they might not obey thy voice; therefore the curse is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the law of Moses the servant of God, because we have sinned against him. 12. And he hath confirmed his words, which he spake against us, and against our judges that judged us, by bringing upon us a great evil; for under the whole heaven hath not been done as hath been done upon Jerusalem. 13. As it is written in the law of Moses, all this evil has come upon us; yet made we not our prayer before the Lord our God, that we might turn from our iniquities, and understand thy truth. 14. Therefore hath the Lord watched upon the evil, and brought it upon us; for the Lord our God is righteous in all his works which he doeth; for we obeyed not his voice.

So much of Daniel's prayer is employed in making a full and heart-broken confession of sins. He vindicates fully the course of the Lord, acknowledging their sins to be the cause of all their calamities, as God had threatened them by the prophet Moses. And he does not discriminate in favor of himself. No self-righteousness appears in his petition. And although he had suffered long for others' sins, enduring seventy years of captivity for the wrongs of his people, he meanwhile having lived a godly life, and received signal honors and blessings from the Lord, he brings no accusations against any one to the exclusion of others, pleads no sympathy for himself as a victim of others' wrongs, but ranks himself in with the rest, and says, We have sinned, and unto us belongeth confusion of face. And he acknowledges they had not heeded the lessons God designed to teach them by their afflictions, by turning again unto him.

An expression in the 14th verse is worthy of especial notice: "Therefore hath the Lord watched upon the evil, and brought it upon us." Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the hearts of the sons of men are fully set in them to do evil. But none may think that the Lord does not see, or that he has forgotten. His retributions will surely overtake the transgressor, against whom they are threatened, without deviation, and without fail. He will watch upon the evil, and in his own good time will bring it to pass.

VANAN 18. And now, O Lord, our God, that hast brought thy people forth out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand, and hast gotten thee renown, as at this day; we have sinned, we have done wickedly. O Lord, according to all thy righteousness, I beseech thee, let thine anger and thy fury be turned away from thy city Jerusalem, thy holy mountain: because for our sins, and for the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem and thy people are become a reproach to all that are about us. Now therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplications, and cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate, for the Lord's sake. O my God, incline thine ear, and hear; open thine eyes, and behold our desolations, and the city which is called by thy name: for we do not present our supplications before thee for our righteousnesses, but for thy great mercies. O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken and do; defer not, for thine own sake, O my God: for thy city and thy people are called by thy name."

The prophet now pleads the honor of the Lord's name as a reason why he wants his petition granted. He refers to the fact of their deliverance from Egypt, and the great renown that had accrued to the Lord's name for all his wonderful works manifested among them. This all would be lost, should he now abandon them to perish. Moses uses the same argument in pleading for Israel. Num. 14. Not that God is moved with motives of ambition and vainglory; but when his people are jealous for the honor of his name, when they evince their love for him by pleading with him to work, not for their own personal benefit, but for his own glory, that his name may not be reproached and blasphemed among the heathen—this is acceptable with him. He then reminds him of the city of Jerusalem called by his name, and his holy mountain, to which he has had such love, and beseeches him for his mercies' sake, to let his anger be turned away. Finally, his mind centers upon the holy sanctuary, God's own dwelling place upon this earth, and he pleads that its desolations may be repaired.

Daniel understood the seventy years' captivity to be near their termination. From his allusion to the sanctuary, it is evident that he no farther misunderstood the important vision given him fifteen years before, as to suppose that the 2300 days, at the termination of which the sanctuary was to be cleansed, expired at the same time. This misapprehension was at once corrected, when the angel came to give him further instruction in answer to his prayer, the narration of which is next given.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER 21. (continued.)

And while I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before the Lord my God for the holy mountain of my God; 21: yea, while I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation.

We here have the result of Daniel's supplication. He is suddenly interrupted by a heavenly messenger. The man Gabriel, appearing again as he had before, in the form of a man, whom Daniel had seen in the vision at the beginning, touched him. A very important question is here to be determined. It is to be decided whether the vision of chapter 8 has ever been explained, and can ever be understood. The question is, To what vision does Daniel refer by the expression, "the vision at the beginning." It will be conceded by all that it is a vision of which we have some previous mention, and that in that vision we shall find some mention of Gabriel. We must go back beyond this sixth chapter; for all that we have in this chapter previous to this appearance of Gabriel is simply a record of Daniel's prayer. Looking back then through previous chapters we find mention of only three visions given to Daniel. 1. The interpretation of the dream of Nebuchadnezzar was given in a night vision. Chap. 2: 19. But there is no record of any angelic agency in the matter. 2. The vision of chap. 7. This was explained to Daniel by "one of them that stood by," probably an angel; but we have no information as to what one; nor is there anything in that vision which needed further explanation. 3. The vision of chapter 8. Here we find some particulars which show this to be the vision referred to. Gabriel is brought to view for the first and only previous time in the book. 2. He was commanded to make Daniel understand the vision. 3. Daniel at the conclusion says he did not understand it; showing that Gabriel, at the conclusion of that chapter, had not fulfilled his mission. 4. There is no place in all the Bible, where this interpretation is carried out, as it is not in chapter 8. If, therefore, the vision of chapter 8, is not the one referred to, we have no reason that Gabriel ever complied with the instructions given him, or that that vision has ever been explained. 5. The instruction which the angel gave to Daniel, as we shall see from the following verses, was exactly complete: what was lacking in chapter 8. These considerations prove beyond a doubt the connection between Daniel 8 and 9; and this connection will be still further strengthened, when we come to look at the angel's instructions.

And he touched me, and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. 22. At the beginning of the supplication the commandment came forth, and I am come to show thee the things that shall be greatly beloved; therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision.

The manner in which Gabriel introduces himself on this occasion, shows that he has come to complete some unfinished mission. It can be nothing less than to carry out the instruction to make this man "understand the vision," as recorded in chapter 8. I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. As the charge still rested upon him to make Daniel understand; and as he explained to Daniel in chapter 8, all that he could then bear, and yet he did not understand, he now comes to resume his work and complete his mission. As soon as Daniel commenced his fervent supplication, the commandment came forth; that is, Gabriel received instruction to visit Daniel and impart to him the requisite information. From the time it takes to read Daniel's prayer down to the point at which Gabriel made his appearance upon the scene, the reader can judge of the speed with which this messenger was dispatched from the court of Heaven to this servant of God. No wonder Daniel says that he was caused to fly swiftly, or that Ezekiel compares the movements of these celestial beings to a flash of lightning. Isa. 1: 14. "Understand the matter," he says to him. What matter? That, evidently, which he did not before understand, as stated in the last verse of chapter 8. "Consider the vision." What vision? Not the interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's image, nor the vision of chapter 7; for there was no difficulty with either of these; but the vision of chapter 8, in reference to which his mind was filled with doubt and astonishment. "I am come to show thee," also said the angel. How then in reference to what? Certainly in reference to something, wherein he was entertaining wrong ideas, and something, at the same time, pertaining to his prayer; as it was this which had called forth Gabriel on his mission at this time. But Daniel had no difficulty in understanding what the angel told him about the ram, he-goat, and Little Horn, the kingdoms of Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome. Nor was he mistaken in regard to the ending of the seventy years' captivity. But the burden of his petition was respecting the repairing the desolations of the sanctuary, which lay in ruins; and he had undoubtedly drawn the conclusion that when the end of the seventy years' captivity came, the time would come for the fulfillment of what the angel had said respecting the cleansing of the sanctuary at the end of the end of the 2800 days. Now he must be set right. And this explains why at this particular time instruction should be sent him after a delay of fifteen years. Now the seventy years' captivity were drawing to their close, and Daniel was applying the instruction he had before received from the angel, to a wrong issue. He was falling into a misunderstanding, and was setting upon it; hence he must not be suffered longer to remain ignorant of the true import of the former vision. "I am come to show thee," "understand the matter," "consider the vision." Such were the words used by the very person Daniel had seen in the former vision, and to whom he had heard the command given, "Make this man to understand the vision," and who he knew had never carried out that instruction. But now he appears and says, "I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding." How could Daniel's mind be more emphatically carried back to the vision of chapter 8, and the connection between that visit of the angel and this, be more distinctly shown, than by such words from such a person? The considerations already presented are sufficient to conclusively show the connection between Dan. 8 and 9; but this will still further appear, in subsequent verses.

One expression seems worthy of notice before we leave verse 23. It is the declaration of the angel to Daniel, "For thou art greatly beloved." The angel brought this declaration direct from the courts of Heaven. It expressed the state of feeling that existed in regard to Daniel, there. Think of celestial beings, the highest in the universe, the Father, the Son, the holy angels, having such regard and esteem for a mortal man here upon earth, as to authorize an angel to bear the message to him that he was greatly beloved! This is one of the highest pinnacles of glory to which mortals can attain. Abraham reached another when it could be said of him that he was the "friend of God." Enoch another when it could be said of him that he walked with God. Can we arrive at any such attainments? God is no respecter of person; but he is a respecter of character. If in virtue and godliness we could equal these eminent men, we could move the divine love to equal depths. We too, could be greatly beloved, could be friends of God, and could walk with him. And we must be in our generation what they were in theirs. There is a figure used in reference to the last church which denotes the closest union with God. "If any man hear my voice and open the door I will come in to him and will sup with him and he with me." Rev. 3:20. To sup with the Lord denotes an intimacy equal to being greatly beloved by him, walking with him, or being his friend. How desirable a position! Alas for the evils of our nature which cut us off from this communion! Oh! for grace to overcome these, that we may enjoy this spiritual union here, and finally feast in the glories of his presence at the marriage supper of the Lamb.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER IX. CONTINUED.

Verses 24. Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy.

Such are the first words the angel utters to Daniel, toward imparting to him that instruction which he came to give. Why does he thus abruptly introduce a period of time? We must again refer to the vision of chapter 8. We have seen that Daniel at the close of that chapter says that he did not understand the vision. Some portions of that vision were at the time very clearly explained. It could not have been those portions which he did not understand. We therefore inquire what it was which Daniel did not understand, or, in other words, what part of the vision was there left unexplained. In that vision four prominent things are brought to view. 1. The Ram. 2. The He-goat. 3. The Little horn. 4. The period of the 2300 days. The symbols of the ram, he-goat, and little horn, were explained. Nothing, however, was said respecting the time. This must therefore have been the point which he did not understand. And as without this the other portions of the vision were of no avail, he could well say, while the application of this period was left in obscurity, that he did not understand the vision.

If this view of the subject is correct, we should naturally expect, when the angel completed his explanation of the vision, that he would commence with the very point which had been omitted, namely, the time. And this we find to be true in fact. After sitting Daniel's attention in the most direct and emphatic manner, back to the former vision, and assuring him that he had now come forth to give him understanding in the matter, he commences upon the very point there omitted, and says, "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city."

But how does this language show any connection with the 2300 days, or throw any light upon that period? We answer, The language cannot be intelligibly referred to any thing else; for determined signifies "cut off," and there is no period from which the seventy weeks could be cut off, but the 2300 days of the previous vision. How direct and natural, then, is the connection. Daniel's attention is fixed upon the 2300 days, which he did not understand, by the angel's directing him to the former vision; and he says, "Seventy weeks are cut off." Cut off from what? The 2300 days most assuredly.

Proof may be called for that the word determined signifies to cut off. An abundance can be given. The Hebrew word rendered, determined, is, chatak. This word Gesenius in his Hebrew Lexicon, defines as follows: "Properly, to cut off; tropically, to divide; and so to determine, to decree." In the Chaldeo-Rabbinic Dictionary of Stronius, the word chatak is thus defined: "Sedit, absedit, conculcit, incidit, excidit — to cut, to cut away, to cut in pieces to cut or engrave, to cut off." Mercurius in his "Thesaurus," furnishes a specimen of Rabbinical usage in the phrase, chatak chatak — "a piece of flesh," or "a cut of flesh." He translates the word, as it occurs in Dan. 9: 24, by "principes cut," was cut off. In the literal version of Arias Montanus, it is translated "decies cut," — was cut off; in the marginal reading, which is grammatically correct, it is rendered by the plural, "decies sunt," were cut off. In the Latin version of Junius and Tremellius, chatak [the passive of chatak] is rendered "decies sunt," were cut off. Again in Theodotion's Greek version of Daniel (which is the version used in the Vatican copy of the Septuagint, as being the most faithful), it is rendered by ovetpnyon [synetismenon], "were cut off;" and in the Venetian copy by tektontai [teintantai], "have been cut." The idea of cutting off, is pursued in the Vulgate, where the phrase is "abbreviate sunt," have been shortened.

"Thus Chaldaic and Rabbinical authority, and that of the earliest versions, the Septuagint and Vulgate, give the single signification of cutting off, to this verb."

Hengstenberg, who enters into a critical examination of the original text says: "But the very use of the word, which does not elsewhere occur, while others, much more frequently used, were at hand, if Daniel had wished to express the idea of determination, and of which he has elsewhere, and even in this portion availed himself, seems to argue, that the word stands from regard to its original meaning, and represents the seventy weeks in contrast with a determination of time (in plateis) as a period cut off from subsequent duration, and accurately limited." Christology of the Old Testament, Vol. II, p. 801. Washington, 1830.

Why then, it may be asked, did our translators render the word, determined, when it so obviously means, cut off? The answer is, They doubtless overlooked the connection between the 8th and 9th chapters, and considering it improper to render it cut off, when nothing was given from which the seventy weeks could be cut off, they gave the word its tropic instead of its literal meaning. But, as we have seen, both the construction and context require the literal meaning, and render any other inadmissible.

Seventy weeks, then, or 490 days of the 2300, were cut off upon, or allotted to, Jerusalem and the Jews; and the events which were to be consummated within that period are briefly stated. The transgression was to be finished. That is, the Jewish people were to fill up the cup of their iniquity; which they did in the rejection and crucifixion of Christ. An end of sins, or of sin offerings was to be made. This took place when the great offering was made on Calvary. Reconciliation for iniquity was to be provided. This was made by the sacrificial death of the Son of God. Everlasting righteousness was to be brought in: the righteousness which our Lord manifested in his sinless life. The vision and the prophecy were to be sealed up, or made sure. By the events given to transpire in the seventy weeks, the prophecy is tested. By this the application of the whole vision is determined. If the events of this period are accurately fulfilled, the prophecy is of God, and will all be accomplished; and if these seventy weeks are fulfilled as weeks of years, then the 2300 days, of which these are a part, are so many years. Thus the events of the seventy weeks furnish a key to the whole vision. And the most holy was to be anointed: the most holy of the heavenly sanctuary. In the examination of the sanctuary, on chapter 8: 14, we saw that a time came when the earthly sanctuary gave place to the heavenly, and the priestly ministration was transferred to that. Before the ministration in the sanctuary commenced, the sanctuary and all the holy vessels were to be anointed. Ex. 40: 9, 10. The last event, therefore, of the seventy weeks, here brought to view is the anointing of the heavenly tabernacle, or the opening of the ministration there. Thus this first division of the 2800 days brings us to the commencement of the service in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary, as the whole period brings us to the commencement of the service in the second.

We now consider the argument conclusive that the 9th chapter of Daniel is connected with the 8th, and that the seventy weeks are a part of the 2800 days; and with a few extracts from the writings of others we will leave this point.

The Advent Shield in 1844 said:

"We call attention to one fact which shows that there is a necessary 'connection' between the seventy weeks of the ninth chapter, and something else which precedes or follows it, called 'the vision.' It is found in the 24th verse: 'Seventy weeks are determined, or cut off, upon thy people . . . to seal up the vision.' &c. Now there are but two significations to the phrase 'seal up.' They are, first, 'to make secret,' and second 'to make sure.' We care not now in which of these significations the phrase is supposed to be used. That is not the point now before us. Let the signification be what it may, it shows that the prediction of the seventy weeks necessarily relates to something else beyond itself, called 'the vision,' in reference to which it performs this work, 'to seal up.' To talk of its sealing up itself is as much of an absurdity as to suppose that Josephus was so much afraid of the Romans that he refrained from telling the world that he thought the fourth kingdom of Daniel was 'the kingdom of the Greeks.' It is no more proper to say that the ninth chapter of Daniel 'is complete in itself,' than it would be to say that a map which was designed to show the relation of Massachusetts to the United States, referred to nothing but Massachusetts. It is no more complete in itself than a bond given in security for a note, or some other document to which it refers, is complete in itself; and we doubt if there is a school-boy fourteen in the land, of ordinary capacity, who would not on reading the ninth chapter, with an understanding of the clause before us, decide that it referred to something distinct from itself, called the vision. What vision it is, there is no difficulty in determining. It naturally and obviously refers to the vision which was not fully explained to Daniel, and to which Gabriel calls his attention in the preceding verse—the vision of the 8th chapter. Daniel tells us that Gabriel was commanded to make him understand that vision (8: 18). This was not fully done at that interview connected with the vision; he is therefore sent to give Daniel the needed 'skill and understanding,' to explain its 'meaning' by communicating to him the prediction of the seventy weeks."

"We claim that the ninth of Daniel is an appendix to the eighth, and that the seventy weeks and the 2800 days or years commence together. Our opponents deny this." Signs of the Times, 1848.

"The grand principle involved in the interpretation of the 2800 days of Dan. 8: 14, is that the seventy weeks of Dan. 9: 24, are the first 490 days of the 2800 of the eighth chapter." Advent Shield, p. 49.

"If the connection between the seventy weeks of Dan. 8, does not exist, the whole system is shaken to its foundation; if it does exist, as we suppose, the system must stand." Harmony of the Prophetic Chronology, p. 38.

Says the learned Dr. Hales, in commenting upon the seventy weeks, "This chronological prophecy was evidently designed to explain the foregoing vision, especially in its chronological part of the 2800 days."—Chronol., Vol. ii, p. 617.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER IX. (CONTINUED.)

VERSE 25. Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks: the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times. 26. And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself; and the people of the prince that shall come, shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. 27. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week; and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations, he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate.

The angel now gives to Daniel the event which is to mark the commencement of the seventy weeks. They were to date from the going forth of a commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. And not only is the event given which was to determine the time of the commencement of this period, but those also which were to transpire at its close. Thus a double test is provided by which to try the application of this prophecy. But more than this, the period of seventy weeks is divided into three grand divisions, and one of these is again divided, and the intermediate events are given which were to mark the termination of each one of these divisions. If, now, we can find a date which will harmonize with all these events, we have, beyond a doubt, the true application; for none but that which is correct could meet and fulfill so many conditions. Let the reader take in at one view the points of harmony to be made, that he may be the better prepared to guard against a false application. First, we are to find at the commencement of the period, a commandment going forth to restore and build Jerusalem. To this work seven weeks are allotted. As we reach the end of this, the first division, seven weeks from the commencement, we are to find, secondly, Jerusalem in its material aspect, restored, the work of building the street and the wall fully accomplished. From this point, sixty-two weeks are measured off; and as we reach the termination of this division, sixty-nine weeks from the beginning, we are to see, thirdly, the manifestation before the world of the Messiah, the Prince. One week more is given us, completing the seventy. And, fourthly, in the midst of this week, the Messiah is to be cut off and cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease; and, fifthly, when the last week expires of that period which was allotted to the Jews as the time during which they were to be the especial people of God, we naturally look for the going forth of the blessing and work of God to other people.

We now inquire for the date which will harmonize with all these particulars. The command was to include more than mere building. There was to be restoration; by which we must understand all the forms and regulations of civil, political, and judicial life. When did such a commandment go forth? At the time these words were spoken to Daniel, Jerusalem lay in complete and utter desolation, and had thus been lying for seventy years. The restoration, pointed to in the future, must be its restoration from this desolation. We then inquire, When and how was Jerusalem restored after the seventy-years' captivity?

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER IX. (VERSES 26-27, CONTINUED.)

THERE are but four events which can be taken as answering to the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. These are, 1. The decree of Cyrus for the re-building of the house of God, n. o. 538. 2. The decree of Darius for the prosecution of that work which had been hindered, n. o. 519. 3. The decree of Artaxerxes to Ezra, n. o. 457, Es. 7, and 4. The commission to Nehemiah from the same king in his twentieth year, n. o. 444. Neh. 2.

DATING from the first two of these decrees, the seventy weeks, being weeks of years, 490 years in all, would fall many years short of reaching even to the Christian era; besides, these decrees had reference principally to the restoration of the temple and the temple-worship, of the Jews, and not to the restoration of their civil state and polity, all of which must be included in the expression, "to restore and to build Jerusalem."

THese made a commencement of the work. They were preliminary to what was afterward accomplished. But of themselves they are altogether insufficient both in their dates, and in their nature, to meet the requirements of the prophecy; and thus failing in every respect, they cannot be brought into the controversy as marking the point from which the seventy weeks are to date. The only question now lies between the decrees which were granted to Ezra and to Nehemiah.

THE facts between which we are to decide here, are briefly these: In 457 n. o., a decree was granted to Ezra by the Persian emperor, Artaxerxes Longimanus, to go up to Jerusalem with as many of his people as were minded to go with him. The commission granted him an unlimited amount of treasure, to beautify the house of God, procure offerings for its service, and to do whatever else might seem good unto him. It empowered him to ordain laws, set magistrates and judges, and execute punishment even unto death; in other words to restore the Jewish state, civil and ecclesiastical, according to the law of God and the ancient customs of that people. Inspiration has seen fit to preserve this decree; and a full and accurate copy of it is given in the seventh chapter of the book of Ezra. In the original this decree is given, not in Hebrew, like the rest of the book of Ezra, but in the Chaldean (or Eastern Aramæic), the language then used at Babylon; and thus we are furnished with the original document by virtue of which Ezra was authorized to restore and build Jerusalem.

THIRTEEN years after this, in the 20th year of the same king, n. o. 444, Nehemiah sought and obtained permission to go up to Jerusalem. Neh. 2. Permission was granted him, but we have no evidence that it was anything more than verbal. It pertained to him individually, nothing being said about others' going up with him. The king asked him how long a journey he wished to make, and when he would return. He received letters to the governors beyond the river, to help him on his way to Judah, and an order on the keeper of the king's forest for timber for beams, &c. When he arrived at Jerusalem, he found rulers, priests, and nobles and people already engaged in the work of building Jerusalem. Neh. 2: 18. These were, of course, acting under the decree given to Ezra thirteen years before. And finally, Nehemiah, having arrived at Jerusalem, finished the work he came to accomplish, in fifty-two days. Neh. 6: 15.

NOW which of these commissions, Ezra's or Nehemiah's, constitutes the decree for the restoration of Jerusalem, from which the seventy weeks are to be dated? It hardly seems that there can be any question on this point.

1. The grant to Nehemiah cannot be called a decree. It was necessary that a Persian decree should be put in writing, and signed by the king. Dan. 6: 8. Such was the document given to Ezra; but Nehemiah had nothing of the kind: his commission being only verbal. If it be said that the letters given him constituted the decree, then the decree was issued not to Nehemiah, but to the governors beyond the river; besides, these would constitute a series of decrees, and not one decree, as the prophecy contemplates.

2. The occasion of Nehemiah's petition to the king for permission to go up to Jerusalem was the report which certain ones, returning had brought from thence, that those in the province were in great affliction and reproach, that the wall of Jerusalem was also broken down and the gates thereof burned with fire. Neh. 1. Whose work were these walls and gates that were broken down and burned with fire? Evidently the work of Ezra and his associates; for it cannot for a moment be supposed that the utter destruction of the city by Nebuchadnezzar, 114 years previous to that time, would have been reported to Nehemiah as a matter of news, nor that he would have considered it, as he evidently did, a fresh misfortune calling for a fresh expression of his grief. A decree, therefore, authorizing the building of these, had gone forth previous to the grant to Nehemiah.

3. If any should contend that Nehemiah's commission must be a decree, because the object of his request was that he might build the city, it is sufficient to reply as shown above, that gates and walls had been built previous to his going up; besides the work of building which he went to perform was accomplished in fifty-two days; whereas the prophecy allows for the building of the city, seven weeks, or forty-nine years.

4. There was nothing granted to Nehemiah, which was not embraced in the decree to Ezra; while the latter had all the forms and conditions of a decree, and was vastly more ample in its provisions.

5. It is evident from the prayer of Ezra, as recorded in chap. 9: 9, of his book, that he considered himself fully empowered to proceed with the building of the city and the wall; and it is evident that he understood, further, that the conditional prophecies concerning his people were then fulfilled, from the closing words of that prayer in which he says, "Should we again break thy commandments and join in affinity with the people of these abominations, wouldest thou not be angry with us till thou hadst consumed us, so that there should be no remnant nor escaping?"

6. Reckoning from the commission to Nehemiah, a. c. 444, the dates throughout are entirely disarranged; for from that point the troublesome times which were to attend the building of the street and wall, did not last seven weeks, or forty-nine years. Reckoning from that date, the sixty-nine weeks, or 483 years, which were to extend to the Messiah the Prince, bring us to a. n. 89-40; but Jesus was baptised of John in Jordan and the voice of his Father was heard from Heaven declaring him his Son, in a. n. 27, thirteen years before. According to this calculation, the midst of the last, or seventieth, week, which is marked by the crucifixion, is placed in a. n. 44, but the crucifixion took place in a. n. 81, thirteen years previous. And lastly, the 70 weeks, or 490 years, dated from the twentieth of Artaxerxes, extend to a. n. 47, with absolutely nothing to mark their termination. Hence if that be the year, and the grant to Nehemiah the event, from which to reckon, the prophecy has proved a failure. As it is, it only proves that theory a failure, which dates the seventy weeks from Nehemiah's commission in the twentieth of Artaxerxes.

7. Will these dates harmonise if we reckon from the decree to Ezra? Let us see. In this case 457 a. c. is our starting-point. Forty-nine years were allotted to the building of the city and the wall. On this point, Pridemore, Concord, Vol. 1, p. 322, says: "In the fiftieth year of Darius Nothus, ended the first seven weeks of the seventy weeks of Daniel's prophecy. For then the restoration of the church and State of the Jews in Jerusalem and Judaea was fully finished, in that last act of reformation which is recorded in the thirteenth chapter of Nehemiah, from the twenty-third verse to the end of the chapter, just forty-nine years after it had been commenced by Ezra, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus."

So far all is harmony. Let us apply the measuring-rod of the prophecy still further. Sixty-nine weeks, or 483 years, were to extend to Messiah the Prince. Dating from a. c. 457, they end in a. n. 27. And what took place then? Luke thus informs us: "Now when all the people were baptised, it came to pass that Jesus also, being baptised, and praying, the heaven was opened, and the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him, and a voice came from Heaven which said, 'Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased.'" Luke 3:21, 22, margin a. n. 27. After this, Jesus came "into Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, 'The time is fulfilled.'" The time here mentioned must have been some specific, definite, and predicted period; but no prophetic period can be found then terminating, except the sixty-nine weeks of the prophecy of Daniel, which were to extend to Messiah the Prince. The Messiah had now come; and with his own lips he announced the termination of that period which was to be marked by his manifestation.

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER IX. (VERSES 27-29 CONTINUED.)

There again is indisputable harmony. But further: Messiah was to confirm the covenant with many for one week. This would be the last week of the seventy, or the last seven years of the 490. In the midst of the week, the prophecy informs us, he should cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease. These Jewish ordinances, pointing to the death of Christ, could only cease at the cross; and there they did virtually end, though not literally till A. D. 70. After three-score and two weeks, according to the record, the Messiah was to be cut off. It is the same as if it had read, And after three-score and two weeks, in the midst of the seventieth week, shall Messiah be cut off and cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease. Now, as the word, midst, here means middle, according to abundance of authority which we might produce, if necessary, the crucifixion is definitely located in the middle of the seventieth week.

It now becomes an important point to determine in what year the crucifixion took place. This question is decided by the following testimony: "The Saviour attended but four passovers, at the last of which he was crucified. John 2:13; 6:1; 6:4; 13:1. This could not bring the crucifixion later than A. D. 31, as recorded by Aurelius Cassiodorus, a respectable Roman senator, about A. D. 514; 'In the consulate of Tiberius Caesar, Aug. 6, and Julius Sejanus [A. D. 784, A. D. 81], our Lord Jesus Christ suffered on the eighth of the calends of April.' In this year and in this day, says Dr. Hales, agree also the council of Caesarea, A. D. 196 or 198, the Alexandrian Chronicle, Maximus Monachus, Nicephorus Constantinus, Cedraeus; and in this year, but on different days, concur Eusebius Epiphanius, followed by Kibler, Buohler, Patinus and Petrus." "It is recorded in history that the whole time of our Saviour's teaching was three years and a half, which is the half of a week of years."

Here, then, are thirteen credible authorities, locating the crucifixion of Christ in the spring of A. D. 31. We may therefore set this down as a fixed fact, as the most cautious or the most skeptical could require nothing more. This being in the middle of the last week, we have simply to reckon backward three and a half years to find where the 69 weeks ended, and forward from that point, three and a half years, to find the termination of the whole period. Thus, going back from the crucifixion, A. D. 31, spring, three and a half years, we find ourselves in the autumn of A. D. 27, where, as we have seen, the 69 weeks ended, and Christ commenced his public ministry. And going from the crucifixion forward three and a half years, we are brought to the autumn of A. D. 31, as the grand terminating point of the whole period of the seventy weeks. This date is marked by the martyrdom of Stephen, the formal rejection of the gospel of Christ by the Jewish Sanhedrin in the persecution of his disciples, and the turning of the apostles to the Gentiles. Acts 7:1-18. And these are just the events which we should expect to take place, when that period which was cut off for the Jews, and allotted to them as a peculiar people, should fully expire.

A word respecting the date of the seventh of Artaxerxes, and the array of evidence on this point is complete. Was the seventh of Artaxerxes A. D. 467? For all those who can appreciate the force of facts, the following testimony will be sufficient here:

"The Bible gives the data for a complete system of chronology, extending from the creation to the birth of Cyrus—a clearly ascertained date. From this period downward we have the undisputed canon of Ptolemy, and the undoubted era of Nabonassar, extending below our vulgar era. At the point where inspired chronology leaves us, this canon of undoubted accuracy commences. And thus the whole arch is spanned. It is by the canon of Ptolemy that the great prophetic period of seventy weeks is fixed. This canon places the seventh year of Artaxerxes in the year A. D. 467; and the accuracy of this canon is demonstrated by the concurrent agreement of more than twenty eclipses. This date we cannot change from A. D. 467, without first demonstrating the inaccuracy of Ptolemy's canon. To do this it would be necessary to show that the large number of eclipses by which its accuracy has been repeatedly demonstrated have not been correctly computed; and such a result would unsettle every chronological date, and leave the settlement of epochs and the adjustment of eras entirely at the mercy of every dreamer, so that chronology would be of no more value than mere guess work. As the seventy weeks must terminate in A. D. 31, unless the seventh of Artaxerxes is wrongly fixed, and as that cannot be changed without some evidence to that effect, we inquire, What evidence marked that termination? The time when the apostles turned to the Gentiles harmonizes with that date better than any other which has been named. And the crucifixion in A. D. 31, in the midst of the last week, is sustained by a mass of testimony which cannot be easily invalidated."—Ad. Herald.

From the facts above set forth, we see that reckoning the 70 weeks from the decree given to Ezra in the seventh of Artaxerxes, A. D. 467, there is the most perfect harmony throughout. The important and definite events of the manifestation of the Messiah at his baptism, the commencement of his public ministry, the crucifixion and the turning away from the Jews to the Gentiles, with the proclamation of the new covenant, all come in, in their exact place, and like a bright galaxy of messengers of light, cluster around to set their seal to the prophecy and make it sure.

It is thus evident that the decree to Ezra in the seventh of Artaxerxes, A. D. 467, is the point from which to date the seventy weeks. That was the going forth of the decree in the sense of the prophecy. The two previous decrees were preparatory and preliminary to this; and indeed they are regarded by Ezra as parts of it, the three being taken as one great whole. For in Ezra 6:14, we read, "And they builded and finished it, according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to the commandment of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes, king of Persia." It will be noticed that the decrees of these three kings are spoken of as one: "The commandment," margin, "Decree, singular number, "of Cyrus and Darius and Artaxerxes;" showing that they are all reckoned as a unit, the different decrees being but the successive steps by which the work was accomplished. And this decree could not be said to have "gone forth," as intended by the prophecy, till the last permission which the prophecy required was embodied in the decree and clothed with the authority of the empire. This point was reached in the grant given to Ezra, but not before. Here the decree assumed the proportions, and covered the ground, demanded by the prophecy, and from this point its "going forth" must be dated.

With the seventy weeks, we are now done; but there remains a longer period and other important events to be considered. The seventy weeks are but the first 490 years of the 2300. Take 490 from 2300, and there remain 1810. The 490, as we have seen, ended in the autumn of A. D. 34. If to this date we now add the remaining 1810 years, we shall have the termination of the whole period. Thus to A. D. 84, autumn, add 1810, and we have A. D., autumn, eighteen hundred and forty-four. Thus speedily and surely do we find the termination of the 2300 days, when once the 70 weeks have been located.

One other point should here be noticed. We have seen that the seventy weeks are the first 490 days of the 2300; that these days are prophetic, signifying literal years, according to the Bible rule, a day for a year, Num. 14: 34; Eze. 4: 6, as is proved by the fulfillment of the seventy weeks, and as all eminent expositors agree; that they commenced in 457 B. C., and ended in A. D. 1844, provided the number is right, and twenty-three hundred is the correct reading. With this point established, there would seem to be no room for further controversy. On this point Dr. Hales remarks:

"There is no number in the Bible whose genuineness is better ascertained than that of the 2300 days. It is found in all the printed Hebrew editions, in all the MSS. of Benkett's and De Rossi's collations, and in all the ancient Versions, except the Vatican copy of the Septuagint, which reads 2400, followed by Symmachus; and some copies noticed by Jerom, 2200, both evidently literal errors in excess and defect, which compensate each other and confirm the mean, 2300."—Chronology, Vol. II, p. 512.

The query may here arise, how the days can be extended to the autumn of 1844, if they commence in 457 B. C., as it requires only 1843 years in addition to the 457, to make the whole number of 2300. Attention to one fact will clear this point of all difficulty; and that is, that it takes 457 full years before Christ, and 1843 full years after, to make 2300; so that if the period commenced with the very first day of 457, it would not terminate till the very last day of 1843. Now it will be evident to all that whatever part of the year 457 had passed away before the 2300 days commenced, just so much of the year 1844 must pass away before they would end. We therefore inquire, At what point in the year 457 are we to commence to reckon? From the fact that the first 49 years were allotted to the building of the street and wall, we learn that the period is to be dated, not from the starting of Ezra for Babylon, but from the actual commencement of the work at Jerusalem; which it is not probable could be earlier than the seventh month (autumn) of 457, as he did not arrive at Jerusalem till the fifth month of that year. Ezra 7: 9. The whole period would therefore extend to the seventh month, autumn Jewish time, of 1844.

Our opponents on this view of the prophetic periods, have been wont in years past to meet us like this: "The 2300 days have not ended, because the time has passed. Why the time passed in 1844, without the consummation of our hopes, we acknowledge to be a mystery; but the passing of the time is proof that the 2300 days have not ended."

Time, however, in no respect of persons nor of theories; and with the formidable sceptre which he is represented as carrying, he sometimes demolishes in the most summary manner the grotesque and gossamer theories of men, however dear they may be to their authors and defenders. It is so here. Heedless of the wild contortions of those who would fain compel him to stop and fulfill their darling predictions, he has kept on the swift but even (and of his way until—what? every limit is passed to which the 2300 days can be extended; and thus he has demonstrated that those days have passed. Let not this point be overlooked. Setting aside for a moment the arguments by which they are shown to have ended in 1844, and letting them date from any point where there is the least shadow of ground for thus placing them, or from which any one has ever dreamed of dating them, and the utmost limit to which they would extend has gone by. They cannot possibly be dated at any point which would bring their termination so late as the present time. We therefore say again, with not a misgiving as to the truth of the assertion, nor a fear of its successful contradiction, Those days have ended!

Thoughts on the Book of Daniel.

CHAPTER IX. (VERSES 25-27 CONCLUDED.)

The momentous declaration made by the angel to Daniel, "Unto two thousand three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," is now explained. In our search for the meaning of the sanctuary and its cleansing, and the application of the time, we have found not only that this subject can be easily understood; but lo! the event is now almost accomplished. And here we pause to reflect a moment or two upon the solemn position into which we are brought.

We have seen that the sanctuary of this dispensation is the tabernacle of God in Heaven, the house not made with hands, where our Lord ministers in behalf of penitent sinners, the place where between the great God, and his Son Jesus Christ, the "counsel of peace" prevails in the work of salvation for perishing men. We have seen that the cleansing of the sanctuary consists of the removing the sins from the same, and is the closing act of the ministration performed therein; that the work of salvation now centers in the heavenly sanctuary; and when this sanctuary is cleansed, the work is done, and the plan is finished! Then the great scheme devised at the fall for the salvation of as many of the lost race as would avail themselves of its provisions, and carried forward for 6000 years, is brought to its final termination. Mercy no longer pleads, and the great voice is heard from the throne in the temple of Heaven, saying, It is done. And what then? All the righteous are safe for everlasting life; all the wicked are doomed to everlasting death. No case can be obauged, no destiny averted, beyond that point.

And we have seen (and this is what brings the solemnities of the Judgment to our own door) that that long prophetic period which was to mark the commencement of this final work in the heavenly sanctuary, has met its termination in our own generation. In 1844 the days ended. For twenty-six years the final work for man's salvation has been going forward. This work involves an examination of every man's character; for it consists in the remission of the sins of those who shall be found worthy to have them remitted, and determines who among the dead shall be raised, and who among the living changed, at the coming of the Lord, and who, of both dead and living, shall be left to have their part in the fearful scenes of the second death; and all can see that such a decision as this must be rendered before the Lord appears. Every man's case is to be determined by the deeds done in the body, and each one is to be rewarded according to his works. In the books of remembrance kept by the heavenly scribes above, every man's deeds will be found recorded; in the closing sanctuary work, these records are examined, and decision rendered in accordance therewith. It would be most natural to suppose that the work would commence with the first members of the human race; that their cases would be first examined, and decision rendered, and so on, with all the dead, generation by generation, in chronological succession along the stream of time, till we reach the last generation, the generation of the living, with whose cases the work would close. How long it will take to examine the cases of all the dead, how soon the work will reach the cases of the living, we do not know. As above remarked, for twenty-six years this work has already been going forward. The light of the types, and the very nature of the cases, forbid that it should be of long continuance. John, in his sublime views of heavenly scenes, saw millions of attendants and assistants, engaged with our Lord in his priestly work. Rev. 5. And so the ministration goes forward. It ceases not, it delays not; and it must soon be forever finished.

And here we stand; the last, the greatest, and the most solemn crisis in the history of our race immediately impending; the great plan of salvation almost finished; the last precious years of probation almost ended; the Lord about to come to save those who are ready and waiting, and to cut asunder the careless and unbelieving; and the world—alas! what shall we say of them!—deceived with error, craved with cares and business, delirious with pleasure, and paralyzed with vice. They have not a moment to spare in listening to solemn truth, nor a thought to bestow upon their eternal interests. Let the people of God, with sternly right in view, be careful to escape the corruption that is in the world through lust, and prepare to pass the searching test, when their cases shall come up for examination in the great tribunal above.

To the careful attention of every student of prophecy, we commend the subject of the sanctuary. In it is seen the ark of God's testament, containing his holy law, and suggesting a reform in our obedience to that great standard of morality. The opening of this heavenly temple, or the commencement of the service in its second apartment, marks the commencement of the sounding of the seventh angel. Rev. 11: 16, 19. The work performed therein is the foundation of the third message of Rev. 14, the last message of mercy to a perishing world. This subject explains the great disappointment of 1844, by showing that we mistook the event to occur at the end of the days. It renders harmonious and clear, past prophetic fulfillments, which are otherwise involved in impenetrable obscurity. It gives a definite idea of the position and work of our great High Priest, and brings out the plan of salvation in its distinctive and beautiful features. It reins us up, as no other subject does, to the realities of the Judgment, and shows the preparation we need to be able to stand in the coming day. It shows us that we are in the waiting time, and puts us upon our watch; for we know not how soon the work will be finished, and our Lord appear. Watch, lest coming suddenly, he find you sleeping.

The Vail of the Sanctuary.

Has the heavenly sanctuary but one vail? Did Christ, when he ascended from the earth, enter within that vail into the most holy place? Has he been carrying on the work of cleansing the sanctuary, ever since his ascension?

These questions are equivalent to a few others which may be expressed as follows: Did the 2800 days, at the end of which the sanctuary was to be cleansed, end before or at the time of Christ's ascension? Did all prophetic time then end? Have the special movements based on prophetic time, Rev. 10: 6; 14: 6, 7, been fulfilled? In short, is all our present system of prophetic interpretation, and the whole advent movement, a farce and deception?

If the first three questions can be answered in the affirmative, the rest must be. Nevertheless, regardless of consequences, some contend that there is no vail but that which divides the holy from the most holy place, and that Christ entered the most holy, when he ascended.

The only text urged in favor of this position, is Heb. 6: 19, 20: "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail; whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest forever after the order of Melchizedec." That this text refers to the entrance of our Lord into the sanctuary above, there is probably no question. And the only thing necessary to be shown to disprove the position above stated, is that the sanctuary has a vail at the entrance of the holy place, as well as the vail which divides between the holy and most holy, so that when Christ ascended and commenced his ministry in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary, or holy place, he had then entered within the vail, as Heb. 6: 19, 20, states.

In Heb. 9: 3, Paul calls the vail which divides between the holy and most holy place, "the second vail." A second necessarily supposes a first; and our minds are at once carried to the door of the first apartment for the first vail. To say that the second vail is only the other side of the one vail, is too far removed from good common-sense to demand a moment's notice.

Now let us inquire whether the door of the sanctuary is ever called a vail. If we find that it is, it will be making assurance doubly sure. Kitto, under the word tabernacle, says:—

"The entrance was turned toward the east, and was closed by means of a splendid curtain of byssus into which figures were woven. This curtain was supported by five wooden columns, which were plated with gold. . . . The holy of holies was ten cubits square and ten high, and was separated from the sanctuary by a curtain into which the figures of cherubim were woven and which was supported by four columns plated with gold."

Here Kitto calls the hangings at the entrance, of both the holy and the most holy place, curtains, showing that he regarded them as the same; if one could be called a vail, so could the other.

Josephus (Jewish Antiquities, book iii, chap. 6) gives a description of the Mosaic tabernacle. After describing the vail that divides the holy from the most holy place, he says:—

"Another vail there was which covered the five pillars that were at the entrance. It was like the former in its magnitude, and texture, and color."

Here he calls the hanging at the entrance a vail, just like the other, applying to it the same term, and giving of it the same description. In book viii, chap. 3, he gives a description of the sanctuary after it was incorporated into the temple of Solomon. He says:—

"Now when the king had divided the temple into two parts, he made the inner house of twenty cubits [every way], to be the most secret chamber, but he appointed that of forty cubits to be the sanctuary; and when he had cut a door place out of the wall, he put therein doors of cedar, and overlaid them with a great deal of gold, that had sculptures upon it. He also had vails of blue, and purple and scarlet, and the brightest and softest of linen, with the most curious flowers wrought upon them, which were to be drawn before these doors. . . . And he added doors to the gate of the temple, agreeable to the measure of the height of the wall. . . . He also had curtains drawn over these doors, in like manner as they were drawn over the inner doors of the most holy place."

This testimony shows that what was placed at the entrance of one apartment, was placed at the other. They were alike. Whatever one could be called, the other could be called, also.

But the reader may say that this is only human testimony, and nothing will be decisive on the question but the evidence of the Scriptures themselves. It shall be furnished. The word used for veil in Heb. 6:19, and 9:3, where Paul speaks of the second veil, is katapetasma. This is defined by Robinson as follows: "A covering, veil, which hangs down. In Septuagint, a veil, curtain, of the tabernacle and temple, of which there were two, viz., one at the entrance of the outer sanctuary, Ex. 26:36; 40:5; and the other before the holy of holies, separating it from the outer sanctuary. Ex. 26:31; 27:21; 40:3."

In the passages referred to in Exodus, our translators have called the first curtain, a "hanging," and the second, a "veil." But they are all from the same original word in the Septuagint, and should all have been rendered veil. Had they been so rendered, we should have had at least three instances in the Bible in which the curtain at the entrance of the first apartment would have been called a veil.

In the Hebrew, two different words are used, but both are defined by Gesenius, a veil, or curtain.

The Hour of His Judgment Come.

This will be true when the message of Rev. 14: 6, 7, is fulfilled; for so it declares: "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his Judgment is come."

Whenever God's word announces anything concerning the Judgment, every mind should give attention, every ear should listen. This is something which concerns all mankind. Other subjects may not interest, because they may treat of things with which we have no especial connection. Not so the Judgment. All are concerned here. For between us and the future world, the searching ordeal of the Judgment inevitably lies. None can escape it. Every member of the human family must pass its trying test, and receive from its decisions a sentence that will determine his or her condition for all that period covered by the fearful word—Eternity!

Let us then not carelessly nor irreverently inquire what, and when, the Judgment is, to which we are brought by the message before us.

This Judgment is a part of the gospel; for the everlasting gospel is what the angel was sent to preach, and all that the prophecy brings to view of his preaching is this appeal to all the people to fear God and give glory to him; for the hour of his Judgment is come.

In the gospel scheme, then, where does the Judgment have a place? and what is it? The gospel is the good news of pardon and salvation through Jesus Christ. And this salvation is secured to us by the following acts on the part of Christ:—

1. Coming down to earth to establish, as prophet and teacher, the new covenant with his people.
2. Dying as our sacrifice.
3. Ministering before the Father, as our priest and mediator, during the gospel age.
4. Coming again in the clouds of heaven to raise the righteous dead and change the righteous living.
5. Clothing them with immortality, and giving them positions of surpassing glory in the kingdom which he shall establish, which shall never end.

But the great event which determines for us all the momentous question who shall be the subjects of Christ's eternal kingdom, is the Judgment of the great day. This fixes the destiny of every one. Paul says that we must all appear before the Judgment seat of Christ that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done whether it be good or bad. 2 Cor. 5:10. And he told the Athenians that God had appointed a day in which he would judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he had ordained, whereof he had given assurance unto all men in that he had raised him from the dead. Acts 17:31. And when John, in prophetic vision, saw a great white throne, and One sitting thereon before the glory of whose face the earth and heavens dissolved and disappeared, he saw the dead stand in the presence of that Being, and receive judgment according to the things written in the books.

Among the great events of the gospel, the Judgment thus holds an important and prominent place. It transpires at the conclusion of human probation. It declares the result of the working of the plan of salvation for 6000 years.

The gospel is one gospel, but it embraces distinct and separate truths, which, at different times, become leading themes of its proclamation. Thus, in the first years of what is known as the gospel dispensation, the burden of evangelical preaching was a crucified and risen Saviour; or, the fact that Christ had appeared in the flesh as a sacrifice for men. In the days of the great Reformation, it was, Justification through Christ, without the intercession of a human priesthood. As we draw near the end, when the Judgment is impending, and the everlasting kingdom of Christ is to be established, taking such only among the living as are ready to enter therein, this fact, as a matter of course, and from the very nature of the case, rises into prominence, and becomes the leading idea to be urged upon the attention of the people.

So in Matt. 24: 14, when the kingdom is about to be established, it is called, "This gospel of the kingdom;" the same gospel as at the beginning, only bringing out more prominently the establishment of the kingdom which the gospel embraces, and which is then soon to be set up. And in the passage before us in Revelation, it is the everlasting gospel; but it here brings to view especially the Judgment, which is the great event impending when this message is given.

By the expression "everlasting gospel," we are not to understand a gospel which is to be preached everlastingly, and never end, but one, the work and results of which are everlasting, being accomplished once for all.

The proclamation of Rev. 14: 6, 7, is therefore a second advent proclamation, and can be in order only when the second coming of Christ and the Judgment are near at hand.

This consideration alone effectually bars all attempts to apply this message to any movement in generations past. But as some, in obedience to a prevailing impulse which inclines people to locate all important events "not in your day or mine," attempt to find this message in past ages, even going as far back as the days of the apostles, we inquire if anything has transpired in those ages which can be urged as a fulfillment of this prophecy.

The apostles did not proclaim the hour of God's Judgment come. It would not have been true if they had proclaimed it. Instead of this, they pointed to the future for that event. Paul reasoned before Felix of a Judgment, not come, but to come, sometime in the future. Acts 24:25. And he told the men of his generation, not that a day had come, but that one was appointed still in the future, for that purpose. Acts 17:31. He also expressly wrote to the believers in Thessalonica, that Christians should not expect that day till after the long period of papal apostasy. 2 Thess. 2:3.

The temporary preaching of the millennium near the close of the 10th century did not fulfill the prophecy. For those engaged in that work did not proclaim the hour of God's Judgment come. It would not have been true if they had proclaimed it. And, moreover, that movement was based on a mistaken application of the prophecies respecting the thousand years.

The reformers did not fulfill this prophecy. Martin Luther held and taught that the Judgment would not come for 300 years from his day.

The "Fifth Monarchy Men" of Cromwell's time did not fulfill it. For that movement was unscriptural and fanatical, limited in extent, and brief in duration.

But we come to our own time and find a movement which shook the churches of all Christendom. We find men moved as if by a divine impulse, giving utterance to a definite and specific proclamation through Europe, Asia and Africa; while a thousand ministers took up the theme in the more enlightened lands of England and America. We find them sending forth the tidings of every missionary station on the globe.

And what was it? The announcement of the advent near; the proclamation of the soon coming of Christ, and the end of the present dispensation. The great Advent movement of the last 33 years cannot be ignored. Many may affect to regard it as a very insignificant affair, and reserve their heartiest terms of contempt for occasions of its mention. But it matters not that multitudes are blind to the importance and significance of this movement. The scribes and Pharisees saw in Christ himself only a malefactor worthy of death. But the sound has gone forth, and who has not heard it? This is enough.

Those who were engaged in preaching the soon coming of Christ between the years 1840 and 1844, claimed to be giving the first message of Rev. 14. And the movement answers to the prophecy in every particular.

1. It answers to it in time; for it has come forth at the very time when all prophecy and all signs show that the end is at hand.

2. It answers to it in the nature of the message proclaimed; for it points to the Judgment.

3. It answers to it in extent; for it has gone to all the world.

Now, no movement ever took place at the very time when such a movement was predicted to occur, and accomplished the very work specified in the prophecy, without being a fulfillment of that prophecy.

In the great Advent movement of the present generation, therefore, we have a fulfillment of the first message of Rev. 14, which announces the hour of God's Judgment come. The nature of this Judgment will be considered in our next.

C. S.

The Judgment of Rev. 14:7.

PROPOSITION 1. By the first message of Rev. 14, we are brought to the beginning of the work of Judgment; but two other messages follow, involving a probationary work, before the Lord comes; therefore the Judgment of Rev. 14:7, transpires before the close of human probation.

PROPOSITION 2. Future rewards and punishments are determined wholly by the Judgment; hence, the bestowal of any retributive reward or punishment, must be preceded by a work of Judgment.

PROPOSITION 3. The living righteous are rewarded instantly at the appearing of Christ; for without space for any investigation of character, or decision of cases, they are changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump. 1 Cor. 15:51, 52. And preceding this change of the living, the righteous dead are raised. 1 Thes. 4:16, 17. A judgment work, therefore, of some kind precedes the second coming of Christ.

To what extent is it necessary that this work should be carried before the coming of Christ takes place? It is necessary that all the members of the human family should, so to speak, be classified; that is, that the line of distinction should be drawn between the righteous and the wicked, and that it should be determined to which class every one belongs. And whoever will think seriously upon this point a moment, will see that it is absolutely necessary that this much should be determined beforehand, inasmuch as immortality is instantly conferred upon all the righteous at the second coming of Christ; and God has not seen fit to decide by his own omniscience who are worthy of immortality, but has left the determination of that question to the investigation and decision of the Judgment, that an intelligent universe may be able to understand for themselves the righteousness of his doings.

And how far must the Judgment be carried to determine this point? It must go so far as to embrace an investigation of the life record of every individual; a record which we have every reason to infer is kept in the books above; Rev. 20:12; for all are to be judged out of the things written in the books according to their works; and in no other way, save by an absolute exertion of God's omniscience, could each one's character and destiny be determined.

There is therefore a preliminary work of investigation of character, previously determining and deciding to which of the two classes, the righteous and the wicked, every one belongs, that must take place before the Lord comes. This is the nature of the Judgment, to the hour, or period, of which we are brought by the first message of Rev. 14. And we think enough evidence has been presented in preceding articles showing that the present generation has heard this message, to create in every mind an intense interest in the question which next arises, Are we now in the inexpressibly solemn and important period of the investigative Judgment which just precedes the revelation of Jesus Christ in the clouds of heaven?

C. A.

Time of the Judgment of Rev. 14:7.

It was shown last week that a preliminary work of Judgment must take place before the Lord comes; and that this is something connected with the work of Christ, as it constitutes, at the time the message of Rev. 14:6 is given, the burden of the everlasting gospel which the angel had to preach.

In all that is revealed concerning the work of our Saviour for us, is any such preliminary Judgment work brought to view? Paul, in Heb. 8:4, 5, states plainly that the priests who ministered under the Mosaic or typical dispensation, prefigured in their ministry the work of Christ, our great High Priest under this dispensation. Read Hebrews, chapters 7, 8 and 9.

Those priests performed their service in connection with a sanctuary. This sanctuary consisted first of the tabernacle erected by Moses, Ex. 25:8, and onward; and secondly, of the temple erected by Solomon, to which the movable structure of Moses gave place. 1 Kings 8:1-11. This, Paul says, Heb. 9:1-7, was the sanctuary of the first covenant.

This sanctuary had two apartments, the first or holy place, the second or most holy, in which was the ark of God's testament. In the first, a daily ministration was carried on through the year; in the second, went the high priest alone once every year. Heb. 9:6, 7. This last day was the day of atonement, or of putting away of sin. It closed the yearly round of service, and was the cleansing of the sanctuary. Lev. 16.

In Dan. 8:14, a great prophetic period is given, and in connection with that, the sanctuary and its cleansing is brought to view: "Unto two thousand three hundred days, [years] then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." In Dan. 9:24, 25, we are told that only seventy weeks, or 490 years of the 2300, are allotted to Daniel's people, that is, to the Jews and to old Jerusalem. Then the remaining 1810 years have their application in the present, or gospel dispensation.

The sanctuary of which we have spoken, was the sanctuary of the first covenant. That covenant came to an end when Christ established the new at his first advent; Heb. 8:6-13; and with that covenant, the sanctuary of that covenant also ended. But the 2300 years, as we have seen, extend down 1810 years into this dispensation; and at the end of these days, the angel assured Daniel the sanctuary was to be cleansed. This dispensation, therefore, has a sanctuary; and what is it?

Paul, in Heb. 9:9, 23, 24, plainly states that the earthly sanctuary was a pattern, figure, type, of the true sanctuary in Heaven. In Heb. 8:1, 2, he states that Christ, in his ascended position of glory and majesty in the Heavens, is a minister of that sanctuary, the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man. In Heb. 9:23, 24, he states that it was necessary that the holy places made with hands, the earthly sanctuary, which was a pattern of the heavenly, should be cleansed with the blood of the earthly offerings, calves and goats, but the heavenly sanctuary itself must be cleansed with the blood of a better sacrifice, which is the blood of Christ.

Many people overlook the blood of this dispensation. Without shedding of blood is no remission. Precious blood of Christ! Knowing that Christ has shed his blood; and that thereby we have forgiveness of sin, they have no idea of anything further. How this blood becomes efficacious for us, or in what way it is ministered, they have no conception. The types of the former dispensation bring out this matter in beautiful clearness. As the blood of the typical offerings was ministered in the service of the typical sanctuary, so the blood of Christ, the antitype, is employed in the service of the antitypical, or true, sanctuary in Heaven. As the blood of the earthly offerings cleansed the typical sanctuary, the blood of Christ cleanses the true; as that took away sin in figure, this takes away sin in fact. A round of service was completed in the earthly sanctuary once every year. The tenth day of the seventh month of every year was devoted to the work of cleansing the sanctuary, and was called the day of atonement. Lev. 16:29, 30. Christ, since he ever liveth, performs his service once for all. Heb. 9:23, 26.

When our Lord appears in the clouds of heaven at his second advent, his work as priest is done; for then he assumes the robes and crown of a king and conqueror. Rev. 19:12-14. But the closing part of his work as priest, must, according to the type, be a work in the most holy of the heavenly sanctuary, to make atonement for his people, and cleanse the sanctuary, not from any physical impurities, but from the imputed sins of those who have sought forgiveness through his blood. And this work he accomplishes just before his second coming.

The reader will now see that this is the very work of preliminary Judgment which it has been shown must be performed before Christ comes.

For the atonement, or putting away of sin, involves the examination of character and decision of cases, according to the records in the books above. The close of Christ's priestly work will determine forever who are his and who are not. And upon all who have secured the forgiveness of their sins through his mediation, immortality is conferred "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," at his second coming.

When, then, does this work of cleansing the sanctuary, or this preliminary Judgment, commence? At the end of the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14; for so the angel assured Daniel. All now hangs upon the termination of this one period of time: can we tell when those days end? Dan. 9, being an explanation of Dan. 8, informs us that they date from the going forth of a commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. In Ezra 7, we find the commandment referred to; and it went forth in the 7th year of Artaxerxes, king of Persia; Ezra 7:7; and the 7th year of this king is determined by Ptolemy's canon, to be the year 457 B. C. Dating from the latter part of that year, Ezra 7:9, they would extend to the same point in the year 1844 A. D.

But that identical year witnessed the very height of the great Advent movement, which, as we have seen, was in fulfillment of the message of Rev. 14:6, 7. That movement was founded principally on the interpretation of the great prophetic period of 2300 days. The message brought us to the hour of God's judgment; and the prophetic period on which it was based brought us to the cleansing of the sanctuary. The hour of God's Judgment and the cleansing of the sanctuary involve, therefore, the same work and occupy the same time. This work has been in progress since the ending of the days in 1844. It occupies a brief but indefinite period just preceding the coming of Christ. It is a work we have shown to be necessary as the closing up of the work of Christ as priest, and as the preliminary Judgment work which must just antedate his appearing. It cannot from the very nature of the case be long extended; and the coming of Christ immediately follows. Candid reader, think of these things.

U. S.

The Sanctuary.

IN the World's Crisis, of Nov. 25, 1874, an article on this subject, by Miles Grant, opens as follows: "It is claimed by the Seventh-day Adventists that the sanctuary to be cleansed at the end of the 1300 [2300] days, mentioned in Dan. 8:13, 14, is in Heaven, and that the cleansing began in the autumn of A. D. 1844. If any one should ask why they thus believe, the answer would be, the information came through one of Mrs. E. G. White's visions."

Let us contrast this statement with the facts in the case. Works upon the Sanctuary are among our standard publications. Hundreds of articles have been written upon the subject. But in no one of these are the visions once referred to as any authority on this subject, or the source from whence any view we hold has been derived. Nor does any preacher ever refer to them on this question. The appeal is invariably to the Bible, where there is abundant evidence for the views we hold on this subject. All this Mr. G. well knows. But his object being not to make a candid statement of facts for the information of his readers, but to create prejudice which shall prevent them from listening to the views we may present, he imagines his purpose will be best accomplished by representing that the only authority we have for our belief is a vision of Mrs. White's. Therefore he resorts to this course, though at the expense of truth. We charge him in the above with uttering a willful and malicious falsehood.

U. S.

Questions on the Sanctuary.

A FRIEND writes us from Fredricksburg, Iowa, that he is thrown into some difficulty in regard to our views by objections raised from an "age-to-come" standpoint; and this, strange to say, by one who keeps the Sabbath. The first difficulty of our friend in reference to our view of a literal sanctuary in Heaven, he states in these words:—

"1. Heb. 10:20 calls the veil his flesh. Rev. 1:20 explains that the seven candlesticks are symbols of the seven churches. Now if the sanctuary in Heaven is literal and according to the one built by Moses, why this explanation?"

We answer by saying that we do not understand Heb. 10:20 to call the veil his flesh. The verse reads: "By a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh." What is the subject upon which Paul treats in this verse? It is the new and living way which Christ hath consecrated for us. Through what does this way lead? Through the veil. And what is this way which he has provided for us? It is his flesh. Paul's declaration is that Christ's flesh is, not the veil, but the new and living way through the veil. And the meaning evidently is that it is by the flesh of Christ, or in other words by the offering which he has provided in the sacrifice of himself, that we are able to enter by faith through the veil into the sanctuary above for the forgiveness of our sins. This is simple and plain. But with the view that his flesh is the veil, the text would be both confused and imperfect; for then we should find Paul speaking of a way through Christ's flesh which would be an incomprehensible idea; and secondly, we should find him introducing the subject of a new and living way, and then leaving it without telling us what that way is. This is neither like Paul, nor the Holy Spirit by which he wrote.

In reference to the candlestick, we think it an entire mistake to regard the seven candlesticks of Rev. 1:12, 13, as the antitype of the candlestick of the sanctuary; for, first, these are seven distinct and separate candlesticks, or lamp stands, as the word here signifies; but the sanctuary candlestick was only one, with seven branches. Secondly. One like the Son of man was seen walking in the midst of the seven candlesticks; but the high priest never walked around amid the seven branches of the one candlestick of the sanctuary. They therefore have no connection with each other. The seven candlesticks, are simply introduced as symbols of the seven churches. When we inquire for the antitype of the sanctuary candlestick, we find it in the seven lamps of fire which John saw before the throne. Rev. 4:5.

The second difficulty of our friend is the following:—

"Again, Heb. 10:12, says, 'He sat down [past tense] at the right hand of God,' which must have been in the most holy place. Now if Christ entered the most holy place on his ascension (as these texts plainly imply) the view you hold of the sanctuary and 2300 days is shaken to the foundation. I ask for information. I do not believe in probation in the age to come; but I feel I am in darkness."

There is no work we undertake with greater pleasure than trying to impart information to those who are candidly seeking it. And we would that those who have been laboring to unsettle the mind of our friend, might see from this case the nature of the work in which they are engaged. It is simply leading people into darkness and bondage. It is to obscure, not enlighten. It is to perplex and bewilder, not to encourage and establish upon the truth. It is not gathering with Christ, but scattering abroad. If they dare risk this course till the Judgment, they do so on their own responsibility.

In reply to the objection, we answer that we entirely disagree with the conclusion that the expression "at the right hand of God," means in the most holy place. Stephen said, Acts 7:55, that he saw Heaven opened, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. Was this the most holy place? That apartment of the sanctuary was not opened nor anything seen there according to the evidence of the Scriptures, till the seventh trumpet commenced to sound, near the end. Rev. 11:19. Again, our Lord himself said, Matt. 28:64, "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Is he in the most holy place when he is coming in the clouds of heaven? Yet he is, in that very act, sitting on the right hand of power, or which is obviously the same thing, sitting at the right hand of God. These texts show that this expression, at the right hand of God, simply denotes the position Christ holds in relation to God, as the second in exaltation, power, and glory.

But, for the sake of the argument, we will take it in its strictest sense, as there are scriptures, Rev. 3:21; Zech. 6:12, 13, which speak of Christ as actually seated with the Father upon his throne. And this position of course he assumed when he ascended. Still we claim that there is not the least proof in this that when Christ ascended he entered into the most holy place; for God's throne is not always and immovably in the most holy place. Where is the proof that it is? It will be answered, perhaps, that God is represented as dwelling between the cherubim, which were upon the ark in the most holy place. These expressions are all found in the old Testament, and have evident reference to the arrangement of the earthly sanctuary. God told Moses that he would meet him from between the two cherubim; and there he manifested his glory. Now suppose that during that period when God communed with mankind through the earthly sanctuary, he ordained to meet them nowhere else but from between the cherubim, would it follow that while in Heaven he must be always in that particular place? This conclusion does not seem at all necessary. The law had a shadow, but not the very image of the things.

If it be said that some of these expressions refer to God's position in Heaven, as the prayer of Hezekiah, 2 Kings 19:13, 16, then it follows that he does not remain fixed in that place; for he left it to come down and communicate with Moses and the elders of Israel. If Ps. 90:1, be referred to, we answer that that verse evidently refers to the time when the earth is to be moved (margin, stagger), or reel to and fro like a drunkard, as Isaiah has it, at the voice of God. Isa. 24:20; Jer. 25:30; Joel 3:16; Rev. 16:17. And at this time his position is between the cherubim in the most holy place, where the priesthood of our Lord then terminates.

But even here upon the earth, although the general rule was that God would commune with Moses from between the cherubim, if these were the cherubim of the mercy-seat, he did not always confine himself to that position; for he sometimes met Moses at the door of the tabernacle. Ex. 33:9; Num. 12:5; Deut. 31:16.

Finally, the throne of God itself, as it exists in Heaven, is a living, moving throne. Read Ezekiel's sublime description of this in his first and tenth chapters. Over the heads of living creatures of awful majesty, called cherubim, was the likeness of a firmament, and over that the likeness of a throne, and one above upon it, which the prophet calls "the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord." In chapter ten he calls it "the living creature that" he "saw under the God of Israel." Beyond all question, the prophet here had a vision of God in his holy temple. He himself calls it "visions of God." Chap. 1:2. And this wonderful being, full of eyes and the Spirit of God, is represented as moving about with the Lord of Israel, the Almighty; and the glory of the Lord appeared at times at the threshold of the house, or temple, not always in the most holy place.

All these facts and considerations go to show that we are not to conceive of the throne of God as any earthly throne, composed of inert material, but one of awful life and majesty. Nor are we to conceive of it as an immovable structure, but borne up by the living creatures, and in a measure incorporated with them, who have the power to go and return like a flash of lightning. Eze. 1:14. Are not these the cherubim between which God dwells? And were not the cherubim placed upon the mercy seat to represent the fact that these were the foundation of God's living throne? Whoever, therefore, builds a theory upon the idea that God's throne is an unmovable structure, and always in the same place, is sure to build an erroneous one.

Other points and queries in the communication of our correspondent, we are obliged, for want of time and space, to omit till next week.

Questions on the Sanctuary.

Oon remarks on this subject last week closed with the argument that the throne of God itself is a living, moving throne, and its glory, by the express testimony of the prophet, is manifested in different apartments of his holy temple. When, therefore, Christ ascended to a position on the throne of his Father, on the right hand of God, he did not necessarily go into the most holy place of the sanctuary on high.

To this we now add that in John's first view of the heavenly sanctuary, he saw the throne of God in the holy place. Rev. 4:1-6. Here John beheld, not Heaven opened, but a door opened in Heaven. And within the apartment opened before him, he saw a throne circled with the rainbow, and glowing like an emerald. The one seated upon the throne was the Father; for Christ is subsequently introduced as the one who took from his right hand the book sealed with seven seals. And before the throne there were seven lamps of fire, the antitype of the candlestick of the earthly sanctuary, which was placed in the first apartment. John's field of vision therefore, in this instance, lies in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary, and he there beholds the throne of God; and he sees the Father, the Son, the four and twenty elders, the four living creatures, and the innumerable company of angels acting together in reference to the salvation of man. Here, then, is positive proof that the first part of Christ's ministry before his Father was performed in the holy place.

We find equal evidence that when the time comes for a change in the ministration from the holy to the most holy place, there is a change in the position of the Father. The opening of the work in the most holy place is undoubtedly described in Dan. 7:9, 10; and there we find this significant language: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down [placed] and the Ancient of days did sit." The Ancient of days can be none other than God the Father. The expression that he "did sit," shows that he here took a position which, in this work, he had not before occupied. In other words, he changed his position from the holy to the most holy place. He thus having changed his position, there is room for the fulfillment of verses 13 and 14, which represent Christ with his holy retinue as being brought into his presence to receive his kingdom, glory, and dominion. This certainly did not take place at the time of Christ's ascension; and there is no place to locate it, without supposing some such movement, as is here suggested, on the part of God. These conclusions are necessary; and as they are the only ones which will harmonize all the Scriptures on the point, we may rest with all confidence on their correctness.

Our correspondent further inquires:—

"Has the temple described in Ezekiel ever been built, or is it yet future? Have you Thoughts on Ezekiel and Isaiah?"

Reference we suppose is made to Eze. chapters 40-48. And we answer unhesitatingly that that sanctuary never has been built, and never will be built; for the promise of it was a conditional promise, and the children of Israel never having complied with the conditions, God could not stultify himself by fulfilling the promise over those violated conditions. It was offered to them on condition that they should be "ashamed" of their iniquities and put them away. Eze. 43:8-11. But Jeremiah in his prophetic history of their future perversity, captivity, and final overthrow, speaking with aid and certainty of what would be, as though it had already been, says: "Were they ashamed when they had committed abomination? Nay; they were not at all ashamed." Jer. 6:15; 8:12. And this is shown in the fact that when the decree for Israel's restoration from captivity went forth, all would not go up to the land where God's abundant blessing was promised. Ezra 1:6; 7:7; 8:15; &c.

But this prophecy does not belong to the future age: for Christ is to be the Prince and Shepherd over Israel in the glorified state. But in the prophecy it is a poor frail mortal, even offering a sin offering for himself. Eze. 45:22. Marriage and death are to be unknown in the age to come; but here are marriages, divorces, widows and death. Eze. 44:22. The prophet does not therefore refer to the age to come.

This prophecy would have been fulfilled, had the conditions been complied with, in the Mosaic dispensation: for it was to be when circumcision, divorce, distinction in meats, offerings of beasts, the Jubilee and the Levitical priesthood were in force, as the chapters referred to testify. See this subject fully canvassed in "The Sanctuary," by J. N. Andrews, second edition, pp. 62-66.

We have no works on Ezekiel and Isaiah.

The last question proposed is the following:—

"What text implies that Christ will put off his priestly robes? Please answer in the Review, as I am not the only one interested. These doubts are suggested to all who hear the doctrine of the 'Age to Come,' and future probation, which we think are wrong." W. A.

To justify the expression that Christ will put off his priestly robes and array himself in kingly apparel when he comes, we refer to Rev. 1:13, and 19:13, 16. The first text represents him during this dispensation, in the midst of his churches, and holding their ministers in his right hand. Here he has on garments suitable to a priestly work, the priest's girdle being especially mentioned. See Ex. 29:9, &c. The second text unquestionably applies at the time of his second coming; and then he has on apparel not at all suited to the position of priest, but that of a king, as he is expressly called, "King of kings and Lord of lords." Other scriptures referring to the same time represent him in a similar manner. Isa. 39:17; 63:1-4, &c.

And these text have a bearing upon that anti-scriptural soul-destroying delusion referred to by our correspondent, namely the idea of probation after the coming of Christ. For when Christ's priesthood ends, and he no longer acts as mediator between God and the children of men, there can of course be no more offers of mercy and salvation to the unreclaimed. Then he that is filthy will be filthy still: Rev. 22:11; then there remaineth no more offering for sin; Heb. 10:14, 18; then it is forever decided who are blessed and holy and have part in the first resurrection: Rev. 20:6; and all the rest are consigned to the second death, which is the lake of fire and perdition of ungodly men. Rev. 20:5, 6, 15; 2 Pat. 3:7. He who can see probation for the ungodly in these declarations and events, must be as blind as the human imagination can conceive or Satan could desire. We would say to our correspondent that he does well to reject such a doctrine. And we would adjure those who are troubling the minds of investigators with these things to desist from their unholy work. Away with such vagaries from the system of present truth. In the name of reason and revelation we protest against them. They have no more business to be associated with the truths of the Sabbath and the third angel's message than a minister of sin would have to be stationed in the courts of glory.

It is truly surprising that any who have investigated the system of present truth, should not be able to see that it is a system of divine harmony and unchangeable relation of parts. Each part is supported by, and each in its turn supports, all the rest. It is strange they should imagine that any point can be treated and adjusted without reference to the others.

As is perhaps natural, the enemy of truth seems most persistent in trying to trouble and unsettle minds in reference to the sanctuary; for that is the citadel of our strength; and the special point of attack is the idea that the cleansing of the sanctuary began, by the entrance of Christ into the most holy place, at the end of the 2300 days in 1844. Hence his scheme to make men believe that Christ entered the most holy place when he ascended.

Now it is easy to show that this position would utterly overthrow all the great lines of prophecy in the Bible. Let us try it on a few of them: If Christ entered the most holy place when he ascended, the cleansing of the sanctuary then commenced. Then the 2300 days at the end of which the sanctuary should be cleansed, terminated at the ascension of Christ. This would destroy at once the grand argument on the seventy weeks of Dan. 9, by which the first advent of the Messiah is demonstrated, and it destroys all the arguments by which it is shown that the decree to restore and build Jerusalem went forth 457 a. c. And inasmuch as the prophecies of Dan. chaps. 2, 7 and 8, are in their main features evidently parallel, and the 2300 days span very nearly the entire field of vision, if they terminated at the ascension of Christ, these lines of prophecy are crowded almost wholly back into the former dispensation, instead of reaching through this one to the end as they certainly do. So much for the prophecies of Daniel. By this view the four lines of the 2d, 7th, 8th and 9th chapters are utterly destroyed.

Again, the message of the angel of Rev. 10, is based upon the prophetic periods of Daniel, and goes forth in connection with the close of the longest of them. If that ended at Christ's ascension, this message was given then. But this is the same as the message of Rev. 14:6, 7; which consequently locates that message at the same time. The 2300 days bring us to the sounding of the seventh trumpet. On the supposition that they ended at Christ's ascension, six of the seven trumpets are thrown back into the former dispensation. The finishing of the mystery of God, which then takes place, Rev. 10:7; 11:19, is the basis of the proclamation of the third angel, of Rev. 14:9-12, which is likewise thrown back to the opening of this dispensation. But this message warns against the mark of the beast enforced by the two-horned beast of the previous chapter, which is thus carried back over 1800 years from our time. This beast does his miracles in sight of the leopard beast mentioned before him, so back goes that beast to the Mosaic dispensation. As this beast continued 1260 years, and first received its seat from the dragon, away goes the dragon for at least 1260 years into the past dispensation, almost to the time of Moses. Who knows but Moses himself was the dragon after all!

And further the seven last plagues, Rev. 16, are poured out upon those who received the mark of the beast against which the third angel warns them. They must have been poured out therefore away back somewhere near the opening of this dispensation, and must all be past; for they all fall upon the same generation. Compare verses 2 and 11. Then the battle of the great day has been fought, the great earthquake has transpired, the cities of the nations have fallen, every island has fled away, and the mountains have disappeared, and the voice from the temple has announced that it is finished; and for the past 15 to 18 centuries more or less, all has been over, the world drifting away beyond all the lines of God's prophecies, and his providence.

To such stupid driveling absurdities as we driven the moment we take the position that Christ entered the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary when he ascended.

We might speak of the converse of all these propositions and show that every argument by which our views on any of the lines of prophecy mentioned, are sustained, are direct evidences to show that the cleansing of the sanctuary did not commence till the end of the 2300 days in 1844; and whoever gives up this point, must be prepared to meet the arguments on all the others. So we might take up any other point with a like result. But this is sufficient. All that is needed is a broad and comprehensive view of the temple of truth, to see the stability of every pillar by which it is upheld.

THE SANCTUARY.

First Paper—The Subject Introduced.

THE Sanctuary—what is it? when is it? where is it? What are its uses, and why? What its relations, and how extensive? What part does it act in the great scheme of human redemption? What prominence is given to it on the inspired pages of the book of God's revelation to man? What bearing has it upon the interpretation of the prophecies? How is its past history calculated to interest, or its present work concern, us? What claims has it upon our attention? In what way are our dearest interests connected with it?

The traveler who visits those marked spots where nature has displayed her most marvelous works or her profoundest mysteries, avails himself of the aid of a guide, who has explored each perilous path, knows the way to wonders and beauties hidden from a stranger's eye, and understands what dangers beset the steps of the unwary. We have to some extent explored this remarkable subject, and would be glad to point out to him who has not made it his study some of the beauties we have discovered, though we may have been able to explore but a small proportion of the whole. Those who have acquainted themselves with what the Bible teaches upon this question, will understand the correctness of the following statements. To those who have not, we will offer abundant proof of their truthfulness, if they will go with us in this investigation.

Let us then say by way of anticipation that the sanctuary is a great central object in the plan of salvation. Next to our Lord himself and his work, it claims our attention, as the place where the wonderful process of a world's redemption is carried forward. There is no one subject which so fully as this unites together all parts of revelation into one harmonious whole. The spokes of a wheel considered by themselves and apart, may be symmetrical and beautiful; but their uses are made apparent and their utility demonstrated only when fixed together by a central hub and exterior felloes, they appear as component parts of a perfect wheel. In the great wheel of truth, the sanctuary occupies this central position. In it the great truths of revelation find their focal point. From it, in every direction, they radiate. It unites the two great dispensations, the Mosaic and the Christian, and shows their relation to each other. It divides with no other subject the high honor of explaining the position and work of our Lord Jesus Christ. Like a brilliant lamp introduced into a darkened room, it illuminates the whole Mosaic economy. In the light of this subject, the books of Moses, with their detail of offerings and sacrifices, their minutiae of rites and ceremonies, usually considered so void of interest and use, if not of meaning also, become animated with life and radiant with consistency and beauty.

It is a key to the interpretation of the most important prophecies which are having their fulfillment at the present time. We confidently assert, that no person who either ignores this subject, or misapprehends it, can rightly interpret the prophecies for this time. While with this subject understood, it is almost as difficult to come to wrong conclusions, as it is otherwise impossible to reach correct ones. These may seem like bold and rash assertions; but they are uttered only under the firmest conviction that they can be made good to the mind of every intelligent and candid reader.

Strange that a subject occupying so important a position in the divine economy should have been so long overlooked. Strange that so few even now are found to give it in any degree their attention, still less their study. In one movement only is it made a prominent feature. By one people only is it made a special subject, discussed in full, and dwelt upon with delight.

It has come up of necessity in the study of the prophecies. In one line it is the objective point to which the prophecy looks. When that point is reached, it thenceforth becomes, in that line, the principal object. To give it that place is to furnish presumptive proof that the prophecy is understood and correctly handled. To leave it out, is to nullify the prophecy, and confess one's self lost and bewildered in its interpretation. That Seventh-day Adventists give it this place, not only in that line of prophecy where it so prominently appears, but in all others connected more or less remotely therewith, we offer as proof that they are the ones who now believe and teach in accordance with the true light of prophetic development.

Another important purpose which this subject serves, in connection with a great question before the world at the present time, may receive a passing remark at this point. The present generation has seen a religious movement such as no other generation ever witnessed: a world-wide agitation of the question of Christ's immediate second coming. Time has continued; and under the name of Millarianism it now receives the flippant sneer of the careless multitude. But the fact nevertheless remains; and its significance cannot be lost.

It must have been a mighty influence of some kind, which was sufficient to impress men simultaneously in almost every quarter of the globe, to go forth and proclaim to their fellow-men, the approaching advent of the Messiah. It must have been no small accumulation of evidence, which could lead men of the best minds and highest culture, to give the assent of their judgment to the validity of the proof, and the truthfulness of the position. The concurrent testimony of all the Scriptures, and the corroborative evidence of the signs of the times, formed a fortress of truth of impregnable strength. The Advent body were a unit, and their testimony shook the world.

Suddenly their power was broken, their strength scattered, their ranks divided and their testimony paralyzed. They passed the point of their expectation, and realized not their hope. That a mistake had been made somewhere, none could deny. From that point the history of the majority of that once happy, united, people, has been marked by discord, division, confusion, speculation, new mistakes, fresh disappointments, disintegration and apostasy. The world, without careful scrutiny, looks complacently upon this result, and relieved of its anxiety respecting the Lord's coming, is wont to regard all classes of Adventists as only the remnants of an exploded delusion.

But there is a remedy for this state of things, an explanation why a movement so evidently led at first by a divine agency, has fallen into such misfortunes, and weakness.

The sanctuary is the one subject which brings order out of all this chaos, points out the mistake, shows where and how it was made, reveals the rock on which so many have foundered, vindicates the past movement, and points out the path to further truth and final triumph.

To him, therefore, who feels any interest in the past advent movement, this subject must be one of exceeding interest. And to him who feels nothing more than a curiosity to investigate the phenomena of one of the most remarkable religious movements of this or any other age, we believe it has features which will well repay the examination of at least a leisure hour.

We therefore call the attention of all to the subject of the sanctuary. It is one of great importance on account of the position it holds in the divine plan. It is one of interest, so intimately is it connected with the work of our redemption. Received, it will affect the life, to elevate and sanctify, and so be found at last to be one of infinite profit.

T. S.

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth; Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 13, 1876.

JAMES WHITE,
J. N. ANDREWS,
URIAH SMITH,

EDITORS

THE SANCTUARY.

Second Paper—Connection with Prophecy.

It has already been stated that in the fulfillment of one of the most important lines of prophecy given in the Bible, the sanctuary becomes the principal object presented to our view. The prophecy referred to is that found in the 8th chapter of Daniel. As we travel down over the line of that prophecy, made plain and smooth to our feet, like the level well-beaten path of a public thoroughfare, suddenly we find suspended over and across the way a banner with this remarkable inscription:—

"UNTO TWO THOUSAND AND THREE HUNDRED DAYS; THEN SHALL THE SANCTUARY BE CLEANSED." Verse 14.

Raising the inquiry, why and by whom these words were spoken, we find they were called out by a conversation between two of the angels of God. And the question raised by one was answered by the other, not to the speaker, but to the prophet Daniel. The question was, "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" And in answer, the angel turning to Daniel said, "Unto two thousand three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

The question is one which is calculated to enlist our whole attention. It is one of deepest interest; for it pertains to the time when the the heel of oppression shall be forever lifted from the host, the people of God, and opposing powers shall no longer be able to pervert his worship.

The time was when the words here spoken, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," were household words with every happy believer in the Lord's soon coming. They were emblazoned on the shields of every soldier in the Advent ranks. They were joyfully uttered from many lips as the watchword of their most ardent desires and their brightest hopes. But the times, in this respect, are strangely altered. Over a portion of the Advent body a mysterious silence now reigns concerning this positive and prominent promise. Lips which were once its joyful heralds seem now to be sealed to its utterance. It seems by some to be studiously ignored, avoided, and set aside. But ignored and set aside it cannot be. The glowing prophecy of which it forms so conspicuous a part, and which must enter into every advent theory, forbids that it should be passed by unnoticed. There are some things in the regions of prophetic truth, as well as in the political world, which are the occasion of "irrepressible conflict;" and this is one of them. Men may not think to avoid it by giving their attention to other themes, and passing it by in silence. In every theory, deserving the name of theory, which professes to show the present age of the world, and the nearness of the great consummation, it imperatively demands a place and an explanation. It is the embarrassing specter which, with unvarying constancy, confronts every theory which would endeavor, with ill-concealed dread of its just claims, to turn aside from the strait path to avoid its presence. And it is well that it should be so; for it claims no more than it deserves; it presents no demands which the lover of truth ought not promptly and willingly to grant.

What, therefore, has been the cause of this change? Why are not these words dwelt upon by all, as formerly, with frequency and pleasure? To this question but one answer can be given! The expectations based upon this scripture have once been disappointed; and the method adopted by any individual to account for that disappointment, determines his view of the sanctuary and 2300 days.

The fact has already been alluded to, that previous to the autumn of 1844, the Advent people were a unit. Zealous for the great doctrine of the soon coming of their Redeemer, clothed with the blessing and power of God, devoted, harmonious, united, they presented a spectacle which made the saints rejoice and the world tremble. But since the tenth day of the seventh month, Oct. 22, Jewish time of that year, dissension and division have been to a mournful degree inscribed upon their history, and the paths they have taken have been various and divergent. The cause of this division must be found in some question involved, in some point at issue, in the events of that memorable day.

The expectation then entertained was, that at that point of time the Lord would come. Arguments had been produced, invulnerable to all the attacks of opposers, and entirely satisfactory to all lovers of the Advent doctrine at that time, that the 2300 days would end in 1844. Making this fact a starting point, an argument was easily constructed as follows:—

The prophecy asserts that the sanctuary shall then be cleansed. The sanctuary is the earth or at least some portion of the earth. Its cleansing is to be by fire. But the reparation of the earth by fire is to take place only at the second coming of the Lord. Therefore the

THE SANCTUARY.

Third Paper—Exposition of Dan. 8.

THE preceding article closed with the inquiry upon our hands, Did the 2300 days end in 1844? The answer to this question involves an answer to two other questions already noticed; namely, 1. Are the seventy weeks of Dan. 9, a part of the 2300 days of Dan. 8? and, 2. Are they rightly dated from B. C. 457? To determine these points it will be necessary to look briefly at the prophecy of Dan. 8, in which the mention of the 2300 days is found.

The first object presented to the eye of the prophet was a ram standing before the river, having two horns, one higher than the other. He saw this ram pushing westward, northward, and southward, with such vigor that no beast could stand before him, and he did according to its will, and became "great."

Scene second. A rough he goat with a notable horn between his eyes came from the west with such rapidity that he seemed not to touch the ground. And he dashed into the ram, overthrew him, broke his horns, and trampled him into the ground. The he goat waxed "very great."

But while he was defiantly prancing about in the plenitude of his power, suddenly the great horn between his eyes was broken, and in its place as suddenly sprang forth four notable horns toward the four winds of heaven.

Scene third. Out of one of these four horns of the goat the prophet then saw a little horn protruding. And lo, it grew with marvelous rapidity. It took a turn toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land. It sprang upward to the host of heaven, and, encircling some of the stars, brought them to the ground and stamped upon them. It even reared itself against the prince of the host, took away the daily, cast down the place of his sanctuary, gathered to itself an overwhelming host by reason of transgression, cast down the truth to the ground, and practiced and prospered. The little horn waxed "exceeding great."

Scene fourth. Other objects now come into the field of vision. Heaven does not look with indifference upon all the transactions indicated by the symbols and their work thus far introduced, especially as it affects the people of God. Angels regard it, and consult about it. Two of them held converse respecting it, in the hearing of the prophet. How long, said one to the other, shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? Then turning to Daniel, as in addressing him he would address the people of God, who are more especially interested in the response, the angel made answer: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

This is the entire matter of the vision, and fills the chapter to the 15th verse. It was now necessary that it should be explained; and Daniel immediately heard

AN EXPLANATION COMMANDED.

"And it came to pass, when I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning, then, behold, there stood before me as the appearance of a man. And I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which called, and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision. So he came near where I stood: and when he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face; but he said unto me, Understand, O son of man: for at the time of the end shall be the vision. Now as he was speaking with me, I was in a deep sleep on my face toward the ground: but he touched me, and set me upright. And he said, Behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation: for at the time appointed the end shall be." Verses 15-19.

Gabriel, true to the commission here laid upon him, proceeded at once to enter upon his duty and to give the explanation he was enjoined to make.

SYMBOL OF THE RAM EXPLAINED.

"The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia." Verse 20.

This is plain language. It cannot be misunderstood. This being the first symbol, we know at what point the vision commences. It does not begin with the empire of Babylon, as do the visions of the second and seventh chapters, but the Babylonian empire being very near its close in the third year of Belshazzar, when this vision was given, the view commences with the incoming Medo-Persian empire. The two horns of the ram denote the union of these two powers the Medes and the Persians in one government.

The Medo-Persian supremacy commenced at the overthrow of Babylon by Cyrus, B. C. 539, and extended to the battle of Arbela, B. C. 331, two hundred and seven years. So long a time is covered by the first symbol. In the explanation of the next symbol we have the power that overthrew the Persian empire, and consequently succeeded to its place.

Lord will come at the termination of the 2300 days. The point of time at length came; but it did not bring the Lord. No cleansing of the earth by fire took place; and believers were still left here upon the earth, having then not only their own disappointment to bear, which was grievous and keen, but also the flood of obloquy and reproach which the world poured upon them. What was the matter? Where had the mistake been made? What was the cause of the disappointment?

On this point different views are entertained, and different opinions advanced. Before examining these, let it be remembered that God cannot be the author of the confusion that has existed since that time in the Advent body. All the various theories that have since sprung up, cannot every one be true. And yet every Adventist will admit that the truth of God at the present day must be found in connection with the Advent doctrine. Every Adventist will admit that if God designs, previous to the coming of the Lord, to warn the world of that event, the great Advent movement of 1840-1844, in so far as it tended to arouse a slumbering world to the fact that we are living in the time of the end, and to warn them of the nearness of the close of probation, and the consummation of all things, was in the order and purpose of God. He must therefore still have a people on the earth as a result of that movement; he must still have a truth among men bearing some relation to that great work; and there must be some correct explanation of the great disappointment connected with that movement.

The theory of the time as held in 1844, consisted of two main propositions: 1. That the 2300 days ended in 1844. 2. That the earth was the sanctuary then to be cleansed. So, based upon these two propositions, two answers are given to the question why those who looked for their Lord at that time were disappointed. The first is that the reckoning of the time was wrong. The second is, that the view taken of the sanctuary was wrong. More fully expressed, we were disappointed, because the 2300 days did not then expire, and consequently the time had not come for the earth to be cleansed with fire; or, secondly, we were disappointed because, though the days did then terminate, as we believed they would, neither the earth nor any part of the earth is the sanctuary which was then to be cleansed.

Either of these answers would be sufficient to explain the disappointment; and both have been offered by different ones. But it will be seen that they are at perfect antipodes to each other; and it remains to determine which is the correct one. We inquire, then, is it correct to say that the time was wrongly calculated, and that the 2300 days did not end in 1844? Previous to that year, it had been held that Daniel 9 was a key to chapter 8, and that the seventy weeks of Dan. 9:24-27, afforded a clue to the explanation of the 2300 days of chapter 8. Now those who deny the ending of the days in 1844, endeavor to sustain their new position in two ways. The first is to deny the connection between Daniel 8 and 9, between the seventy weeks and 2300 days. This class claim that the seventy weeks of Daniel 9 are no part of the 2300 days of Dan. 8, and that, consequently, the date of the former does in no wise determine the date of the latter. They acknowledge that the date assigned by all Adventists previous to 1844, for the commencement of the seventy weeks, namely, a. c. 457, cannot be disproved; but as they are no part of the 2300 days, they furnish no clue to the commencement of that period. Where the 2300 days did commence, or what event marked their beginning, they cannot tell. This much only, on this point, they profess to know, that they did not end in 1844, because the earth is the sanctuary, and the earth was not then burned.

The other class acknowledge the validity of the arguments by which the seventy weeks are shown to be a part of the 2300 days, as held by all Adventists up to 1844, but deny that the date of their commencement was rightly placed in a. c. 457. Commencing at that point, they would end in 1844; but this class, like the one first mentioned, contend that they could not then have ended, and for the very same reason, namely, because the earth is the sanctuary, and the earth was not then burned.

From this general survey of the subject, one would be led to conclude that there was something all-potent in the theory that the earth is the sanctuary. From what it has done, we should suppose it had been able to intrench itself behind infallible evidence. It has led the majority of those who were in the past Advent movement, while divided on many other points, to agree on this, that the 2300 days did not end in 1844. It has led them to make a full surrender of positions which were once acknowledged to be the ground and pillar of the Advent faith; positions which able men were led to take when their hearts were glowing with a newly-found and life-giving truth, and their intellects quickened by the outpouring of the Spirit and power of God; positions which passed unscathed through the most fiery ordeal of scrutiny and opposition, to which, perhaps, it has been the lot of any truth in any age to be subjected; positions which stood the test when the world was aroused to the subject of the Advent as never before nor since, when opposition was called forth in all its strength, and the highest worldly wisdom played its heaviest batteries against the unpopular movement. The reasons which would lead men to abandon positions like these should be infinitely weighty; but these positions have all been surrendered to the solitary view, which has thus been set up paramount to to them all, that the earth is the sanctuary. Where is the mighty array of evidence by which this is sustained? All that has been, or can be, produced, it will not be difficult to find, as we proceed.

C. S.

SYMBOL OF THE GOAT EXPLAINED.

"And the rough goat is the king of Grecia: and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king. Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power." Verses 21, 22.

This also is plain and unequivocal language. The power that was to succeed the Persian in the empire of the world, according to the prophecy, was the Grecian. It was fulfilled two hundred and thirty-one years after the vision was given, when, at the battle of Arbela, Oct. 1, B. C. 331, Alexander the Great utterly routed the forces of Darius Codomanus, and became absolute lord of the empire to the utmost extent ever possessed by any of the Persian kings.

The great horn between his eyes was the first king. This was Alexander the Great. That horn was broken. Eight years after the battle of Arbela, Alexander died in a drunken debauch at the age of 33, Nov. 12, B. C. 323.

In place of this first horn, four came up toward the four winds of heaven. These, the angel said, signified four kingdoms to arise out of the nation. After the death of Alexander, much confusion arose among his followers respecting the succession. It was finally agreed, after a seven days' contest, that his natural brother, Philip Arrideus, should be declared king. By him and Alexander's sons, Alexander Egeus and Hercules, the name and show of the Macedonian empire was for a time kept up. But these were all soon murdered; and the regal family being then extinct, the chief commanders of the army, who had gone into different parts of the empire as governors of the provinces, assumed the title of kings. They thereupon fell to leaguings and warring with each other to such a degree that within the short space of fifteen years from Alexander's death, the number was reduced to just four, as the prophecy had declared. These kingdoms thus originated about 308 B. C. They were Macedonia, Thrace, Syria, and Egypt, ruled respectively by Cassander, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy. The kingdom of the goat dates from B. C. 331 to the time when a succeeding power appears upon the scene, B. C. 161, as we shall hereafter see. A period of 170 years is thus covered by this symbol.

THE SYMBOL OF THE LITTLE HORN EXPLAINED.

"And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand." Verses 23-25.

This little horn is unquestionably a symbol of the power that succeeded Grecia in the dominion of the world. And this, according to the prophecies of Dan. 2 and 7, was Rome. Some special reasons must be given if we are to take the ground that this prophecy does not run parallel with the others, and from the time of its beginning bring to view the same universal kingdoms.

Such a view, however, is taken; but such good reasons for it are not produced. Romanists, to avoid the application of this part of the prophecy to the Roman power, pagan and papal, endeavor to shift the application from Rome to Antiochus Epiphanes. And this lead of the papists has been followed by the majority of those who oppose the Advent faith. In our next we shall show that this view cannot be correct, but that the reasons fixing this upon Rome, are more clear and numerous than those even which determine the application of the other symbols.

U. S.

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth; Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, NICH., FIFTH-DAY, JAN. 27, 1876.

JAMES WHITE,
J. N. ANDREWS,
URIAH SMITH, } . . . EDITORS.

THE SANCTUARY.

Fourth paper.—Daniel 8, Continued.

ANNOUNCEMENT was made last week that the little horn of Dan. 8, could be shown to be, not Antiochus Epiphanes, but Rome. The task is easy. If people would only treat interpretations of prophecy as they treat bank bills, that is, compare them with the detector to see if they are genuine, there would be no trouble. Our only wonder is that any one could ever have supposed the application to Antiochus to be genuine.

We say, then, that the little horn of Dan. 8, does not symbolize Antiochus, but does symbolize Rome, because,

1. This horn came out of one of the four horns of the goat. Verse 9. It was therefore another horn separate and distinct from any of the four. One of these four horns, as we have seen, was the kingdom of Syria, founded by Seleucus, from whom sprung the famous line of kings known in history as the Seleucidae. Of these there were twenty-six, in order as follows:—

1. Seleucus Nicator. 2. Antiochus Soter. 3. Antiochus Theus. 4. Seleucus Callinicus. 5. Seleucus Ceraunus. 6. Antiochus the Great. 7. Seleucus Philopator. 8. Antiochus Epiphanes. 9. Antiochus Eupator. 10. Demetrius Soter. 11. Alexander Bala. 12. Demetrius Nicator. 13. Antiochus Theus. 14. Antiochus Sidetes. 15. Zebias. 16. Seleucus, son of Nicator. 17. Antiochus Grypus. 18. Antiochus the Cyprian. 19. Seleucus, the son of Grypus. 20. Antiochus Eusebes. 21. Antiochus, second son of Grypus. 22. Philip, third son of Grypus. 23. Demetrius Eucherus. 24. Antiochus Dionysius. 25. Tigranes. 26. Antiochus Ariaticus, who was the last of the Seleucidae, and who after an insignificant reign of four years, was driven from his dominions by Pompey, the Roman, A. C. 65.

It will thus be seen that Antiochus Epiphanes was simply one of the twenty-six kings which constituted the Syrian horn of the goat. He was for the time being that horn; hence he could not be at the same time a separate and independent power, or another remarkable horn, as the little horn was.

Rome was such a separate horn, and from the stand-point of this prophecy, came out of one of the horns of the goat, thus answering exactly to the prophetic description. In the year 161 A. C., Rome became connected with the Jews by the famous Jewish League, 1 Mac. 8; Josephus' Antiq. B. xii., chap. x., sec. 6; Pridemore vol. ii., p. 168. Nations are noticed in prophecy when they become connected with God's people. Right here the conquering legions of the Roman power came into the prophet's view. But just seven years before this, A. C. 168, Rome had conquered Macedonia (one of the four horns of the goat), adding it to its empire. And as if coming from that horn, the prophet beholds it from that point pursuing its triumphant career. It is therefore spoken of as coming forth from that horn.

2. Were we to apply the little horn to any one of these twenty-six Syrian kings, it should be to the most illustrious and powerful one of them all. But this was not Antiochus Epiphanes. For historians inform us that his name, Epiphanes, the illustrious, was changed to Epimanes, the fool, on account of his vile and extravagant folly.

The little horn cannot apply to Antiochus, but must signify the Roman power, because,

3. This little horn, in comparison with the preceding kingdoms, Media and Persia, waxed "exceeding great." There is in the prophecy a regularly increasing gradation of power: great, very great, exceeding great. Applying the little horn to Antiochus the following result is presented: "Great," Persia. True. "Very great," Grecia. True. "Exceeding great," Antiochus. Nonsense.

The Persian empire is simply called "great," though it ruled "from India even unto Ethiopia, over an hundred twenty and seven provinces. Grecia, still more extensive and powerful, is called "very great." Then comes the power in question which is called "exceeding great." Was Antiochus great in comparison with Alexander who conquered the world? or with the Romans who conquered all of Alexander's dominions and vastly more? The kingdom of Antiochus was only a portion of the empire ruled by the goat. Is a part more than the whole? Of the relation between Antiochus and the Romans the Religious Encyclopedia says: "Finding his resources exhausted he [Antiochus] resolved to go into Persia to levy tributes and collect large sums which he had agreed to pay to the Romans."

Can any king be said to have waxed exceeding great, when he left his kingdom no larger than he found it? But Sir Isaac Newton testifies that Antiochus did not enlarge his dominions. He made some temporary conquests in Egypt, but immediately relinquished them when the Romans took the part of Ptolemy and commanded him to give them up.

It surely cannot take any one long to decide which was the greater power, the one which evacuated Egypt or the one which commanded that evacuation; the one compelled to pay tribute, or the one to whom he was compelled to pay it. One was Antiochus; the other was Rome. With Rome as the third member of the series, we have this result: Great, Persia. True. Very great, Grecia. True. Exceeding great, Rome. More emphatically true than either or both the others.

4. The little horn was to stand up against the Prince of princes, by which title without doubt, our Lord is meant. But Antiochus died 104 years before Christ was born. There was a power, however, which did stand up against the Saviour. Rome was then in the zenith of its glory. And Rome in the person of Herod endeavored to destroy the infant Jesus. Subsequently when Pilate was its mouth-piece in Judea, it nailed him to the cross.

The same work is attributed to the great red dragon of Rev. 12, a symbol referring so evidently to Rome, that none care to dispute the application.

Antiochus answers not one specification of the prophecy; and here we may therefore dismiss him. But, for a more full elucidation of the prophecy, we may further say of Rome:—

4. This horn was "little" at first. So was Rome, but it "waxed" or grew exceeding great in three several directions. What better terms could be used to describe the course of that power which from a small beginning rose to be the mistress of the world.

5. It gathered dominion toward the south. Egypt was made a province of the Roman empire B. C. 30, and continued such for over six centuries.

6. It marched its conquering legions toward the east. Rome subjugated Syria B. C. 63, and made it a province of the empire.

7. It set its face toward the pleasant land. Judea is so called in many scriptures. Ps. 109: 24; Zech. 7: 14; &c. First by a league of assistance and friendship the Romans took under their influence the holy land and people. They subsequently made Judea a Roman province, and finally destroyed the city of Jerusalem, burned their beautiful temple with fire, and scattered the Jews over the face of the whole earth to be gathered no more till time shall end.

8. It waxed great even to the host of heaven. These terms used in a symbolic sense in reference to earthly scenes, must denote persons of illustrious character or exalted position. The great red dragon, Rev. 12: 4, Pagan Rome, is said to have cast down a third part of the stars of heaven to the ground. This is the same power, and we think the same work, referring to its acts of oppressing the Jews, and deposing their rulers.

9. By him the daily (not daily sacrifice, as our translators have supplied, but daily desolation, which is paganism) was taken away, and the transgression of desolation, the papacy, was set up. Chap. 11: 31. Rome, and Rome alone, did this. While Rome was ruler, the religion of the empire was changed from paganism to that corrupted form of Christianity known as the papacy. And the place where paganism had long had its sanctuary, Rome with its Pantheon, or temple of all the gods, was cast down, or degraded to the second rank, by the removal of the seat of government to Constantinople. So in Rev. 13: 2, the dragon, pagan Rome, gave to the beast, papal Rome, his seat, the city of Rome, and great authority.

10. An host was given him against the daily. The barbarians that subverted the Roman empire became converts to that nominal Christianity before which they were thus brought face to face, and were soon transformed into willing instruments whereby their former religion, paganism, was dethroned. No other power has in any respect fulfilled this prophecy.

11. In the interpretation, verse 23, it is called a king of fierce countenance and understanding dark sentences. Such was emphatically Rome, with its warlike paraphernalia, and its strange language which the Jews did not understand. Moses uses similar language, referring, as all agree, to the Romans. Deut. 28: 49, 50.

12. It was to stand up in the latter time of their kingdom, when the dominion of the four horns of the goat was drawing to an end. There Rome appeared.

13. It was to destroy wonderfully. Hear all opposing powers which it so rudely overthrew, testify. Thus did Rome.

14. Rome has destroyed the mighty and holy people, the people of God, more than all other powers combined. A many-tongued voice from the blood of more than fifty millions of martyrs, goes up to testify against it.

15. And it has "practiced,"—practiced its deceptions upon the people, and its schemes of cunning among the nations, to gain its own ends, and aggrandize its power.

16. And it has "prospered." It has made war with the saints, and worn them out and prevailed against them.

17. It has run its allotted career, and is to be "broken without hand." Verse 25. How clear a reference to the stone cut out without hand which smote the image upon its feet and dashed it to pieces. So the papacy is soon to perish in the consuming glories of the second coming of our Lord.

Thus Rome fulfills all the specifications of the prophecy. No other kingdom meets even one. Rome is the power in question. No other can be.

In view of all these facts, if any one still affirms that Antiochus was the little horn, or if he even hesitates to admit its application to Rome, all we can do is to take such person by the hand, and exclaim with the deepest commiseration for his unfortunate condition, "non compos mentis. Farewell." U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Fifth Paper.—The Year-day Principle.

From the exposition of the symbols thus far given we have the field of vision laid clearly out before us. The first symbol, Persia, covers a period of 207 years; the second, Grecia, 170 years; the third, which we have seen to be Rome in both its phases, pagan and papal, from A. C. 181 to its division into ten parts, in 483, A. D., continued 344 years; and if we come down to the close of papal supremacy in 1798, we have the long period of 1969 years; and if we come still forward to our own time, for this power is not yet broken without hands, we have the surprising period of 2033 years covered by this symbol.

Putting these periods together, we have from the commencement of Persian supremacy, A. C. 538, to the division of Rome, 483 A. D., 1021 years, to the temporary overthrow of papal Rome 1798, A. D. 2336 years; to our own time 2410. So vast is the sweep of this vision, which was given to the beloved Daniel.

This fact has an important bearing upon the subject of time, which we are now prepared to consider. One point alone remains unexplained in Daniel 8, and that is the sanctuary and 2300 days of verse 14. On this we now inquire:—

1. Does the word "days," which in the margin is rendered "evening, morning," mean days as commonly understood by that term?

2. Have we the correct reading, 2300?

3. Are the days literal or symbolic; and can we tell how long a period they denote?

On the first of these inquiries, we present the following testimony from Dr. Hales:—

"The earliest measure of time on record is the Day. In that most ancient and venerable account of the creation, by Moses, the process is marked by the operations of each day. The evening and the morning were the first day, &c. Gen. 1:5, &c. Here the word 'day' denotes the civil or calendar day of 24 hours, including 'the evening,' or natural night, and 'the morning,' or natural day; while the sun is either below or above the horizon of any place, in the course of the earth's diurnal rotation between two successive appulses of the same meridian to the sun; corresponding, therefore, to a solar day in astronomy. It is remarkable that the 'evening,' or natural night, precedes the 'morning,' or natural day, in the Mosaic account. Hence the Hebrew compound, עֶרֶב וּבֹקֶר, 'evening-morning,' is used by the prophet Daniel to denote a civil day, in his famous chronological prophecy of the 2300 days, Dan. 8:14."—Sacred Chronology, vol. 1, p. 10.

Again he says when speaking on this text in Vol. ii. p. 512, note, "The evening-morning was a civil or calendar day."

On the second inquiry, Is 2300 the correct reading? we quote again from the same author:—

"There is no number in the Bible whose genuineness is better ascertained than that of the 2300 days. It is found in all the printed Hebrew editions, in all the MSS. of Kennicott and De Ross's collations, and in all the ancient versions, except the Vatican copy of the Septuagint which reads 2400, followed by Symmachus; and some copies noticed by Jerome, 2200; both evidently literal errors, in excess and defect, which compensate each other and confirm the mean, 2300." Id., Vol. ii. p. 512.

These points being thus established that the expression is the proper one to denote a civil day, and that the reading, 2300, is correct, we next inquire, Are these days literal, or symbolic? If they are literal, they give us (dividing by 365) six and one-third years, as the extent of the whole period. If they are symbolic, each day signifying a year, they bring to view a period 2300 years in length. Which of these two views is the more consistent with the rest of the prophecy?

The question was "How long the vision?" The question, certainly, covers almost the whole, if not the whole, duration of the vision; and that, as we have seen, extends over a period of over 2400 years. Now if in reply the angel singled out a period only six years and one third in length, then there is no correspondence either between this answer and the vision in connection with which it was given, or between the answer and the question which directly called it forth. These days if taken literally would be far from covering the duration of any one of the kingdoms of the prophecy taken singly, how much less of them all taken together.

This is symbolic prophecy; it would be natural therefore to conclude that the time introduced would be of a like nature. Twenty-three hundred literal days would not be out of proportion to the lives of the beasts shown in the vision; and as these beasts are symbols, representing long-lived kingdoms; so the days are symbols representing the years of their continuance.

The Bible observes this rule of chronological proportion in a general way. In Eze. 10, the Jewish nation is symbolized under the figure of a youthful woman, the youthful age of the woman, and the comparatively short period of growth to womanhood, representing the youthful period of the nation, and the years during which it was coming to maturity. See Elliott's Horæ Apocalypticæ, Vol. iii, p. 241.

But more than this, the Bible gives the exact proportion between literal and symbolic time. Ezekiel, during the selfsame Babylonian captivity in which Daniel's prophecies were delivered symbolizes years by days. He was commanded to make known to his fellow exiles by the river Chebar, near the Euphrates, the fate of Jerusalem, with her last king Zedekiah, and also God's reason for it. For this purpose he was to lie prostrate with his face toward the city, on his left side 390 days for Israel, and on his right side 40 days for Judah, restricted all the while to a famine diet, like the Jews he represented shut up in the siege. And God said, I have appointed thee each day for a year. Eze. 4:6.

In this representation Ezekiel himself became a symbol. He was acting a symbolic part, an individual representing a nation, the days in which he was acting his part symbolizing the actual years of the punishment of those whom he represented.

Another instance, not so evidently symbolic in its nature, but equally definite in showing how God uses short periods of time to represent longer ones, and the proportion to be observed between them, is found in Numbers 14:34: "Forty days, each day for a year."

It is objected against this principle of interpretation that it is novel, not having been known in the church from the days of Daniel to those of Wickliffe, and, secondly that those who adopt the year-day principle are in confusion among themselves respecting their interpretations of prophecy.

The first of these objections is shown by Mr. Elliot not to be well founded; as this principle of interpretation, though not the exact application of this prophecy, was adopted by Augustine, Tichonius, Primasius, Andreas, the venerable Bede, Ambrosius, Ansbertus, Berengaud, Bruno Astensis, &c.

As to the second objection, there certainly is no more confusion among year-day interpreters than among those who take the day-day view; and it is not strange that there should have been discordant views in days past since the prophecy was closed up and sealed till the time of the end; but the intimation is given that then the seal would be broken, the wise understand and knowledge be increased on these things. And right here the year-day principle has been brought out and especially defended as a key to the interpretation of the prophecies.

But that which demonstrates beyond question the correctness of the year-day principle, is the fact that we, living down in the last years of prophetic fulfillment, are now able to trace out in history the accomplishment of these predictions; and we find that the seventy weeks of Dan. 9, the 1260, 1290, and 1335 days of Daniel 7 and 12, and Rev. 12 and 13, and the five months, and hour, day, month and year of Rev. 9 have all been exactly fulfilled a day for a year.

The 2300 days of Dan. 8:14 are therefore 2300 literal years. Where do they begin and where do they end?

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Sixth Paper. — Dan. 8 Explained by Dan. 9.

HAVING now seen that the 2300 days of Dan. 8, are symbolic, and denote 2300 literal years, the inquiry is resumed, When do they commence and when terminate? The symbols of the ram, goat, and little horn, were clearly explained in chapter 8. Gabriel was commanded to make him understand the entire vision. But at the conclusion of the chapter Daniel says, "I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it."

So far therefore as the record of the 8th chapter is concerned, Gabriel had not then fulfilled his mission. The point left unexplained was the 2300 days. Why did not Gabriel continue his instructions till this point was also made clear? Because Daniel had heard all he could endure, and fainted and was sick certain days. But Gabriel must somewhere explain this matter of the time, or prove disobedient to his instructions, and thus become a fallen angel. But he did not thus become apostate; for more than five hundred years after this, we find him still in divine employ, sent on a sacred mission to Zecharias and to Mary. Gabriel has therefore somewhere given Daniel further instruction on that part of the vision which remained unexplained, namely, the 2300 days. We are to look for this, of course, in the subsequent records of Daniel's prophecy.

Fifteen years elapse, and the record of chapter 9 opens. We have now reached the year 538 a. c. A mighty revolution has just taken place. The empire of the world has changed hands. Babylon lies prostrate and bleeding in the dust. The proud oppressor of God's people is brought low. Medo-Persia now wields the scepter. Daniel beholds in all this the hand of God, and the fulfillment of prophecy. He understood by the writings of Jeremiah that Jerusalem should lie desolate for seventy years, and that the termination of that period would be marked by the punishment of the king of Babylon. Jer. 25:12. He has seen the punishment of Babylon, and concludes that the day of deliverance for his people is at hand. The seventy years did actually terminate two years later, in the first year of Cyrus a. c. 536, and their expiration was marked by the decree of Cyrus for the re-building of the temple.

Daniel therefore sets his heart to seek the Lord, and to pray to him for the fulfillment of his word. Then follows the wonderful prayer of Dan. 9:4-19. In the course of his prayer he said, "O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplication, and cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate."

We remember, as Daniel doubtless did, that the 2300 days ended with a promise respecting the sanctuary. And it is evident from this expression that Daniel had in some way connected the end of the 2300 days with the end of the 70 years of Jewish captivity. In this it was necessary that he now be set right.

Again the prophet is rapt in vision; and a heavenly messenger appears upon the scene. We ask the reader to consider carefully who this is. We last beheld Daniel in converse with Gabriel. The angel was explaining to him the things he had seen in compliance with the mandate of One qualified to command even so high an angel as Gabriel, "Make this man to understand the vision." He had explained all but the time, when Daniel's powers gave way, the prophet fainted, and he was obliged to desist. Thus the 8th chapter leaves us, Gabriel departing Heavenward, his work unfinished, and Daniel, though sufficiently recovered to attend to the king's business, wondering at the vision but not understanding it. This vision of the 9th chapter is the very next vision, so far as we have any account, which the prophet had. Again he is honored with the presence of a heavenly guest. And who is it? "Gabriel," exclaims the prophet; and that there may be no doubt as to his identity, Daniel adds, "whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning." Thus our minds are carried directly back to the vision of chapter 8, and the prophet declares that the very same angel he had seen at that time was with him again.

The vision of chapter 9 therefore opens as the vision of chapter 8 closed, Daniel and Gabriel in communication with each other. And there is no intervening vision to cut off the connection between these two scenes. And here we behold two of the manifold links that bind these chapters together: the same vision called up, and the same angel introduced whom we there beheld.

Gabriel speaks; and his first words confirm this view: "O Daniel I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding." As if he had said, O Daniel when last I was with you, explaining the vision you had seen, I was obliged to leave my explanation midway, because you could endure no more; hence you did not understand it; but I was commissioned to ask, you understand it; and therefore I am now come forth to give you the understanding which I could not then impart.

Gabriel continues; and every word he utters strengthens this conclusion: "At the beginning of thy supplication the commandment came forth, and I am come to show thee; for thou art greatly beloved: therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision."

It would be useless for any one to deny that a previous vision is here referred to; and it would be equally useless for him to deny that that is the vision of chapter 8.

Now we will introduce a test to settle beyond peradventure the truthfulness or falsity of the position here taken. If chapter 9 is connected with chapter 8: if the vision of chapter 9 is the sequel of that of chapter 8; if the expression used by Gabriel in chapter 8, "consider the vision," refers to the vision of chapter 8; and if he has now come to complete the instruction which he there omitted; it is certain that he will commence with the very subject which he was obliged to leave unexplained in that vision, namely the subject of the time. If he does this, the connection between these two chapters for which we here contend is established. If he does not it is perhaps still an open question.

And what does he say? "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city." He does therefore commence with the subject of time. But how do we know that this time has any connection with the time of chapter 8? Because he says of it that it is "determined;" and the word determined here signifies "cut off." But there is no period of time from which they could be said to be cut off, except the 2300 days of chapter 8. Thus are the expressions relating to the time connected together; and Gabriel undertakes an explanation of the 2300 days by dividing it into two periods, the first of seventy weeks or 490 days, and the remainder of 1810 days, and then explaining the shorter, which is a key to the whole.

Proof that the word "determined" signifies "cut off," and testimony from eminent writers who have acknowledged the connection between Daniel 8 and 9, will be given in our next.

C. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Seventh Paper.—"Determined," Dan. 9: 24, Means "Cut Off."

First witness. "Seventy weeks are determined," literally 'cut off.' Hebraists all admit that the word determined, in our English version, does signify 'cut off.' Not one has disputed it.—Jonah Litch, Midnight Cry, Vol. iv. No. 25.

Second witness. "Seventy weeks have been cut off upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sin offerings, and to make atonement for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy." Dan. 9: 24.—Whiting's Translation.

Third witness. Gesenius, the standard Hebrew lexicographer, thus defines this word in his Hebrew lexicon: "Nechlak: Properly, to cut off; tropically, to divide; and so to determine, to decree."

Fourth witness. The Chaldeo-Rabbinic Dictionary of Stockius, defines the word nechlak as follows: "Scidit, absidit, conscidit, incidit, excidit—to cut, to cut away, to cut in pieces, to cut or engrave, to cut off."

Fifth witness. Mercerus, in his "Thesaurus," furnishes a specimen of Rabbinical usage in the phrase, chafukh shel basar, "a piece of flesh," or "a cut of flesh." He translates the word as it occurs in Dan. 9: 24, by "precious cut," was cut off.

Sixth witness. Arias Montanus in a literal version of the text translates it "decies est" was cut off; in the marginal reading, which is grammatically correct, the rendering is in the plural, "decies sunt," were cut off.

Seventh witness. In the Latin version of Junius and Tremellius, nechlak (the passive of chathak) is rendered "decies sunt," were cut off.

Eighth witness. Theodotion's Greek version of Daniel (which is the version used in the Vatican copy of the Septuagint, as being the most faithful), renders it by αὐτεμάχθησαν, αὐτεμάχθησαν, "were cut off;" and the Venetian copy by τεμαχθέντες, τεμαχθέντες, "have been cut."

Ninth witness. In the Vulgate the phrase is, "abbreviata sunt," have been shortened.

"Thus Chaldaic and Rabbinical authority, and that of the earliest versions, the Septuagint and Vulgate, give the single signification of cutting off to this verb."

Tenth witness. Hengstenberg, who enters into a critical examination of the text says: "But the very use of the word, which does not elsewhere occur, while others, much more frequently used, were at hand if Daniel had wished to express the idea of determination, and of which he has elsewhere, and even in this portion availed himself, seems to argue that the word stands from regard to its original meaning, and represents the seventy weeks in contrast with a determination of time (as aplaten) as a period cut off from subsequent duration, and accurately limited."—Christology of the Old Testament, Vol. ii. p. 301. Washington, 1839.

This translation is further vindicated by Prof. N. N. Whiting, from whom a quotation has already been given, in the following language: "As the period of 2300 days is first given, and verses 21 and 23, compared with Dan. 8: 16, show that the ninth chapter furnishes an explanation of the vision in which Gabriel appeared to Daniel, and of the 'matter'—(the commencement of the 2300 days)—the literal (or rather, to speak properly, the only) signification demanded by the subject matter, is that of 'cut off.'"—Midnight Cry, Vol. iv. No. 17.

No further or better evidence could be required on this point. Beyond question the seventy weeks are cut off from some other period; and just as evidently that other period is the 2300 days of chapter 8. Should it be asked why our translators render the word "determined" when it so obviously signifies "cut off," a sufficient answer would be that they doubtless overlooked the connection between the eighth and ninth chapters; and, considering it improper to speak of a period of time as cut off, when nothing was given from which it could be cut off, they gave the word its tropical instead of its literal meaning.

In connection with this point, we promised testimony from prominent writers on the prophecies who have acknowledged the connection between Daniel 8 and 9. In perusing them the reader will be able to decide which class have proved recalcitrant to the original advent faith, we who adhere still more tenaciously than ever to these views, or those who, without any assignable reason, repudiate and reject them. We commence with an extract from an article in the Advent Shield which reads:—

"We call attention to one fact which shows that there is a necessary 'connection' between the seventy weeks of the ninth chapter, and something else which precedes or follows it, called 'the vision.' It is found in the 24th verse: 'Seventy weeks are determined, or cut off, upon thy people . . . to seal up the vision,' etc. Now there are but two significations to the phrase 'seal up.' They are, first, 'to make secret,' and second, 'to make sure.' We care not now in which of these significations the phrase is supposed to be used. That is not the point now before us. Let the signification be what it may, it shows that the prediction of the seventy weeks necessarily relates to something else beyond itself, called 'the vision,' in reference to which it performs this work, 'to seal up.' To talk of its sealing up itself is as much of an absurdity as to suppose that Josephus was so much afraid of the Romans that he refrained from telling the world that he thought the fourth kingdom of Daniel was 'the kingdom of the Greeks.' It is no more proper to say that the ninth chapter of Daniel 'is complete in itself,' than it would be to say that a map which was designed to show the relation of Massachusetts to the United States, referred to nothing but Massachusetts. It is no more complete in itself than a bond given in security for a note, or some other document to which it refers, is complete in itself; and we doubt if there is a school-boy of fourteen in the land, of ordinary capacity, who would not on reading the ninth chapter, with an understanding of the clause before us, decide that it referred to something distinct from itself, called the vision. What vision it is, there is no difficulty in determining. It naturally and obviously refers to the vision which was not fully explained to Daniel, and to which Gabriel calls his attention in the preceding verse—the vision of the eighth chapter. Daniel tells us that Gabriel was commanded to make him understand that vision (8:16). This was not fully done at that interview connected with the vision; he is therefore sent to give Daniel the needed 'skill and understanding,' to explain its 'meaning' by communicating to him the prediction of the seventy weeks."—Advent Shield, 1844.

"We claim that the ninth of Daniel is an appendix to the eighth, and that the seventy weeks and the 2300 days or years commence together. Our opponents deny this."—Signs of the Times, 1843.

"The grand principle involved in the interpretation of the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14, is that the seventy weeks of Dan. 9, 24, are the first 490 days of the 2300 of the eighth chapter."—Advent Shield, p. 49.

"If the connection between the seventy weeks of Dan. 9, and the 2300 days of Dan. 8, does not exist, the whole system is shaken to its foundation; if it does exist, as we suppose, the system must stand."—Harmony of Prophecy Chronology, p. 33.

Says the learned Dr. Hales, in commenting upon the seventy weeks, "This chronologic prophecy was evidently designed to explain the foregoing vision, especially in its chronologic part of the 2300 days."

What more need be said? The arguments which show the seventy weeks to be a part of the 2300 days, are all invulnerable. We may consider this question decided, and hereafter appeal to this decision as authoritative.

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Eighth Paper.—The Seventy Weeks.

It has now been proved, 1. That there is the clearest connection between the 8th and 9th chapters of Daniel. 2. That the seventy weeks are consequently a part of the 2300 days. 3. That these weeks are cut off from those days. 4. That the seventy weeks are the first 490 days of the 2300 days. 5. That, consequently, where the seventy weeks begin, there the 2300 days begin.

Respecting the time, therefore, we have now only to inquire further, From what point are the seventy weeks to be reckoned? The data which the Bible furnishes on this point are found in the further instruction which the angel gave to Daniel in chapter 9. After informing him that seventy weeks were cut off from the 2300 days, and allotted to his people and the city of Jerusalem, he proceeds immediately to tell him in the following language where they begin, and what events would mark their termination:—

“Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore

and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks; the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times. And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself; and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week; and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate.” Dan. 9: 25-27.

From this testimony respecting the seventy weeks we learn, 1. That a commandment to restore and build Jerusalem marks their beginning. 2. That seven weeks or 49 years were allotted to the work of restoration. 3. That sixty-nine weeks or 483 years would span the interval to the time when the Messiah the Prince should appear upon the earth, or when our Lord should commence his public ministry here among men. 4. That during the last or seventieth week, the Messiah should confirm the covenant (the new covenant) with many. 5. That in the midst or middle of that last week, he should be cut off, and cease the sacrifice and oblation to cease; expressions which must be considered as referring to his crucifixion, and the effect which his thus offering himself upon the cross would have upon the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies, in causing them virtually to cease. When the seventy weeks, therefore, are correctly located, we shall find the seventieth week falling at such a time that the commencement of Christ's ministry will stand at the beginning, and his crucifixion, three and a half years later, in the middle, of that last week. The whole question might therefore be left to an argument on the date of the crucifixion of Christ, since this has as much bearing upon the point at issue as even the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem from which this period is to be dated.

But it is not difficult to find the commandment to restore Jerusalem, and to ascertain that it went forth at the precise time to render the prophecy harmonious in all its parts.

There are four events which have by different ones at different times been regarded as the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. These are, 1. The decree of Cyrus for the rebuilding of the house of God, a. c. 538. Ez. 1: 1-4. 2. The decree of Darius for the prosecution of that work which had been hindered, a. c. 519. Ez. 6: 6-12. 3. The decree of Artaxerxes Longimanus to Ezra, a. c. 457, Ez. 7. And 4. The commission to Nehemiah, from the same king in his twentieth year, a. c. 444. Neh. 2.

1. Respecting this last, we find no feature about it necessary to constitute it a Persian decree. It was essential that such decrees should be put in writing, and signed by the king. Nehemiah had nothing of the kind. His commission was only verbal. If it be said that the letters granted him constituted a decree, then the decree was issued not to Nehemiah, but to the governors beyond the river; and moreover these would constitute a plurality of decrees, not one decree as the prophecy contemplates.

2. The occasion of Nehemiah's petition to the king for permission to go up to Jerusalem was the report which certain ones, returning, had brought from thence, that those in the province were in great affliction and reproach, that the wall of Jerusalem was also broken down, and the gates thereof burned with fire. Neh. 1. What wall and gates were those that were broken down and burned with fire? Evidently some which had been built by the Jews who had returned to Jerusalem under one, or all, of the preceding decrees, of Cyrus, Darius and Artaxerxes; for it cannot for a moment be supposed that the utter destruction of the city by Nebuchadnezzar, 144 years previous to that time, would have been reported to Nehemiah as a matter of news, or that he would have considered it as he evidently did, a fresh misfortune, calling for a fresh expression of his grief. A decree, therefore, authorizing the building of these had gone forth previous to the grant to Nehemiah.

3. Should any contend that the commission to Nehemiah must be the decree in question, because the object of his request was that he might build the city, it is sufficient to reply as above, that gates and walls had been built previous to his going up; besides, the work of building which he went to perform was accomplished in fifty-two days; whereas the prophecy allows for the building of the city, seven weeks, or forty-nine years.

4. There was nothing granted to Nehemiah, not embraced in preceding decrees, while those decrees had already granted vastly more privileges than his commission.

5. Reckoning from the commission to Nehemiah, a. c. 444, the dates throughout are entirely disarranged; for from that point the troublous times which were to attend the building of the street and wall, did not last seven weeks or forty-nine years. Reckoning from that date, the sixty-nine weeks or 483 years which were to extend only to the Messiah the Prince, bring us to a. d. 39-40; but Jesus was baptized of John in Jordan, and the voice of his Father was heard from Heaven declaring him his Son, in a. d. 27, thirteen years before. According to this calculation, the midst of the last, or seventieth, week, which was to be marked by the crucifixion, is placed in a. d. 44; but the crucifixion took place in a. d. 31, thirteen years previous. And lastly, the seventy weeks or 490 years, dating from the 20th of Artaxerxes, extend to a. d. 47, with absolutely nothing to mark their termination. Hence, if that be the year, and the grant to Nehemiah the event, from which to reckon, the prophecy has proved a failure. But such a conclusion is simply an overwhelming proof that that theory which dates the seventy weeks from the commission to Nehemiah in the 20th of Artaxerxes, is an utter failure.

We may therefore dismiss this commission, and this date, from consideration. The question now lies between the decrees of Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes. Which one, if only one, and how many, if more than one, of these did it take to make that decree to which the prophecy is to be the starting point of the seventy weeks -

U. S.

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth; Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 2, 1876.

JAMES WHITE,
J. N. ANDREWS,
UBIAH SMITH, } . . . EDITORS.

THE SANCTUARY.

Ninth Paper.—The Commandment to Restore and Build Jerusalem.

As noticed last week, we must look to one, or all, of the decrees issued by Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes, for the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. And the selection must be determined largely by a consideration of how much is embraced in the prophecy respecting the restoration of this city.

The promise embraced the restoration as well as the rebuilding of Jerusalem. To restore and build, is more than simply to build. The rebuilding of its demolished palaces, the re-opening of its deserted streets, the re-erection of its leveled walls, and the setting up again of its broken gates, would not alone meet the provisions of the prophecy. There must be the forms and privileges of religious worship, the regulations of society, judges to interpret, and officers to execute, the laws, and the re-establishment of that civil polity which made Jerusalem what she was before her fall.

The decree of Cyrus standing nearest to the prophecy respecting the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, naturally first engages our attention.

Some have claimed that this decree of Cyrus must be the commandment in question, because God by the prophet Isaiah speaks of Cyrus as the one who should say to Jerusalem, "Thou shalt be built." Isa. 44:28. But there are three conclusive objections to this view: 1. It is not Cyrus who, in the prophecy of Isaiah, says to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; but the Lord is the one who says this. See verses 26 and 27. 2. The decree of Cyrus pertained simply to the temple at Jerusalem: See Ez. 1:2. It did not even make provision for the building of the city, much less for those other provisions, which, as we have seen, must have been included in the prophecy. 3. From the date of this decree, A. C. 536, the sixty-nine weeks, or 483 years which were to extend to the Messiah the Prince, fall 63 years short of reaching even to the birth of Christ. An effort has consequently been made by those who take the decree of Cyrus to be the commandment in question, to change the date of that decree, placing it at a point late enough to harmonize with the prophecy respecting the Messiah. But this cannot be done, as we shall hereafter see.

By these remarks we do not design in the least to rob the decree of Cyrus of any measure of its importance. It occupies a prominent place in connection with the history of Jerusalem's restoration. The work which Cyrus did was given him of the Lord to do. He was called by name over a hundred years before his birth, and his work in a measure at least pointed out. And that which his decree granted was one of the first steps, and a very necessary step in the work of restoration; but its provisions were too limited to meet the specifications of the prophecy. Some things, to be sure, would follow as a necessary consequence, such as the building of houses for the workmen, the opening of worship, and the carrying on of some necessary traffic. But the decree did not provide for them.

The decree of Darius stands next in order. It was occasioned by the following circumstances: The next year after the Jews had commenced the work under the decree of Cyrus, the enemies of the Jews made request that they be permitted to join them in the work. This the Jews refused, whereupon their enemies set themselves to work to trouble them in their building and to frustrate them in their purposes, "all the days of Cyrus, . . . even until the reign of Darius, king of Persia." Ez. 4.

Seven years after issuing his decree, Cyrus died, and was succeeded by Cambyses, called in Ez. 4:6, Achaemenus, who reigned seven years and five months, and who was in turn succeeded by Smerdis the Magian, called in Ez. 4:7, Artaxerxes, from whom the enemies of the Jews obtained an edict prohibiting the further prosecution of the work at Jerusalem. Ez. 4:21-24. But the land being smitten with barrenness, the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, having made known to the Jews the cause of this calamity, exhorted them to resume the work of building the house of God, which they accordingly commenced again A. C. 520.

Again their enemies endeavored to hinder and stop them, and appealing to Darius who had now come to the Persian throne, he caused search to be made among the chronicles of the kingdom, and finding the decree of Cyrus, re-affirmed it, with some provisions of his own; and thus the work went forward prosperously again.

Here was a second decree. It was however only seventeen years from the decree of Cyrus, and therefore does not meet the prophecy any better than the former, in the matter of dates. And further, it was but a reaffirmation of the decree of Cyrus, and was therefore too limited in its provisions to constitute the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. But it was a second step in the work, and, adding somewhat to the decree of Cyrus, was some advancement toward the end in view.

Third and last stands the decree of Artaxerxes Longimanus, as recorded in Ez. 7. This Artaxerxes was the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther, which will account for the remarkable favor he showed to the Jewish people. The decree which he issued was given to Ezra at the earnest solicitation of that man of God; for it is said that the king granted Ezra "all his request."

A mere perusal of this decree shows its full and ample provisions. It is drawn up in a formal manner. It is expressly called "a decree." It is written, not in Hebrew, but in Chaldaic or Eastern Aramaic. "Thus," says Prof. Whiting, "we are furnished with the original document, by virtue of which Ezra was authorized to 'restore and build Jerusalem;' or, in other words by which he was clothed with power, not merely to erect walls or houses, but to regulate the affairs of his countrymen in general, to 'set magistrates and judges which may judge all the people beyond the river.' He was commissioned to enforce the observance of the laws of his God, and to punish those who transgressed with death, banishment, confiscation or imprisonment. See verses 23-27."

No such ample powers as this decree conferred upon Ezra can be found in any previous or subsequent act of this kind. This, in connection with those which had been given before, contained all the provision that could possibly be made for any people who were still to be held tributary to the Persian throne. And we have in Ez. 6:14, a remarkable declaration showing that all three of these decrees are taken as the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem: "And they builded and finished it, according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to THE COMMANDMENT of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes, king of Persia." Here the decrees of these three several kings, are called "the commandment," singular number, according to which the work in Jerusalem was finished. When therefore this last decree went forth from Artaxerxes, enlarging and completing all the provisions that had been made before, then the work was finished; and with the provisions of that decree carried out, the commandment "went forth" in the sense of the prophecy.

We shall next show that this decree went forth a. c. 457, and then test its agreement with the remainder of the prophecy. U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Tenth Paper.—Date of the 70 weeks.

We have now seen what constituted the decree for the restoration and building of Jerusalem from which the seventy weeks were to be reckoned. It was the authority granted to the Jews to restore their temple, their worship, their city and their civil state, by the three-fold decree of the Persian kings, Cyrus, Darius and Artaxerxes. It was completed, and went forth, when the last touch of authority granted to Ezra by Artaxerxes Longimanus, was put into operation by Ezra, in carrying out the work which it gave him liberty to perform.

In what year was this?

Ezra says that it was in the seventh year of that king. Ez. 7:7, 8.

What year before Christ was the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus?

The following testimony is a concise and conclusive answer to this important question:—

"The Bible gives the data for a complete system of chronology, extending from the creation to the birth of Cyrus, a clearly ascertained date. From this period downward we have the undisputed Canon of Ptolemy, and the undoubted era of Nabonassar, extending below our vulgar era. At the point where inspired chronology leaves us, this Canon of undoubted accuracy commences. And thus the whole arch is spanned. It is by the Canon of Ptolemy that the great prophetic period of seventy weeks is fixed. This Canon places the seventh year of Artaxerxes in the year B. C. 457; and the accuracy of the Canon is demonstrated by the concurrent agreement of more than twenty eclipses. The seventy weeks date from the going forth of a decree respecting the restoration of Jerusalem. There were no decrees between the seventh and twentieth years of Artaxerxes. Four hundred and ninety years, beginning with the seventh, must commence in B. C. 457, and end in A. D. 34. Commencing in the twentieth, they must commence in B. C. 444, and end in A. D. 47. As no event occurred in A. D. 47 to mark their termination, we cannot reckon from the twentieth; we must, therefore, look to the seventh of Artaxerxes. This date we cannot change from B. C. 457 without first demonstrating the inaccuracy of Ptolemy's Canon. To do this, it would be necessary to show that the large number of eclipses by which its accuracy has been repeatedly demonstrated, have not been correctly computed; and such a result would unsettle every chronological date, and leave the settlement of epochs and the adjustment of eras entirely at the mercy of every dreamer, so that chronology would be of no more value than mere guess-work. As the seventy weeks must terminate in A. D. 34, unless the seventh of Artaxerxes is wrongly fixed, and as that cannot be changed without some evidence to that effect, we inquire, What evidence marked that termination? The time when the apostles turned to the Gentiles harmonizes with that date better than any other which has been named. And the crucifixion, in A. D. 31, in the midst of the last week, is sustained by a mass of testimony which cannot be easily invalidated."—Advent Herald, March 2, 1850.

Again the Herald says:—

"There are certain chronological points which have been settled as fixed; and before the seventy weeks can be made to terminate at a later period, those must be unsettled, by being shown to have been fixed on wrong principles; and a new date must be assigned for their commencement based on better principles. Now, that the commencement of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus was B. C. 464-3, is demonstrated by the agreement of above twenty eclipses, which have been repeatedly calculated, and have invariably been found to fall in the times specified. Before it can be shown that the commencement of his reign is wrongly fixed, it must first be shown that those eclipses have been wrongly calculated. This no one has done, or ever will venture to do. Consequently the commencement of his reign cannot be removed from that point."—Advent Herald, Feb. 15, 1857.

It will thus be seen that the date of the seventh year of Artaxerxes rests very largely upon the records of history respecting eclipses, and the testimony of astronomy as to the time when those eclipses occurred. Of the accuracy with which the dates of eclipses may be settled, Prof. Mitchell eloquently says:—

"Go back three thousand years—stand upon that mighty watch-tower, the temple of Belus, in old Babylon—and look out. The sun is sinking in eclipse, and great is the dismay of the terror-stricken inhabitants. We have the fact and circumstances recorded. But how shall we prove that record correct? The astronomer unravels the devious movements of the Sun, the earth, and the moon, through the whole period of three thousand years; with the power of intellect, he goes backward through the cycles of thirty long centuries, and announces that at such an hour and such a day—as the Chaldean has written—that eclipse did take place.

Respecting the authority of the canon of Ptolemy, Pridemur, Vol. i. p. 242 thus speaks:—

"But Ptolemy's canon being fixed by the eclipses, the truth of it may at any time be demonstrated by astronomical calculations, and no one hath ever calculated those eclipses but hath found them fall right in the times where placed; and therefore this being the surest guide which we have in the chronology, and it being also verified by its agreement everywhere with the Scriptures, it is not for the authority of any other human writing whatsoever, to be recorded from."

Thus positively do we find the date for which we seek. The seventh of Artaxerxes was B. C. 457. There the seventy weeks commenced.

From this point we drop the plummet down through following years to ascertain whether, measuring our lines according to the prophecy, we strike the events which the prediction brings to our view.

The first line is forty-nine years in length; for, says the prophecy, there shall be seven weeks (49 symbolic days, or 49 literal years), during which the street and wall shall be built in troublous times. Dan. 9:25. This brings us to the time when the work of building was completed; and this was finished in the last act of reformation under Nehemiah, in the fifteenth year of Darius Nothus.

Forty-nine years from B. C. 457, bring us to B. C. 408.

The fifteenth year of Darius Nothus was B. C. 408. Pridemur, Bliss, Hales.

Thus at our first testing point, the event answers to the prophecy, as the shadow answers to the face in the mirror. U. S.

The Review and Herald.

"Sincerely Ours through Thy Truth; Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 16, 1876.

JAMES WHITE,
J. M. ANDREWS,
ULIAN SMITH, } . . . EDITORS.

THE SANCTUARY.

Eleventh Paper.—Messianic Dates.

We have now found the event, and the date, from which the seventy weeks of Dan. 9, are to be reckoned; namely, the decree of Artaxerxes Longimanus to Ezra, which he issued in the 7th year of his reign, A. C. 457.

We have applied the first measuring line given in the prophecy, namely the 49 years which were to cover the building of the street and wall, even in troublous times, and found it to fall exactly upon the events specified. The work was finished in the 15th year of Darius Nothus A. C. 408; and there the 49 years terminated, reckoned from A. C. 457.

Three other events remain by which to test the application of this prophecy: 1. Sixty-nine weeks, or 483 years were to extend to the Messiah the Prince. 2. Sixty-nine and one-half weeks, or 483½ years were to extend to the cutting off of the Messiah; and 3. The seventy weeks, 490 years, were to extend to that point when the Jews should no longer be the peculiar people of God. If, reckoning from A. C. 457, we find the measurements to reach the events specified, the correctness of the application will be assured beyond the least shadow of uncertainty.

The word Messiah means "the anointed;" and the expression "to the Messiah the Prince," must point to the time when Christ was manifested to the world as the anointed of God. This was not at his birth, as some have imagined, but at his baptism, as is proved by Acts 10:38; 4:27; Luke 4:18, &c.

We have therefore to inquire (1) at what point, according to the foregoing dates the baptism of Christ should have occurred; (2) at what point it did occur; (3) to ascertain the length of Christ's ministry; (4) the date of the crucifixion; and (5) the time when the blessings of the gospel ceased to be especially offered to the Jews.

1. From some point in the year A. C. 457, the period of sixty-nine weeks or 483 years to the Messiah the Prince, would carry us to a corresponding point in the year A. D. 27. This is the answer to the first point of inquiry; and if the first date is correct, here we should find the baptism of the Saviour.

2. When Christ entered upon his mission, immediately after his baptism, he came into Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, "The time is fulfilled." Mark 1:14, 15. This must mark the fulfillment of some definite period, or it would not be asserted that "the time is fulfilled." The time here fulfilled can be none other than that given in Dan. 9:25: "Unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks," 483 years. We are therefore correct in saying that this is the period that reaches to his baptism. Can we now ascertain in what year his baptism occurred?

Christ was six months younger than John the Baptist, and is generally considered to have entered upon his ministry six months later; both of them commencing their work, according to the law of the priesthood, when they were thirty years of age. Of Christ, Luke says expressly that at the time of his baptism he began to be about thirty years of age. Luke 3:23. Now John entered upon his ministry as Luke informs us (3:1) in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar. Tiberius was the successor of Augustus who reigned to A. D. 14. The date of Augustus' death is indisputably fixed by means of the great lunar eclipse soon after, Sept. 27, which served to quell the mutiny of the Pannonian legions, and to induce them to swear fidelity to Tiberius, as recorded by Tacitus, Anal. 1:28, and Dio. lib. 57, p. 604. But the reign of Tiberius is to be reckoned, according to Pridaunx, Dr. Hales, Lardner, and others, from his elevation to the throne to reign jointly with Augustus his step-father, in August A. D. 12, two years before the death of the latter. The fifteenth year of Tiberius would therefore be from August A. D. 26 to August A. D. 27. If John commenced in the spring in the latter portion of the 15th year of Tiberius, it would bring the commencement of Christ's ministry in the autumn of A. D. 27, the very point where the 483 years of Dan. 9, expire.

3. The length of Christ's ministry. This may be quite accurately determined by enumerating the passovers which he attended. There were but four of these as recorded in John 2:13; 6:4; 6:4; and 13:1. At the last of these he was crucified. This would make the duration of his ministry three years and a half. Thus, if he commenced in the autumn of A. D. 27, he would preach six months before his first passover in the spring of 28. His second passover would be in the spring of 29, his third in the spring of 30, and his fourth in the spring of 31, when he was crucified.

This would correspond exactly to the prophecy; for he was to confirm the covenant with many for one week, seven years, and in the midst, or middle of the week, he was to be cut off, and cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease. This he did when he expired upon the cross, three and one half years from the commencement of his ministry; and during the remainder of the week he confirmed the covenant through his apostles. Heb. 2:3. Dr. Hales, vol. 1, p. 84, quotes Eusebius, A. D. 300, as saying: "It is recorded in history, that the whole time of our Saviour's teaching and working miracles was three years and a half, which is the half of a week [of years]. This John the evangelist will represent to those who critically attend to his gospel."

4. The date which this gives us for the crucifixion, A. D. 31, is confirmed by abundance of testimony. The crucifixion was attended by a preternatural darkening of the sun, for the space of three hours. Matt. 27:45. "A total eclipse of the moon may occasion a privation of her light for an hour and half, during her total immersion in the shadow; whereas a total eclipse of the sun can never last in any particular place above four minutes, when the moon is nearest to the earth and her shadow thickest."—Hales, Vol. I, p. 68.

This darkness was observed at Heliopolis in Egypt, by Dionysius the Areopagite, afterward the illustrious convert of Paul at Athens, Acts 17:34, who in a letter to the martyr Polycarp describes his own astonishment at the phenomenon, and that of his companion, the sophist Apollonides. "These, O good Dionysius," exclaimed Apollonides, "are the vicissitudes of divine events." To which Dionysius answered, "Either the Deity suffers or he sympathizes with the sufferer." And that sufferer, according to tradition, recorded by Michael Synkellos of Jerusalem, he declared to be, "The unknown God, for whose sufferings all nature was darkened and convulsed." Id. Vol. III, p. 230.

"Hence it appears that the darkness which 'overspread the whole land of Judea' at the time of our Lord's crucifixion was preternatural, 'from the sixth until the ninth hour,' or from noon till three in the afternoon, in its duration, as also in its time, about full moon, when the moon could not possibly eclipse the sun. The time it happened, and the fact itself, are recorded in a curious and valuable passage of a Roman Consul, Aurelius Cassiodorus Senator, about A. D. 514: 'In the consulate of Tiberius Caesar Aug. v. and Ælius Sejanus (O. C. 784, A. D. 31), our Lord Jesus Christ suffered, on the 8th of the Calends of April (25th of March): when there happened such an eclipse of the sun as was never before nor since.' In this year, and in this day agree also the Council of Caesarea, A. D. 196 or 198; the Alexandrian Chronicle, Maximus Monachus, Nicephorus Constantinus, Cedrenus; and in this year, but on different days, concur Eusebius, Epiphanius followed by Kepler, Bucher, Patinus and Peterius, some reckoning it the 10th of the Calends of April, others the 13th."—Id. Vol. I, pp. 69, 70.

The common Bible chronology placing the crucifixion in A. D. 33, was, according to Dr. Hales, assumed on no earlier authority than that of Roger Bacon, in the 13th century, who, finding by computation that the paschal full moon fell on Friday in the year 33, was led by that circumstance to suppose that that must have been the year of the crucifixion. But this very circumstance Dr. H. claims as proof that that was not the year; for the true paschal full moon should come not on the day of the crucifixion, but the day before when Christ ate the passover with his disciples. Id. p. 100.

We have thus thirteen creditable authorities locating the crucifixion in the spring of A. D. 31. And all the evidence on this point tends also to establish the date of Christ's baptism in the autumn of A. D. 27; for according to the prophecy the Messiah was to be cut off after three years and a half from the time of his manifestation; and, according to the evangelists, his ministry continued just that length of time, three years and a half. If, therefore, he was crucified in the spring of A. D. 31, he was baptized and commenced to preach three and a half years before, in the autumn of A. D. 27.

And right at that point the sixty-nine weeks ended, reckoned from B. C. 457, and in A. D. 31 we reached the middle of the last or seventieth week, where the Messiah was to be cut off, and cease the sacrifice and oblation (the Jewish sacrifices and offerings) to cease by the offering of himself as the great antitype of them all, upon the cross.

So far we find the most striking and indisputable harmony. We now go forward three and a half years to the terminal point of this grand prophetic period of seventy weeks, and inquire what then occurred. On this point we quote again from the learned Dr. Hales:—

"Eusebius dates the first half of the passion week of years as beginning with our Lord's baptism, and ending with his crucifixion. The same period precisely is recorded by Peter, as including the duration of our Lord's personal ministry: 'All the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of [or by] John, until the day that he was taken up from us,' at his ascension, which was only 43 days after the crucifixion. Acts 1:21, 22. And the remaining half of the passion week ended with the martyrdom of Stephen, in the seventh or last year of the week. For it is remarkable that the year after, A. D. 35, began a new era in the church, namely, the conversion of Saul, or Paul, the apostle, by the personal appearance of Christ to him on the road to Damascus, when he received his mission to the Gentiles, after the Jewish Sanhedrim had formally rejected Christ by persecuting his disciples. Acts 9:1-18." Vol. I, p. 100.

Thus at precisely the right point we find events which fitly mark the termination of that period which was allotted to Jerusalem and the Jews: Stephen is martyred, Paul is raised up an apostle to the Gentiles, the Jews formally reject Christ and the gospel in the persons of the first disciples, and the apostles turn from the Jews to other nations. Surely a fulfillment of prophecy so plain cannot be questioned.

And with these facts all established by the clearest evidence, and the dates of the prophecy all thus harmonized, we have in our hands the key which will draw every bolt, and give us free entrance into all departments of the larger prophecy and longer period of the 2300 days.

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twelfth Paper.—Closing Remarks on the Time.

From the points which have now been established, the way is short and clear to the end of the argument respecting the time.

If we have a period of ten years, in reference to the location of which we wish to inform our friends, we need not tell them where the whole period terminates to convey to them the desired information. It would be sufficient to say, "We will tell you all about the first five years of that period, where they begin and end, with intermediate dates and events." Then they could easily ascertain the termination of the whole period. After the first five years, five more would remain, and adding them to the date where there the five terminated, they would have the true date of the termination of the ten.

Just this course inspiration has followed with the 2300 days. It is as if the angel had said to Daniel, I have not come to give you the year in which the 2300 days will end; but a portion of this period belongs to your people and your holy city Jerusalem; and this period, comprising seventy weeks which are the first 490 years of the twenty-three hundred, I will tell you all about, giving you the time when they will commence, and the chief events which will mark intermediate dates, and finally their termination. And the angel well knew that he who had interest enough to inquire, could then easily find the termination of the whole period.

Thus four hundred and ninety years taken from twenty-three hundred, leave eighteen hundred and ten. Briefly expressed in figures it stands thus: $2300 - 490 = 1810$. And this number, eighteen hundred and ten, added to the date where the four hundred and ninety terminated, will give us the termination of the period of twenty-three hundred. But we have found that the four hundred and ninety ended in the autumn of A. D. 34. This gives us the following numerical statement: A. D. 34, autumn, $+1810 =$ A. D. 1844, autumn. In the autumn of A. D. 1844, we thus have the termination of the longest and most important prophetic period revealed in the Bible.

But some may fall into perplexity over the calculation of this period from another standpoint, and query how, if the 2300 days commenced A. C. 457, they can extend to A. D. 1844, since if we take 457 from 2300 we have only 1843 remaining. Did they not therefore terminate in 1843? So Adventists reasoned previous to that year; and this is the reason why that year was first set for the coming of the Lord. But further thought showed that they must extend into the following year. For it would take 457 full years before Christ, and 1843 full years after Christ, to make 2300. Therefore if the days commenced with the very first day of 457 A. C., they would not terminate till the very last day of 1843. But we have evidence to show that they did not commence with the first day of 457 A. C., but that some portion of that year had elapsed before we are to begin to reckon.

It is evident from the wording of the prophecy that the actual commencement of the work at Jerusalem marks the commencement of the seventy weeks, inasmuch as the first seven weeks are allotted to the building of the city, which we could hardly begin to reckon, consistently, before the work of building was actually begun. Now Ezra did not arrive at Jerusalem till the fifth month of that year. Ez. 7:6. Then the large company that went up with him were to be provided with homes, and arrangements made for their living, &c., before they would be ready to take hold of the work. Two months would certainly be short enough time to allow for this work, which would bring us to the seventh month, or the autumn of the year. Now whatever portion of the year A. C. 457 had elapsed before the 2300 days began, just that portion of a year we must add to 1843 A. D. to make out the 2300 full years; for if only 456 years and a fraction, are to be reckoned before Christ, we must have 1843 and a fraction after Christ to make out the number. Thus are we brought again to the autumn of 1844, as the point where the 2300 days terminated.

The same argument will apply to the date of Christ's baptism. How do we make that date to be A. D. 27, when 457 years before Christ and only 26 after Christ, make out the 483 years which were to reach to Messiah the Prince? In the same way as above presented. For if any portion of A. C. 457 had elapsed before we should begin to reckon, a corresponding portion of A. D. 27 must be taken to fill out the specified number of full years. And the events associated with this, in the prophecy of the seventy weeks, are such as to show conclusively that the days terminated in the autumn of the year. At the beginning of the seventieth week the Messiah was to be manifested, that is, commence his ministry as the Anointed One. In the midst, or middle, of that week, which would be three years and six months from its commencement, he was to be cut off. This cutting off can refer to nothing else but his crucifixion. But his crucifixion in whatever year it may have occurred, was in the spring; for it was at the passover. Then, as we go back from the crucifixion of Christ three years and six months to find the commencement of his ministry, we are brought to the autumn; and as we go forward from the crucifixion three years and six months, we are again brought to the autumn. But, as has already been shown, A. D. 31 has been established beyond dispute as the year of the crucifixion; and as this was the middle of the seventieth week, the last half of the week, three and a half years more, bring us to the autumn of A. D. 34. But if the first 490 years ended in the autumn of A. D. 34, the remaining 1810 years just as conclusively ended in the autumn of A. D. 1844.

We are thus particular upon this point, because this is the important one of all the prophetic periods; and it is desirable that all points in the argument should be clearly understood.

And what were some of the circumstances which rendered 1844 a memorable date in the history of the church and the world? We then reached, if we may so speak, the climax of the world's great prophetic era. Within the forty-six years preceding, five of the seven prominent prophetic periods of the Bible had terminated. The 1200 and 1200 years had ended in 1798, and marked the commencement of the "time of the end." The 391 years and 13 days of Rev. 9, had ended Aug. 11, 1840, and marked the departure of the Ottoman supremacy. The 1335 years had expired in 1843, and marked the manifestation of such a "blessing" as the disciples at Christ's first advent were themselves permitted to enjoy. Dan. 12:12; Matt. 13:16, 17. And now the great period of 2300 years was finished, which marked the commencement of the cleansing of the sanctuary.

God has never left his church without faithful watchmen, and in such an important epoch as the one we are considering, they would not be asleep. And they were not asleep. A warning message to the world, which commenced some years before, had now swelled into a mighty cry. A movement such as the world had never before witnessed, now reached the height of its power. The impending second advent of the Son of God, was the burden of the proclamation. Sublimar theme never engaged the attention of man. In different parts of the world, men simultaneously called of God to this work, were heralding it abroad. It went to every missionary station on the globe. Treasure was poured out like water in its promulgation. An army of able and devoted men, appeared, who freely gave their time, talent, and strength, to its vindication. The spirit of revival everywhere followed the proclamation of the message. God was in the movement; and Christendom was shaken from center to circumference.

What did all this mean? It meant that the first division of that three-fold warning which was to precede the coming of Christ was going forth. Rev. 14:6-12. It meant that the mighty angel standing on the sea and on the land had uttered his solemn oath that time (prophetic) should be no more; Rev. 10:6, for the time had come for the longest and latest prophetic period to meet its termination.

A grievous disappointment was experienced in that movement, and a mistake had somewhere been made, yet it becomes us not hastily nor rashly to decide in regard to the nature of that work. As was asked respecting the baptism of John, we ask respecting this movement: Was it of Heaven or of men? And the same difficulties are involved in the answer; If it was from Heaven, we cannot give it up; but how then can we account for the mistake connected with it, without compromising its Heavenly origin? But if it was of men, how shall we solve the still harder problem of accounting for the presence and power of God that so manifestly attended it?

Now if in 1840, 1843, and 1844, the last prophetic periods did end, that fact would be a sufficient reason why God's hand should be in the movement based upon that fulfillment of his word, even though we might have adopted wrong views in reference to the event to occur, as did the disciples of our Lord, when in fulfillment of his word, they escorted him into Jerusalem, as their immediately expected King, shouting, "Hosanna to the son of David: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Matt. 21:4-9.

With this view, therefore, that the prophetic periods did expire, but the mistake was in relation to the event, we are not obliged to repudiate and throw away that great work. We can give it its place in prophecy, and gratefully acknowledge the wonderful work of God connected with it.

But if we take the ground that the prophetic periods did not then expire, the whole work falls to the ground, as wholly false and unscriptural. For if the termination of the prophetic periods is yet future, another like movement is to transpire, and the one we have had was a counterfeit and a fraud. Then we must attribute to fanaticism that work which gave every evidence of being wrought by the Spirit of God, and admit that in this important age, marked as the time of the end, when the world is to be warned of coming Judgment, the most devoted and intelligent students of prophecy, and servants of Christ, were left to enter upon a false movement, and make an unpardonable mistake which was calculated to destroy the confidence of the world in all prophetic investigation.

We need not pursue this line of thought to any greater length. The evidence is now before the reader that the calculation of the time was correct; that Daniel 8 is an explanation of Daniel 9; that the seventy weeks are a part of the 2300 days; that they are correctly dated from B. C. 457, and that consequently the 2300 days terminated in 1844. With the utmost assurance we therefore say that those who endeavor to account for the disappointment of 1844 on the supposition that the mistake was made in the time, and not in the sanctuary question, are entirely wrong. u. s.

THE SANCTUARY. Thirteenth Paper.—The Original Advent Faith.

SEVENTH-DAY Adventists are sometimes charged with being a mere offshoot from the Advent body, followers of side issues and newly-created hobbies. We claim, and shall show, that we are the only ones who adhere to the original principles of interpretation, on which the whole Advent movement was founded, and that we are the only ones who are following out that movement to its logical results and conclusions.

The reader has seen something of the strength of the argument by which the original application of the prophetic periods is sustained. Those who have attempted to re-adjust those periods in order to extend them to some future point of time when Palestine or the earth should be purified by fire, have found themselves in an extremely embarrassing position. Their own confessions have proved this; and the reader will be interested to see some of them.

Jonah Litch, a prominent writer and laborer in the early stage of the Advent movement, spoke as follows in the Advent Herald of Dec. 28, 1850:—

"Chronologically, the period [2300 days] is at an end, according to the best light to be obtained on the subject; and where the discrepancy is I am unable to decide. But of this we shall know more in due time.

"God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain."

The Advent Herald, seeing the utter inconsistency of denying the termination of the 2300 days in the past, while at the same time it was setting forth unanswerable arguments in vindication of the original date for the commencement of the period, as it long continued to do, in connection with the seventy weeks, it at last denied the connection between the seventy weeks and the twenty-three hundred days, and thus cast this latter period adrift upon the prophetic sea. This appears from the following queries by a correspondent, and the answers of the then editor of the Herald, inclosed in brackets, which appeared in the Herald of May 22, 1852:—

"In your 'chronology' the cross is placed in A. D. 31. What are the principal objections which bear against its being placed in A. D. 39? [Ans. 1. The absence of any evidence placing it there. 2. The contradiction of the wonderful astronomical, chronological, and historical coincidences which show beyond the shadow of controversy that the seventh of Artaxerxes was in B. C. 457-8, that the birth of Christ was A. D. 4-5, that the thirtieth year of Christ was 483 years from the seventh of Artaxerxes, that the crucifixion was in A. D. 31, and that that was the point of time in the last week, when the sacrifice and oblation should cease.]

"If the seventy weeks of Dan. 9 do not commence in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, how can the 2300 days begin at the same time with them, and yet terminate in the future? [Ans. They cannot.] Must we not henceforth consider that they have different starting points? [Ans. Yes.]"

To understand how serious a departure this was from the "original Advent faith," the reader should bear in mind the following statements which under the significant heading of "Points of Difference between Us and our Opponents," once formed a standing notice in the Advent Papers:—

"We claim that the ninth of Daniel is an appendix to the eighth, and that the seventy weeks and the 2300 days or years commence together. Our opponents deny this."—Signs of the Times, 1843.

Who now deny this? All who call themselves Adventists, so far as we know except the Seventh-day Adventists. And in what position do they place themselves by this denial? In the position of those who were originally the opponents of the Advent faith. Gone over to the side of their opponents, and yet claiming to be the adherents of the original Advent faith!

The declaration above quoted is as good for us to-day as it was for the Signs of the Times in 1843. It still lies from our meat head.

"We claim that the ninth of Daniel is an appendix to the eighth, and that the seventy weeks and 2300 days or years commence together. Our opponents [apostatized Adventists] deny this."

Who, then, are the original Adventists?

Again, to show the importance which was formerly attached to this matter, we quote from the Advent Shield, p. 49, Art. The Rise and Progress of Adventism:—

"The grand principle involved in the interpretation of the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14, is, that the 70 weeks of Dan. 9:24, are the first 490 days of the 2300, of the eighth chapter."

Those who have yielded this point, have therefore given up the "grand principle involved in the interpretation of the 2300 days." If to do this and go over to the position of "our [their] opponents," is not a serious defection from the original Advent faith, we greatly err.

The following well-founded opinion was expressed by Apollon Hale in 1846:—

"The second point to be settled, in explaining the text [Dan. 9:24], is to show what vision it is which the 70 weeks are said to seal. And it should be understood this involves one of the great questions which constitute the main pillars in our system of interpretation, so far as prophetic times are concerned. If the connection between the 70 weeks of Dan. 9, and the 2300 days of Dan. 8, does not exist, the whole system is shaken to its foundation; if it does exist, as we suppose, the system must stand."—Harmony of Prophetic Chronology, page 33.

Mark this language. The connection between Daniel 8 and 9 constitutes one of the "main pillars" of our system of interpretation. If it does not exist the whole system is shaken to its foundation. If it does exist, the system must stand. We rejoice in the fact to-day that this connection does exist, and the system stands.

And now, what are the reasons offered for taking a position which denies one of the main pillars of this system of interpretation, and shakes its very foundation! Simply this: -

"We have no new light respecting the connection between the 70 weeks and 2300 days. The self-argument against their connection in the passing of the time. Why that has passed, is a mystery to us; which we wait to have revealed."—Advent Herald, Sept. 7, 1866.

The same paper, in its issue of Feb. 22, 1861, further said:

"Before 1900, we became satisfied of the validity of the arguments sustaining their connection and simultaneous commencement. There has nothing happened to weaken the force of those arguments but the passing of the time we expected for their termination. We now have no other clue to advance against that connection; and, therefore, can only wait for the mystery of the passing of time to be explained. But of the commencement and termination of the 70 weeks, we are satisfied that they cannot be removed from the position which Protestants have always ascribed them."

Before such a matter of course surrender was made of the strongest evidences and clearest proofs that can be drawn from the word of God on any subject, we submit to the reader if it would not have been more logical to inquire whether there might not possibly be some mistake in the view that the earth is the sanctuary, and that the planting of the sanctuary is to be by fire at the second coming of Christ; whether the day may not have ended, and the work to which they brought us, whatever it is, be now in process of fulfillment. S. D. Adventists, before rejecting the past movement, raised this inquiry, and the result has repaid our researches a thousand fold, as will hereafter appear.

And how do those who disconnect the 70 weeks and 2300 days, dispose of this latter period; for something must be done with it? They attempt to date it from the point at which Daniel says the ram pushing westward and northward and northward so that no beast might stand before him; and that pushing they make to be the decree issued against the Jews, as recorded in the Book of Esther. As the result of the pushing in the prophecy, no beast could stand before him. This view therefore makes the Jews to be the beasts. But how did this matter come out? A counter decree was issued; fear of the Jews fell upon all the people; many joined themselves to them; and when the day of slaughter came, no man could withstand the Jews. Esth. 9:2. They smote all their enemies. Verse 5. Seventy and five thousand persons fell before them; and it was to them a day of triumph and joy. This, fourthly, with the ram pushing and doing according to his will, and becoming "great," so that none could deliver out of his hand. To such absurdities are men driven in trying to avoid the plain and evident conclusion to be derived from God's word. These men should seriously argue in this manner: is one of those strange phenom-ens that sometimes appear in the workings of the human mind.

But if time has demonstrated that these days are in the past, it has also demonstrated that the earth is not the sanctuary, the very point claimed by those who offer this fact as the explanation of our disappointment in 1844; there is no change has come over the earth since, physically, increasing signs of infirmity and old age, and, morally, a deeper plunge in wickedness and sin, on the part of its fast-generating sons and daughters. The conclusion that the earth is the sanctuary, being demonstrated to be incorrect, the inquiry, What is the Sanctuary? is now fairly in hand, and pre-emptorily demands an answer. U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Fourteenth Paper.—What Is the Sanctuary?

THIS is exclusively a Bible question. With the testimony of the Bible only, then, have we to do. The object of our inquiry can only be, What does the Bible reveal to us respecting the sanctuary? And we shall find its testimony neither brief nor obscure on this important subject. The word occurs in the inspired Scriptures one hundred and forty-six times; and more times than this does it offer us instruction by prediction, definition, or historic record, concerning this wonderful object.

Perhaps no language can better introduce this subject than that of the apostle Paul in his letter to the Hebrews. In chap. 8, he contrasts the two covenants, the first and the second, the old and the new, under the latter of which we now live. In chap. 9, he then speaks as follows:—

"Then verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary. For there was a tabernacle made; the first wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the show-bread; which is called the sanctuary; and after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all; which had the golden altar, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant; and over it the cherubims of glory, shadowing the mercy-seat," &c. Verses 1-5.

Let this language of the apostle be carefully considered. It both introduces and settles one great division of this question. It tells us definitely what, for a time, constituted the sanctuary of the Lord. During the period covered by the first covenant, while the tabernacle, or dained as thus plainly described, was in existence, there can be, in the face of these words of Paul, no controversy as to what constituted the sanctuary. Turning to the records of those times, we find a more definite mention of this singular structure, which, from its bearings and relations in the temple of divine truth, deserves to be examined with absorbing interest.

Go back to the time when Israel, crowned with deliverance, stood on the shore of the Red Sea, while the Egyptians were perishing at their feet in the returning and angry waters. Listen to that song of triumph which Moses sings, and mark this language, "The Lord is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation; he is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation." Ex. 15:2. In this we receive the first intimation of that building that was afterward to be erected by the direction of the Lord, that he might dwell among his people. In verse 17 of the same chapter, is the first occurrence of the word sanctuary which we find in the Bible.

Pursuing the sacred record, we find in the twenty-fifth chapter of Exodus, and onward, more definite information respecting the sanctuary. Here we read the commission which God gave to Moses for the erection of this building. In the third month after their departure from Egypt, the children of Israel came to the wilderness of Sinai. There Moses was summoned up into the mount, to an audience with his Maker. Forty days and nights were consumed in that memorable interview. During this time Moses was shown the pattern of the sanctuary, and all the sacred vessels, and received full instructions in relation thereto.

Into a particular description of the tabernacle, as erected by Moses, we need not here enter. It is minutely set forth in Exodus, chapters 25-31. Suffice it to say that it was a structure of extraordinary magnificence, formed of upright boards overlaid with gold. It was thirty cubits in length, about ten in width, and ten in height. At the east end, which was the entrance, there were five pillars of shittim wood, overlaid with gold, having hooks of gold and sockets of brass. Over the tabernacle, thus erected, were thrown four different coverings. The first and inner covering was composed of fine linen, embroidered with figures of cherubim in blue, purple, and scarlet. By this would be formed a ceiling of surpassing beauty and magnificence. The second covering was made of goats' hair; the third of rams' skins dyed red; and the fourth and last of badgers' skins. A richly embroidered curtain suspended from the five pillars overlaid with gold, that stood at the entrance upon the east, formed the door of the tabernacle.

The sacred tent was divided into two apartments by means of a veil suspended from four pillars of shittim wood, overlaid with gold, set in sockets of silver. In what proportion the sanctuary was thus divided we are not informed; but it was undoubtedly the same that was afterward observed in the temple, 1 Kings 6, in which two-thirds of the space was allotted to the first apartment, and the remaining one-third to the second.

In the first apartment or holy place were three things worthy of notice: the golden candlestick, the table of show-bread, and the altar of incense. The candlestick was of solid gold, the table of show-bread and the altar of incense, of shittim wood, but overlaid throughout with pure gold. In the second apartment, or most holy place, were also three things to claim attention: the ark, the mercy-seat, and the cherubim. The ark was a chest of shittim wood, two cubits and a half in length, a cubit and a half in breadth, and the same in height. It was overlaid within and without with pure gold. The mercy-seat was the cover of the ark, of solid gold, and the cherubim were likewise of pure gold, on either end of the mercy-seat. It was above the ark, over the mercy-seat between the cherubim, that God manifested his presence, and from whence he communicated with his people. Ex. 25:22. And so David says, "Thou that dwellest between the cherubim, shine forth." Ps. 80:1.

THE SANCTUARY.

Fifteenth Paper.—What Is the Sanctuary?

It will be observed that neither the holy nor most holy place, had any window; hence in the first apartment there was need of the candlestick with its seven lamps; and in regard to the second, where God dwelt, Solomon said, "The Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness." 1 Kings 8:12.

How impressive must have been the scene presented by the interior of this building. There were its walls, having all the appearance of massive and solid gold, and reflecting in a thousand directions the light of the seven lamps of the golden candlestick; there were the table of show-bread and altar of incense, glittering in its light like burnished gold; and there was the curtain that formed the gorgeous ceiling, with its mystic figures of cherubim in blue, and purple, and scarlet, adding its beauty to the brilliant scene. While in, beyond the second veil, was the glorious Shakinah, or visible manifestation of God's glory, into the awful presence of which, except the high priest's entrance once every year, no man could venture and live.

Before the door of the tabernacle were placed the brazen laver, and the altar of burnt offering, and around the whole was erected the court with its curtains of fine twined linen.

In the second year after Israel had departed from Egypt, in the first month, on the first day of the month, the tabernacle was reared up. And Moses spread abroad the tent over the tabernacle, and he put the testimony (the tables of the ten commandments) into the ark, and the mercy-seat upon it, and brought it into the tabernacle, and set up the veil; he placed the table of show-bread and golden candlestick in in the first apartment, and lighted the lamps before the Lord; he put the golden altar of incense before the veil, and burnt sweet incense thereon; and on the altar, before the door of the tabernacle, he offered the burnt offering and the meat offering as the Lord commanded. Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. Ex. 40. He had now taken possession of his dwelling place, in the midst of his people.

We have now before us the sanctuary as Moses erected it in the wilderness of Sinai, 1490 years before Christ. With its ark of the covenant, its mercy-seat, and its glorious Shakinah, it constituted the heart and center of Israel's religious worship, under that typical system.

The children of Israel being at this time in the period of their wanderings, the sanctuary as first given to them was adapted to their condition. It was so constructed that it could be easily taken down and borne with them in their journeys, and immediately erected wherever the divine presence, which accompanied them in a cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night, should direct them to pitch their camp. Num. 9:15-23.

The Levites were consecrated to the service of the sanctuary, and were commanded to bear it, and all its sacred vessels, when the camp set forward. Thus it was with them during the forty years in which they journeyed in the wilderness. During this time, this building which God claimed as his dwelling place, and where his service was performed, is fifty-six times called the sanctuary, in the following instances: Ex. 25:8; 30:13, 24; 38:1, 3, 4, 6; 38:24-27; Lev. 4:6; 5:15; 10:4; 12:4; 16:33; 19:30; 20:3; 21:12 (twice), 23 (plural); 26:2; 27:3, 23; Num. 3:28, 31, 32, 38, 47, 50; 4:12, 15 (twice), 16; 7:9, 13, 19, 25, 31, 37, 43, 49, 55, 61, 67, 73, 79, 85, 86; 8:19; 10:21; 18:1, 3, 5, 16; 19:20.

U. A.

THE SANCTUARY.

Sixteenth Paper.—Points of History.

THE object we now have before us, the tabernacle built by Moses, is one of exceeding interest. Its erection marks one of the most important epochs in the religious history of the world. Like the full orb'd moon, shining with a light borrowed from a central sun, a new dispensation was now rising upon the world to reflect the glory of the coming ministration of the Messiah. A people long schooled in the furnace of Egyptian servitude, were now brought forth amid such displays of God's consuming judgment, and overwhelming power, as were fitting to his purpose and to that occasion. Such a migration of an entire nation from one land to another the world had never seen. With that people God purposed to maintain henceforth a visible symbol of his presence; and this purpose called for the erection of a suitable dwelling-place. Of this he gave to Moses a pattern throughout, and calling Bezaleel and Aholiab endowed them with heavenly wisdom for their sacred work.

This marvelous structure, the tabernacle, was the result, with its gold plated walls, its gold covered furniture, its wonderfully embroidered curtains, its holy places, and its solemn service.

In the center of that vast camp of more than three millions of souls that tabernacle was set up, and over it stood in towering majesty the pillar of cloud, a shade and refreshment by day, but glowing like a blaze of fire, the light and glory of the camp by night, to govern and guide and guard that living multitude.

In and around this tabernacle, the Lord met with his people. There he told Moses he would commune with him. Ex. 25:22. There the Spirit came upon the seventy elders and they prophesied. Num. 11:24, 25. Thither Aaron and Miriam are called out, when they rebel against the servant of the Lord. Num. 12:4. There the glory of the Lord appears after the unfaithfulness of the twelve spies. Num. 14:10, and the rebellion of Korah and his company, 16:19, 42; and the sin of Meribah, 20:6. Thither, when there was no sin to punish, but a difficulty to be met, the daughters of Zelophehad came to bring their cause before the Lord. Num. 27:2. And there, when the death of Moses drew near, the solemn charge was given to his successor. Deut. 31:14.

For all these reasons, this structure is an object of surpassing interest, and entitled to our careful consideration; but chiefly for this, because Paul says plainly that this was the Sanctuary of that first covenant which immediately preceded and ushered in the present. It will be worth our while, therefore, to notice further the important place it held in that dispensation by looking at some of the chief features of its history.

According to the commonly-received chronology, the sanctuary made its entrance into the promised land on the 10th day of the first month, a. c. 1451. Up to this time, neither the children of Israel nor the sanctuary, had had any long continued abiding place. But now as the former enter upon their promised inheritance, the latter begins to be more permanently located.

The first encampment, after the passage of the Jordan, was in Gilgal. Josh. 4:19. Here it abode seven years, and was then removed to Shiloh, according to God's promise that he would choose the place of its location. Josh. 9:27; 18:1. Shiloh was about 15 miles north from Jerusalem, and nearly in the center of the whole land. Here, according to our Bible chronology, it remained from a. c. 1444, to a. c. 1141, a period of 303 years. But Paul makes the time still longer; for he says that after the dividing of the land by lot, God gave them judges about the space of 450 years until Samuel the prophet. And it was not till after the call of Samuel the prophet that the ark was removed from its place by the infatuated and backslidden Israelites, and in the disastrous campaign which it was meant to redeem, fell into the hands of the Philistines.

This instructive episode in the history of the sanctuary demands a passing notice. In the long period of the continuance of the sanctuary at Shiloh, Israel had greatly apostatized from God. In the yearly feast and solemn dances, Judges 21:19, 21, the religion of Israel had sunk far toward the orgies of heathenism.

Troops of women, shameless as those of Midian, assembling at the tabernacle as the worshippers of Jehovah, became the concubines of his priests. 1 Sam. 2:22, margin. "A state of things which was rapidly assimilating the worship of Jehovah to that of Ashteroth, or Mylitta, needed to be broken up." So God forsook his habitation, and raised up the Philistines to chastise his rebellious subjects into the right way again.

Israel unmindful of their only source of strength went boldly out to meet the enemy, but as any one might have foreseen, were routed before them. And now they were left to pursue a course which would show both to themselves and others how low they had fallen. They doubtless had learned how in former times their fathers had been beaten by their enemies when they took not the ark with them to battle, as in the case of the Canaanites, Num. 14:44, 45, and how they had succeeded with it around the walls of Jerico, and resolved that the ark should be brought forth, vainly supposing that that alone would preserve them, when the God of that ark had departed from them. Therefore in an evil hour the ark of the covenant of the Lord of hosts was carried forth by its adulterous priests, into the midst of a sinful and God-forsaken army. But God was not long in teaching them by sad experience that the ark was no safeguard against their enemies when their transgressions had cut them off from his strength. Smitten again before their enemies with great slaughter, they fled every man to his tent, the ark was taken, and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were slain.

Eli, the aged high priest, well-meaning but weak, so weak that he would suffer his sons to make themselves vile and restrain them not, so weak that he had permitted the ark to go forth under all these forbidding circumstances to battle, sat upon a seat by the wayside, anxiously waiting the result of the engagement; for "his heart trembled for the ark of God." A messenger soon returned in hot haste from the army, and in four brief sentences made known to him the sum of their misfortunes: 1. "Israel is fled before the Philistines." 2. "There hath been a great slaughter among the people." 3. "Thy two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, are dead." Did not this bring the climax of his grief? No. All this, sad as it was, he bore with comparative composure; for there was another object which held a higher place in his heart, and for which he was more solicitous even than for these; and that was the precious ark of God; was the ark safe? The dregs of this tale of bitterness were yet to come: 4. "AND THE ARK OF GOD IS TAKEN." And when this terrible report from the ark broke upon his ears, "he fell from off the seat backward by the side of the gate, and his neck brake, and he died." The ark of God was more deeply enshrined in the affections of this venerable but misguided man, than even the welfare of Israel or the fate of his two sons. In his anxiety for that he had overlooked all other calamities, but when his hopes in regard to this were crushed, and his worst fears realized, he could no longer endure the weight of such accumulated disasters. Nature yielded, and he found his own grave by the side of his sons whom he had failed to rule, and thus helped to precipitate this dire calamity upon all the country.

So dark was the cloud which Israel's wickedness had raised to obscure the sun of their prosperity. They were now dishonored in the sight of the heathen. The name of the Lord would be blasphemed. The loss of the ark showed that God had departed from them; and the destruction of their nation and the ruin of their religion must have been to them no distant prospects. The language in which they embodied the burden of their woe was this: "The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken." And when in after years, the Lord would make the people understand the utter destruction he threatened against Jerusalem for still unchecked wickedness, he had only to say, "I will do to this house, as I have done to Shiloh, and make this city a curse to all the nations of the earth." Jer. 7:14; 26:6.

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Seventeenth Paper.—Points of History.

How long the tabernacle remained in Shiloh, after the capture of the ark, we are not informed. But it does not appear that God's glory or the ark of his covenant, ever returned to that building. The tabernacle next appears in the sacred record, about seventy-nine years later, in the days of Saul, when we find it at Nob, 1 Sam. 21; Matt. 12:3, 4, a place about twelve miles west by north from Jerusalem. We again find it, twenty years later still, in the days of David and Solomon at Gibeon. 1 Chron. 16:39; 2 Chron. 1:3. This was about eight miles north from Jerusalem. Here it remained thirty-eight years till the building of the temple.

But where, during all this time was the ark of the covenant of the Lord? We left it at the battle of Ebenezer, where it was captured by the Philistines, and the lament went up that the glory had departed from Israel, for the ark of God was taken. Being essential to the tabernacle we must follow it till we find them together again.

The ark was retained in the land of the Philistines seven months. At Ashdod their god, Dagon, fell on two successive days before it, the second time his head and hands being severed, and nothing being left but the stump or fleshy part of the old idol. The priests of Dagon hurried it off to Gath; and from thence it was taken to Ekron; and both these cities were sorely smitten on account of its presence. "So," says the record, "they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philistines, and said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again to his place, that it slay us not and our people." 1 Sam. 5.

The providence of God was equally conspicuous in its return to the Israelitish people. To test the matter whether their calamities had been inflicted upon them by the hand of the God of Israel on account of the presence of the ark among them or not, the Philistines proposed that the ark with the golden trespass offerings should be put on a new cart, and that two cows, their calves being shut up at home, should be attached to the cart, and left to take their own course. If they went up toward the coasts of Israel, to Beth-shemesh, they would know that God had inflicted their evils upon them. But if the cows according to their nature should only seek their own home, they would know that it was only chance that had happened unto them.

It was done as they proposed; "and the kine took the straight way to the way of Beth-shemesh and went along the highway, lowing as they went." Then the Philistines knew that some-thing that had befallen them; and, filled with amazement, they followed on behind it even unto the border of Beth-shemesh.

"And they of Beth-shemesh were reaping their wheat harvest in the valley; and they lifted up their eyes and saw the ark, and rejoiced to see it." 1 Sam. 6:13. But for presuming to look into the ark, without any permission, and contrary to God's order that not one was to touch it, and only the Levites were to touch it, the men of Beth-shemesh were smitten. How many? Our common version reads, "fifty thousand and three score and ten men." But it is not probable that a small place like Beth-shemesh would have so many inhabitants, and by no means probable that so many would be engaged in wheat harvest even if we take into the account all the region round about. Josephus omits the fifty thousand altogether, retaining only the seventy. He (Antiq. Jud. lib. vi., cap. i., sec. 4.), "But the displeasure and wrath of God pursued them: that seventy men of the village of Beth-shemesh, approaching the ark, which they were not permitted to touch (not being priests), were struck by lightning." Dr. Clarke argues that the difficulty may be explained by supposing that in transcribing, a single letter was accidentally omitted, "the particle of comparison כִּי ke, as, or equal to, before the word שִׁבְעִים shib Shim: thus כִּי שִׁבְעִים kechamishshim. The passage would then read: 'And he smote of the people seventy men, equal to fifty thousand' that is, "they were elders or governors of the people." And this, Dr. C. argues, would account for the reading of Josephus "who in recital would naturally leave out such an explanation of the worth of the seventy men, as Roman readers could not easily comprehend such comparisons."

From Beth-shemesh the ark was removed to Kirjath-jearim, to the house of Ahinadab, where it abode twenty years. It was during this period that all Israel lamented after the Lord, 1 Sam. 7:2. Then David gathered together all the chosen men of Israel and went to bring up the ark from Kirjath-jearim to Jerusalem, the city of David, to the tent which he had there pitched for it. 2 Sam. 6:1, 2; 1 Chron. Chap. 13 and 16. But on account of Uzzah's putting forth his hand to steady it, and being slain for his rashness, he not being a priest, and hence having no right to touch it, David was afraid, and would not remove the ark of the Lord unto his house. He carried it to the house of Obed-edom, the Gittite. The ark continued three months; and the Lord blessed Obed-edom and all his household. As it was told king David saying, The Lord hath blessed the house of Obed-edom and all that pertaineth unto him, because of the ark of God. So David went and brought up the ark of God from the house of Obed-edom into the city of David with gladness. 2 Sam. 6:12. Here it remained in the tent which David had pitched for it, till the erection of the temple, where we are soon to find the ark and the sanctuary together again, and the worship of God resumed in greater impressiveness and glory.

T. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Eighteenth Paper.—Points of History.

It now pleased God that the sanctuary should take a more permanent form. All necessity for a movable structure, to be temporarily located in different places, had ceased to exist. The period of Israel's journeyings had long gone by. The period of the Judges, during which the affairs of Israel were often uncertain and the times troublous, though exceeding in duration more than four times the length of the existence of our own government, was at length ended. The tribes of Israel were consolidated into a new and powerful kingdom. Under David the Hebrew scepter established its broadest sway.

At length God gave him rest from all his enemies round about. 2 Sam. 7 and 8. Then came the house of God into his mind, and to the prophet Nathan, he thus spoke: "See now I dwell in an house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains." This doubtless refers to the tent which he had pitched for it in the city of David, of which the words of Uriah the Hittite, 2 Sam. 11:11, may also probably be understood.

The prophet approved of what was implied in the language of David, that he purposed to prepare a suitable structure for the permanent abiding place of the ark of God, and he said, "Go, do all that is in thine heart; for God is with thee." But the Lord the same night reversed the decision of the prophet, saying to the king that he could not build a house for him to dwell in; for he had been a man of war and had shed much blood. This was an important and a holy work. In this house the olive branch of peace was to be held out by Heaven to a rebellious world, and none but those whose lives had been passed in peace could be employed in its erection.

THE TEMPLE, LIKE THE TABERNACLE, BUILT AFTER A PATTERN.

Nevertheless to David was given by the Spirit of God, an accurate pattern of the temple, and all things pertaining thereto, just as Moses had received the pattern of the tabernacle in the wilderness of Sinai. This we find in 1 Chron. 28:11, and onward; and in verse 19, David says, "All this the Lord made me understand in writing by his hand upon me, even all the works of this pattern."

Besides thus receiving the pattern, it was permitted him to make also abundant preparation for the coming building. Its erection was committed to his son Solomon, and to him and the princes, David gave the following solemn charge concerning this work: "Now set you heart and your soul to seek the Lord your God; arise therefore, and build ye the sanctuary of the Lord God, to bring the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and the holy vessels of God, into the house that is to be built to the name of the Lord." 1 Chron. 22:19.

Again: 1 Chron. 28:10: "Take heed now; for the Lord hath chosen thee to build an house for the sanctuary: be strong and do it."

Mark, it was the sanctuary for which provision was thus carefully being made, the sanctuary, of which David had seen the pattern, for which he had made ready his material, and concerning which he gave this solemn charge.

The pattern is now furnished, and the material prepared. Where was this sanctuary located? The spot chosen was most significant. It was none other than the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebnite, 2 Chron. 21:14-18, where the angel of the Lord appeared to David, upon Mount Moriah, 2 Chron. 3:1, which was near to Mount Zion. Upon this spot Isaac had been offered eight hundred and sixty years before, and a lamb had been provided in his place. Gen. 22:1-14.

All questions being thus decided and all preparations made, the work commences. The sacred writer thus marks this important event: "And it came to pass in the four hundred and eightieth year after the children of Israel were come out of Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign over Israel, in the month Zif, which is the second month, that he began to build the house of the Lord." 1 Kings 6:1.

A question of chronology here demands solution. Paul in Acts 13:18-22, gives a far different reckoning of the time from the exodus to the building of the temple. He allows to the wilderness 40 years, the time given to the destruction of the seven nations of Canaan, usually computed as 6 years (see Bliss' Sacred Chronology), to the Judges 450 years, to the reign of Saul 40 years, to that of David 40 years, and to Solomon's fourth year, 3 years, making in all 679 years, and bringing the building of the temple in the 680th year from the exodus, instead of the 480th as in 1 Kings 6. It is not necessary to give the long and elaborate opinions of critics upon this matter. There being a difference of just one hundred years goes far to show that a mistake of just that measure of time has somewhere been made. This could not be made in the text of the Judges, nor in the discourse of Paul, where the period is drawn out in items, so easily as in 1 King 6, where it is expressed in a single statement. Hence it is the opinion of chronologists that the reading in Kings is not genuine; that the building of the temple was commenced in the fourth year of Solomon, as here and elsewhere stated, but that this was the 580th year from the exodus, instead of one hundred years earlier. See this question discussed at length in Barrett's Synopsis of Criticism, v. ii. part 2.

THE SANCTUARY.

Nineteenth Paper.—The Temple.

The intimate connection of the temple with its prototype, the tabernacle, is shown in the general arrangement and furniture of the building. Like the tabernacle it had its holy, and most holy, places. But these in all their dimensions, length, breadth, and height, were exactly double those of the tabernacle. Thus the most holy place was 20 cubits each way, instead of 10, and the holy place 20 by 40 cubits, instead of 10 by 20.

Besides these apartments, there was a porch of 10 cubits at the entrance, and surrounding chambers for the use of the priests, besides various courts and covered porches surrounding the whole. Altogether it covered a large area, and presented an imposing and magnificent appearance. Rising from its commanding height like a mountain of marble and gold, it stood before the world a monument of splendor more gorgeous and wonderful than men had ever looked upon before. The carving of the wall of the house with figures of cherubim; the overlaying of it with pure gold within and without the doors of olive trees adorned with carved work, and overlaid with gold fitted to the carvings with other innumerable and costly ornaments and embellishments, were accomplished at an expense, says Dr. Clarke, which it is impossible to estimate.

Two gigantic cherubim, of olive wood overlaid with gold, each 10 cubits high, were prepared for the most holy place, and put in position on either side of the spot upon which the ark was to rest. "And they stretched forth the wings of the cherubim, so that the wing of the one touched the one wall, and the wing of the other cherub touched the other wall, and their wings touched one another in the midst of the house."

Many of the vessels of the sanctuary were also enlarged and multiplied for the temple service. Ten golden candlesticks shed their light in the holy place, and ten tables bore the consecrated bread which was placed each Sabbath before the Lord. 2 Chron. 4:7, 8.

At the expiration of seven years and six months from the commencement of the work the building was completed, though the dedication did not take place till the following year the twelfth of Solomon's reign. Having all things prepared for this joyful occasion, Solomon assembled the elders of Israel, and all the heads of the tribes, the chief of the fathers of the children of Israel, that they might bring up before him the covenant of the Lord, out of the city of David, to its new abode. 1 Kings 8. As King Solomon, and all the congregation of Israel, that were assembled unto him, were with him before the ark, sacrificing sheep and oxen that could not be told nor numbered for multitude. What a procession was that!

They also brought up the tabernacle. The original tabernacle was left at Gibeon thirty-eight years before; and it is generally supposed that David had erected a new one for the ark when he brought it to his city. Which of these was brought into the temple? Some think both; but Dr. Clarke suggests what seems the more probable view that the original tabernacle was brought up from Gibeon, to be preserved in the temple as a relic, and the temporary one erected by David was destroyed.

What was in the ark? 1 Kings 8:9, says explicitly that there was nothing there save the tables of stone. Paul is supposed to say Heb. 9:4, that it contained also the golden vessels of manna and Aaron's rod. That these were originally laid up before the testimony is evident from Ex. 16:33, 34; Num. 17:10. We find no record that they were put into the ark with the tables of the law. Paul, in Heb. 9:3, speaks of the tabernacle, which is called the holiest of all; and the word wherein verse 4, is simply the relative pronoun, "which," which may refer to the tabernacle antecedent, instead of the ark. With this Paul's language would simply affirm that the most holy, or second apartment, were placed the golden censer, the pot of manna, Aaron's rod, the ark, and the tables of the covenant; the tables, though contained in the ark, being mentioned separately from the ark by way of emphasis.

The passage from Hebrews then bears similarity to that in 1 Kings 8:21, which reads "And I have set there a place for the ark wherein is the covenant of the Lord, which I made with our fathers, when he brought them out of the land of Egypt." In this passage the word, wherein, refers, as in Hebrew, to the place, not to the ark. In the ark was the covenant which he commanded, the ten commandments, but not the covenant which he made with the children of Israel, which was a new agreement between himself and them. It was written in a book, and placed in the side of the ark. Deut. 31:26.

And this leads us to consider what is meant by this expression, "In the side of the ark." Prieux has explained it so fully in his "Connection," Vol. i. p. 152, that we can do no better than to give his words:—

"As to the book, or volume of the law, it is commanded to be put mitzad i. e. on the side of the ark, those who interpret that word of the inside, place it within the ark, and those who interpret it of the outside, place it on the outside of it in a case or coffer made on purpose for it, and laid on the right side; meaning by the right side, that end of it which was on the right hand. And the last seems to be in the right as to this matter; for, first, The same word, mitzad, is made use of, where it is said, that the Philistines sent back the ark with an offering of jewels of gold put in a coffer by the side of it.

And there it is certain that word must be understood of the outside, and not of the inside. Secondly, the ark was not of capacity enough to hold the volume of the whole law of Moses, with the other things placed therein. Thirdly, The end of laying up the original volume of the law in the temple was, that it might be reserved there as the authentic copy, by which all others were to be corrected and set right; and, therefore, to answer this end, it must have been placed so as that access might be had thereto on all occasions requiring it; which could not have been done, if it had been put within the ark, and shut up there by the cover of the mercy-seat over it, which was not to be removed. And, fourthly, When Hilkiah, the high-priest, in the time of Josiah, found the copy of the law in the temple, there is nothing said of the ark; neither is it there spoken of, as taken from thence, but as found elsewhere in the temple. And, therefore, putting all this together, it seems plain that the volume of the law was not laid within the ark, but had a particular coffer or repository of its own, in which it was placed on the side of it. And the word mitnad, which answers to the Latin a latere, cannot truly bear any other meaning in the Hebrew language. And therefore the Chaldee paraphrase, which goes under the name of Jonathan Ben Uzziel, in paraphrasing on these words of Deuteronomy—"Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant," renders it thus, "Take the book of the law, and place it in a case or coffer, on the right side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God."

The ark was brought into its position in the most holy place between the wings of the cherubim, and thus again became connected with the sanctuary after a separation of 136 years. God approved of all that had been done, to suitably prepare for his worship as adapted to that time, and as he had taken possession of the first tabernacle, Ex. 40:34, so now he takes possession of this: "And it came to pass when the priests were come out of the holy place, that the cloud filled the house of the Lord, so that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of the Lord." 1 Kings 8:10, 11.

That was a day of joy in Israel. The thousands of offerings consuming upon the altars, the clouds of incense that rose above the temple, the sounds of the instruments of music, and the voice of the singers, the inimitable prayer of Solomon, the wisest of men, the glory of the new temple, the vast concourse of people, and above all, the crowning visitation of the shekinah, or visible glory of God, as he took possession of his dwelling, all conspired to render this

THE MOST IMPOSING RELIGIOUS SERVICE EVER PERFORMED IN THIS WORLD, EITHER BEFORE OR SINCE THAT TIME.*

Twenty-two thousand oxen and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep, constituted Solomon's peace offering. Besides this there were his meat offerings, his burnt offerings, and his drink-offerings, besides the offerings of the assembled multitudes. Fourteen days the King and all Israel kept a feast unto the Lord, and then the people returned to their homes, blessing the King, and glad of heart for all the goodness of the Lord.

During Israel's sojourn in the wilderness, the tabernacle, as we have seen, was fifty-six times called the sanctuary. From its entrance into the holy land, till its incorporation into the temple, it is nineteen times more called the sanctuary in the following passages:—

Joah. 24:20; 1 Chron. 9:20; 22:19; 24:5; 28:10; 2 Chron. 20:8; Ps. 20:2; 28:2, margin; 28:2, margin; 63:2; 68:24; 73:17; 77:13; 78:54, 69; 96:8, 9, margin; 134:2; 150:1.

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twentieth Paper.—Destruction of the Temple.

With the dedication of Solomon's temple the earthly sanctuary reached the summit of its glory. Its sacred vessels were perfect and complete. It contained the very ark which was made by Moses, under the express direction of Heaven; and that ark contained the very tables of stone, which had been written by Jehovah himself. The temple building was a structure of unsurpassed magnificence and glory, and there was nothing to hinder the Levitical worship from going forward in all its perfection.

It would be pleasant long to contemplate both the temple and the sanctuary in this prosperous condition; but the dark specter of sin with its inevitable train of judgments and calamities, soon appears upon the scene.

The temple was dedicated a. c. 1005. Thirty-four years after this, a. c. 971, Shishak, king of Egypt, having declared war with Rehoboam, took Jerusalem and carried away the treasures of the temple. 1 Kings 14:25, 26; 2 Chron. 12:9. But when the king humbled himself, thus turning from the sins which had brought down the judgments of God upon him, God turned from his wrath against him. Verse 12.

Jehoshaphat commenced the work of repairs a. c. 856. 2 Kings 12:4, 5. Ahaz, king of Judah, becoming involved in war with the kings of Israel and Damascus, robbed the temple to pay Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, whom he had summoned to his aid; 2 Chron. 28:21, 22; a. c. 740. Hezekiah, his son, in a measure repaired this loss, but was himself finally compelled to take all the riches of the temple to purchase peace from Sennacherib who had come against him. 2 Kings 18:14-16.

Manasseh, son and successor of Hezekiah, profaned the temple of the Lord, by setting up altars to all the host of heaven, even in the courts of the Lord, 2 Kings 21:4-7, for which God delivered him into the hands of the king of Babylon. He was loaded with chains and carried beyond the Euphrates; 2 Chron. 33:11; a. c. 677. But humbling himself and repenting of his sins, he was sent back to his own dominions, and labored to repair the profanations he had committed upon the house of the Lord. Verses 14-16.

Josiah, king of Judah, labored zealously to repair the edifices of the temple. 2 Kings 22:4-6. He commanded the Levites to put the ark of the Lord, in the sanctuary, in its proper place, and that they should no more bear it about, as they probably had done, during the administrations of the wicked kings who had reigned before him. 2 Chron. 35:3.

But these were only slight profanations and calamities, compared with the storm of destruction, the projected shadow of which was now beginning to darken that devoted land. The nation had sunk to so low a depth of sin, that God could no longer dwell among them. Zephaniah complains that her prophets were light and treacherous persons, that her priests had polluted the sanctuary, and done violence to the law. Zeph. 3:4. By the prophet Ezekiel, 23:38, 39, the Lord lays the same things to their charge, and adds (24:21), Behold I will profane my sanctuary. Therefore

GOD AGAIN FORSAKES HIS SANCTUARY.

It is never without warning that God visits his people in judgment. The long record of his dealings with them presents no exception to this rule. In this case the warning had been given in these words:—

"But go ye now unto my place which was in Shiloh, where I set my name at the first, and see what I did to it for the wickedness of my people Israel. And now, because ye have done all these works, saith the Lord, and I spake unto you rising up early and speaking, but ye heard not; and I called but ye answered not; therefore will I do unto this house, which is called by name, wherein ye trust, and unto the place which I gave to your fathers, as I have done to Shiloh. Jer. 7:12-14; 26:1-7.

What had God done to Shiloh? David answers: "When God heard this, he was wroth, and greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent which he had placed among men, and delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemy's hand. Ps. 78:59-61. To do the same to the temple would be to forsake it, and give it into the hands of the enemy.

The manner in which the people received this warning, set the seal to God's purpose in this respect. "They mocked the messengers of God and despised his words, and misused his prophets, until the wrath of the Lord rose against his people till there was no remedy." 2 Chron. 36:16.

Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon the first universal empire, the head of gold of the great symbolic image of Dan. 2, was the instrument God selected to carry out his purpose. In the year a. c. 606, Jerusalem was taken, the temple plundered, a part of the sacred vessels removed and placed in the temple of Belus in Babylon. multitudes of the people were transported into the land of their captors, the sons of the royal family, and the nobility of the nation were made eunuchs and slaves in the palace of the king of Babylon, the whole land was made tributary; the king, Jehoiakim, became a vassal to the king of Babylon: and the predicted seventy years' captivity commenced. 2 Chron. 36:6, 7.

- The evil behaviour of Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim, brought Nebuchadnezzar against Jerusalem the second time, B. C. 590, when he not only still further ravaged the house of the Lord and its sacred vessels. Verse 10.

And lastly the wicked course of Zedekiah, Jehoiachin's successor on the throne of Judah, drew upon Jerusalem that terrible destruction which for a while blotted it from the face of the earth. Zedekiah foolishly defied the power of the king who had already twice taken Jerusalem. Nebuchadnezzar was thus brought a third time against the doomed city, determined this time to quell forever its rebellious spirit. After a siege of about one year the city fell. All the vessels that could be found in the house of the Lord, were taken out, and all the riches were secured that could be found in every house in the city. The temple and the walls of the city were then set on fire. The walls, towers and towers were overthrown, and every building in the city was leveled to the ground, excepting only the piles of unconsumable rubbish, the site of Jerusalem was as bare as if human foot had ever trod thereon.

As God had done to the sanctuary at Shiloh he had now done to the sanctuary at Jerusalem but with tenfold heavier judgment. In the light of these facts the following references to the sanctuary are easily understood: Ps. 74:1-4; 76:1; Isa. 63:18; 64:10, 11; Eze. 24:2; Jer. 51:51; Lam. 1:10; 2:7, 20; 4:1.

While Israel were thus dispersed among the nations, and their beautiful sanctuary at Jerusalem lay in ruins, God promised to be to them as a little sanctuary, in the country where they should come. Eze. 11:16. Towards the close of the seventy years' captivity, Daniel prayed thus to God, "Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary which is desolate." Dan. 9:2, 17.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twenty-first Paper.—The Sanctuary
Offered by Ezekiel.

JERUSALEM, the temple, and the sanctuary, were destroyed in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, B. C. 588. Fourteen years after this, B. C. 574, Ezekiel, himself among the captives of Israel, was moved to describe a very remarkable sanctuary, into possession of which they were to come, if on their part they would comply with certain conditions. This is recorded in chapters 40 to 48, of his prophecy.

It is certain that this sanctuary has never been built. It becomes therefore a matter of interest to inquire why. Is it because the conditions were not complied with on the part of the people? or, is it because, as some of late years have claimed, this prophecy pertains to the future, and the time has not yet come for its fulfillment?

Let us then see if we can ascertain from the specifications of the prophecy itself, in what dispensation it was to be fulfilled. The conclusion is very easily reached, that it was designed to be fulfilled, not in the future dispensation, which is the immortal state; not even in the present dispensation; but in the past. This will appear evident from a few of its statements.

1. It was to be fulfilled while circumcision was in force. Eze. 44:9. But circumcision was abolished at the first advent. Gal. 5:2; 6:13.

2. It was while divorce was allowed. Eze. 44:22. But that is now done away. Matt. 5:31, 32; 19:8, 9.

3. It was to be while the distinction between meats, clean and unclean, was recognized. Eze. 44:23, 31. But that does not now hold. Acts 10:11-16; Rom. 14.

4. Sacrifices, offerings, burnt offerings, and sin offerings, of bulls and goats, were then in force. Eze. 46. But they are not now acceptable to God. Heb. 10.

5. The feast and the Jubilee were then in force. Eze. 43:21-25; 46:9, 11, 17. But they were nailed to the cross. Col. 2:14-17.

6. The Levitical priesthood was then in force. Eze. 40:46; 44:16. But the priesthood of Melchisedec, which passeth not to another, has taken its place. Heb. 5:9.

7. It was to be while "the middle wall of partition" existed, as all these ordinances prove, as well as the acknowledged distinction between "the seed of the house of Israel," and the stranger. But this wall of partition is now broken down, and this distinction no longer exists. Eph. 2.

These facts point out with sufficient distinctness the time when this sanctuary was to be built, if it should be built at all. Why, then, was it not built? The answer is clear: The people did not comply with the conditions on which it was offered. It was to be established with them on the condition that they were ashamed of their iniquities, and put them away. Eze. 43:11. But Jeremiah, speaking prophetically of what would be, says, 6:18, that they were not ashamed when they had committed abomination. And this the event proved; for when the offer was made by Cyrus to all in the captivity to return to their own land, only a few availed themselves of the privilege to go back to Jerusalem. Thus they slighted the inestimable blessings offered them; and the sanctuary set before them in their captivity, which they might have had, was never erected.

What then shall we say of those who make this a prophecy to be fulfilled in the future age? A few considerations will show the folly of such an application.

1. In the future state, Christ is to be the Prince over Israel; and there is to be but one. Luke 1:32, 33. But the prince brought to view by Ezekiel is a poor, frail mortal, as is shown by the following representations made concerning him.

2. He is commanded to offer a bullock, as a sin-offering for himself. Eze. 45:22. But Christ, the Prince of the future state, is himself the great sin-offering for the world. 1 John 2:1, 2.

3. He was to offer all manner of offerings for himself. Eze. 46:1-8. But Christ caused all this to cease at his death. Dan. 9:27.

4. God says to the princes mentioned by Ezekiel, Take away your exactions from my people. Eze. 45:9. But when Christ reigns there will be nothing oppressive; for the officers will be peace, and the exactors, righteousmen. Isa. 60:17-19.

5. Ezekiel's prince was to have sons and servants to whom he might, if he chose, give an inheritance; but it was to return to him in the year of Jubilee; and he was forbidden to oppress the people. Eze. 46:18-19. Surely it would be blasphemous to apply this to Christ, to whom it must apply if this prophecy has reference to the future state.

6. And finally, in the state of things Ezekiel brings to view, there are marriages, divorces, and deaths. Eze. 44:22, 24-27. But in the future state, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are equal unto the angels, and can die no more. Luke 20:36.

Thus it is demonstrated, First. That Ezekiel has no reference to the world or age to come. Secondly. That he has no reference to the present dispensation. Thirdly. That his prophecy refers wholly to the past or Mosaic dispensation. Fourthly. That the prophecy was conditional, and the time having passed and the conditions never having been complied with, it never has been, and never is to be, fulfilled.

To the building offered by Ezekiel, the word sanctuary is eighteen times applied in the following instances: Eze. 41:21, 23; 42:20; 43:21; 44:1, 5 (verses 7, 8, refer to Solomon's temple); 46:11, 13, 16, 27; 45:2, 3, 4, 18; 47:12; 48:8, 10, 21.

c. s.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twenty-second Paper.—The Sanctuary Rebuilt.

When the seventy years of Israel's captivity were expired, and the land of Judea had lain desolate and thus enjoyed her sabbaths of which the wickedness of the people had deprived it, the Lord, in fulfillment of his word, stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, king of Persia, to make a proclamation throughout all the kingdom, that of all the people of the God of Heaven dwelling therein, whosever would might return to Jerusalem.

Two tribes only, as tribes, Judah and Benjamin, acknowledged the heavenly token, and availed themselves of the opportunity offered. The majority of the other tribes chose to remain in their iniquity, and to abide still in the land of the heathen. But some of all the tribes joined themselves to the returning company, so that all Israel was represented, and all the tribes were perpetuated in Judea after the captivity. Hence the idea sometimes advanced that there are ten lost tribes which are to be restored at some time in the future, is a figment of the imagination.

Forty-two thousand, three hundred and sixty persons, enough to people quite a respectable city, returned under the proclamation of Cyrus, to the site of Jerusalem, to rebuild the house of the Lord. And the sacred vessels which had been taken away were also restored. Fifty-two years after the complete destruction of the first temple the foundation of the second was laid by Zerubbabel. The prophets, Haggai and Zechariah encouraged the builders. Ex. 5:1; 6:11. Hindered fifteen years through the influence of the Samaritans, and others, it was at length finished and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes, B. C. 515, twenty-one years after its commencement.

Though this temple was not, in some respects, equal to the first, yet the Lord promised that the glory should be greater, because to it, in the fullness of time, should come the Desire of all nations. Hag. 2.

What was wanting in the second temple? It was not with respect to size that the first house surpassed the latter; for this was of the same dimensions as the former, being built upon the same foundations. But those marks of the divine favor which were the main glory of the first temple, were wholly wanting in this. Thus the Jews reckon up in five particulars; namely, 1. The Ark, and the Mercy-seat which was upon it. 2. The Shekinah, or divine presence. 3. The Urim and Thummim. 4. The holy fire from the altar. 5. The spirit of prophecy.

What had become of the ark? Upon this question there has been expended much conjecture. That it was not carried to Babylon is generally admitted; as, if it had been, it would have been brought back with the other sacred treasures which had been carried thither. Ez. 1:8-11. It is supposed by some that it was hid away and preserved by Jeremiah. To sustain this view reference is made to the book of Maccabees which contains the following account of the matter:—

Jeremy the prophet "being warned of God, commanded the tabernacle and the ark to go with him, as he went forth into the mountain where Moses climbed up, and saw the heritage of God. And when Jeremy came thither he found an hollow cave, wherein he laid the tabernacle and the ark, and the altar of incense, and he stopped the door. And some of those that followed him came to mark the way, but they could not find it. Which when Jeremy perceived, he blamed them, saying, As for this place it shall be unknown until the time that God gather his people again together, and receive them with mercy." 2 Mac. 2:4-7. And from this latter expression some have inferred that it is to be discovered and brought forth again before the end.

"Most of the Jews will have it," says Prideaux, "that king Josiah being foretold by Huldah the prophetess, that the temple, speedily after his death, would be destroyed, caused the ark to be put in a vault under ground, which Solomon, foreseeing this destruction, had caused of purpose to be built for the preserving of it. For proof they produce 2 Chron. 33:3. But Prideaux argues that "these words import more than that Manasseh or Ammon having removed the ark from where it ought to have stood, Josiah commanded it again to be restored to its proper place."

These are, perhaps, but little more than conjectures. And while there seems to be an improbability that God would permit any work of his own hands, like the writing on the tables of the decalogue, to be destroyed by the hands of wicked men, there does not appear any positive proof that the ark and its contents were not destroyed with the temple, as were, probably, the shew-bread table and the golden candlestick.

The want of the ark was, however, supplied as to the outward form; for an ark was made of the same shape and dimensions as the first, and placed in its appropriate position in the second temple (Lightfoot on the Temple, c. 15, a. 11) but it contained no tables of the law, there was no appearance of the divine glory over it, and no oracular answers were given from it.

The Urim and Thummim. These were the third object specified as wanting in the second temple. What were they? Prideaux concludes that the words meant "only the divine virtue and power given to the breastplate in its consecration of obtaining an oracular answer from God, whenever counsel was asked of him by the high priest with it on, in such manner as his word did direct; and that the names Urim and Thummim were given hereto, only to denote the clearness and perfection which these oracular answers always carried with them; for these answers were not, like the heathen oracles, enigmatical and ambiguous, but always clear and manifest; not such as did ever fall short of perfection, either of fullness in the answer, or certainty in the truth of it. And hence it is that the Septuagint translate Urim and Thummim by the words delosin kai aletheian, i. e., manifestation and truth, because all these oracular answers given by Urim and Thummim were always clear and manifest, and their truth ever certain and infallible. As to the use which was made of the Urim and Thummim, it was to ask counsel of God in difficult and momentous cases relating to the whole state of Israel. — Connexion, Vol. i. p. 156.

Five hundred years elapsed. The temple, as might well be supposed, became, during this time, in many respects sadly in need of repairs. Whereupon Herod the Great, to ingratiate himself into the favor of the Jews, conceived the idea of rebuilding it throughout. The old temple was pulled down to its foundation, and the building of the new one commenced A. D. 19. It was this temple to which the Jews referred when they said to the Saviour at his first passover in the spring of A. D. 28, "Forty and six years was this temple in building." John 2:20. It had been completed the year before, A. D. 27, the very year in which Christ commenced his public ministry. To this temple, according to the prophecy of Haggai, the Desire of all nations had now come. Happy would it have been for the Jews if, knowing the time of their visitation, they had received him as their Lord, and owned his mission.

Externally, this building was at once the admiration and envy of the world. "Its appearance," says Josephus, "had everything that could strike the mind and astonish the sight; for it was on every side covered with solid plates of gold, so that when the sun rose upon it, it reflected such a dazzling effulgence, that the eye of the beholder was obliged to turn away from it; being no more able to sustain its radiance than the splendor of the sun." "It appeared at a distance like a huge mountain covered with snow; for where it was not decorated with plates of gold, it was extremely white and glistening."

Thus we are brought to the time of our Saviour. That covenant which had its ordinances of divine service in connection with "a worldly sanctuary," was drawing to a close. The great Sacrifice to which the offerings of the sanctuary pointed was about to be offered. The Lord was engaged in his solemn mission of love to man. Often would he have gathered them, to enlighten their blindness, heal their backslidings, and save from destruction. But they would not. Their incorrigible resistance at length wrung from him the mournful lamentation, "Behold your house is left unto you desolate." Matt. 23:37, 38. Yes, their beautiful house, the Spirit and presence of God driven therefrom, had become only a tomb of darkness and death. And as Christ departed with sad and lingering footsteps from the temple, the fearful doom which he saw awaiting that people obliged him to declare, not in anger, but in sorrow, that the temple should be thrown down, so that not one stone should be left upon another.

In the purpose of God, the services of this worldly sanctuary were now at an end. And when amid the startling scenes, the darkness and the earthquake, that attended the crucifixion of the Son of God, unseen hands violently rent in twain the magnificent veil that hung before the holy of holies, its services came really to an end; for they were no longer of any virtue.

A few short years sufficed to bring the literal fulfillment of our Lord's prediction. The armies of Rome environed Jerusalem. The city fell. Titus desired to spare so gorgeous a trophy as the temple, but a Roman soldier, impelled by a blind spirit of infatuation, or perhaps by a divine impulse, climbing upon the shoulders of his comrade, thrust a blazing firebrand into the gilded lattice of the porch. The flames at once sprang up. No power could then save it. It soon lay a melted, shattered, hissing mass of ruins. And the date of this destruction, in A. D. 70, falls upon the same month, and the same day of the month, as the destruction of Solomon's temple by Nebuchadnezzar, six hundred and fifty-eight years before.

Standing here at the conclusion of its earthly history, it remains to inquire why this arrangement was ever instituted. What was the object of this earthly sanctuary and the services connected therewith?

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twenty-third Paper.—The New Covenant Sanctuary.

THE reader will now understand why we have dwelt so lengthily upon the history of the worldly sanctuary. It is because Paul in plain and explicit language declares that that building erected by Moses at the command of God, and which was perpetuated in the temples built by Solomon, Zerubbabel and Herod, was the sanctuary of the first covenant; and it was important to see how prominent a place that held in the former dispensation. The word sanctuary occurs in the Old Testament one hundred and forty-two times, and in almost every instance refers to this building. It was no insignificant object, it was no trifle in the divine economy of that age. It is everywhere held before us, as the sanctuary, the holy place, the sacred place, the dwelling place of the Most High among the children of men. And Paul presents the complement to all these declarations when he declares so clearly that this was the sanctuary of the first covenant.

We desire the reader to appreciate the full value which this statement possesses in this investigation. From this there is no appeal. Here all believers in the Bible must occupy common ground. Here for the space of fifteen hundred years, we are all brought together on this subject. From Moses to Christ, this object, and no other, was the sanctuary of the Bible.

We have followed this to the close of its history. In A. D. 70 it disappeared forever from the face of the earth. Has there been no sanctuary since that time? Or has something else taken the place of that sanctuary? If this latter be the fact, we ask what that something else may be.

We have seen that only 490 years of the 2300 belonged to the Jews and Jerusalem. When that period ended, the services of the sanctuary of that people had come to an end. But yet 1810 years remained, bringing us down even to 1844. And it had been announced through the prophet that then the sanctuary should be cleansed. What sanctuary? and where? No sanctuary on the earth; for since A. D. 70 there has been none here. But a sanctuary cannot be cleansed that does not exist. There must therefore be a sanctuary somewhere, and that date must bring us to its cleansing, or the word of God prove incorrect.

Paul says that the sanctuary of Moses was the sanctuary of the first covenant. It was, as we have seen, one of the chief features of that covenant. But that covenant has given place to the new. Jer. 31:31; Heb. 8:10-12. Under this new covenant we are now living; for it was confirmed by the Messiah, the prince, during the last week of the 70, or the last seven years of the 490, by himself in person for the first half of the week, three years and a half to A. D. 31, and through his apostles, during the remainder of that period, to A. D. 34. Heb. 2:3. The great features of that first covenant find their counterpart in the present. The sanctuary of that covenant must find its counterpart here. And the Bible nowhere recognizes anything as the sanctuary of God, except the sanctuary, or sanctuaries, connected with these two covenants. The new covenant therefore has a sanctuary, as well as the old.

This is proved directly by the words of Paul in the text in question. Heb. 9:1: "Then verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary." Paul is showing the relation which the two covenants sustain to each other; and the word, also, shows that those things which he mentions pertained to both. One had ordinances of divine service; the other also has them. One had a sanctuary; the other also has a sanctuary.

The great question to which we have now come, and in which all the controversy is involved, is then simply this:—

What is the sanctuary of the new covenant?

The sanctuary of the old covenant must bear the same relation to the sanctuary of the new covenant, which the old covenant itself bears to the new. And on this point we suppose there is no controversy. All agree that they stand as type and antitype. The first was the type and shadow; this is the antitype and substance. The sanctuary of that dispensation was the type; the sanctuary of this, the antitype. But the sanctuary of that dispensation was the tabernacle of Moses. Of what, then, was the tabernacle of Moses a type, figure, or shadow?

The answer to this question is intimated in various scriptures to which we now call the attention of the reader. To Moses, the Lord said: "Let them make me a sanctuary, according to all that I show thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it." Ex. 26:8, 9. "And look that thou make them after their pattern which was showed thee in the mount." Verses 40. "And thou shalt rear up the tabernacle according to the fashion thereof which was showed thee in the mount." Ex. 26:30. "As it was showed thee in the mount, so shall they make it." Ex. 27:8. "Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speaking unto Moses that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen." Acts 7:44. "While as the first tabernacle was yet standing, which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices." Heb. 9:8, 9. "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true." Verses 24.

These texts afford no material for an argument and conclusion. They make a plain, positive assertion, which, if we believe their testimony, we must admit. They declare that the tabernacle built by Moses, the sanctuary of the first covenant was not an original structure; it was made after a pattern; it was simply a model or figure of something else, given for the time being to his people; and that from which it was modeled or fashioned, is declared to be the true sanctuary; and this true sanctuary must be the sanctuary of the new covenant; for God recognizes in connection with his work only these two: the true, and the figure or model which was made from it. The figure was the tabernacle of Moses. What is the true? c. a.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twenty-fourth Paper.—The Earth not the Sanctuary.

HAVING seen that the new covenant must have a sanctuary corresponding to that of the old, and that there must be something now recognized by the Bible as the sanctuary, the next step in the inquiry is to try to ascertain what this is. And here we are met by a variety of conflicting views which demand examination.

It is claimed by some that this earth is now the sanctuary.

By others, that it takes earth and Heaven together to constitute the sanctuary; the earth being the first apartment, and all Heaven the second.

By a third class it is claimed that the land of Canaan is now the sanctuary.

And a fourth class take the word in a more figurative sense, and apply it to the church.

Is the earth the sanctuary? We reply, No; and the reasons for this answer are at hand.

1. Definition of the word. According to Webster, Walker, Cruden, and the Bible, the term, sanctuary is defined to mean, "A holy place, a sacred place, a dwelling place for the Most High." Is the earth such a place? or has it been such since sin entered therein to mar and defile it? We know it has not; and this fact alone is sufficient to strangle forever the idea that this earth is the sanctuary.

2. The antitypical nature of the new covenant sanctuary. As we have seen, the sanctuary of the former dispensation was a type of the sanctuary of the present, whatever it may be. Is it now the earth? Then the former sanctuary prefigured it. But in what respect did it represent this earth? Can it for a moment be supposed that Moses when in the mount was shown this earth as a pattern from which he was to erect the sanctuary, and that the nearest resemblance he could make of it was an oblong building ten cubits in width, and three times that number in length? And we might extend the same inquiry to the furniture of the sanctuary. What is there on this earth that answers as the antitype of the ark, the altar of incense, the golden candlestick, and the table of shew bread? But this line of thought need not be pursued further to show the utter absurdity of such a view.

3. The use of the term. The word sanctuary occurs 146 times in the Bible, but is not in a single instance applied to the earth. The only texts which any one could imagine to have even a shadow of an application to this earth, are Isa. 60:13; Eze. 37:26-28; Rev. 21:1-3. But these refer, not to the present but to the future, and show simply that this earth renewed is the place where the tabernacle of God will be located hereafter.

4. But finally, if the earth is the sanctuary now, it was just as much the sanctuary in the former dispensation. No change has taken place by which it has become the sanctuary now any more than it must have been then. But Paul says that the tabernacle built by Moses was the sanctuary then; hence the earth was not then the sanctuary, and therefore is not the sanctuary now.

This view being such apparent folly, what shall we say of that view which makes this earth only a part of the sanctuary and looks to Heaven for the rest? It is strange that any person of common intelligence should conceive such an idea, or for a moment endeavor seriously to defend it. The only apology we can make for it is, that its advocates, misled by our common translation, suppose that the Bible calls Heaven the most holy place. But this is no apology; for no one has a right to set himself forth as a religious teacher, who on a point so plain is not acquainted with the correct reading.

The principles already presented on this subject go far toward proving the incorrectness of those views which apply the sanctuary to the land of Canaan or the church. See reasons 1, 2, 3 and 4 above stated. To prove the land of Canaan the sanctuary, appeal is made to Ex. 15:17. But if this text proves that Canaan was ever the sanctuary, it was the sanctuary then, and of that covenant. But here come these good words of Paul again, which declare that the land of Canaan was not the sanctuary then, but that the tabernacle built by Moses was. This is sufficient to settle this point. But some will not be satisfied without a further notice of a few texts. Let Ex. 15:17, then, be explained by Ps. 78:53, 54, 59. David here speaks of the same events to which Moses referred. Moses gave them as matters of prediction, David, living after their accomplishment, as matters of history. What Moses in the poetical license of his fervent song of triumph speaks of as the inheritance and sanctuary, David says in more explicit terms was the border of the sanctuary, and adds that the sanctuary was something which was built therein.

Good king Jehoshaphat makes the same distinction. 2 Chron. 20:7-9. He speaks of the land which had been given them, and the sanctuary which they had built therein, and then says that that sanctuary was the house (Solomon's temple) before which they stood. There is no mistaking such language, and any confusion in regard to the relation of the sanctuary to the land of Canaan is utterly inexcusable.

Isa. 63:18 refers to the overthrow and treading down of the house of God, the sanctuary of that time, stated in 2 Chron. 36:17-20, and Isa. 60:13 simply speaks of the new earth as the future glorious place of the sanctuary.

The land of Canaan was not, and is not, the sanctuary, but simply the place where the typical sanctuary was located.

As regards the church, it is never once called the sanctuary. Ps. 114:4 speaks of Judah as God's sanctuary. But this at most would only prove that a portion of the church constitutes the sanctuary, not the whole, as Judah was only one of the twelve tribes. But again, when was Judah thus called the sanctuary? When Israel went out of Egypt. And what does Paul tell us was then the sanctuary? The tabernacle built by Moses. This settles the question again. Why then is Judah called the sanctuary? Simply because Mount Zion was located in Judah, and on Mount Zion the sanctuary was built.

But if Judah, or the whole church was the sanctuary then, it would not be the sanctuary now; for the sanctuary of that dispensation has given place to the sanctuary of the new.

But if the church could be shown to be the sanctuary at any time, it could not even then be the sanctuary of Dan. 8:13, 14, the only one under discussion, for the church is expressly spoken of in connection with that as the host, or worshippers, related thereto. Here the church and the sanctuary are certainly separate and distinct objects.

v. s.

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth; Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., FIFTH-DAY, JUNE 22, 1876.

JAMES WHITE,
J. N. ANDREWS,
URIAH SMITH, } . . . EDITORS.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twenty-fifth Paper.—A Sanctuary in Heaven.

As we have found that the earth is not the sanctuary, that the land of Canaan is not the sanctuary, and that the church is not the sanctuary, but little more remains upon this branch of the subject; for but one more object is left to be considered, and but one more class of texts to be examined.

This object is what is called the sanctuary, temple, or tabernacle in Heaven; and the texts that refer to it were spoken by David, Habakkuk, John, and Paul.

Paul uses language which cannot be misunderstood. Hear him: "Now of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the Heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. 8:1, 2.

In the seven preceding chapters of Hebrews, Paul has introduced the priesthood of Christ. He has compared it with that of Aaron in the light of prophecy. He shows the superiority of Christ's priesthood over that of Aaron. Christ is a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec.

After plainly showing that a priest was to be provided like Melchisedec, he sums up his argument in the 8th chapter, already quoted. We have such an high priest. Who is he? Christ. Where is he? In Heaven. In what place does he minister? In the true sanctuary, not in the figure or model which existed here upon the earth. Who pitched this true tabernacle, or erected this sanctuary? Not man, as Moses erected the earthly sanctuary, but the Lord. Where is this true sanctuary? In Heaven, of course, where the High Priest is. Could not Christ be a priest upon earth? No; for provision was made in the Aaronic priesthood for all the work of that kind which was to be performed upon the earth; and they served, says Paul, "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things."

We invite the reader to dwell a moment upon this picture. The two dispensations are here set in juxtaposition before us; the relation they sustain to each other is clearly shown, together with the work that pertains to each, the place where it is carried forward, and the agents by whom it is performed. In the following epitome, let No. 1 represent the former dispensation, and No. 2, the present.

No. 1. Priesthood performed by Aaron and his sons.

No. 2. Priesthood performed by Christ, a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec.

No. 1. Priesthood performed here upon the earth.

No. 2. Priesthood performed in Heaven.

No. 1. Performed in an earthly sanctuary pitched by man.

No. 2. Performed in a heavenly sanctuary, which the Lord pitched and not man.

No. 1. The type.

No. 2. The antitype.

Where is now our priest? In Heaven. Where is now our sanctuary? In Heaven. Is the sanctuary in Heaven a literal sanctuary? Just as literal as the Priest, our Lord Jesus Christ, who ministers therein.

We have now found the great original from which Moses copied when he made the sanctuary for his dispensation. That sanctuary was simply copied from the sanctuary of this dispensation. The priesthood of that dispensation was copied from the priesthood of this dispensation. That owed its existence entirely to this. It was given in reference to this. It was designed simply to introduce this. This is the all-important object in the whole arrangement. That in due time came to an end; and this took its place. The work on earth ceased; and the work in Heaven commenced. We have now neither priest nor sanctuary on the earth; but we have both a priest and a sanctuary in Heaven. Thank God that so momentous a truth, freighted with consequences of such infinite interest to us all, is so clearly revealed.

All these particulars are clearly and explicitly stated by Paul, and no believer in his inspiration can for a moment question his testimony.

This should be an end of all controversy on this point.

This sanctuary in Heaven is called by David, Habakkuk, and John, "the temple of God in Heaven;" Ps. 11:4; Hab. 2:20; Rev. 11:19; 16:17; by Zechariah and Jeremiah, God's "holy habitation;" Zech. 2:13; Jer. 25:30; by Paul, a "greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands," Heb. 9:11, "the true," verse 24, "things in the Heavens," verse 23, and the "holy places" (Greek), verses 8, 12, and chapter 10:19.

But some one may say, This sounds very well as an argument, yet there may possibly be some error in the premises or conclusions. But if any one had only been to Heaven and seen this sanctuary there, we could then believe. Will you take the testimony of such an one? You shall have it. John was taken to Heaven in vision and shown things therein; and he has plainly told us of some of the things which he there saw. Rev. 4:5. "Seven lamps of fire burning before the throne," antitype of the golden candlestick of the earthly sanctuary with its seven branches. Rev. 8:3. Altar of incense, golden censer, and "much incense," all of which pertained exclusively to the sanctuary. Rev. 11:19: "And the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." What was the ark? An instrument of the sanctuary and nothing else; to be seen in the most holy place, and nowhere else. Thus John beheld the sanctuary in Heaven, and has given us a description of its furniture. And what more need we? Moses says he made the sanctuary after a pattern which was shown to him; Paul says plainly that that pattern was the true sanctuary, and that it is now in Heaven; and John completes the evidence by saying that he saw it there. How could testimony be more comprehensive or complete? Reader, do you believe these things? If you believe God's word, you do!

But there is one consideration which in some minds weighs as an objection to the view here presented. It is said that if there is a sanctuary in Heaven, it cannot be the sanctuary of Dan. 8:14; for that is a sanctuary which is trodden under foot; but a sanctuary in Heaven cannot be trodden under foot.

This objection is surely uttered without thought. Where is Christ? In Heaven. Can he while there be trodden under foot? If so, the sanctuary where he ministers can also be trodden under foot. And Paul says emphatically that Christ is trodden under foot by a certain class of sinners, crucified afresh, and put to an open shame. Heb. 10:20: "Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God." How do they do this? Simply by becoming apostate and counting his blood an unholy thing, and doing despite to the spirit of grace. And how do they tread under foot the sanctuary? By erecting rival sanctuaries, and turning mankind away from the true. While the sanctuary was upon earth, this sometimes involved the literal destruction of the tabernacle; but this was only a subsidiary feature, not the main circumstance in this work.

The two powers which were to tread down the host and sanctuary, were paganism and the papacy. How have they done it? In the days of the Judges and of Samuel, Satan's rival sanctuary was the temple of Dagon, where the Philistines worshiped. Judges 16:23, 24. After Solomon had erected a glorious sanctuary upon Mount Moriah, Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin, erected a rival sanctuary at Bethel, and thus drew away ten of the twelve tribes from the worship of the living God, to that of the golden calves. 1 Kings 12:28-33; Amos 7:13, margin. In the days of Nebuchadnezzar, the rival of the sanctuary of God was the temple of old Belus in Babylon. At a later period, there was the Pantheon or temple of "all the gods" at Rome, which, after the typical sanctuary had given place to the true, was baptized and called Christian. Thenceforward Satan had at Rome a "temple of God," in which was a being "exalted above all that is called God or that is worshiped," the man of sin, the son of perdition. And of this papal abomination it was expressly predicted that it should make war upon the saints, or tread under foot "the host," and make war upon the tabernacle of God in Heaven, or tread under foot the sanctuary above. Rev. 13:6. And it has done this by turning away the worship of them that dwell on the earth from the temple of God in Heaven to its own sanctuary at Rome. It has trodden under foot the Son of God, the minister of the heavenly sanctuary, by making the pope the viceroy of the Son of God, and the head of the church instead of Christ, and by leading men to worship this son of perdition as one not only able like God to forgive past sins, but to go beyond what God ever proposed, in forgiving them before their commission. Surely there is propriety in speaking of this work as treading under foot the host, and the sanctuary, or "blaspheming God's tabernacle and them that dwell in Heaven." And thus the only seeming objection that can be urged to the position here taken is removed out of the way. U. S.

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth: Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., FIFTH-DAY, JUNE 29, 1876.

JAMES WHITE,
J. N. ANDREWS,
URIAH SMITH, } . . . EDITORS.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twenty-sixth Paper.—Ministration of the Sanctuary.

So far as the object itself is concerned, we have now before us the sanctuary of the Bible in its entirety. It consists, first, of the earthly sanctuary as embodied in the tabernacle of Moses, and the temples of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod, and, secondly, of the more perfect tabernacle, temple, and sanctuary in Heaven, which the Lord pitched and not men, and which took the place of the former when the typical dispensation gave place to the true. The Bible nowhere recognizes any other objects as the sanctuary of the Lord, and these cover both dispensations. Whatever, therefore, is said of the sanctuary which has its application in the former dispensation, refers to the sanctuary of that dispensation; and whatever has its application in this dispensation, refers to the sanctuary of the present dispensation, the sanctuary in Heaven. This is a self-evident conclusion from the premises already proved.

Another conclusion as speedily follows; namely, that the declaration of Dan. 8:14, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," has its application in this dispensation, and hence refers to the sanctuary in Heaven. For it has been before shown that only 480 years of the 2300 belonged to the Jews and the earthly sanctuary. There remain 1810 years extending far down into this dispensation, even to 1844. There the 2300 days terminated, and there we come to the cleansing of the sanctuary, the sanctuary, of course, of this dispensation.

Gabriel himself showed this, before he completed his instructions to the prophet Daniel. He showed him, first, that the earthly sanctuary would be destroyed shortly after the rejection of the Messiah, by his people, and that it would never be rebuilt, but be desolate until the consummation. Dan. 9:26, 27. Secondly, he brought to view the new covenant: "He [the Messiah] shall confirm the covenant [the new covenant] with many for one week." Verse 27. Thirdly, he brought to view the new covenant church, or host, namely, the "many" with whom the covenant was to be confirmed. Fourthly, he brought to view the new covenant sacrifice, namely, the cutting off of the Messiah, but not for himself. Fifthly, he brought to view the Mediator of the new covenant, who should cause the sacrifices and services of the former to cease. Verse 27. See also Dan. 11:22; Heb. 12:24. And sixthly and lastly, he brought to view the new covenant sanctuary when he said that seventy weeks were cut off . . . "to anoint the most holy." Verse 24. This brings to view an act which was performed preparatory to the commencement of the ministration of the sanctuary, which was to anoint both the holy places and all the sacred vessels. Ex. 40:9-11. On this point the Advent Shield, No. 1, p. 75, contains the following:—

"And the last event of the 70 weeks, as enumerated in verse 24, was the anointing of the 'Most Holy,' or the 'Holy of Holies' or the 'Sanctum Sanctorum.' Not that which was on earth, made with hands, but the true tabernacle, into which Christ, our High Priest, is for us entered. Christ was to do in the true tabernacle in Heaven what Moses and Aaron did in its pattern. See Heb. chapters 6, 7, 8, and 9; Ex. 30:22-30; Lev. 8:10-15."

In this utterance, the Shield was not far from the kingdom of God; and it seems almost marvelous that any upon whose minds the truth had begun to dawn so clearly, should not have followed on to the full light on this glorious subject. No doubt, certainly, can remain concerning the object which the angel had in view when he said, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

But it is at once objected that this application cannot be correct, and this cannot refer to any sanctuary in Heaven; for there is nothing there that needs cleansing; nothing there impure to which such language can apply. And in some minds this mole-hill becomes magnified into a mountain, which they forever try in vain to surmount, and which eclipses from their minds all the strength of proof and array of evidence which may be brought upon this question from any other quarter.

It is not strange that upon the first introduction of this subject, this thought should arise as a seeming objection. But it can, upon a little thought, be fairly met and fully disposed of. It would be anticipating to enter at length upon the question here, inasmuch as it involves an examination of the ministration and cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, where it will receive due consideration. Suffice it to say at this point that this cleansing is not a cleansing from any physical impurities. It is not accomplished with soap and sand, and mope and brushes. It is a cleansing accomplished with blood. But the use of blood is for the sake of remission, or forgiveness of sin, nothing else; hence the cleansing is a cleansing from sin; and Paul testifies that such a cleansing does pertain both to the earthly and the heavenly building. He says, Heb. 9:23: "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the Heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these." That is, to paraphrase and express more fully the meaning of this language, "It was therefore (because there is no remission or forgiveness of sin without the shedding of blood, verse 22) necessary that the patterns of things in the Heavens [that is, the earthly sanctuary] should be purified [or cleansed] with these [the sacrifices of calves and goats, verse 19, with which the earthly sanctuary each year was cleansed]; but [it was necessary for the same reason that] the heavenly things themselves [the true sanctuary in Heaven, should be cleansed] with better sacrifices than these [even with the precious blood of Christ]."

We confidently submit, to every one capable of understanding the meaning of language, that this is the exact idea which Paul here expresses; and this being so, Paul affirms in the clearest manner that the sanctuary in Heaven must be cleansed. Consistent or inconsistent, this is what Paul says. We leave the objector to settle the matter with the apostle.

We wish to know what this cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary is, which is predicted in Dan. 8:14; for this is the great event to which the prophecy points us. To learn this we must acquire an understanding of the ministration of that heavenly sanctuary; but we can learn of this only from the ministration of the earthly sanctuary; for Paul says that the priests who here ministered, served "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Heb. 8:5. We therefore go backward in history thirty-three hundred years, to that law which was given to lead us to Christ, through which there was spread out here upon earth a shadow of heavenly things, and inquire into the services and ceremonies connected with its sanctuary, how they were performed, and what they signified.

The ministration of the earthly sanctuary was accomplished by the Levitical order of priesthood, and consisted of two great divisions: first, the daily ministration in the first apartment, or holy place, which went forward through the entire year, with the exception of, secondly, a special service in the second apartment, or most holy place, into which, says Paul, the high priest went once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself and the errors of the people. This yearly day of service in the most holy place was called the day of atonement, and fell each year on the tenth day of the seventh month. Lev. 23:27.

The daily ministration embraced the regular morning and evening burnt-offering, Ex. 29:38-43, the burning of sweet incense on the golden altar of incense every morning when the high priest dressed the lamps, and every evening when he lighted them, Exodus, chapter 30, the additional work appointed for the Sabbaths of the Lord, and the annual sabbaths, new moons and feasts, Numbers, chapters 28 and 29, besides the particular work to be accomplished for individuals as they should present their offerings throughout the year.

This latter was the larger and more important part of the service. It consisted of several impressive and solemn steps, chief among which were the following: When a person had sinned he procured for himself such a victim as the law prescribed, which was to be put to death in his stead. This victim he brought to the priest, to the door of the tabernacle. He then laid his hand upon the head of the victim and confessed over him his sin, through which act his sin was considered as transferred to the victim. With his own hands he then took the life of his offering, a most striking confession that through his sin he was worthy of death; and the priest took of the blood, and dipping his finger therein, sprinkled it seven times before the Lord, before the vail of the sanctuary, as near as he could approach to the ark till the great day of atonement. Thus was the sin transferred, first to the victim, and then through its blood to the sanctuary itself, and the transgressor went free.

In this manner went the typical service forward through the year. Day after day, week after week, month after month, we behold this round of service performed, the victims coming in solemn procession to the sanctuary, the work of confession going on, the crimson tide of expiation flowing, and the solemn-visaged priests in ceaseless service sprinkling this token of forfeited life before the broken law. There was thus a continual transfer of sins from the people to the sanctuary through the year. What became of these sins? U. S.

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth: Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, NICH., FIFTH-DAY, JULY 6, 1876.

JAMES WHITE,
J. M. ANDREWS,
URIAN SMITH, } . . . EDITORS.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twenty-seventh Paper.—Cleansing of the Earthly Sanctuary.

Our last article closed with the query, What was further done with the sins which were borne into the sanctuary? The Bible fully informs us. Their transfer from the sinner to the sanctuary was not the final disposition of them. They were not borne into the sanctuary, either to remain there forever, or to be considered as blotted out and removed. But they were treated as still in existence, and as hateful and evil things, respecting which a further ministration must take place, in order that the camp of Israel might become forever free therefrom.

We have already noticed the service through which the sins of the people were borne into the sanctuary. We now come to notice that by which they were taken out. This work was performed only once a year, and was fixed invariably to the tenth day of the seventh month. The work itself was called the cleansing of the sanctuary, or the atonement; and the day upon which it was performed was called the day of atonement.

To accomplish this, an apartment of the sanctuary, into which no man through all the year had been permitted to enter on pain of death, was solemnly laid open, and the ministry of the high priest transferred thereto. So Paul says that into the second apartment of the sanctuary, or most holy place, "went the high priest alone, once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people." Heb. 9:7. When this was accomplished, a complete round of service in the sanctuary had been completed. Then the most holy place was closed again to mortal presence for another year, and the work in the first apartment, or holy place, went on as before till the next tenth day of the seventh month.

The description of this special or yearly ministration in the most holy place, which constituted the cleansing of the sanctuary, is found in Leviticus 16. Let us look briefly at some of the principal features of the scene. Through Moses the Lord gave the following instruction to Aaron the priest: "Speak unto Aaron thy brother, that he come not at all times into the holy place within the veil before the mercy-seat, Lev. 16:2. The Lord sometimes met with his people in other places; Ex. 29:42, 43, &c.; but in the earthly tabernacle, the place over the mercy-seat between the cherubim, may be considered as the place where God generally manifested his presence, and from which he had ordained to commune with them. At all events, he promised to meet the priest there on the great day of atonement.

To come thus into the immediate presence of God was an act of fearful solemnity, and was not to be performed without suitable preparation, and certainly in no trivial or careless manner. Therefore, the priest was to offer a young bullock for a sin-offering and a ram for a burnt-offering, and make atonement for himself and his house. Verses 6, 11-14. Having thus, so far as that service could go, become free from sin himself, he was prepared to act in the remaining solemn services of that day, as mediator between God and the people.

He was then to take of the congregation of the children of Israel two kids of the goats, and present them before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. Verse 6. One of these goats was to be slain, and his blood ministered in the most holy place; the other was to be the scape-goat. But which of these it should be was not left to Aaron to decide: the Lord determined that by the lot which Aaron was to cast for this purpose. Verse 8. This being decided, he was to slay the goat upon which the lot fell for the Lord, for a sin-offering for the people, and bear his blood within the veil, and sprinkle it with his finger upon the mercy-seat eastward, and before the mercy-seat seven times.

Two special purposes are stated for which this blood was offered: 1. To make an atonement for the transgression of the children of Israel in all their sins. 2. To cleanse, or make atonement for the holy sanctuary. These vital facts are clearly stated in Lev. 16:15-22, a portion of which, for the benefit of the reader, we here transcribe:—

VERSE 15. Then shall he kill the goat of the sin-offering, that is for the people, and bring his blood within the veil, and do with that blood as he did with the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it upon the mercy-seat, and before the mercy-seat. 16. And he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins; and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation, that remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness. 17. And there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place, until he come out, and have made an atonement for himself, and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel. 20. And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat; 21; and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness; 22; and the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited; and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness.

The margin of this last verse reads, instead of a land not inhabited, a land of separation. This goat was separated from the people. He came no more into the camp. And with him, the sins he bore upon himself were considered as forever separated from the people, to appear no more against them. Tradition has it that this goat was hurled from a precipice, and so dashed in pieces. However this may be, beyond question he in some way miserably perished; and with him, also, perished the load of guilt he had borne away from Israel. The man who led away the scape-goat was obliged to wash both himself and his clothes with water before returning into the camp. The whole service was calculated to impress the Israelites with the holiness of God and his abhorrence of sin, and to show them that they could have no contact with it without becoming greatly defiled.

With the sending away of the goat, the people were free from the effect of those sins to which the atonement related. Till then they were not. For every man was to afflict his soul while the work of atonement was going forward; and whoever refused to do this, was to be cut off from among the people. Lev. 23: 29, 30.

The work of the priest in the cleansing of the sanctuary is again summed in verses 29, 30, 33, 34: "And this shall be a statute forever unto you; that in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, ye shall afflict your souls, and do no work at all, whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger that sojourneth among you; for on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord." "And he shall make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, and he shall make an atonement for the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar, and he shall make an atonement for the priests, and for all the people of the congregation. And this shall be an everlasting statute unto you, to make an atonement for the children of Israel for all their sins once a year. And he did as the Lord commanded Moses."

The view of the subject here presented suggests some pertinent thoughts relative to the forgiveness and remission of sin. The acceptance of a substitute for the sinner was not for the purpose of making in the body of that substitute an end of the punishment due to the transgressor's sin, but simply to remove the guilt from the sinner. The pouring out of the blood of that victim was not to cancel the sin, but to provide a means of its transfer to still some other object or party. Through the blood of the victim the sin was transferred to the sanctuary. So far the sinner's work was an acknowledgment to the law, through blood, of his guilt, and a desire for pardon through faith in a substitute. But he was as yet only relatively or conditionally free. The law still held him, and unless its claims should be more directly satisfied, the remission of his sins would not be secured.

On the day of atonement, the priest, taking an offering from the people, not for the purpose of bearing sins into the sanctuary, but of making an atonement for those already there, appeared with the blood of this general offering for the people, and sprinkled it upon the mercy-seat directly over the law, to make full satisfaction for its claims.

Its demands being thus met, the law released its hold of all the sins in the sanctuary, and through them of the sinners from whom they had come. Then the high priest, if we may so express it, gathered the sins all upon himself and bore them from the sanctuary. Placing his hands upon the head of the scape-goat, he confessed over him all these sins, thus transferring them from himself to the goat. The goat then bore them away, and with him they perished.

Remission means a sending away. Remission of sins is that absolute disposal of them that removes them forever, so that they can no more appear against the sinner. Pardon of sin was secured through the sinner's offering; remission, only through the atonement. Pardon was conditional; remission, absolute.

We have now before us a general outline of the ministration and cleansing of the earthly sanctuary. This was performed, says Paul, unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. From this service, we are, therefore, to reason concerning the ministration and cleansing of the sanctuary in Heaven.

r. s.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twenty-eighth Paper.—The Ministration of the Heavenly Sanctuary.

IN entering upon this, the most important branch of the subject before us, we are not left to explore our way alone. Guides, appointed of Heaven to lead, the inquiring mind into the right way, are present to direct us. Paul, in his divine commentary on the typical system, addressed to the Hebrews, draws out in plainest terms the parallel between the priestly work of that system and the ministry of our Lord, who is a priest after the order of Melchisedec. Arm in arm with the apostle we walk forward to the following conclusions:—

1. The earthly sanctuary meets its antitype in the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man, of which, with its two holy places, it constituted a correct pattern or shadow. Heb. 8:2, 6; 9:8, 9, 12, 23, 24.

2. The typical offerings meet their antitype in the great offering on Calvary. Heb. 7:27; 9:11-14, 26; 10:10, 12, 14.

3. The typical priesthood meets its antitype in the priesthood of our Lord. Heb. 4:14; 7:23, 24; 8:1, 2; 9:11, 24, 25.

4. As the priests on earth had offerings to make, it is necessary that Christ also have somewhat to offer. Heb. 8:3.

5. The work of the priest in the earthly tabernacle meets its antitype in the ministry of our Lord in the sanctuary above. Heb. 8:5, 6.

That Christ is our High Priest, and that he has ascended to Heaven, there to minister for us, will not be disputed by any of that class of people with whom we now argue.

When did he commence his ministry in the sanctuary on high? When he ascended up to appear in the presence of God for us. Heb. 9:8, 11, 12, 24; 10:12. On this there can be no diversity of opinion.

Where did he commence his ministry? Was it in a place corresponding to the first apartment or holy place of the earthly sanctuary, or in some place which corresponds to the most holy place? In other words, does Christ minister in two apartments in the sanctuary above, so that somewhere in his ministry he changes his work from one to the other? or, does he minister in only one apartment, and that the most holy place? While we answer unhesitatingly that Christ commenced his work in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary, others take issue and claim that he ministers only in the most holy place. Their view in reality is, that there is in the antitype only a most holy place, and that is all Heaven; consequently, Christ has but one place in which to minister, and his work goes on without change of character or locality from beginning to end. Let us see what this view involves.

1. The ministration in the most holy place is the cleansing of the sanctuary, let it take place when it will, and continue as long as it may. So the cleansing of the sanctuary commenced when Christ ascended to Heaven, and he has been doing no other work for these 1800 years past, and it is not ended yet. Why, then, may it not just as appropriately continue 1800 years more and indefinitely longer? This reduces the idea of the cleansing of the sanctuary to an absurdity.

2. The 2300 years reached to the cleansing of the sanctuary. They must, therefore, have ended at the ascension of Christ, if he then commenced the work in the most holy place, for that is the cleansing of the sanctuary. But such a claim is ridiculous, as the prophecy makes only 70 weeks of the 2300 days reach to that event. The last of the 70 weeks which were cut off from the 2300 days brought us to the ascension of Christ, and the commencement of his ministry as priest at the right hand of God.

3. The earthly sanctuary was the shadow cast here by the heavenly; and the earthly had two apartments certainly; but if the heavenly has but one apartment, the most holy alone, how could it cast upon earth a shadow with two? When people will show us a monument with a single shaft casting in the light of the same sun a shadow with two shafts, then they may talk about a heavenly sanctuary with one apartment casting a shadow here upon the earth with two. Till then, if they have any regard for their reputation as men of common observation or philosophy, let them never hint such an idea. But if there are two apartments in the heavenly sanctuary, that settles the question of the ministration; for surely an apartment would not be provided in which no ministration was to be performed.

4. But the service of the priests was a shadow of heavenly things, just as much as the place in which they ministered. And by far the greater portion of their ministry was performed in the first apartment, or holy place. Now a ministry performed by the earthly priests in the holy place, could not shadow forth a ministry performed by Christ in the most holy place. Therefore, on the view we are examining, all this service in the holy place for 364 days out of the year was performed unto the example and shadow of nothing! Such a position stands related to both Scripture and common sense, negatively as 304 to 1.

5. If Heaven is the most holy place simply, what is the veil dividing between it and the holy? Some quote Heb. 10:19, 20, and say that it is Christ's flesh. Then when Christ entered within the veil, as they say he did when he ascended, he entered within his flesh, which is absurd. These texts assert simply that his flesh is the new and living way consecrated for us, not that it is the veil. His flesh, or his sacrifice, is that by which we in faith enter into the true holy places, as these verses assert.

6. The text, "This man after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, forever sat down on the right hand of God" (Heb. 10:12), has been urged as forbidding the idea of his ministering in two holy places. We answer that, so far as the idea of sitting is concerned, it would be equally proper to represent him as standing on the Father's right hand. Acts 7:55, 56. And then we reply further, that even when he is seen coming in the clouds of heaven, he is said to be "sitting on the right hand of power." Matt. 26:64; Mark 16:82. Then he can certainly be at the Father's right hand in both the holy places. But Paul bears direct testimony on this point. He says that Christ is a minister of the sanctuary; and the word here rendered sanctuary (Heb. 8:2) is in the plural number, and signifies the holy places. This none can deny. It is by the Douay Bible rendered, "the holies;" and by Macnight, "holy places." We therefore justly conclude (1) that our Lord can be a minister of the two holy places, and yet be at the Father's right hand; and (2) that he must minister in both the holy places, or Paul's testimony that he is a minister of the holies (plural) is not true; for a priest that should minister simply in the holiest of all, would not be a minister of the holy places.

7. Again: Heb. 9:8, and also 10:19, are by some urged to prove that Christ ministers only in the most holy place. These texts both speak of the holiest as though it were in the singular number; but we have already observed that the words thus rendered are not in the singular, but plural; not "hagia hagion," holy of holies, as in chapter 9:3, but simply "hagion," holies, plural, the same as is rendered sanctuary in chapter 8:2. Also the phrase in chapter 9:12, 25, rendered "into the holy place," is the same as is in verse 24 literally rendered into the holy places (plural). These texts, therefore, instead of sustaining what they are often quoted to prove, viz., that Christ has but one apartment in which to minister, furnish positive testimony to the reverse, by showing that there are holy places in the heavenly sanctuary, and that Jesus ministers in them both.

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Twenty-ninth Paper.—Within the Vail.

We offered last week conclusive proof that Christ commenced his ministry in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary, and answered some objections which are offered against that view. A few more points remain to be noticed.

Paul's testimony in Heb. 6:19, 20, is quoted to prove that when Christ ascended he entered into the most holy place: "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail; whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest forever after the order of Melchisedec."

The claim here instituted is that "the vail," within which Christ has entered, signifies the vail dividing between the holy and most holy places; and if Christ entered within that vail when he ascended, or if he was there when Paul wrote, he was in the most holy place.

If we grant this claim, some conclusions follow which demand consideration. If there is a vail dividing between the holy and most holy places, which the foregoing claim admits, then there is somewhere a holy place as well as a most holy. But if the most holy is all Heaven where Christ has entered, then what and where is the holy place? It must be something outside of Heaven. Then what is it? Is it this earth, as some contend? If it is anything outside of Heaven it must be; for this is the only place with which we have anything to do this side of Heaven. Then what is the vail dividing between earth and Heaven? Why are not our opponents thoughtful enough to give us some light on such points as these?

But, further, the holy place in the sanctuary was twice as large as the most holy; and if the earth is the holy place of the true sanctuary, and Heaven the most holy, it follows, the proportion being maintained, that this little diminutive earth, of which it would take three hundred and fifty-two thousand to equal the bulk of the sun, is twice as large as all Heaven!

And, still further, in fulfillment of the type, Christ must perform a portion of his ministry in the holy place. If this is the earth, he should have performed a portion of his ministry here. But Paul says explicitly that he could not be a priest upon earth; for there was another order of priests appointed to do all the work of this kind that was to be done on the earth. Heb. 8:4. And he says again that while the earthly tabernacle stood, while any service of that kind was performed here, the way into the holy places, both the holy and the most holy of the heavenly sanctuary, was not made manifest or laid open. Heb. 9:8.

We have already seen how this idea that Christ entered into the most holy place at his ascension, and commenced the work of cleansing the sanctuary, disarranges the period of 2300 days, that great central pillar of the prophecies. It throws the whole system of prophetic interpretation into inextricable confusion. It even destroys the Messiahship of Christ by throwing the 70 weeks far back into the former dispensation. If these two pillars, the 70 weeks and 2300 days, can be wrenched from their foundations in the temple of truth, as Samson lifted the pillars of the Philistine temple, the whole structure falls, and Biblical interpreters of every school are involved in the ruin.

And what is the reason for all this? Why call the vail in Heb. 6:19, the second vail? Simply to avoid the conclusion that the Lord is doing any special work either in Heaven or on earth at the present time; for if the sanctuary is not now being cleansed, the position and work of our Lord differ in no respect from what they have been the past 1800 years; and the past advent movement is all a failure. But if there is nothing to the past movement, there is certainly nothing to the present. Thus men labor hard to give the devil the whole field, and exhibit themselves as the victims of the thinnet of all delusions.

We inquire, then, Does the word vail in Heb. 6:19, mean the second vail? We answer, No; and this we will prove to the satisfaction of every candid mind. There are but two words rendered vail in the New Testament. These are diaphana and sarantropaia. The first occurs four times only, in verses 13, 14, 15 and 16 of 2 Cor. 3, referring to the vail over Moses' face. The second is used six times, once each by Matthew Mark and Luke, all in reference to the vail of the temple which was rent in twain when Christ expired upon the cross, Matt. 27:51; Mark 15:38; Luke 23:45; and three times by Paul in the book of Hebrews: 6:19; 9:3; and 10:20. Is there anything peculiar in Paul's use of this word in Hebrews? Yes; when he means the second vail he specifies it. Heb. 9:3: "And after the second vail, the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all." Now if the term "the vail" was used to signify invariably the second vail, why did Paul use the term second? Why did he not say, here, simply, "And after the vail?" Because a second must imply a first, and he well understood that there was at the entrance to the tabernacle a hanging, which was just as much a vail as that which divided between the holy and the most holy; and to carry out his purpose of instruction in reference to the sanctuary, which is one of Paul's great objects in the book of Hebrews, he accurately distinguishes between the two, and when he means the second, he says the second.

This word, sarantraqa, is defined in Robinson's Gr. Lex. of New Testament as follows: "A covering, veil, which hangs down. In Sept. a veil, curtain, of the tabernacle and temple, of which there were two, viz., one at the entrance of the outer sanctuary, Heb. 9:3 Sept. sarantraqa, Ex. 26:38; 40:3. Jos. B. J. 5. 5. 4; and the other before the holy of holies, separating it from the outer sanctuary."

Here is good testimony that the same word is used to designate both hangings, the one at the door, and the other in the interior, of the sanctuary. In the Hebrew, in Ex. 35:12; 39:34; 40:21; and Num. 4:8, both the terms that are used for hanging and veil are joined together to designate the inner veil before the most holy place, and it is called the veil of the covering. The Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature by McClintock and Strong, under the term "Hanging," says:—

"The hanging was a curtain or covering (as the word radically means, and as it is sometimes rendered) to close an entrance. It was made of variegated stuff wrought with needlework (compare Ezech. 1:5), and (in one instance at least) was hung on five pillars of acacia wood. The term is applied to a series of curtains suspended before the successive openings of entrance into the tabernacle and its parts. Of these, the first hung before the entrance to the court of the tabernacle (Ex. 27:16; 39:18; Num. 4:20) the second before the door of the tabernacle (Ex. 26:36, 37; 39:38); and the third before the entrance to the most holy place, called more fully veil of the covering. Ex. 35:12; 39:34; 40:21."

We have now before us sufficient evidence that the covering of the outer entrance to the tabernacle was a veil, as well as that which hung before the most holy place. The same Greek word, and the same Hebrew word, are applied to both.

The point now to be ascertained is, In what sense does Paul use the term the veil? All hangs on the answer to this question, as he is the one who makes use of the language now under examination. As we have seen, with the single exception of the three references by the evangelists to the veil on the day of the crucifixion, Paul is the only New Testament writer who makes use of the term. And in accordance with the accuracy with which he is writing he finds it necessary to discriminate between the two. And inasmuch as he once specifies the second veil when he refers to that, we must understand him as referring to the first veil when not thus specified. To understand otherwise, is to charge Paul with a degree of looseness in his writings altogether unpardonable in a man of his ability and education, and altogether unaccountable in one who wrote moreover by the inspiration of God.

We therefore assert that it matters not how other writers use the term. The evangelists by the veil may mean the second veil, as they doubtless do; and if other writers had used it in the same sense a thousand times, it would in no wise affect the case in hand; for Paul has shown us plainly how he uses the term, and that is all we have to know to understand his writings in reference to it. And when he means the second he says the second, and when he does not specify, he means the only remaining one, which is the first.

Now to show finally and conclusively that this is so, we quote Heb. 10:19, 20: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest [Greek, holies, plural,] by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh." Paul here assures us that Christ by his flesh, his sacrifice, has consecrated a new and living way for us through the veil. And into what does that way through the veil lead? Into the holy places, plural, both of them, the holy as well as the most holy. Therefore to go into the holy place or first apartment is to go through or within the veil, as Paul uses the term. And this passage is exactly parallel with Heb. 6:19, 20. Christ, our forerunner, is entered within the veil to make this living way for us into the holy places. But Christ does not minister, nor open the way for us, in both of the places at once. This would outrage all order and do violence to the type. He ministers in the first apartment till the prophetic days expire, then goes within the second veil to accomplish the last division of his solemn work, which is to cleanse the sanctuary, and make once for all a disposition of the sins of those who have sought pardon through his blood.

Here are harmony, reason and Scripture, these three, and the greatest of these is Scripture. Why will persons willfully shut their eyes to the light?

D. A.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirtieth Paper.—Between the Cherubim.

AND still another attempt is made to find an objection to the view we advocate, that Christ commenced his ministry as priest in the first apartment of the sanctuary in Heaven when he ascended up on high. It is framed on this wise: God is spoken of as dwelling between the cherubim. These cherubim were on the ends of the mercy-seat which was the cover of the ark; and the ark was always in the most holy place, or second apartment of the sanctuary. This, therefore, being God's fixed location, when Christ ascended up to the right hand of the Father on high, he of necessity entered where God was, into the most holy place, and hence did not commence his ministry in the holy place.

The passages which contain the expression, "Between the cherubim," are the following: Ex. 25:22; Num. 7:69; 1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Sam. 6:2; 2 Kings 19:15; Isa. 57:16; Ps. 80:1; 99:1; Eze. 10:2, 6, 7. It will be noticed that all are from Old Testament writers. The first four refer directly to the ark of the tabernacle. Of the remaining passages, two refer to the one expression made by Ezekiel in his prayer, and two are used by David, the three being evidently borrowed from the sanctuary service. The passages from Ezekiel record what he saw when he had visions of God.

Before these passages can be made available for our opponents, it must be shown,

First, That God immovably fixed himself to that position between the cherubim on the ark, and did not meet or commune with his people from any other place. But this is contrary to the record; for at times he met both with Moses and the children of Israel at the door of the tabernacle. Ex. 29:42, 43; 33:9, 10. And again, was God dwelling between the cherubim of the ark when the sons of Eli rashly took it out to battle, and it fell into the hands of the Philistines? It must be shown,

Secondly, That even though God did meet and commune with his servants from between the cherubim of the ark here below, so much so that it is spoken of as his dwelling-place, it must also be so in Heaven. But this would not inevitably follow; for in his intercourse with men this might be the best mode of procedure, but not necessarily so in Heaven. It must be shown,

Thirdly, That the cherubim between whom God dwells on high are the cherubim of the ark. But this cannot be shown; for it appears from Ezekiel's vision of God and his throne, in Eze., chapters 1 and 10, that the throne of God itself is a living throne, supported by the most exalted order of cherubim. And the most appropriate representation of this fact that could be given here on earth was to designate the locality between the cherubim over the ark, as his dwelling place in his ordinary intercourse with the human race. It must be shown,

Fourthly, That God's throne in Heaven is immovably fixed to one place. But this cannot be shown; for in Ezekiel's vision above referred to it is represented as full of awful life and unapproachable majesty, and moving whithersoever the Spirit was to go. And as in the earthly tabernacle, so here, it sometimes stood at the door of the Lord's house. Eze. 10:18, 19. It must be shown, Fifthly, That the declaration that Christ ascended to the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the Heavens, signifies locality, rather than position in respect to exaltation and power. But this cannot be shown; for even when Christ appears coming in the clouds of heaven, he is said to be sitting on the right hand of power. Matt. 27:64.

Thus the argument of our opponents fails them at every step.

We have seen from Ezekiel's sublime description that God's throne is in itself a throne of life and motion. The Creator of the universe, the Upholder and Ruler of all this vast realm, is not immovably confined to any one locality. And yet he dwells between the cherubim, because his throne itself is upheld by those wonderful beings. We now have evidence to show that when Christ commenced his ministry above, on the throne of his Father, that throne was in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary.

1. John says, in the 4th chapter of the Revelation, "After this I looked, and, behold, a door was opened in Heaven." He thus introduces us, not merely into Heaven, but into some apartment in Heaven. Therein he saw the throne of God, in all its majesty and glory, and before the throne he beheld seven lamps of fire, which are, beyond question, the antitype of the candlestick with its seven lamps, which had its position in the holy place or first apartment of the sanctuary. Christ is then introduced into the scene, described both as the lion of the tribe of Judah, and as a lamb as it had been slain, signifying at once his sacrificial work as priest, and his position of exaltation and power with God; and he takes the book sealed with seven seals, and begins to break the seals and unroll the book for the benefit of his people. And the first seal opens with the first, or apostolic, church. Thus the scene opens with the commencement of Christ's ministry, and at that time the throne of God was in the first apartment of the sanctuary, where the antitype of the golden candlestick was seen.

2. This view of the matter is rendered sure by the testimony of Rev. 11:19, which declares that the temple of God where the ark is, the most holy place, was not opened till the sounding of the seventh trumpet, near the end of all earthly kingdoms. The scene of Rev. 4, where John first beheld the throne of God, was therefore certainly not in the most holy place.

3. The opening of the investigative Judgment is brought to view in Dan. 7:9, 10. And it is said that at that time "the Ancient of days did sit." The word here rendered "did sit," signifies both in Hebrew and in the Greek of the Septuagint, according to Gesenius and Liddell and Scott, "to sit enthroned," or "as judges to sit in court." Had not the Ancient of days been seated upon his throne before this? Certainly; but the language clearly indicates that he here took a new position for a new purpose. Some move is therefore made on the part of the Father when the Judgment scene opens. He then occupies a position which he did not occupy before.

4. The relation of Christ to this move on the part of the Father, is indicated in verse 13: "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom," &c. This is not Christ's second coming to earth; for the Ancient of days is not here; but he came to the Ancient of days in Heaven; and came to receive dominion and a kingdom, which he will receive at the conclusion of his work as priest, but will not receive till then. This therefore brings to view a scene to transpire near, and at, the conclusion of Christ's work as priest. We have seen Christ on the throne with the Father in the holy place. But we have seen the Father changing his position and opening a new scene, a scene of Judgment. To do this he must first move to the place where this scene is to transpire. Then Christ, as the second essential actor in the scene, is escorted by a multitude of heavenly beings, surrounding him like clouds of glory, into the presence of the Ancient of days in his new position, according to Dan. 7:13. On the supposition of a change of ministration from the holy to the most holy place of the Heavenly Sanctuary near the close of Christ's work therein, all these statements and movements have their appropriate place and explanation; but on no other ground can they be harmonized or explained.

Thus it becomes more and more apparent that the view that Christ entered the most holy place when he ascended, is at every step at war with both reason and Scripture; while every objection to the view that he commenced his ministry in the first apartment vanishes at the slightest touch; for God can dwell between the cherubim, and Christ be at his right hand, and both be, nevertheless, in the holy place.

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-first Paper.—The Priesthood of Christ.

We rest with all confidence upon the great fact now fully proved in the course of these articles, that there is in Heaven a real, literal, sanctuary, the antitype of the earthly building, called the temple, the temple of God, and the temple of Heaven; and that Christ when he ascended up on high, opened his grand work of priestly ministry in the first apartment of that Heavenly tabernacle, in accordance with the work of the earthly priests, who, ministering unto the example and shadow of Heavenly things, began their round of service in the first apartment of the earthly building.

And this fact established, is a nail in a sure place. Other conclusions of overwhelming importance to the church and the world, follow inevitably and in quick succession, as we shall presently see.

We pause a moment, before passing, to notice one more query, the only remaining one now coming to mind as pertaining to this subject previous to the opening of Christ's ministry in Heaven.

The work in the typical sanctuary virtually came to an end when the real sacrifice was offered upon the cross, and the veil of the temple was rent in twain from top to bottom. It was of no account for the sinner to present, any longer, his victims there. But Christ did not ascend for forty-three days after this, and of course could not commence his ministry before his ascension. And the question is asked what the condition of the world was during that time. With no service of any virtue here upon the earth, and the work in the Heavenly sanctuary not yet commenced, is there not a perplexing break of at least 43 days and probably of three years and a half to the end of the 70 weeks, during which the sinner was left without a mediator?

In answering this, we might go back to the time before the earthly tabernacle was erected, and before a regular order of priesthood was instituted, even to those offerings in reference to which Adam and Eve were instructed, when sin had forced them to turn their backs on holy Eden in the world's earliest infancy. No priests were then ordained; the sinner presented his offering in his own behalf. There were no holy places laid open, and no priestly work in Heaven. Yet the offerings there made, if offered in a proper manner, were as efficacious as any offered at any time previous to Christ. The great offering was not made, but these all looked forward in faith to it; and faith in the Redeemer to come gave them all their virtue.

It may be said that during these antecedent ages, though there was no ministry in Heaven, men had effectual sacrifices which they could offer, which they could not do after the veil of the temple was rent and its services ceased. Very true; but that very moment they had a sacrifice provided for them, the merits of which they could present to God in their behalf. There was really no break in the work. The two systems, typical and antitypical, touched each other upon the cross. There the shadow, all the way from Eden down, met the substance, and there was no blank between the two. So as men by their sacrifices could manifest their faith in a Redeemer to come, though there was no ministration going on in Heaven, and as those offerings were efficacious up to the cross, so from that very moment men could manifest their faith in a sacrifice which had been offered, though the actual commencement of Christ's work as priest might still for some years be delayed.

The way thus being all cleared up to this important division of the subject, let us consider a moment the nature of that priesthood upon which Christ now entered. The work in the earthly tabernacle was performed by mortal men, subject to disease and death, and was hence cumbered with such imperfections as were inseparable from the defective instruments by which it was performed. The priesthood of Christ is a superior priesthood, in which the imperfections of the earthly system find no analogy. This may be stated in a few particulars:—

1. Christ is a priest after the order of Melchisedec, and not after the order of Aaron. Heb. 5:8.

2. Perfection was not of the Levitical priesthood; for if it had been, says Paul, what further need was there that another priest should arise after the order of Melchisedec, and not after the order of Aaron. Heb. 7:11.

3. Those priests were many; because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death; but this man continueth ever, and hath an unchangeable priesthood. Verses 23, 24.

4. It was necessary for the priests of the house of Levi, to offer up sacrifices daily, embracing all the various offerings that were made by those who had transgressed. But all this Christ did by one act when he offered up himself. Heb. 9:25, 26, 28; 10:10, 12, 14.

5. The round of service in the earthly tabernacle was many times repeated; but the ministry of Christ is accomplished once for all. Heb. 9:11, 12, 24, 26; chapter 10.

6. All the blood which was offered in the former dispensation, was offered for past transgressions only, and made no provision for the future; while the merits of that blood which was shed on Calvary applied not to the past alone but to the future also. Heb. 9:14, 15.

7. As the blood of Christ is the only blood ministered in connection with the Heavenly sanctuary, whether by actual presentation or by virtue of its merits, is immaterial, the same blood must be ministered in both apartments.

blood must be ministered in both apartments.

8. As long as Christ fills the office of priest, so long he is mediator between God and man.

The chief difference, then, between the priestly work of Christ and that of the Levitical order, results from these facts: that Christ has but one offering to make for his entire ministry; that he ever lives and hence need not repeat his work, but perform it once for all, that his offering pertains to the future as well as to the past; and that it does make perfect, or take away really and absolutely, the sins of, those who avail themselves of its merits. There is nothing in the fact that Christ is a priest after the order of Melchisedec and not after the order of Aaron, to show that he does not perform a work exactly like that performed by Aaron, as near as the perfect things of Heaven may resemble the imperfect things of earth. And Paul assures us that he does perform just such a work; for he says that the Aaronic priesthood in their work were simply acting out the shadow of the work performed by Christ in Heaven.

The conclusion becomes evident, therefore, that as the sins of the people were borne into the earthly sanctuary in type through the blood of beasts, they are now borne into the heavenly sanctuary in reality through the blood of Christ. A comparison of Leviticus and Hebrews will make this plain.

The blood of all the offerings, it appears, was not borne into the sanctuary by the priest, and sprinkled before the vail. It was the blood of some of the offerings called sin-offerings which was thus treated. Of these offerings, Wm. Smith, in his Dictionary of the Bible, says:—

"The sin-offering represented that covenant as broken by man, and as knit together again by God's appointment, through the 'shedding of blood.' Its characteristic ceremony was the sprinkling of the blood before the vail of the sanctuary, the putting some of it on the horns of the altar of incense, and the pouring out of all the rest at the foot of the altar of burnt offering. The flesh was in no case touched by the offerer; either it was consumed by fire without the camp, or it was eaten by the priest alone in the holy place, and everything that touched it was holy. This latter point marked the distinction from the peace-offering, and showed that the sacrificer had been rendered unworthy of communion with God. The shedding of the blood, the symbol of life, signified that the death of the offender was deserved for sin, but the death of the victim was accepted for his death by the ordinance of God's mercy. . . . Accordingly we find (see quotation from the Mishna in Outr. De Sacr. i. c. xv., § 10) that, in all cases it was the custom for the offerer to lay his hand on the head of the sin-offering, to confess generally or specially his sins, and to say, 'Let this be my expiation.' Beyond all doubt, the sin-offering distinctly witnessed that sin existed in man, that 'the wages of that sin was death,' and that God had provided an atonement by the vicarious suffering of an appointed victim."

Provision was made for all to present the kind of offering, the blood of which was borne into the sanctuary, and sprinkled before the vail. First, for the priest. Lev. 4:3-12. Secondly, for the whole congregation, collectively. Verses 13-21. Thirdly, for the ruler. Verses 22-26. And, fourthly, for any one of the common people. Verses 27-35.

In Lev. 0:30, we read: "And no sin-offering whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten. It shall be burnt in the fire." Now it appears from Paul's testimony to the Hebrews, that of all the offerings, those sin-offerings, the blood of which was carried into the sanctuary, and their bodies burned without the camp, especially prefigured the offering of our Lord. He says, Heb. 13:11: "For the bodies of these beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate." Of these offerings Christ was especially the antitype. And as by these the sins of the people were anciently transferred to the sanctuary (for Paul says this blood was borne in there for sin), so through the blood of Christ, which is ministered wholly in the sanctuary above, our sins are transferred to that heavenly temple.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-second Paper.—Cleansing of the Heavenly Sanctuary.

A PORTION of the evidence was presented last week to show that our sins are transferred to the Heavenly sanctuary through the blood of Christ. This is still further confirmed by 1 Pet. 2:24: "Who [Christ] his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree." On the cross Christ bore our sins as a sacrifice. In this sense he bears them at no other time or place. Here he was set forth as the Lamb of God that taketh [margin, beareth] away the sin of the world." John 1:29. Here he was offered as the "propitiation for the sins of the whole world." But how much is implied in these expressions that he bare our sins on the tree, and that he is the Lamb that taketh away the sin of the world? Simply that here a sacrifice was provided the merit of which was sufficient to avail with God to cancel the guilt of the entire world; that here an offering was given upon which all who would might lay their sins. But if none had come or should come to Christ, his offering would have been in vain. Whether or not his sacrifice shall be of benefit in any individual case, depends on the action of that individual.

Having provided the sacrifice, Christ commences his work as priest in the sanctuary above, and the invitation is sent out to all the world, Come unto me for pardon and everlasting life. The way of our coming is described in Acts 20:21. "Repentance toward God, and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ." We confess our sins to God through Christ as our sacrifice. As the penitent in the former dispensation laid his sins upon his victim, by confessing over him his transgressions, so we lay our sins upon Christ by confessing them to God through him. Thus the confession and offering of the sinner of old finds its antitype in our confession of sin to God through Christ. By the Mosaic offering the sin was borne into the earthly sanctuary; by faith in Christ as our offering, and by our confessions through him, we transfer our sins to the sanctuary in Heaven, where he ministers for us. Thus the Lord carries forward the great work which he commenced when he bore the sins of the world at his death, by pleading the cause of penitent sinners through his blood shed in their behalf. And thus there is in this dispensation, as in the former, a transfer of sins; there in figure, here in fact. There is nothing strange or fanciful in this. Every one can easily understand it. Such was the service of the type which was a shadow of the Heavenly things; and such therefore is the Heavenly ministration itself.

As in the case of sins transferred to the earthly tabernacle, the question arose, What became of those sins? we have here the same question to answer respecting the sins transferred through Christ to the Heavenly sanctuary: What is to become of these sins? Do they remain there forever? No; they will be removed just as they were in the type; for the Heavenly sanctuary is to be cleansed even as was the earthly.

That sins are transferred to the sanctuary is evident from the fact that there exists a necessity for its cleansing; and there can be nothing there but the presence of sin to render such a work necessary. We look to the type. A work of cleansing was performed every year in the most solemn manner by divine appointment. Why was this? What was there to render the cleansing of that sanctuary necessary? Into the most holy no man entered but the high priest, and he but once a year. In a place so sacredly guarded, could there have been anything physically impure? By no means. And yet that sanctuary, the most holy as well as the holy, had to be cleansed. Again we ask the reader, and especially the objector, to ponder well the question, Why? But one answer can be returned. The sins of the people were represented there; and from their presence it must be freed. And this work of cleansing, as we have seen, was not a purification from material uncleanness, but simply a ceremony by which imputed sins were removed and borne away forever.

So in the antitype. There is nothing literally impure or unclean in the Heavenly sanctuary. But the sins of all those who have sought pardon through the merits of Jesus have been transferred there; and these must be removed. This is its cleansing. No other is brought to view. In reference to no other act or ceremony is the expression "cleansing of the sanctuary" ever used. No mind can fail to understand this, and none need to revolt at the idea.

We have already referred to Paul's testimony in Heb. 9:22-24, which forever settles this point. We scarcely need repeat that the burden of Paul's argument is remission, which is the removal of sin. He shows in these verses that the earthly sanctuary had to be cleansed because sin was to be remitted, and that it must therefore be accomplished with blood. He then explicitly states that it was necessary for the same reason that the Heavenly sanctuary should undergo a cleansing of the same nature, and by the same means, only that now the sacrifice was infinitely better, being the blood of Christ, instead of the blood of beasts. On this point we need not longer dwell. No statement is needed to add to such a plain declaration by the apostle, no additional light is called for to help the rays of the noon-day sun.

It would seem that no one can now fail to understand the nature of the cleansing of the sanctuary. It is accomplished by blood not by fire. It is a part of Christ's work as priest, not as king. It is the ministration performed in the most holy place to complete the round of service, and end the work.

This then is what was to take place at the end of the 2300 days when the sanctuary was to be cleansed. But some still cling to the idea that the sanctuary of which this is said, the sanctuary of Dan. 8:14, must be the very sanctuary that Daniel had in view, in the land of Palestine, not a sanctuary in Heaven. In reply we point the objector to the fact that there is no sanctuary now in Palestine. There was none there when the 2300 days ended in 1844. And how can a sanctuary be cleansed that does not exist? They must first show a sanctuary there, before they can talk of its cleansing. Still they ask, If a man should promise to cleanse a meeting-house in Battle Creek which had become defiled, and then should go and cleanse one in Detroit, would that be fulfilling the promise? Such a question betrays at once their utter misapprehension of the question. In the first place the cleansing of the sanctuary is not made necessary by its being trodden under foot. It has reference to another feature of the question entirely. In the answer to the question enough was given for us to know, namely the time when the closing scene in its work should commence, which after a brief but indefinite space of time would bring us to the end. Secondly, the sanctuary in Palestine, and the sanctuary in Heaven, are not like two meeting-houses, one in Battle Creek and the other in Detroit, having no connection with each other. These are counterparts of each other. They stand as type and antitype. When one had fulfilled its design, it gave place to the other, which thenceforward became the sanctuary. The first was given to lead us to the second, and instruct us in reference thereto. Therefore whatever is said in reference to the sanctuary which applies to the former dispensation, it has reference to the sanctuary of that dispensation; and whatever applies to this dispensation, it has reference to that which is the sanctuary of this dispensation, namely, the sanctuary in Heaven. But as we have shown the 2300 days reach far down into this dispensation; and consequently the sanctuary to be cleansed at the end of those days is the sanctuary of this dispensation, the tabernacle on high.

This is illustrated by what is said of the host. The host was to be trodden under foot the whole length of time covered by the vision. Who were the host, the people of God, when Daniel wrote? The Jews. But the vision reaches over into this dispensation, and who are the host, the people of God, now? The Jews? No; but Christians who are called in by the gospel. When the dispensation changed, the Jews were no longer recognized as the host, but Christians are now such, and to them Dan. 8:13 now applies. So likewise when the new covenant was introduced, the sanctuary of the vanished dispensation is no longer recognized as the sanctuary of the Bible, but the true sanctuary in Heaven which then took its place. And to this, Dan. 8:14 now applies.

To return to the illustration of our opponents. If it was arranged that a meeting-house in Battle Creek should be the meeting-house of a certain society for ten years, and then it should be destroyed, and give place to a meeting-house in Detroit which should thenceforward for ten years be the meeting-house of that society, and at the end of twenty years the meeting-house of that society should be cleansed, to which would it apply? To the meeting-house in Battle Creek, which had been destroyed? or to the meeting-house in Detroit, which was the meeting-house of the society at that time? To the one in Detroit, of course. This would be an illustration adapted to the subject of the sanctuary; for this is just what the Bible asserts in relation to it. It said that while the former dispensation lasted, the earthly sanctuary should be the sanctuary connected with God's worship, that then that sanctuary should be destroyed and give place to the true tabernacle and sanctuary in Heaven which the Lord pitched and not man which should thenceforward be the sanctuary of God's worship and of this dispensation; and finally that at the end of 2300 days, 1813 years and six months down in this dispensation the sanctuary should be cleansed. What sanctuary? The earthly one which had served its purpose, been destroyed, vanished away with the system to which it belonged, and had given place to the new? No; but the sanctuary of this dispensation, of course. It is only when thus stated that this is a fair illustration of the subject. But thus stated it is taken out of the hands of the objector; for it sets forth just the point which we maintain. The sanctuary in Heaven is therefore the one to be cleansed at the end of the 2300 days.

Striking about for some other pretext to object to our conclusion, our opponents next assert that the language "then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," means that the cleansing should be finished at the end of the 2300 days whereas we assert that then it just begins. The answer to this is not long nor difficult. The cleansing of the sanctuary, as we have seen occupies a space of time; and in speaking of such events, the Bible brings us to the beginning of the work not to its close. It does not say then shall the sanctuary have been cleansed, but then shall it be cleansed. When the Scriptures speak of accomplished events, they so express it, as the two witnesses, Rev. 11:7: "When they shall have finished their testimony," or Christ, 1 Cor. 15:24, "when he shall have delivered up the Kingdom." But when they say "Then shall be great tribulation," Matt. 24:21 it means that it shall then begin and continue and when they say, "Then shall that wicked be revealed," 2 Thess. 2:8, it means then shall begin the period during which he will stand revealed before the world. So, "then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," simply refers to the time when the work shall commence.

Therefore are we held inevitably to the conclusion that at the end of the 2300 days, in the autumn of 1844, the ministration of the sanctuary above was changed from the holy to the most holy place. Then the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament. Rev. 11:19 There the Ancient of days then placed his throne and "did sit," as the prophet Daniel saw. Dan. 7:9. Then, escorted by the retinue of holy angels, Christ, our priest and mediator, moved into the inner temple to receive from his Father the result of his long work of mediation for man. Dan. 7:13, 14. Then opened the solemn Judgment scene of verses 9 and 10 of Daniel 7. Then the seventh angel sounded, and the work of finishing the mystery of God began. Rev. 10:7. These are the sublime events involved in the cleansing of the sanctuary which then commenced. In the scene now presented before us we behold the climax of the grandeur, glory, and solemnity that center in this great subject.

c. a.

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth: Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., FIFTH-DAY, AUG. 17, 1876.

JAMES WHITE,
J. M. ANDREWS,
URIAN SMITH, } . . . EDITORS.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-third Paper---A Work of Judgment.

THE cleansing of the sanctuary leads us into a series of subjects of the most important and timely character, subjects which explain some statements of the Scriptures which are otherwise obscure, harmonize lines of prophecy otherwise disconnected, and answer some otherwise unanswerable queries which arise concerning events connected with that crowning of all events, the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

For instance, when Christ comes a change passes instantaneously upon the people of God, and all others are passed by. The righteous who are in their graves are raised in power, glory, and immortality, and the rest of the dead are left in their graves for a thousand years, and the righteous who are living are changed from mortality to immortality, while the rest of the living are given over to perdition under the judgments of the Almighty. And this change for God's people is wrought instantaneously at the last trump. But before this change can be wrought it must be decided who are the people of God, and who are the incorrigibly wicked. This point must be decided before the Lord comes; for there is no time then for investigation and decision of character. But this work of decision is a work of judgment; and such a work of judgment must transpire before the Lord comes.

We know of no system of belief which has a place for this preliminary work of judgment, except that held by S. D. Adventists. It has been a source of perplexity to many, and to meet it, they have been obliged to resort to such unscriptural conclusions as these: 1. That all the race, good and bad, are raised indiscriminately together; whereas the Bible plainly declares that there are a thousand years between the resurrection of the righteous and that of the wicked. Rev. 20: 5. 2. That when the righteous are raised, they are raised mortal, judged and then changed; whereas the Bible assigns no place for any such work of investigative judgment after Christ appears, and moreover, explicitly declares that the righteous are raised in power, in glory, with spiritual bodies, and in incorruption. 1 Cor. 15: 42-44. No system which contradicts such plain statements of the Bible can be worthy of the least credit.

The subject of the sanctuary, correctly understood, removes all these difficulties. The cleansing of the sanctuary provides the very place for this preliminary work of judgment, and brings to view a work of just exactly this nature.

The cleansing of the sanctuary is a work of judgment. A few considerations will make this proposition plain. The priesthood of Christ continues up to the time when he takes his own throne as king. He passes directly from the first position to the second; and when he takes his position as king, his work as priest is done. Now, his work as priest, being for the purpose of gathering out from the human family a people for his name and kingdom, his priestly office cannot close till this result is declared. When he ends his work, it will be decided who have availed themselves of his mediation, and have thus become his people. It is the putting away of sin that determines this; but this is the very work that Christ performs in the most holy in the conclusion of his ministry. He here puts away the sins of his people; and this is the cleansing of the sanctuary.

This involves an examination of the books; for the rule that God has laid down in this matter is that all judgment shall be rendered according to each man's works as they stand upon the record. "And the dead," says John, "were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." Rev. 20: 12. From the reference in this and numerous other passages, to the books, the book of life, the names or the things written therein, and the blotting out to take place, but one conclusion can be drawn; and that is that a faithful record is kept of each one's actions, the thoughts words and deeds that make up the texture of his character, and the course of his life. If the person repents, all these recorded sins are to be blotted out of this book. So Peter declared, "Repent ye therefore and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." Acts 3: 19. Of the same class Christ speaks in Rev. 3: 5: "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels." Again he says, "Whosoever, therefore, shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in Heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in Heaven." Matt. 10: 32, 33; Luke 12: 8, 9. And this is when Christ is about to be sent the second time to earth, Acts 3: 20, and when he is prepared to come as a thief on all them that do not watch. Rev. 3: 3.

The two divisions of this great proposition are thus established: If we secure the pardon of our sins, the time comes just before the end when these sins are blotted out of the books, and our names are retained in the Lamb's book of life, and the Saviour confesses our names to the Father as those who have accepted of salvation through him. Our cases are then decided, and we are sealed for everlasting life. If, on the other hand, we do not repent, our sins are not blotted out of the record where they stand, but our names are blotted out of the book of life, and Christ denies our names before his Father, as those who have slighted his mercy, and are not entitled to everlasting life through him.

Thus the cleansing of the sanctuary involves the examination of the records of all the deeds of our lives. It is an investigative Judgment. Every individual of every generation from the beginning of the world thus passes in review before the great tribunal above. So Daniel, describing the opening of this scene, calls it a work of Judgment, and expressly notices the fact that the books were opened. Dan. 7: 8, 10.

This work has been going forward in the sanctuary above since the end of the prophetic period in 1844. Beginning, according to the natural order, with the earliest generation, the work of examination passes on down through all the records of time, and closes with the living. Then the sealing message, Rev. 7, will have performed its work, and all antecedent questions being determined, all cases decided, everything will be ready for the coming of the Lord.

For nearly thirty-two years already this solemn work has been in progress. How much longer can it continue? Nearly thirty-two years of this solemn work of investigative Judgment already past, and yet how few of all the masses of the earth dream of their position. O church of Christ, lift up the voice like a trumpet, sound an alarm which shall cause all the inhabitants of the land to hear and tremble; for the great day of the Lord is near, and hasteth greatly.

v. s.

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth: Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, NICH., FIFTH-DAY, AUG. 24, 1876.

JAMES WHITE,
J. M. ANDREWS,
URIAH SMITH, } . . . EDITORS.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-Fourth Paper—The Opening of the Temple.

"And the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. 11:19.

We have seen that the temple in Heaven is the sanctuary, the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man. The opening of this temple brought to view in this passage, is that which reveals the ark of God. The ark had its position invariably in the second apartment. This, then, is the opening of the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary. And when does this take place? At the sounding of the seventh trumpet. Rev. 11:15. The events mentioned to take place under this trumpet are, 1, the anger of the nations, verse 18, commencing especially when so many European thrones toppled to the dust in 1848, and continuing to the present time. 2. "And thy wrath is come," referring to the seven last plagues in the near future. 3. The kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ. Verse 16. This will be fulfilled when Christ takes the throne of his kingdom. 4. "And the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth." Verse 18. This must reach over to the final destruction of the wicked at the end of the 1000 years. 5. "And the temple of God was opened in Heaven." We know from the argument on the sanctuary and the 2300 days, that this took place in 1844. And, conversely, as it does not take place till the sounding of the seventh trumpet, the last of that series, we know it must take place somewhere near the end, and could not have taken place at the opening of this dispensation, as some vainly imagine. This, then, is the earliest event that takes place under the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and hence the inference is necessary that the seventh trumpet commenced to sound at that point. The 2300 days ended, the seventh trumpet began to sound, the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and the work of the cleansing of the sanctuary was entered upon.

And what results from the opening of this temple? "There was seen," says John, "in his temple the ark of his testament." He does not say simply, I saw it, but it "was seen." John standing here as the representative of the church, clearly teaches that the church would then by faith behold the ark in the tabernacle above. The sight of the ark suggests one thing, and one only, and that is the law of God contained in the ark. The ark was called the ark of the testament because it contained the tables of the testimony which God gave to Moses, the ten commandments. It owed its name to the fact that the tables of the law were therein. Had it not contained the tables it never would have been called the ark of the testament; and whenever and wherever it is called the ark of the testament, it is proof that the law of God is there.

With these remarks we ask the reader to mark well the fact that the ark as seen in Heaven by John, down under the sounding of the seventh trumpet, is still called "the ark of his testament." What does this prove? It proves that that ark in Heaven contains the law. What law? The same law that gave it that name in the days of Moses; namely, the tables of the testimony, the ten commandments. And how may we suppose that those commandments read in the ark in Heaven? Just the same, of course, as they read in the ark on earth. Of this there can be no question. This forever precludes the idea of any change in the law. Talk about changing or abolishing the law? Not until we can change or abolish those tables in Heaven. Oh! what a vain and futile work are they engaged in, who are laboring to show that the law of God, or even the fourth commandment, has been in the least respect altered, much less done away.

The conclusion is therefore not only plain and scriptural, but beautiful as well, that as the ark in Heaven is the great original, after which the ark on earth was formed, so the law in the ark above is the great original, of which the law given on earth was but a transcript or copy.

This great truth the poet, in the following language, has well expressed:—

"For God well knew perdition's son
Would ne'er his precepts love;
He gave a duplicate alone,
He kept his own above."

Having now found a sanctuary, an ark, and a law in Heaven, where Christ is ministering, another thought is at once suggested, in relation to the object to which the earthly and Heavenly ministrations have reference. We have seen the relation which these two ministrations sustain to each other, namely, that of type and antitype. The first was a figure, the second the reality; the first a shadow, the second the substance. But everything pertaining to that dispensation was not a figure and a shadow. There was something there real; and that was sin. Men were actual transgressors. But sin, or transgression, is a violation of law. Hence there was a real law there which they were guilty of breaking; and that was the law contained in the ark, the ten commandments. All that was typical was the ministration connected with that law. There was real law, and actual sin; and the ministration, the service of the priesthood, was for the purpose of taking away that sin. But this could be done only in figure; for the blood of beasts, the only blood they had to offer, Paul says, could not in reality take away sin. But this typical ministration looked forward to one to come, to be performed by our Lord, which should in reality take away sin.

The offerings of that time were types of the offering of our Lord. Those offerings had reference to the law contained in the ark. The offering of our Lord must therefore have reference to the law contained in the ark; for what they were in figure, this must be in fact. The idea could not for a moment be conceived that those offerings should have reference to one law, and yet be types of an offering which would have reference to another or a different law. This could not be possible. In this case the one would not and could not be a type of the other. The established relation of type and antitype existing between these offerings shows that they must have reference to identically one and the same law. Therefore, the law in the ark in Heaven, before which Christ ministers, must be, word for word, letter for letter, jot for jot, tittle for tittle, the same as the law that was deposited in the typical ark here upon the earth.

Such is the bearing which the subject of the sanctuary has upon the law of ten commandments. It is an absolute demonstration of their perpetuity and entire immutability. And this is perhaps the reason why those who have set their hearts against the law shut their eyes to the plain light on the subject of the sanctuary. They cannot receive the one, without adopting the other.

The temple has been opened in Heaven, and John says there was seen there the ark of the testament, seen of course, through faith, by the church on earth. What further evidence can we show that this has been fulfilled? We answer, The great movement in behalf of the law now going forward in the land through the efforts of the S. D. Adventists. They have received the light on the subject of the sanctuary. They see the temple opened in Heaven. They behold there the ark, and our Lord making his last offering on the mercy seat, the cover of the ark, in the most holy of the sanctuary on high. They see that the requirements of the law in that ark are neither relaxed nor altered. And they are going forth to vindicate its claims, and lead men to the reform necessary in its observance. This movement has come up in the right time and manner to fulfill the prophecy and confirm the application we make of this important subject.

The temple is opened, and no man can shut it. The ark is seen, and no man can obscure it. The corresponding movement on the earth is in progress, and no man can stop it. Reader, fall into line, and go with us to the kingdom.

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-fifth Paper.—The Mystery of God Finished.

IN last week's article upon the subject of the sanctuary, it was shown that at the time when the 2300 days ended, and the cleansing of the sanctuary commenced, there the temple of God, that apartment where the ark is, was opened; and that that took place under, and marked the commencement of, the sounding of the seventh trumpet. When the seventh trumpet, the last of the series of trumpets which cover the gospel dispensation, sounds, the temple of God is opened in Heaven, and the cleansing of the sanctuary commences.

There is another remarkable prediction concerning what takes place at the sounding of the seventh trumpet which now invites our attention. It was said to John, Rev. 10:7: "But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God shall be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." What is meant by the mystery of God, and its finishing? In a number of passages Paul speaks very definitely concerning the mystery of God. In Eph. 3:3-6, he says: "How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery (as I wrote afore in few words; whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ), which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel."

Here Paul states explicitly that the mystery was made known to him by revelation. In his epistle to the Galatians he tells us what was made known to him by revelation. Gal. 1:11: "But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man; for I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." This is what he had written "afore," or a little before, "in few words." The epistle to the Galatians was written six years before the letter to the Ephesians. And what in Ephesians he calls the mystery made known to him by revelation, in Galatians he calls plainly the gospel as preached to the Gentiles.

Again he says, Eph. 1:9: "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in Heaven, and which are on earth, even in him." Again in Col. 1:23-27, we have this declaration: "Whereof I am made a minister, according to the dispensation of God which is given to me for you, to fulfill the word of God; even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to his saints; to whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is Christ in you the hope of glory." Eph. 3:9: "And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ." Rom. 16:25, 26: "Now to him that is of power to stablish you according to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith."

All these texts speak to the same point, and testify unmistakably to the fact that the mystery of God, the mystery of Christ, &c., is no more nor less than the gospel of Jesus Christ through which the Gentiles are brought in to be members of the commonwealth of Israel and partakers with the household of faith. This being the mystery, its finishing would be the close of the proclamation of the gospel, the completion of the work which it was designed to accomplish. This of course ends probation and finishes up the plan of salvation.

But this, as we have seen, is the very result involved in the cleansing of the sanctuary. That concludes Christ's work as priest, finishes his mediation, decides the cases of all mankind and concludes the work of the gospel.

The reader will now perceive another beautiful link in the faultless chain of harmony which the Bible presents to us on this subject. When the seventh angel sounds, then commences the work called the finishing of the mystery of God. But it will occupy some years; for it is "in the days," years, "of the seventh angel when he shall begin to sound" that this mystery is to be finished. This work will occupy the first years of the sounding of this trumpet. But this trumpet commenced to sound at the end of the 2300 days in 1844, when the temple of God was opened in Heaven. We are now therefore in the period of the finishing of the mystery of God; and this finishing work we find to be the same as the cleansing of the sanctuary there introduced, and the ministration in that apartment of the heavenly temple then opened. Could facts more completely harmonize than these?

The mystery of God was to be finished, said the angel to John, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets. Where had he declared this? This is but a part of the declaration of the angel, which includes the preceding verses: and in these we find him uttering a solemn oath that "time shall be no longer." Rev. 10:6. This cannot mean literal time; for the angel immediately speaks of the days of the seventh angel to succeed. It cannot mean probationary time; for John as a representative of the church, is commissioned to proclaim another message to the people after that. But one other kind of time remains, and that is prophetic time; and to this therefore the passage must refer. But the period of 2300 days is the longest prophetic period given in the Bible, and reaches down to the latest point. Therefore this oath of the angel has its application at the point where the 2300 days terminate; and the expression is equivalent to a declaration that then prophetic time should end, or the 2300 days would terminate. Then the angel states what shall immediately follow; namely, the mystery of God should be finished, as he had declared to his servants the prophets. What had God declared to the prophets should take place at the end of the 2300 days? Why, it had been shown to Daniel that then the sanctuary should be cleansed. Here, then, is where he had declared to his servants the prophets that the mystery of God should be finished; which is the same thing. Such is the unquestionable parallel between these prophecies.

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-sixth Paper.—The Atonement.

In the long retinue of subjects with which the question of the sanctuary stands so intimately connected, and in the understanding of which exerts so controlling an influence, the doctrine of the atonement occupies a prominent place.

We have already seen that the cleansing of the sanctuary, the investigative judgment of the saints, the blotting out, or remission, of sin, and the finishing of the mystery of God, are one and the same thing. We now make the additional statement that this is also the atonement.

The frequency with which the expression is made that Christ atoned for our sins upon the cross, shows how widely this idea is entertained. But this leads to two ultra and fundamental errors. Men have been driven by this idea to the extremes of error in opposite directions, and have spent their time in an unnecessary and fruitless warfare.

The Scriptures plainly declare that Christ died for all. Now with the view that the death of Christ is the atonement, the conclusion is easily reached that the sins of all have been atoned for, and hence that no condemnation can ultimately remain to any. This branch of the argument blossoms at once into Universalism.

But the Scriptures just as plainly assure us that all will not be saved; that some do now, and will in the end, rest under condemnation. For these, of course, no atonement is made; and if the atonement and the death of Christ are the same thing, it follows that his death reaches no farther than the atonement, and hence that he did not die for all, but only for a chosen few. On this branch of the argument we find the bitter fruit of ultra Calvinism.

The subject of the sanctuary relieves us from the false claims of both these errors. The trouble in either case lies in the premise common to both, which is defective; and with a false premise, however sound the reasoning based upon it, it is impossible to reach a correct conclusion. The death of Christ and the atonement are not the same thing. And this relieves the matter of all difficulty. Christ did not make the atonement when he shed his blood upon the cross. Let this fact be fixed forever in the mind.

But does it not say that he bore our sins in his own body on the tree? And as he died for all, did he not thus bear the sins of all? He did, indeed; but in what sense? What office was he fulfilling in the shedding of his blood? For light on this, we turn again to the types. The idea and the doctrine of the atonement are drawn from the typical system.

To reach the atonement several steps were necessary: 1. The confession of sin upon the head of the victim. 2. The sacrifice of the offering. 3. The work of the priest. And this work was performed three hundred and sixty-four days in the year before the day of atonement came. The work of atonement was the last ceremony of the year, and completed the round of sanctuary service. The offering and the service of the priest preceded the atonement. The offering was not the atonement, nor was the service of the priest, until the day of atonement arrived, and the service was commenced in the most holy place of the sanctuary.

The parallel between the earthly and the heavenly sanctuary has been sufficiently drawn to make at once the application. The anti-typical atonement, which is the real removal of sin, was not made when the offering for this dispensation was provided, nor by the service of the priest in the first apartment of the sanctuary, but is accomplished only by the service of the priest in the most holy place, which is the closing work of our Lord's ministration, the cleansing of the sanctuary, and did not commence, as we have seen, till 1844.

In this case, as in the type, the offering and the usual priestly work precede the atonement. But when Christ suffered for us, in what capacity was he acting? Not as our priest, but only as the offering; for he was put to death by wicked hands, even as the victims of old were slain by the sinner. It was as the sacrifice and offering that he bore our sins in his body on the cross. Here the blood was provided with which he was to minister. This was an act preparatory to the priestly work he was to perform; the atonement is the last. Those who make the offering to be the same as the atonement, confound together events that are more than 1800 years apart. The offering was general. Christ died for all the world. The sacrifice was offered to all who would accept of it. But the atonement at the close is specific; it is made only for those who seek the benefits of his redeeming work.

It is not the place here to introduce a dissertation on the subject of the atonement. It is mentioned in this connection simply to show that the great sanctuary question locates the atonement, and guards us against the error of confounding the offering with the atonement, and placing it at the commencement of Christ's ministry, instead of at its close.

But does not Peter say, "Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins"? Acts 2:38; and if sins are remitted in the act of baptism, how can we look forward to a future time for the atonement and remission? So some minds any query. But the text does not say that sins are remitted in baptism. It is only for, or "in order to" remission that this rite is performed. It looks forward to a future time, when all the requirements of God having been complied with in faith, sins will be blotted out, and the times of refreshing come from the presence of the Lord.

It may be asked again if Rom. 5:11, does not say that we have already received the atonement? The word katalage, there rendered atonement, should be rendered reconciliation, as in the margin. Reconciliation is effected between ourselves and God, but the atonement, or the removing of sins, so that they can be remembered no more against us, is the last act of Christ's service performed by the Lord for us.

But are not our sins forgiven now? and, if forgiven, are they not put away? We answer. Forgiving sin and blotting out sin are not the same. Forgiveness is conditional, the condition being that we comply with certain requirements upon which it is suspended, till the end of our probation. If we fail, we stand at last unforgiven, and no atonement can be made for us. The doctrine on this point is stated by Ezekiel, and an illustration is given by the Saviour himself.

The doctrine. Eze. 18:20: "When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them; for his iniquity that he hath done, he shall die." In chapter 33:13, it is added, "All his righteousness shall not be remembered." That is, he shall be treated as though he had never been righteous. But the righteousness of the righteous is by faith; therefore, if he turn and commit iniquity, he shall be treated as if he never had faith; the forgiveness, conditionally extended, is withdrawn.

The illustration. Matt. 18:21-35. We will not take space to quote it, but simply epitomize the facts: A king had a servant who owed him an enormous sum of money; but having nothing wherewith to pay, his lord forgave him the debt; but this same servant had a fellow-servant who owed him a small sum, and having nothing with which to pay, asked to be forgiven the debt. But his fellow-servant would not, but cast him into prison till he should pay all. His lord, hearing of it, immediately withdrew his own offer, and delivered the unmerciful debtor over to the officers till he should pay all that was due. Christ puts the fearful point to this illustration by adding, "So likewise shall my Heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses." This plainly illustrates the conditional nature of forgiveness, and shows how past forgiveness may be nullified by present or future sin.

How, then, if the atonement is yet future, do we receive of its benefits? How are we justified? In reply, we would ask the questioner, How, if the atonement was made on the cross, did those who lived before that time secure its benefits? And just as the people of God who lived and died before Christ could receive the benefits of the atonement if it was made on the cross, just so both they and we can receive its benefits, if it is deferred to be the closing work of this dispensation. It is by faith. The patriarchs were justified by faith, and so died. So with the righteous ever since that day. All their life work, their acts of faith, stand faithfully written out in the heavenly books of record. The time comes for the investigative Judgment, for the last division of Christ's work as priest, for the sanctuary to be cleansed, for sins to be blotted out, for the atonement to be made. The books are opened. Every case is examined. Then the sins of those whose record shows their last acts to have been acts of repentance, faith, and obedience, are atoned for, or blotted out.

U. A.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-seventh Paper.—The Tenth Day of the Seventh Month.

We have seen that the closing work in the sanctuary is the work of atonement. In the type, one day out of the year was allotted to this work, called the day of atonement. This was the tenth day of the seventh month.

It will be noticed that in the fulfillment of the types, scrupulous exactness is observed in reference to the time; that is, the fulfillment occurs in the same month of the year, and on the same day of the month, as that on which the type was set forth. The fulfillment of the types of the spring is recorded in the New Testament, so that we have a divine exposition of this part of the typical system.

Thus, the passover was killed on the fourteenth day of the first month. Ex. 12:6; Lev. 23:5. Christ is our passover; and he was sacrificed for us in the same month and on the same day, the fourteenth day of the first month. 1 Cor. 5:7; Mark 14:12; John 18:39, 40; 19. The sheaf of firstfruits was waved on the sixteenth day of the first month. This met its antitype in the resurrection of our Lord, the first fruits of them that slept, the sixteenth of the first month. 1 Cor. 15:20; Luke 24:21. The feast of weeks, or Pentecost, occurred on the fiftieth day from the offering of the first fruits. The antitype of this feast, the Pentecost of Acts 2, was fulfilled on that very day, fifty days from the resurrection of Christ, in the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the disciples.

The fulfillment of these types shows us these facts: That the great events for which the passover, the day of first fruits, and the Pentecost were respectively noted, met their antitype on the very days of the types. Applying the same principle to the work on the tenth day of the seventh month, we are led to expect the antitype of the great work which characterized that day of atonement, namely, the cleansing of the sanctuary, on the tenth day of the seventh month of that year in which the 2300 days ended, as it was at that point that the sanctuary was to be cleansed.

As those days ended in 1844, an effort was made to find the tenth day of the seventh month, Jewish time, of that year; and it was found to fall on the 22d of October. The historical and numerical arguments on the 2300 days have shown that those days terminated in the autumn of that year; and the argument from the types would confine us to that month and that day. This is why that day was set for the coming of Christ. While it is marvelous that so critical an examination of the types should not have revealed to the Adventists of that time the fact that the cleansing of the sanctuary was not the coming of Christ, nevertheless, their eyes being so holden that they did not perceive this point, and supposing that the cleansing of the sanctuary was inseparably connected with the coming of Christ, they were left no other alternative but to fix that day for his appearing.

In the light of the preceding argument, it is unnecessary to add that all any one had a warrant to conclude was that on that day the great work in the second apartment of the heavenly sanctuary would commence.

Another point should be borne in mind relative to typical fulfillment; namely, that the antitype commences upon the day of the type, but may extend forward a great distance. We are still partaking of Christ our passover, as the church has been for the past eighteen centuries. We are still keeping the feast of unleavened bread. And the Holy Spirit which came down on the day of Pentecost, as the antitype of the feast on that day, still abides with the church of Christ. Read carefully 1 Cor. 5:7, 8; John 14:16. So with the work in the holiest on the day of atonement, the tenth day of the seventh month. Its antitype must commence at that time, and of course must occupy a space of time corresponding to its magnitude and importance.

But right here some set up the claim that the 2300 days do not extend to the cleansing of the sanctuary, but only to the antitypical day of atonement; and that as there were preliminary offerings to be made on that day, before the real work of cleansing the sanctuary, so now, although the 2300 days have ended, we are yet only in that preliminary work, and the cleansing of the sanctuary has not yet commenced.

But few words are needed in reply to this proposition. We do not read anywhere in the Bible of such a period as the antitypical day of atonement. It may be proper enough to apply this expression to the time actually covered by the work of the antitypical cleansing of the sanctuary. We may speak of this as the antitypical day of atonement, confining it to the time while the sanctuary is being cleansed; but as the Bible nowhere uses the expression, so it nowhere countenances the idea of any antitypical day of atonement, extending outside of that work.

To say that the 2300 days do not extend to the cleansing of the sanctuary is to squarely contradict Dan. 8:13, 14, which says that at that time the sanctuary shall be cleansed. It is only by corrupting the words of the text and making it read, "Then shall the antitypical day of atonement commence," instead of, "Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," that any one is able to insert any time between the ending of the days and the commencement of the work of the cleansing of the sanctuary. But who knows that the extra offerings of the day of atonement, as mentioned in Num. 29, were to transpire before the high priest entered the most holy place? Who knows but they were made after the high priest came out of the holiest, at the time mentioned in Lev. 16:23, 14? All this has to be assumed; because the Bible is silent upon it.

But if it could be proved that these offerings were made prior to the work in the most holy place, no such conclusion as is set forth could then be drawn from it; for in some of the types of the spring, to which reference has already been made, as, for instance, the day of first fruits, and the feast of weeks, or the Pentecost, there was the same work of burnt offerings, &c., as on the day of atonement. Lev. 23:10-21; Num. 28:16-31. Yet, in the fulfillment, no allowance of time was made for these; but the antitype commenced on the very day of the type.

From these considerations, it follows that if we are to have a long preliminary work preceding the cleansing of the sanctuary, that work must transpire before the 2300 days end. If these days ended in 1844, then this supposed preliminary work had transpired prior to that time. But if the preliminary work is now going on, the 2300 days have not yet ended. But the evidence that the 2300 days have ended is unanswerable. Therefore, the cleansing of the sanctuary must now be transpiring.

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-eighth Paper.—The Close of Probation.

THE idea seems to have taken strong hold of some minds that when the work of atonement commences in the most holy place of the sanctuary above, mercy can no longer be offered to sinners, but probation must close. And this is offered as an objection to our view that the cleansing of the sanctuary commenced in 1844; for, say they, had that been the case, there could have been no conversions since that time; but as sinners have been converted since that point, they conclude that the cleansing of the sanctuary did not then commence.

But who has said that probation must close when our Lord commences to minister in the most holy place? No inspired writer has said such a thing, and it is not in the type. It is answered, that all offerings for sin were to be presented at the door of the tabernacle; this is true; but an assumption must be superadded to that fact to make it available as an objection; and that assumption is this: that our prayers, supplications and confessions of sin, are our offerings; that consequently we can present them nowhere else than at the door of the tabernacle, and that only while the high priest ministers in the first apartment; for after he has changed his position to the second apartment, no such offerings can longer be accepted, no more mercy be offered, nor probation continued.

Such betray an utter misapprehension of the whole question, for they make our prayers and confessions the antitype of those ancient offerings. What! can any one for a moment suppose that when a person offered up his victim at the earthly tabernacle, it signified that people under the gospel dispensation would pray and confess their sins! This we are indeed to do; but the ancient offerings had no connection with this; for they all pointed forward to Christ; and when our friends will take the right antitype, they may lay as much stress as they please upon the locality where it is to be offered; for Christ also "suffered without the gate." Heb. 13:12.

But if Lev. 17, which is supposed to prove that forgiveness of sin can be found only in the first apartment, be examined as far as verse 7, it will be seen that the great object of the special charge to bring their offerings to the door of the tabernacle, was to prevent the people from sacrificing in the fields to devils. This therefore in no way contradicts the testimony of Lev. 16, that the high priest with the blood of sin offering did make atonement in the holiest because of the transgression of the people in all their sins.

Reference was made last week to those offerings which are supposed to be preliminary to the work of atonement or the cleansing of the sanctuary. As already stated the position is taken by some that we are now in this preliminary work, and the matter of continued probation is got along with on the supposition that these preliminary offerings might have reference to individual cases, and have reference to particular sins.

We inquire for the foundation upon which this supposition rests. It is said that the work in the holiest was not the offering of blood for particular individuals but for all the people. Then we answer that these preliminary offerings to which reference has already been made, were of precisely the same nature. They were not offered by individuals, but like the daily morning and evening sacrifices were offered in behalf of the whole people. So there is just as much mercy implied in the sin offering in the holiest, as in the other offerings presented on that day. We do not deny, but on the other hand fully maintain, that those offerings did imply mercy and the forgiveness of sin for the people. But if so, there was forgiveness of sin to be found while the high priest was presenting his offering in the most holy place.

If it be said that the work in the holiest was to cleanse the sanctuary, we reply that it cannot be said that it was only to cleanse the sanctuary, which would make quite a different statement of it. It is true it was to cleanse the sanctuary, but this is not the whole truth on this point. It was also for the people, availing for sins committed up to the moment of its offering. The high priest made atonement for the sins of the people on that day just as much as he did for his own sins. Read carefully Lev. 16 and Heb. 9:7.

Now we affirm that what was done in the type for the people as a body, is done in the antitype for the people as individuals; and the blood of sin offering uninterposed in the most holy place, avails for their sins, even as it did in the outer apartment till it comes to an application in their individual cases. The twofold work of the high priest in the earthly sanctuary seems fitly to typify this twofold work of our High Priest above. For the sins of the whole church for six thousand years may be disposed of as individual cases, and all the while that this great work is being accomplished, the blood of Jesus may avail for us in the presence of God.

There seems therefore to be no difficulty involved in the idea that the offering of the high priest in the holiest, can avail for sins committed while he is there before God. Some additional considerations go to sustain this idea. In the type, so far as we know, during the whole work of the year, the transgression preceded the offering. The sin was committed before the victim was brought. And no offering was brought to the priest for sins that would be committed in the future. This was at least as much so in the holy place as in the most holy.

But how was it with our Lord? He shed his blood before entering the tabernacle in Heaven at all. And that blood once shed avails for sins committed after his death, just as effectually as for those which, as in the type, were committed before his offering was made. And, as we have seen, this blood is ministered by our Lord in both apartments of the Heavenly sanctuary. Now if its offering in the most holy place cannot avail for any sins, only those committed before it began to be offered there, by parity of reasoning it would follow that it could not avail in the holy place or first apartment, for any sins only those which had been committed before it began to be offered there. And then we should have no forgiveness anywhere in all this spiritual, life-giving dispensation. But this would be proving too much; and any position which involves such an issue, or any line of argument which leads to such a result, must be abandoned.

And finally the testimony of the New Testament is conclusive on the point that the blood of Jesus avails for us in both the holy places of the Heavenly tabernacle: Heb. 10:19: "Having, therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus." The word here rendered, holiest, is plural in the original, signifying holy places; and so Macknight renders it: "Well, then, brethren, having boldness in the entrance of the holy places by the blood of Jesus."

These words are a complete refutation of the doctrine that probation closes with our Lord's entrance within the second vail. We enter into the most holy as well as into the holy by his blood; and we do it with boldness, because of the promise of the forgiveness of our sins. Thank God that we can still thus enter by the blood of Jesus.

We therefore conclude that probation does not end when the work in the most holy place commences, but that it ends with each individual, as the work shall reach his or her individual case. The natural order would seem to be that this work which we have shown to be the investigative Judgment, would begin with the earliest generations of men, that is with those who are now in their graves (but their record lives on high), and so come down through all successive generations till it reaches the living, the decision of whose cases would be the very closing act of this last work. And we may perhaps consider our experience since the cleansing of the sanctuary commenced, a demonstration of this point.

But at length the cases of all the generations of the dead will have been examined, and it will come to the living; and then as each individual case is taken up and passed upon, his probation will end and his destiny be fixed. This is the scene our Lord brings to view when just before his coming he says that this fearful fiat shall go forth: "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still."

And how near are we to this solemn moment? We know not. For thirty-two years already has this closing sanctuary work been in progress. It cannot much longer continue. Its whole duration is to be spanned by one generation. This much we know, as taught by the type, that if we would have Christ's blood avail for us to atone for our sins when our cases shall come up in that grand review, the record must show that we have sincerely repented of all our sins and sought pardon for them through our Advocate on high. In the type the people were required on the day of atonement to afflict their souls. Are we thus faithfully crucifying ourselves to this world, that we may live in the world to come? How solemn is this time! Let us endeavor to feel the force of the following impressive lines of the poet, and give them in our memory the place they so well deserve:—

"There is a time we know not when,
A point we know not where,
That marks the destiny of men,
To glory or despair.

"There is a line by us unseen,
That crosses every path,
The hidden boundary between God's patience and his wrath.

"To pass that limit is to die,
To die as if by stealth;
It does not quench the beaming eye,
Or fade the glow of health.

"The consolation may be still at ease,
The spirit light and gay,
That which is pleasing, still may please,
And care be thrust away.

"But on that forehead God has set
Indelibly a mark
Unseen by man; for man, as yet,
Is blind, and in the dark.

"And yet the doomed man's path below
Like Eden may have bloomed;
He did not, does not, will not, know,
Or feel that he is doomed.

"Oh! where is this mysterious hour
By which our path is crossed,
Beyond which God himself hath sworn
That he who goes—is lost?

"How far may we go on in sin?
How long will God forbear?
Where does hope end—and where begin
The confines of despair?

"An answer from the skies is sent,
To that from God depart,
While it is called to-day, repent,
And harden not your heart."

U. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Thirty-Ninth Paper.—The Seven Last Plagues.

We have now brought our investigation of this subject down to the time when all cases have been examined and decided. The investigative Judgment in the most holy place has then transpired. The mystery of God is finished. Christ is no longer an intercessor. Probation has closed. We have endeavored to anticipate and answer all queries that properly arise in reference to this subject thus far; and we now turn our attention to what follows the work of this awful moment in which are concentrated the bliss and the woes of an eternity.

When Christ ceases to plead, and steps out from between God and rebellious and incorrigible man (for such are all those who at this time stand unreconciled to God), there is nothing to longer stay the vials of long-merited judgments from the shaltery heads of the wicked. Then can be fulfilled the punishment threatened by the third angel's message against the worshippers of the beast, which is the visitation of God's wrath with no mixture of mercy; Rev. 14:10; and then we can have, as described in chapter 16:1, the pouring out of those vials in which is filled up his indignation. Neither of these could be fulfilled while a divine mediator stood between God and man. For so long as God regards the pleading of his Son, which he will do so long as he pleads at all, he could not visit judgment upon men in which no mercy was mingled, nor pour out any vial filled up with wrath alone. This is proof that the third angel's message is addressed to the last generation of men; for on no others can the punishment threatened be visited.

We now propose to show that these judgments are the seven last plagues and that they immediately follow the close of our Lord's work in the sanctuary above.

In the 15th of Revelation, verse 5, John speaks of the opening of the tabernacle of the testimony in Heaven. This is the opening of the most holy place of the sanctuary, as elsewhere explained. After this, seven angels come out of the temple having the seven plagues, represented as seven golden vials full of the wrath of God. They go forth to pour these out upon men, and the temple or sanctuary is filled with smoke, so that no man, or no being, as it might be translated, is able to enter therein, or carry forward a work of ministration there, till the seven plagues of the seven angels are fulfilled.

In verse 1 of this chapter it is said that in these plagues is filled up the wrath of God, which shows that they are poured out after probation is ended, and the son of mercy has withdrawn its last warning ray from this apostate earth.

The statement of verse 8, that no one was able to enter into the temple till the seven plagues are fulfilled, is another proof of the same point, and if possible still more positive. For ever since Christ commenced his work in Heaven, there has been some one in the sanctuary. So this scene has not transpired in the past, and it is certain that the seven last plagues have not yet commenced to be poured out. And until Christ closes forever his service as priest, there will be some being in the sanctuary; for there is no break in this work from beginning to end. So the scene of verse 8 cannot transpire till the sanctuary work is done.

The prototype of this scene is found in Ex. 40:34, 35: "Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. And Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle." This was at the commencement of the typical work here on earth, as the scene described in Rev. 15 is at the close of the real work in Heaven. Thus this work so far as man has to do with it, is bounded at its beginning and close with an overpowering manifestation of the glory of God. He takes sole possession of his own dwelling place, and thus sets his seal to the work which has been accomplished therein.

Thus as we pass out from the sanctuary we are called upon to look at the effects of the close of this work in scenes to transpire here among men. A full dissertation upon the subject of the plagues is not called for here. See the subject discussed more at length in Thoughts on the Revelation, chapter 16. We only glance here at simply the most prominent features.

As we have shown that these plagues are future, and are visited upon men at the close of probation, so there is just as clear evidence that they will be literal. The first falls upon the men who are guilty of that sin which the third message is warning the world against to-day. A sore, noisome and grievous, more corroding than the leprosy, more stinging than blains, more painful than boils, breaks forth upon those who, contrary to light and warning, have received the mark of the beast, and worship his image.

The second vial throws the sea into the most infectious and deadly condition that can be conceived of: it becomes like the blood of a dead man. If this applies to the oceans of our globe, as we see not why it may not, we leave each one's imagination to grapple with the problem, what the condition of the earth would be with three quarters of it enveloped in this deadly substance.

The third plague strikes at a still more vulnerable spot; and the rivers and fountains become blood; as if the earth in her last agony was pouring forth blood from every aperture, even as it oozed from the Saviour's pores, as he wrestled with the world's sin and darkness in lonely Gethsemane. This plague, as perhaps the preceding, will probably be of short duration, as it would seem that none could long survive should this cup of blood be pressed continually to their lips.

The fourth plague lights up the sun with an unwonted flame. Vegetation withers beneath its scorching rays; the streams evaporate; the heat burns to the very bones of men; and an air of desolation spreads over the face of nature. We now have the woes of men increased in a regular ratio: first, sorrow; then, as a consequence, fever and thirst; then blood to quench that thirst; and finally, blinding, glaring, intolerable heat from a sun on fire.

The fifth angel pours the contents of his vial upon the seat of the beast, old Rome, gray and crumbling from its long years of sin. And the kingdom of the beast, the whole Catholic world, is full of darkness. The similar plague on Egypt, produced darkness so gross that it could be recognized by the sense of touch; and in the dark night following the dark day of 96 years ago, even dumb animals were filled with such terror, that horses could not be forced from their stables. So here the darkness summons around the followers of the papal apostasy its legions of undefinable terrors till they dare not stir, but gnaw their tongues for their pains and their sores.

The sixth angel stations himself over the symbolic Euphrates, and pours his vial upon the Turkish empire; and its waters (people), which have for many years already been growing weaker, or drying up, will then be clean dried up, and the way of the kings of the East will be laid open, that they may come up to the battle of the great day of the Lord. Then the spirits of devils from the three great systems of false or apostate religion, the dragon, beast, and false prophet, paganism, popery, and a dead and backslidden Protestantism, go forth to gather the nations to this last strife. And they march up goaded by their own sufferings and torments, the results of the previous plagues, and impelled by devils, to the valley of slaughter, the great antitypical Megiddo.

The seventh angel hurls the contents of his vial around the globe. The air is tainted, and every breathing thing inhales the deadly miasma. Then the voice of God, which has once shaken the earth, is heard again, and shakes both earth and heaven. That voice proclaims the controversy ended. It is done. And the majestic utterance rends the earth with the mightiest convulsion it has ever felt. The cities fall; great Babylon is forced to taste the fierceness of God's wrath; every island flees away, the mountains disappear, and when thus every hiding place and refuge is taken away, the mighty treasures of hail which God has reserved against the time of trouble, against the day of battle and war, Job 38:22, 23, is dashed upon them out of heaven. The last prayer of the wicked is for rocks and mountains to hide them from the presence of the Lajub; but so completely are they transformed by sin, that their last ejaculation is one of blasphemy against God; for the plague of the hail is exceeding great. Thus amid the convulsions of the last day, this poor earth, which has long groaned under the weight of the curse and been torn by the wild disorders of sin, is laid in its coffin for a thousand years.

We ask the sinner to study well this picture, and haste, while a few precious hours of probation linger, to seek a shelter beneath that wing which shall safely cover the righteous during the time of trouble, and bring them everlasting deliverance at its close.

C. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Fortieth Paper.—The Scape-Goat.

AFTER the ministry in the most holy place was accomplished, one thing more remained for the priest to do, before the work was entirely finished. Having by presenting before the law in the ark the blood of the appropriate offering, released from the sanctuary the sins for which that blood made atonement, those sins were cancelled as related to the forgiven sinner, but were not by this act destroyed. The high priest having performed the ministry which took them from the sanctuary, they were left for him to dispose of in a manner plainly pointed out. He came out of the sanctuary, and laying both his hands on the head of the scape-goat, held in waiting at the door, confessed over him "all the iniquities of the children of Israel and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat." Lev. 16:21. This is a plain statement that the sins taken from the sanctuary were transferred to the goat. The goat with these sins upon him was then sent away into the wilderness, into a land of forgetfulness, implying probably the destruction of the goat, in the death of which the sins also perished.

The ceremony of thus sending away the sins of the people in the type, Lev. 16:20-22, has already been noticed. The question now arises, What service in the real ministry of Christ, in the more perfect tabernacle above, answers to this, and how is it to be performed?

The principal point to be decided here is, To what being shall we look as the antitypical scape-goat? When the typical goat, anciently, loaded with the sins of the people, went forth from the camp of Israel, to be heard of no more forever, what did it foreshadow to be fulfilled in this dispensation? Here again we are led to differ materially from the views which have obtained on this subject.

The view very generally held is that the scape-goat typified Christ. Because John the Baptist said, John 1:29, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh [margin, beareth] away the sin of the world," and because it is said of the scape-goat that he "shall bear upon him all their iniquities into a land not inhabited," it is, without other thought, concluded by some that the latter was a type of the former.

From such a view we dissent for the following reasons:—

1. If Christ, in bearing the sin of the world, filled the antitype of the scape-goat, he must have filled this office at the time of the crucifixion; for Peter says of him, "Who his own self bore our sins in his own body on the tree;" 1 Pet. 2:24; and this is the only time when, and in only sense in which, he is said to have borne our sins. But in the type the scape-goat did not bear away the sins of the people till after the cleansing of the sanctuary; hence the antitype of this work cannot take place till after the cleansing of the antitypical sanctuary, which work, as has been proved, did not commence till the termination of the 2300 days in 1844. Dan. 8:14; Heb. 9:23. It is therefore impossible to carry this work back to the crucifixion of Christ, which was even before he commenced his ministry in the Heavenly sanctuary at all. Christ cannot therefore be the antitype of the scape-goat.

2. The scape-goat, after being loaded with sin, was sent away by the priest. He could not therefore be the priest himself. But in this dispensation Christ is priest; he cannot therefore be the antitypical scape-goat to be sent away by the priest. Christ cannot send away himself. The conclusion is hence inevitable that the scape-goat must be some being whom Christ, after placing upon him the sins borne from the sanctuary, shall send away into a land not inhabited.

3. The scape-goat was sent away from Israel, into the uninhabited wilderness. If our Saviour is its antitype, he also must be sent away, not his body alone, as some suppose who refer it to his death, but in his entire being (for the goat was sent away alive) from, not to, nor into, his people; neither into Heaven; for that is not a wilderness, or land not inhabited. But instead of thus being sent away, Christ is to dwell in the midst of his people, the true Israel of faith, forevermore.

4. The scape-goat received and retained all the iniquities of the children of Israel; but when Christ appears the second time, he will be "without sin."

5. It is impossible that two goats, one of which was chosen by the Lord, and is called the Lord's, while the other is not so called, but was left to perform an entirely different office,—it is impossible that these both should typify the same person. But the goat on which the Lord's lot fell, the blood of which was ministered in the sanctuary, did certainly typify Christ. Just as surely the scape-goat did not typify him.

Having thus proved by evidence which must be conclusive to every candid mind, that Christ cannot be the antitype of the Levitical scape-goat, the direct question, Who is the antitype of that goat? now presents itself for solution.

1. The definition of the word is sufficient to suggest an application. In the common acceptation of the word, the term scape-goat is applied to any miserable vagabond who has become obnoxious to the claims of justice; and while it is revolting to all our conceptions of the character and glory of Christ, to apply this term to him, it must strike every one as a very approprate designation for a certain character whom the Scriptures style, the accuser, adversary, angel of the bottomless pit, Beelzebub, Belial, dragon, enemy, evil spirit, father of lies, murderer, prince of devils, serpent, tempter, seducer, &c.

2. We are not without direct evidence to the same purpose. The Hebrew word for scape-goat, as given in the margin of Lev. 16:8, is Azazel. On this verse Jenks in his comprehensive commentary remarks: "Scape-goat. See diff. opin. in Bochart. Spencer, after the oldest opinion of the Hebrews and Christians, thinks Azazel is the name of the devil; and so Rosenmire, whom see. The Syriac has, Azazel, the angel (strong one) who revolted." These authorities unmistakably point out Satan. Thus we have the definition of the Scripture term for scape-goat, in two ancient languages, with the oldest opinion of both Hebrews and Christians, in favor of the view that the scape-goat is a type of Satan.

3. Chas. Beecher, in "Redeemer and Redeemed," pp. 67, 68, says:—

"What goes to confirm this is, that the most ancient paraphrases and translations, treat Azazel as a proper name. The Chaldee paraphrase, and the targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, would certainly have translated it if it was not a proper name, but they do not. The Septuagint, or oldest Greek version, renders it by ἀνομιμαίος (anomiaios), a word applied by the Greeks to a malign deity, sometimes appeased by sacrifices. Another confirmation is found in the book of Enoch where the name Azazel, evidently a corruption of Azazel, is given to one of the fallen angels, thus plainly showing what was the prevalent understanding of the Jews at that day.

"Still another evidence is found in the Arabic, where Azazel is employed as the name of the Evil Spirit. In addition to these we have the evidence of the Jewish work Zohar, and of the Cabalistic and Rabbinical writers. They tell us that the following proverb was current among the Jews: 'On the day of atonement, a gift to Sammael.' Hence, Moses Gerundinensis feels called to say that it is not a sacrifice, but only done because commanded by God.

"Another step in the evidence is, when we find this same opinion passing from the Jewish to the early Christian church. Origen was the most learned of the Fathers, and on such a point as this, the meaning of a Hebrew word, his testimony is reliable. Says Origen: 'If who is called in the Septuagint ἀνομιμαίος, and in the Hebrew Azazel, is no other than the devil.'

"In view then of the difficulties attending any other meaning, and the accumulated evidence in favor of this, Hengstenberg affirms with great confidence, that Azazel cannot be anything else but another name for Satan."

On page 70, Mr. Beecher further says: "The meaning of the term [scape-goat] viewed as a proper name, was stated, in 1677, by Spencer, Dean of Ely, to be powerful Apostate, or mighty Receder." Prof. Bush is also quoted on p. 72, as regarding Azazel as a proper name of Satan.

u. s.

THE SANCTUARY.

Forty-first Paper.—The Binding of Satan.

AMONG the evidences presented last week to show that the scape-goat was a type of Satan, were some extracts from a work entitled, The Redeemer and Redeemed, by Chas. Beecher. It is but just to Mr. B. to remark that while he thinks that Azazel is the name for Satan, he does not regard the goat as representing Satan; but looks upon the ceremony as performed in some sense in reference to Satan. This he thinks implied in the words engraved on the lots which the high priest drew for the goats on the day of atonement; one, La-Yehovah, for Jehovah, the other, La-Azazel, for Azazel, for the devil; and he takes the transaction to signify that subjection of Christ to Satan which is implied in the sentence that the serpent should bruise the heel of the seed of the woman. But as this was done at the crucifixion, it can have no reference to the ceremony of the scape-goat, a ceremony not performed till the work in the sanctuary is finished. And inasmuch as the goat upon which the lot fell for the Lord typified Christ himself, so the goat upon which the lot fell for Azazel would typify Azazel, or Satan himself.

Another reason for considering the scape-goat a type of Satan is the very striking manner in which the ceremony of sending away the goat into the wilderness harmonizes with the events to transpire in connection with the cleansing of the Heavenly sanctuary, so far as revealed to us in the scriptures of truth.

Thus in the type we see the following acts performed: 1. The sin of the transgressor is imparted to the victim. 2. That sin is borne by the priest in the blood of the offering into the sanctuary. 3. On the day of atonement the priest with the blood of the sin offering for the people removes all these sins from the sanctuary, and lays them upon the head of the scape-goat. 4. The goat is then sent away into a land not inhabited.

Answering to these several events in the type, we have in the antitype the following: 1. The great offering for the world was made on Calvary. 2. The sins of all those who avail themselves of Christ's shed blood by faith in him, are represented in that blood, with which he entered into the sanctuary on high, Heb. 9:12, and are through that transferred to that sanctuary. 3. After Christ the minister of the true tabernacle, Heb. 8:2, has finished his ministration, and by the atonement has released the sins of his people from the sanctuary, he will lay them upon the head of their author, the antitypical scape-goat, the devil. 4. The devil will then be sent away, loaded with these sins, into a land not inhabited.

And we apprehend that we find a description of this latter event in plain terms in Rev. 20:1-3: "And I saw an angel come down from Heaven having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be fulfilled."

This is just such a movement in reference to Satan as we might expect to occur on the supposition that he is the antitype of the ancient scape-goat. Looking upon him as such antitype, we watch for some transaction which will correspond to the sending away of the goat anciently, loaded with sins, into the waste wilderness. At length we see an angel come from Heaven, lay hold upon him, bind him, and cast him into the bottomless pit for a thousand years; and we involuntarily exclaim, Here it is; this is it.

With this view, the scene described in Rev. 20:1-3 can show its connections and the reason why it occurs. Without this, it comes in abruptly; and who can tell why just this disposition, instead of some other, is at this time made of the devil?

This scene occurs at just the right time to fulfill the antitype; for it is immediately after Christ has finished his work as priest. Secondly, the right agent is employed. The goat anciently was not led away by the high priest, but by the hand of another person. So here it is not Christ, our great High Priest, who casts Satan into the bottomless pit, but an angel; which admirably answers to the type. Thirdly, he is cast into the right place. Anciently, the goat was sent away into a waste wilderness, a land not inhabited. The devil is cast into the bottomless pit, corresponding most fittingly to the former, as we shall see.

This word, bottomless pit, in the original signifies an abyss, bottomless, deep, profound. Its use seems to be to denote any place of darkness, desolation, and death. Thus in Rev. 9:1, 2, it is applied to the barren wastes of the Arabian desert, and in Rom. 10:7, to the grave. In Gen. 1:2, the same word is rendered "deep" in the declaration that "darkness was upon the face of the deep;" and here it must apply to the whole earth in its state of primeval chaos. And we have reason to believe that it means precisely this in Rev. 20:3, when it is made the dreary prison-house of Satan. At this time, let it be borne in mind, the earth is a vast charnel-house of desolation and death. The voice of God has shaken it to its foundations, the islands and mountains have been moved out of their places, the great earthquake has leveled to the earth the mightiest works of man, the seven last plagues have left their withering and blasting foot-prints over all the fair face of nature, the burning glory attending the coming of the Son of man has borne its part in accomplishing the general desolation, the wicked have been given to the slaughter, and their putrefying flesh and bleaching bones lie unburied and unlamented from one end of the earth to the other. Thus is the earth made empty and waste, and turned upside down. Isa. 24:1. Thus is it brought back again to its original state of chaos. See Jer. 4:19-26. And what better term could be used to describe it rolling on in its disorganized condition of darkness and desolation for a thousand years, than the term abyss or bottomless pit, which was used to describe it in the beginning?

Here is a desolate wilderness, or "land not inhabited," well befitting the great antitypical scape-goat. And what more fitting retribution could at this point overtake the author of all our woe, than that he should, through all these slow-circling thousand years, be confined amid the ruin which his own hands have indirectly wrought, unable to flee from his habitation of woe, or to repair in the least degree its hideous wretchedness.

While Satan is passing his thousand years upon this desolate earth, bound, that is, restrained from carrying forward his nefarious work, the righteous being in Heaven, and the wicked in their graves, and so all being beyond his power, the saints are accomplishing the work of judgment they perform in connection with Christ in Heaven, 1 Cor. 2:2; Rev. 20:4, that is, apportioning to the wicked the punishment due to each one, to be inflicted upon them at the end of the thousand years.

This work being accomplished, the thousand years expire, the wicked dead are raised, Satan is loosed, for he now has something to do, and he goes out to deceive those wicked multitudes that are brought out of their graves. Having gathered them around the holy city, which has then come down out of Heaven, fire descends from God and devours them all, root and branch, Satan and all his followers. Here the wicked receive in their own persons the punishment due to their sins, while Satan suffers under the accumulated load of the sins of all the righteous, which, at the beginning of the thousand years, were laid upon him as the antitypical scape-goat.

C. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Forty-second Paper.—The End of Sin.

The division of the subject now under consideration, is one of exceeding interest. The great burden of the penitent, reaching out for a Saviour, is, "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" And the great joy of the new convert is, "There is now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus." The question of becoming free from sin, and the process by which this is accomplished, has power to affect the heart of the awakened sinner, as no other question can.

With scarcely less interest we go forward to the final disposition of sin, when it shall be forever put away. We have now traced it, in the work of salvation, from the sinner to the sacrificial victim, from the victim to the sanctuary, from the sanctuary to the scape-goat, which in the antitype is Satan, and are led to the conclusion that sin, of which he is himself the author, comes to its end in his destruction.

But it may be asked if Paul does not show by the expression that Christ "appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself," that he did put it away upon the cross. The answer is that that must be understood only as making provision for the putting away of sin; for sins cannot be put away in advance, and millions of those who will be saved, were yet unborn when Christ suffered.

But a still stronger objection to the view here advocated, that Satan is the antitype of the scape-goat, is urged from the expression used in reference to that goat in Lev. 16:10: "But the goat on which the lot fell to be the scape-goat, shall be presented alive before the Lord, to make an atonement with him, and to let him go for a scape-goat into the wilderness." How, it is asked, can the scape-goat be a type of Satan when an atonement was made with him? does Satan have anything to do in making the atonement? Assuredly not; and we do not think such an idea is presented in the text. It does not read that the goat should be presented alive before the Lord that he might make an atonement for the sins of the people, or to assist in making the atonement. But the goat shall be "preserved alive before the Lord," by whom? By the priest. "To make an atonement with him." Who to make an atonement? The priest. Then the atonement is all made by the priest. No one shares with him in this work. But in making the atonement, or in carrying out, or completing, the work of the atonement, the high priest has something to do with the scape-goat, and that is to heap upon him the foul load of the sins of the people and send him away to be heard of no more forever.

So, as the antitype, Satan has nothing to do of himself in making the atonement. He has no share in the work; but our High Priest has something to do with him in carrying out the result of his work, by making him bear away the sins which have been taken from the sanctuary, that he may perish with them, and thus a final disposition be made both of them and him. So far therefore as concerns the relation which Satan bears to the atonement, no objection exists to the view here advocated.

Another query arises relative to the punishment of sin. If Satan is punished for the sins of the righteous, are not those sins punished twice, once in the person of Christ, who suffered for our sins, and again in the person of Satan upon whom they are finally laid? We answer that the sins of the righteous are no more punished twice than the sins of the wicked. Christ suffered for all alike, just as much for those who will be finally lost, as for those who will be saved. But the lost will all be punished at last for their own sins.

The trouble arises from a misapprehension of the position of Christ as our substitute. The idea seems to be generally entertained that Christ in his own person suffered all the punishment due to the sins of all the saved, which they would themselves have endured had they been lost. This leaves those who believe in eternal misery to grapple with an insurmountable problem; and it leads to the most ultra Calvinism. The truth seems rather to be that Christ appeared before the law as an innocent victim to meet in behalf of others the sentence, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." The offering was voluntary, and therefore involved no injustice; it was from one of so exalted a position that God could accept it; and it was of such infinite value that the law could honorably relax its claims from all those who would accept of it, even if all the world should do so. But we have seen from the type that the removal of sin from the penitent did not cancel the sin itself but only transferred it to some other object. The forgiveness was relative not absolute; that is, as related to the sinner it was forgiven, but the sin itself was considered still in existence to be disposed of in some other way. Christ has done for us in fact what the ancient offering did for the sinner in figure; that is, he has provided a medium through which sin with its guilt may be removed from us and transferred to some other party. Thus we can be saved, but the sin must meet its just desert in some other quarter.

Let us now consider where this, in the case of the sinner, would naturally fall. Sin did not have its origin with mankind. They were not the original agents of this evil, but were seduced and led away under the power of temptation by another. And this we apprehend to be the difference between the condition of men and that of Satan and his angels. With the one sin had its origin; and an outbreak so unprovoked and causeless could have no forgiveness. It would not be safe to re-instate to favor those with whom such a course could originate. But with the other, with men, sin was an evil into which they were led by another party; hence their case could be commiserated, and provision be made for their restoration.

Sin may therefore be represented as a partnership business. Satan is the senior party, the sinner the junior. The latter having been seduced into that position, is allowed under certain conditions, to leave the company and step out from under the obligations of the business. Upon whom then will they fall? Upon the only remaining member of the firm, the instigator of the whole business, the senior partner, Satan. If the sinner chooses to maintain the partnership in that illegitimate business, he can do so, and receive in his own person at last the punishment of his deeds. But it is in his power, if he so desires, to leave his present relation, unite himself to Christ, and leave his former business with him who is primarily responsible for it.

And this is what we are taught by the doctrine of the scape-goat. The sinner goes free, and Satan receives the sins he has incited the sinner to commit back upon his own head, to answer therefor in the settlement which he at last must meet.

Viewing in this light the work of Satan among mankind, it is evident that the matter has been so overruled that he has been playing a losing game, in seducing men to sin. It would have been far better for him if he had done nothing of the kind. But having entered upon this work, we see that he has a personal interest of the most powerful kind to induce him to hold persons in sin to the last; for then they receive the punishment for their own personal sins which he otherwise must suffer. And every one who escapes from his power and secures salvation through Christ, adds an additional weight to his accumulating load of woe.

And it must strike every one as right and consistent that this should be so. The sinner has been seduced into sin, but he repents. Yet standing back of the scene, there is one who is the primary author and instigator of all, the inciting agent in every sinner's deeds; and when the transgressor awakes to the true nature of his course, and sees the enormity of his crimes, and seeks to put away his sins, what could be more fitting than that they should fall back upon the head of him who first gave birth to sin, and who has fostered the growth of every branch from that baleful root. In this, the decision of every right-minded intelligence must be, that God is just, and Satan receives no more than his due deserts.

Satan, having thus received the load of sins from which the righteous have become free, and being confined to this desolate earth, is reserved to the day of perdition. The thousand years at length expire, the lake of fire prepared, for the devil and his angels, appears. They are cast therein, and all the wicked in league with them, share the same fate. Then every sin ever committed is punished, and in the persons of the wicked, evil angels and Satan, it perishes forever.

C. S.

THE SANCTUARY.

Forty-Third Paper.—The Subject
Concluded.

We are now prepared to take a retrospective view of this important subject. The questions with which we started out in the beginning of these articles, are now answered.

To the question, "The Sanctuary—what is it?" the answer has been plainly found. It is not the earth, not the land of Palestine, not the church; but, as revealed to us in the word, it is first the dwelling which the Lord provided for himself here among men, in the tabernacle of Moses, and afterward in the temple of Jerusalem; and finally we behold it as the temple of God in Heaven, his dwelling place on high.

To the question, "When is it?" the answer has come. In all its most important aspects, it is now. Beginning with Moses, fifteen hundred years before Christ, it becomes an object of ever-increasing interest, till, as we reach our own generation, and the work connected with it is about to close, the issues there to be decided make it an all-important centre of consideration and study.

To the question, "Where is it?" the answer is equally plain. During the typical dispensation, it was here upon earth; in the present antitypical dispensation, it is in Heaven.

"What are its uses?" It is the centre around which all the worship of God revolves, and to which every act of devotion points. "And why?" Because it is the habitation of God, and there in the most holy, he placed the transcript of his will, the ten commandments; and there on the mercy-seat, the cover of the ark, is the focal point in the work of redemption, where "mercy and truth meet together and righteousness and peace kiss each other." There reposes the law which shows transgression; and there is presented the blood which satisfies the law, and, so far as the sinner's record is concerned, blots out the sin.

"What are its relations and how extensive?" The forty-two previous papers in this series of articles have partially and imperfectly answered this question. It relates to everything in the plan of salvation, and has to do with every individual who comes within the range of Christ's redeeming work.

"What prominence is given to it on the inspired pages of the book of God's revelation to men?" Great prominence. The word occurs one hundred and forty-six times, not merely as casual mentions, but often as the theme of the discourse itself.

"What bearing has it upon the interpretation of the prophecies?" A bearing the most intimate. It shows that no prophetic period reaches to the coming of the Lord, but only to the short but indefinite work called the cleansing of the sanctuary which just precedes that coming. It thus saves us from the folly of time-setting. It clears up and explains the mystery of the disappointment in the past Advent movement. Mistaking the sanctuary to mean the earth, it was supposed that the cleansing of the sanctuary meant the purifying of the earth by fire; and as the Lord is to be revealed in flaming fire, it was argued that the Lord must then come. Hence the coming of the Lord was looked for at the end of the 2300 days in 1844. But the prophecy only says, "Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," which we now see to be the closing work of our High Priest in the temple above. It explains the parable of the wedding garment, Matt. 22:11-13, shows where that preliminary work of Judgment comes in, which must precede the coming of Christ, and shows how and when that sentence which eternally fixes every man's condition, whether he be filthy or righteous, unjust or holy, can go forth before the Lord appears. Rev. 22:11.

"How is its past history calculated to interpret, or its present work concern, us?" Its past history interests us because it is the text book from which we learn the nature of the work of our great High Priest above, and the manner of his ministration; and its present work concerns us, because in connection with the declaration of the prophecies concerning it, we learn more definitely than from any other source, our proximity to the end.

"In what way are our dearest interests connected with it?" Our dearest interests are there because there is our only hope of life and salvation. There is to be found the only means that can cleanse our soul from guilt, and there the only Advocate who can plead our cause. If we accept his mediation on the free terms offered, our case will go well; if we reject it, all is lost. The court is now sitting; and its session soon will close, and its eternal decisions be rendered.

These are the claims it now has upon our attention, the strongest and most urgent that can ever be brought to bear upon men.

All through its history are epochs of interest. It was a point of great interest when the tabernacle was first reared in this world of ours, and an outward symbol of the work of salvation was given to men.

It was a point of interest when the tabernacle gave place to the larger and more glorious structure of the temple, and when in the dedication of that temple the most imposing religious ceremony was performed which the world has ever witnessed.

It was a point of still greater interest when the typical dispensation closed, and a transfer was made from the sanctuary below to the sanctuary on high. Henceforward we come directly to Jesus, the mediator of the new covenant, and turn our attention to Jerusalem above.

A point of still deeper interest to us was reached when at the end of the 2300 days in 1844 the time came for the cleansing of the sanctuary, and the ministration was moved from the holy into the most holy place. Then the temple of God was open in Heaven. Then was discerned, by faith, the ark of God's testament there. Then the position of the moral law was seen, enthroned in the very presence of Jehovah, immutable, eternal. Then was discovered the connection between this subject and the seal of the living God, the sealing work, the last message of mercy, and the closing up of the great Advent movement of the present generation. Then the foretold Judgment hour began, and the church entered upon the great Sabbath reform. With this subject all portions of the message are connected; this is the grand centre and citadel of the present truth.

Then it was seen that the time of probation could last but a little longer; for the final work in the sanctuary must be brief. Should it be otherwise it would destroy the type, and show in the plan and work of God a want of consistency and harmony, which we know does not exist. And already for thirty-two years this work has been going forward. We understand that beginning with the human race at the opening of the world's history, the examination passes down through successive generations, in consecutive order, till at length the cases of the last generation, the living, are reached, who come latest into this investigative Judgment, and the work closes. And what generation has the work now reached? Has it come down to the age of Noah? of Abraham? of Job? of Moses? of Daniel? Has it reached the age of the apostles and the early Christians? Are their cases now in review before the great tribunal above? Has it come down to the setting up of the papacy, to the dark ages, when the Waldenses and other few faithful witnesses in obscurity and concealment kept the light of God's truth alive in the world? Has it come down to the great Reformation, to the times of Luther? of the Wesleys? We know not. We only know that it is passing down somewhere through these generations, and rapidly approaching the living, when our cases will come up for decision, and our destiny be decided forever. And here we now stand waiting, may we not also say, preparing?

But with considerations of such thrilling interest even as these, our view of this subject does not end. We go forward a little in the future, and behold the sins of all the righteous loaded upon the head of the antitypical scapegoat to be sent away forever. We see Satan bound, and the saints forever free from his power. This is a point of transcendent interest to all the righteous. Then we take our first draughts from the cup of immortality. Our sins are borne away. They come up to trouble us no more. We cannot recall them; and even God says that he will forget them. He who instigated them will then have received them back again. Here the serpent's head is effectually bruised by the seed of the woman. Here the strong man armed (Satan), who has been shutting up even the followers of Christ in his prison house, the grave, for six thousand years, will be bound by a stronger than he (Christ), and his house be spoiled of its precious treasures. Then will the tares have been bound in bundles for the burning, and the wheat have been gathered into the heavenly garner. Then our High Priest will have come forth from the sanctuary to pronounce the everlasting blessing upon his waiting people. Then we shall have come, not by faith merely, but in deed and in truth, unto Mount Zion, and the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels. Then will the redeemed, placing the foot of triumph upon the world, the flesh, and the devil, raise their glad voices in the song of Moses and the Lamb. Glorious and longed-for day! May the Lord hasten it in his good time.

One more scene remains: the kindling of those final fires prepared for the devil and his angels, at the end of the thousand years. Here is also the perdition of ungodly men. And here all the agents of evil, root and branch, Satan and all his followers, be they angels or men, are destroyed from the universe of God. The deepest taint of the curse is burnt out; the last vestige of disgrace is removed; and nothing remains but the great and solemn lesson of sin and its fearful results, which will tend to confirm in uprightness and holiness all other intelligences in all the universe.

Thus triumphantly God's controversy with sin will end. Here are finished the results of all Christ's work as connected with the sanctuary. Redemption is successfully completed. The original purpose in regard to this world, that it should be the beautiful abode of holy beings, is carried out. The requisite number to people it is secured, and the earth is renewed to be their eternal abode. Here the righteous are called to inherit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world.

And from this height of ineffable bliss, away through the ever-revolving cycles of eternity, there open before us boundless vistas of

EVERLASTING LIFE AND ETERNAL GLORY.

U. S.

THE GREAT CENTRAL SUBJECT.

In the Bible-lecture class in the College, the subject of the sanctuary has been under investigation for the past week. At every examination of this question, the evidence in behalf of the view held by H. H. Adventists appears more satisfactory, the testimony more clearly defined and positive, and the possibility of any well-supported objection fainter and fainter; and in just the same proportion our wonder increases that any who are interested in the great question of the second coming of Christ, should reject this view of the subject, and persist in clinging to that misapplication which was the cause of the great disappointment in 1844, and from which has largely resulted the confusion and failures among first-day Adventists since that time. As we look at it, their attitude toward the S. D. Adventist view must result from a wonderful indifference which prevents their examining the subject, or from a strong personal interest in some direction. That this may appear the more clearly, let us look at some of the difficulties solved and the doctrines established by this question.

The view that the sanctuary of the new covenant is in Heaven; that it is cleansed by the service of our great High Priest in the putting away of sins; that this cleansing is the finishing of the mystery of God, Rev. 10:7, and the close of probation; and that it is for this reason, among others, a work of Judgment, marvelously simplifies some otherwise very perplexing questions, and makes room for some plainly predicted and necessary events which, on any other view, are not possible.

1. It makes provision for a preliminary work of Judgment, which must take place before Christ appears. The least reflection will convince any one that when Christ reveals himself in the clouds of heaven, there is no time given for the investigation of character, and the work of deciding who are worthy of the blessings he comes to bring; but he declares that his reward is with him, to give every man as his work shall be; hence it must have been determined before this what every man's reward is to be; and therefore, as soon as he appears, all the dead in Christ can be raised, while all the wicked dead are still left in their graves, and all the righteous living can be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. The subject of the sanctuary, as set forth in the Scriptures, brings this very preliminary work to view, assigns it a time and place, reveals the period of its beginning, and shows us its nature. But apart from this view of the subject, who can tell us by what this work of Judgment is determined, and when it can be accomplished?

2. It provides a time and place for Christ to confess before the Father and the holy angels the names of his friends, and deny those of his enemies. Matt. 10:32, 33: "Whoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in Heaven. But whoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in Heaven." This he does as he finishes his work as priest in the sanctuary.

3. It provides a time and place for a blotting out of sins before Christ comes, as in Acts 3:19, 20, or the blotting out of names from the book of life, as in Rev. 3:5. As cases are examined in the sanctuary, the sins of all those who have secured pardon through the intercession of Christ will be blotted out of those books wherein our deeds are written; while, on the other hand, if they have not secured pardon, their names will be blotted from the book of life, and their sins retained against them.

4. It guards against the error of continually setting times for the Lord to come, inasmuch as it shows that no prophetic period reaches to that event—the longest and latest—the 2300 days—reaching not to the coming of the Lord, but to a work called the cleansing of the sanctuary, which must be accomplished before he comes.

5. It enables us to distinguish between the work of Christ as an offering for sin, and his work as a High Priest atoning for sin. In the first-named capacity he atoned for all the world; in the second, for his people only; and by confounding the two, we are inevitably driven into Universalism on the one hand, or into predestinationism on the other. The subject of the sanctuary saves us from both, showing that the atonement is the very last act of Christ's service as a priest and mediator.

6. It establishes the doctrine of the immutability of the law and the perpetuity of the Sabbath, by bringing to view in the temple of God in Heaven, under the sounding of the seventh angel, the ark of his [God's] testament. Rev. 11:19. The ark was so called because it contained the tables of testimony, or tables of the ten commandments, which he calls "his" covenant. The fact that John applies the same name to it, as revealed in Heaven under the sounding of the seventh trumpet, shows that the same law exactly must be therein. Moreover, Christ's work, to be the antitype of the work of the earthly priests, must have reference to the same law that their work had reference to, which was the law of ten commandments in the ark.

7. It establishes the doctrine of the soon coming of Christ; for Christ comes as soon as he has finished his work as priest, and he is now performing the closing service of that priestly work. His coming must therefore be at hand.

8. It establishes the doctrine of the unconscious state of the dead, by showing that no part of the Judgment, which must precede the bestowal of rewards and punishments, could be performed till Christ reached the closing division of his work as mediator. Men and women have not, therefore, through all the ages past, been going to Heaven and hell, but are resting in their graves, awaiting the decision in their cases.

9. It gives us more clear, definite, and beautiful views of Christ's position and work than can be evolved from any other subject.

10. Finally, it sets the seal of divine truth, and of divine providence, to the message now going forth. Here we see the open door which no man can shut. Rev. 3:8. Through this, the ark of God's testament is seen in the temple in Heaven, and no one can shut off the view. Rev. 11:19. The truth will go forth. The message will be proclaimed, though God should have to find new messengers to carry it. The work cannot be overthrown, and will not come to naught; for it is the work of God, and cannot fail.

Do we make enough of this great central subject of that system of truth which belongs to this time? Line upon line must be given, till the people are made familiar with all its parts. Study to present it in such a way as to arrest attention, and show the importance which attaches to it. May Heaven speed the message forward in mighty power!

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth: Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., FEBRUARY 20, 1883.

URIAH SMITH, Editor.

J. H. ANDREWS AND J. H. WAGGONER, Corresponding Editors.

THE SANCTUARY.

THE subject of the sanctuary is one which should specially engage the attention of S. D. Adventists. It is a subject peculiar to this people. There is no other denomination whose views on this question correspond with, or even approximate, the views set forth in the works issued from this Office. Every one of our people should therefore make it a point of first importance to become thoroughly conversant with this subject.

But not merely for the reason already named should we study this question. We should do it on account of its intrinsic importance. It is a safeguard against error. It is a citadel of truth. We still frequently meet with articles on this subject in our exchanges from first-day Adventists advocating the old views, and hence bolstering up the old errors. Not enough can be said in favor of that view to make even the frame-work of a respectable argument; yet they tenaciously cling to it. At first thought, this seems very strange; yet it is perhaps not to be wondered at so much after all; for it does not take a very long look at the subject for any one to see that if the view we hold in place of the one named above, be adopted, it makes absolutely necessary the adoption of certain other views which they seem determined neither to accept nor to obey.

Looking at the subject in a general sense, that which is perhaps most calculated to excite our wonder is the fact that a question so intimately connected with, and so essentially modifying, some of the most important subjects of the Bible, should have lain so long unnoticed. And this furnishes all the greater reason why, now that light is shining upon it, and its commanding position in the great temple of truth is discovered, the most earnest efforts should be made to bring it to the attention of the people.

This subject is intimately connected with the prophecies, and this may be one reason why it has not sooner engaged the special attention of Bible students; for it has been reserved to this present generation, living in "the time of the end," to behold the seal broken from the prophetic page and to see a wonderful increase of knowledge respecting its soul-inspiring utterances. But an understanding of the subject of the sanctuary is essential to the understanding of some of the most important of these prophetic records.

There is, it is said, in Rome, a room the walls of which are covered with tracings which to the beholder, as he enters, appear but a mass of inextricable confusion. But as he reaches one certain point in the room, immediately all lines fall into place, all forms assume their due proportion, the laws of perspective assert their sway, and immediately out of the chaos rise order and beauty in harmonious and beautiful proportion.

The sanctuary occupies this true point of perspective in the prophetic apartment of the Sacred Scriptures. From it the unity and harmony of the prophetic lines can be seen as from no other standpoint.

It is interwoven also with subjects of the greatest practical importance. It has a wider bearing and involves a greater number of important topics than any other subject to which our attention is called by the unfoldings of prophecy. It especially reins up to the work of a preparation of character for the test of the Judgment, and the coming of the Son of man. Study the subject of the sanctuary.

THE SANCTUARY.

The dawning of a new truth brings joy to the heart in proportion to the darkness it expels, and the difficulties it relieves. It should be prized in proportion to its practical value in pointing out duty and shielding from error. Judged by those rules, the truth which has risen upon us on the subject of the sanctuary, is one which should cause the greatest joy to every heart, and be prized by all this people above hid treasures.

1. On this subject we hold doctrines which are peculiar to ourselves. No other people entertain the same views we cherish on this question, nor ever have, so far as we are able to learn, since the darkness of the great apostasy came down like a cloud upon the church, to obscure the true doctrines of the Bible, and corrupt the practices of apostolic times. Now, if there is any reason for our denominational existence, and we have any right to maintain an organization separate from others, those doctrines which give us this right, and justify this separation, are especially entitled to our regard, our study and support. And just so far as we fail to bear aloft those doctrines on our banner, we are criminally recreant to duty.

2. The great truths that there is a God; that man is his creature and amenable to his will; that by rebellion he has alienated himself from his favor; that a Redeemer has undertaken to bring him back to divine favor, are truths of a fundamental nature, and of the first importance. Of equal interest is the question of the nature of the work which our Lord accomplishes, and the place where this wonderful process of a world's redemption is carried forward. Light on these points is given us in the subject of the sanctuary. No other subject, so fully as this, unites together all parts of revelation into one harmonious whole. The great truths of revelation here find their focal point. From it in every direction they radiate. It unites the two great dispensations, the Mosaic and the Christian, and shows their relation to each other. It divides with no other subject the high honor of explaining the position and work of our Lord Jesus Christ. In the light of this subject, the books of Moses, with their details of offerings and sacrifices, their minutiae of rites and ceremonies, usually considered of so little use, because so destitute of interest, if not of meaning also, become animated with life, and radiant with consistency and beauty. They become the divine glass through which we behold in its true and glorious light the work of Christ as our mediator in the presence of his Father on high.

3. An understanding of the subject of the sanctuary, is the key to the interpretation of the most important prophecies which are having their fulfillment at the present time. It shows that no prophetic period reaches to the coming of the Lord, but only to the short but indefinite work called the cleansing of the sanctuary, which just precedes that coming. It thus effectually guards us against the folly of time-setting. It makes plain the mystery of the disappointment in the past advent movement, by showing that the earth is not the sanctuary, as was supposed, and its cleansing is not the coming of Christ, but giving us instead the more consistent and Scriptural view that the sanctuary is the place of Christ's ministry on high, and its cleansing is the preliminary work of Judgment which must take place before Christ appears to reward every man as his work shall have been. It explains the parable of the wedding garment, Matt. 22:11-13, and shows when that sentence which irrevocably fixes every man's condition, whether he be filthy or righteous, unjust or holy, can go forth before the Lord appears. Rev. 22:11. It explains all such scriptures as Acts 3:19, and Rev. 3:6, which speak of the blotting out of either our sins or our names, when God's probationary account with us shall close.

4. Our dearest interests are connected with the sanctuary, for there is our only hope of life and salvation. There, and there only, is found the means that can cleanse our souls from guilt, and there only the Advocate who can plead our cause. If we accept his mediation on the conditions offered, our case will go well, and the decision will cause us everlasting rejoicing; but if we reject it, or neglect it, all is lost, and the decision will doom us to shame and everlasting contempt. The court is now sitting. Its sessions soon will close. The Mediator who waits to plead any case which is now in faith committed to his hands, and who sends to his people a message composed of a warning of our danger and an urgent invitation to accept his offers of aid, will soon change his work forever, leaving his position as Advocate and Intercessor, to take the throne as King of kings and Lord of lords. We cannot take a position of ease in Zion, indifferent and unconcerned, and the delusive idea that nothing will be done in our cases till we ourselves call them up and present them. They are there already on the great court register. Action will be taken upon them, whether we will it or not, whether we are ready or not. And the decisions now so soon to be rendered, will be subject to no appeal, no revision, and no end.

5. In the light of the sanctuary it is seen, through the lens of no other subject, that probationary time can last but a little longer. The final work in the sanctuary, that is, all the work called its cleansing, must be a comparatively brief work. Should it be otherwise, it would be contrary to the type, and show in the carrying out of the plan and work of God, a want of consistency and harmony which we know does not exist. And already for nearly thirty-nine years, or since the ending of the 2300 days, on the tenth day of the seventh month, Oct. 22, 1814, the cleansing of the sanctuary, the great work of atonement which closes forever the plan of salvation for the human family, has been going forward. How much longer, think you, can it continue? Here the church is enjoined to watch. This event it is—the close of our probation—which is coming suddenly, when we are not aware, and which, so coming may find us sleeping. With such a truth, in such a thrilling hour, with such momentous results before us, how can we be indifferent or careless or worldly now? On the light of the sanctuary let us keep our steadfast gaze. The atonement is passing, and the world should know it. In general it is a careless, reckless, scoffing world, and yet it must be warned. If we are not prepared for impending events, and our friends are not urged by us to flee from the wrath to come, how can our skirts be clean?

A WORK OF JUDGMENT.

The gospel is followed by the Judgment. The latter may be defined, in general terms, to consist of investigation of character, sentence rendered according to the facts established, and the execution of the sentence. It covers a period of over a thousand years. For the wicked dead are not raised till one thousand years after the first resurrection, in which the righteous have their part (Rev. 20: 5); and the sentence against them cannot of course be executed till after their resurrection. But it is said that when Christ appears, he comes to "judge the quick and the dead" (2 Tim. 4: 1); and the destruction of the wicked after the close of the thousand years is called the "day of Judgment and perdition of ungodly men" (2 Pet. 3: 7); and of those who reign with Christ during all the intervening thousand years, it is said that "Judgment [by which we must understand some part of the Judgment work] was given unto them" (1 Cor. 6: 2). These texts show that all of this period of time is covered by the Judgment. The result reached is the establishment of the righteous in their everlasting inheritance, and the final destruction of all the enemies of God.

As investigation of character and decision of cases is included in this work, it follows that the Judgment really begins, and that portion of its work which most vitally concerns us is accomplished, before Christ appears. A few thoughts will suffice to demonstrate this most important and solemn proposition.

The text has already been alluded to that the righteous, according to Rev. 20: 1-6, are raised by themselves, while all the wicked remain in their graves a thousand years thereafter till the second resurrection. The resurrection of the righteous draws the line between these two classes; and this resurrection takes place when Christ appears. 1 Thess. 4: 16. A division equally marked occurs at the same time among the living; for when Christ appears the living righteous are changed to immortality, while all the rest of the living are given over to perish in the judgments of the great day. And this stupendous change, Paul tells us, is accomplished in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, when the last trumpet sounds. 1 Cor. 15: 52. No space is allotted here for the investigation of character and decision of cases, and no such work is possible after Christ appears, before this change is wrought; for it is done instantaneously, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye.

Now we ask, how it becomes known, before Christ appears, just who among the great multitudes sleeping in their graves, are to be raised, and just what individuals in the great army of fourteen hundred millions living upon the earth, are to receive the stamp of immortality, and be changed in a moment when the trumpet sounds?

But one answer can be given, and that is, that their cases have been investigated and decision rendered, before this event takes place. That portion of the Judgment for them is then past. And when He who is their life appears, and they appear with him in glory (Col. 3: 4), it is but the carrying out of decisions previously rendered in their cases. This is what must be meant when it is declared that Christ judges "the quick [living] and the dead, at his appearing and his kingdom." He simply carries out, in conferring immortality upon his people, the decisions of a Judgment work previously accomplished.

It is not possible to avoid this conclusion, unless we take one of two other positions which are explicitly contradicted by the Scriptures, but both of which are resorted to by different classes rather than accept the view of a preliminary or investigative Judgment before Christ comes, which is here advocated.

The first of the positions referred to is that there is to be but one resurrection, and that in this resurrection all the dead, good and bad, are raised together in one indiscriminate multitude, and then the separation is made between the righteous and the wicked. But as already noticed, the Bible plainly declares that there are to be two resurrections, one thousand years apart, the first confined exclusively to the righteous; for "blessed and holy" are all they who have a part therein (Rev. 20: 6); and the second embracing only the wicked, those who are the dupes of Satan. This position therefore cannot be true.

The second position is that when Christ comes and the dead in Christ are raised, they are raised in a mortal condition, then judged, and then changed to immortality. But this just as explicitly as the other contradicts the unmistakable teaching of the Scriptures; for they declare respecting the righteous that they are to be raised in power, raised in glory, raised spiritual bodies, raised in incorruption. And besides, the Bible assigns no place, for any such work of investigative Judgment while Christ remains in the clouds of heaven.

These positions are the only ones possible in opposition to the one we advocate; but being so plainly contrary to the Scriptures they are entitled to no sort of credit whatever. Yet, strange to say, no system of belief appears which introduces this preliminary work of Judgment, and provides an appropriate time and place therefor, except that held by S. D. Adventists. Not a few have soon and tacitly confessed the difficulties of the situation. But rather than accept the view offered by this people, which clears away all difficulties and sets all events in the most consistent and harmonious relation to one another, they choose to adopt the anti-Scriptural views above referred to.

Why this opposition? We venture to suggest that the whole trouble is the connection of this view with the subject of the sanctuary; for in this alone we find the time and the place for the preliminary Judgment which the very nature of the case shows to be so indispensable before Christ shall come. It is that portion of the ministry of our blessed Mediator which is performed in the second apartment, or most holy place, of the "true tabernacle" on high. Heb. 8:1, 2. It is the cleansing of the sanctuary which was to commence at the end of the 2300 days. Dan. 8:14. It is the atonement, which concludes our Lord's work as priest, according to the type. Lev. 16:29-34. It is the finishing of the mystery of God, commencing with the sounding of the seventh angel (Rev. 10:7), a work introduced when that apartment of the temple in Heaven was opened which discloses to view the glorious ark of God's testament, containing the ten commandments. Rev. 11:19.

By all these different modes of expression, and repeated Scripture affirmations, the same work is brought to view. It is a work of Judgment; for it investigates character and decides cases. It is the work of Judgment allotted to the last days just before the appearing of the Saviour. It is now going forward. The close of the 2300 days in 1844 brought us to its commencement. The period allotted to it will soon end, and its eternal decisions be all rendered. We cannot too earnestly urge upon the reader the importance of a constant and careful study of this grand theme, the anti-typical sanctuary, and its cleansing. If you have not the works, procure them, and let your soul be come imbued with the spirit of that work in which all our hopes and interests now center.

SATAN AS THE SCAPE-GOAT.

A CORRESPONDENT asks with some apparent solicitude, if it can be possible that we have made so fundamental a mistake as to take the worst and most detestable being in the universe for the antitypical scape-goat, when the goat chosen for that service in the type was perfect, without blemish.

That our correspondent's fears are not well grounded, for that there is no incongruity involved between type and antitype in taking Satan to be the antitypical scape-goat, will appear from a few considerations:—

1. Satan was not always the reprobate that he now is. Once he was one of the anointed cherubim, next in position, dignity, and perfection to the Son of God himself. This we gather from the declarations of Isaiah and Ezekiel.

2. When the goats were selected on the day of atonement, one to be a sacrifice to the Lord, the other to be the scape-goat, it was not decided which goat was to perform either office till the lots were cast upon them. They must therefore both be without defect or blemish, that the lot for the Lord might appropriately fall on either one. And does not this well represent the fact that these two beings, Christ and Satan, were both in their beginning, each in his sphere, perfect in wisdom and beauty?

3. The scape-goat having once been selected, it never after performed any office involving dignity or honor, or calling for any thing which would symbolize perfection of life or character. It was loaded with sins and thus made abominable in God's sight, and with its load of guilt and execration was hurried out of the camp into the wilderness, where it miserably perished afar from the children of Israel and the habitations of man. So will Satan at last receive the load of all that amount of sin which he has incited men to commit, from which they have freed themselves by penitence and confession, thus leaving them with the originator and instigator of sin, and with them he will miserably perish outside the camp of the saints.

4. This never can be true of Christ. That is, Christ never is to perish with the sins of his people upon him. It fell to his lot to bear sins once. But this was when he was nailed to the tree, and bore the sins of the world as a sacrifice, preliminary to his work as mediator in the sanctuary above. In a certain sense he bears the sins of his people as priest in the aforesaid sanctuary work, but only in the process of making a disposition of them, which is completed by placing them all upon the head of the scape-goat and sending him away into the wilderness. But he never bears sins as the scape-goat. He bore them in his own body on the tree before his work as priest begun. The scape-goat bears them after Christ's work as priest is done.

5. This consideration also answers another objection which is proposed by some, namely, that Satan can have no part to act in the work of the atonement. This objection is, as we view it, based on a misapprehension; for Satan does not have any part to act in making the atonement. The atonement is all made, sins are remitted, the records of the evil deeds of God's people are blotted out, and they are forever freed from them, and these sins are all borne from the sanctuary, before ever Satan is called into requisition at all.

God then simply uses him as the vehicle by which to make a final disposition of these sins in the lake of fire. Thus, so far as the work of atonement itself is concerned, the plan and work of mercy by which God's people are forgiven their sins, Satan has no part to act.

MILLER'S MISTAKE.

BLD. J. B. Goodson has been giving lectures on the views of S. D. Adventists, in Worcester, Mass. In one lecture he took occasion to explain the mistake made by Wm. Miller and others in 1844. Light on the subject of the heavenly sanctuary has made it exceedingly plain that the mistake was not in the time but in the event to occur at that point. The Worcester Evening Gazette of Sept. 18, gave a synopsis of this discourse, which the World's Crisis of Oct 3 copied, and to which its Corresponding Editor offers a reply.

The writer of the reply seems to be laboring under the impression that it is one of the easiest things in the world to demolish Seventh day Adventism, and that he is doing it. Two or three specimens of his assertions and his manner of procedure, will be all-sufficient for our readers. He represents us as claiming that the seventy weeks extend to, and end at, the crucifixion of Christ; whereas any one who knows anything of our views knows that we place the termination of the seventy weeks three and a half years this side the crucifixion of Christ, inasmuch as Christ by his crucifixion caused the sacrifice and oblation to cease in the midst or middle of the last or seventh week.

Again, he represents us as placing the crucifixion of Christ in A. D. 34. But none of our preachers have ever made such an assertion, nor have any of our books ever so published it. For the past thirty-five, and more, years, our uniform and invariable teaching has been that Christ was crucified in the spring of A. D. 31. A person who has so slightly or so carelessly examined our position is poorly qualified to act the part of a reviewer.

This assumption, that we place the crucifixion in A. D. 34, affords him a good deal of capital. He says:—

"The Seventh-day people now insist that the 2300 days ended in the autumn of 1844, and this places the crucifixion in the spring of A. D. 34, in which year the Passover fell on Tuesday, and Christ was certainly crucified at the time of the Passover in whatever year he died; so as truly as Sabbatarians are correct in ending the 2300 days in 1844, so surely Christ died on Tuesday, and there is no way of escaping the conclusion."

Ah! indeed! Yes, there is—a very easy way of avoiding that conclusion. If the writer will correct his own unaccountable blunder, his man of straw will instantly vanish, and he will have no occasion to make such an assertion. For in the spring of A. D. 31, the Passover did not fall on Tuesday, and the seventy weeks did not end till the autumn of A. D. 31.

Again he says:—

"The effort to make it appear that there was need of a cleansing work in Heaven by quoting Heb. 9:23, is a failure. While the text reads, 'It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these,' the word 'purified' here means, as in the 18th verse, 'dedicated.'"

How correct and profound this criticism is, may be seen from two facts: 1. The word rendered "dedicated," in verse 18, is ειδικαιω (enkykainizo), and is defined, "To imitate, i. e., to dedicate, to consecrate."—Robinson. 2. The word rendered "purified," in verse 23, is καθαριζω (katharizo), and is defined, "1. To make clean, to cleanse. 2. Tropically, To cleanse in a moral sense, i. e., a) From sin or pollution, by expiation, to purify, Heb. 9:22, 23. b) Genr. and without expiation, to cleanse, to purify, to free from moral uncleanness. 3. In the Levitical sense, to cleanse, to make lawful."

The words are not the same, are not used interchangeably, and do not mean the same thing; and the work they bring to view was not the same work, nor a work performed for the same object.

Another declaration is about parallel to the foregoing: "When under the law blood was applied to inanimate things, it was for their dedication, and not to remove pollution."

According to Lev. 16, the mercy-seat, the most holy of the tabernacle, the altar of incense, and the first apartment, had blood applied to them every year, to say nothing of other objects, like the altar before the door, which had blood sprinkled upon it every day. The theory under review would have us believe that these things were continually re-dedicated but never cleansed! The chaos which must reign in any mind which can so touch on this subject we leave the reader to fathom if he can.

He thinks our view fails because the sanctuary has been trodden down just as much since 1844, as previous to that time. Here again he entirely misapprehends the subject. The question, How long shall it be trodden under foot? was not directly answered. The answer puts us upon the period of its cleansing which began at the end of the days in 1844; and when this cleansing is finished, the treading under foot both of the sanctuary and its minister, the Lord Jesus Christ, will be brought to a very decisive and effectual close.

This editor of the Crisis touches, in short, that this earth is the antitype of the first apartment of the sanctuary; that Heaven is the antitype of the most holy place; that the sky is the curtain, or veil, between them; that Christ, the antitype of the high priest, entered Heaven, the most holy place, and began his ministry there, over 1800 years ago; and that the "antitypical minor priests," by which he means the ministers of the gospel, officiate here on the earth, in the first apartment.

In this view there is an impossibility and absurdity yoked together like an ox and an ass, which was under the law forbidden. If Christ began his ministry in the most holy place 1800 years ago, there has been, according to this view, no ministration (or work of the gospel) here on the earth, or first apartment; for when the high priest was in the most holy, there could be no man (no ministration) in the first apartment or holy place. Lev. 16:17. This is the impossibility. The absurdity is that this view makes the lower orders of Jewish priests types of the ministers of the gospel in this dispensation, or, which is the same thing, the ministers of the gospel are the antitypes of those ancient Jewish priests. Wonder if Mr. S. is not the antitype of Nadab or Abihu. He is just about wild and reckless enough to occupy that position.

Speaking of Mr. Miller, he says: "He also began to reckon from the 7th of Ezra." He might as well have said, "from the 3d of Job." He probably meant "from the 7th of Artaxerxes Longimanus, which is mentioned in the 7th of Ezra;" and then in reference to the date of the 7th year of Artaxerxes, he says, "which incorrect chronology sets down as 457 B. C." But this date has the authority of the best and most reliable authorities on the subject of chronology the world has ever seen. Yet Mr. S. sets these all aside with as much nonchalance as if they were the merest tyros.

Prophecy assures us that we are now in the "patience of the saints." Yet we confess that nothing so severely tries our patience as the effrontery of such assertions. When we look at such teaching, if it is put forth with becoming modesty and offered as something sincerely believed and honestly taught, it excites only one emotion—that of pity that any one should be so unfortunate in his powers of comprehension; but when it is accompanied with importunate assurance, the most audacious and groundless assumption, and what to a disinterested beholder looks verily like inordinate self-conceit, another emotion is excited; and then just where the pity should end and the contempt begin, it is not easy to determine.

QUESTIONS ON THE SANCTUARY.

1. A CORRESPONDENT asks concerning the gender and signification of the words hilasterius and hilasterion (ἱλαστήριον, ἱλαστήριον). Greenfield in his lexicon to the New Testament makes the first a noun in the masculine gender, meaning "one who makes expiation, a propitiatory sacrifice;" applied to Christ in Rom. 3:25; and the second a noun in the neuter gender, meaning the mercy-seat. Heb. 9:5. The accusative singular of the first, and the nominative singular of the second, have precisely the same form; which has led some into the error of confounding the two words.

2. "Is 'holiest' in Heb. 10:19, in the singular in the Greek? and what does the 'new and living way' refer to?"

Answer. There are three instances in which the words "holy places," plural, have been strangely rendered in the singular in the English version. The first is Heb. 9:8: "The Holy Ghost this signifying that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest while as the first tabernacle was yet standing." Here the Greek has τῶν ἁγίων, genitive plural, "holy places." The second is verse 12, "By his own blood he entered in once into the holy place," where the Greek has τὰ ἁγία, accusative plural, "holy places." The third is the passage named by our correspondent, Heb. 10:19: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus." Here the Greek has τῶν ἁγίων, genitive plural, the "holy places." The rendering given in our English version can be accounted for only on the ground that the translators did not see and understand what the apostle has taught us in regard to the sanctuary.

The new and living way is Christ's flesh, or sacrifice. The apostle does not say that the veil is his flesh, as some contend; but his flesh is the way or means by which we gain access to the holy places. A transposition of the sentence will bring out the true idea, thus: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter, through the veil, into the holy places, by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, that is to say, his flesh [or sacrifice], which he hath consecrated for us." Under the type, the people entered into the earthly sanctuary by the blood of dead beasts; under the antitype, the gospel, we enter into the heavenly sanctuary by the blood of Jesus, who though he once gave his life to provide the sacrifice, has been raised from the dead, and now "ever liveth" as a mediator for us before God. So Jesus is the way for us; for he first in his own body provided a sacrifice which was able to take away sin; and he is the "living" way; for he is now a living mediator for us before his Father.

3. "What service is being done in the holy place during the cleansing of the sanctuary? Can now census be brought there, since the work of atonement commenced?"

Answer. There is no service in the holy place while the ministry is going forward in the most holy. Lev. 16:17. But the sacrifice avails and mercy is offered just the same in the most holy place as in the holy; for the blood of the goat which was ministered in the most holy place on the day of atonement, was for all the people; and they availed themselves of its benefits by affliction their souls. Lev. 16:29; 23:27-29. So the blood of Christ, the antitype of that goat, is for all the people; and all who will, may avail themselves of its provisions and find mercy till the last act of mediation therewith has been performed in the most holy place, and the work of the atonement is done.

THE ATONEMENT.

A NEW, ENLARGED, AND IMPROVED EDITION OF AN EXCELLENT WORK.

Those who have come to feel and confess that the blood of Christ alone can save us, are ready to acknowledge that the subject of the atonement, as an embodiment of this truth, is the great central doctrine of revelation. In it is involved also the great central "mystery" of the gospel—"God manifest in the flesh," a divine being bearing the nature of the seed of Abraham, the innocent paying to inexorable law the debt of the guilty, the criminal pardoned, and at the same time the welfare of the universe not imperiled, the majesty of law sustained, justice satisfied, mercy magnified, and the love and wisdom of God manifesting themselves in a more brilliant uncoiled of light and glory.

It is a doctrine which is extremely sensitive in its relation to other doctrines; that is, more than any other doctrine it exacts of him who would understand it, correctness of belief in all other parts of his faith. It is a doctrine such that if erroneous views are held concerning it, those errors are more far-reaching and more demoralizing to a correct system of truth, than errors on almost any other article of faith.

Unfortunately the Christian world has suffered one of the great truths of revelation—a glowing feature of the plan of redemption—to pass into the background, and be lost sight of. We refer to the subject of the sanctuary. As a consequence, the doctrine of the atonement has become, in the minds of the great mass of Christians, involved in great obscurity and perplexity. And theologians have been led to take positions on the question which are immensely mischievous. Its nature is presented in such a light as to expose it to the charge of leading to license and immorality; and the time of its accomplishment is fixed at such a period that it makes inevitable the doctrine either of universal salvation, or of Calvinistic predestination.

Take the almost universally accepted view that Christ made the atonement on the cross, and one or the other of the errors above named is inevitable. For Christ bore upon the cross the sins of all the world; and if that was the making of the atonement, then the sins of the whole world are atoned for, and universal salvation is the result. Others who cannot accept this conclusion, still clinging to the error that the atonement was made upon the cross, are driven to the conclusion that the work of Christ upon the cross was not for all the world, but was partial, embracing only a special predestinated class, whose sins alone were atoned for, and who consequently, despite all contingencies, must be saved. Thus a distorted form of the doctrine of election is produced. The teaching of the sanctuary question shows that the atonement was not made upon the cross; and if men would accept this, the theology of Christendom would be revolutionized.

There are but few books issued upon this important subject; hence there is here a want to be supplied in the theological world. The book we here refer to, is the new edition of "The Atonement; an Examination of a Remedial System in the Light of Nature and Revelation," by Eld. J. H. Waggoner. The author treats the subject from the vantage ground of present truth; and while the smaller book which he issued years ago, shed much light on this subject, and did a good work, we have here in the revised and enlarged edition, a complete and exhaustive treatise upon this great question. Yet the arguments are so concisely stated that the work is not bulky, consisting of only 368 pages, and not expensive, the price being only one dollar.

It is unnecessary to say to those so well acquainted with the author as are the readers of the Review, that he builds his argument like an adamantine wall, of such smooth and compact face, that the sharpest darts of the opposition find no crevice through which they can enter, but fall blunted and broken at its base. The subject is presented in two parts: "I. An Atonement Consistent with Reason; II. The Atonement as Revealed in the Bible." And the scope of the work will be seen from the headings of its chapters. Thus, "Part I. Chapter 1. Comparison of Nature and Morality; 2. The Moral System; 3. Requirements of the Moral System. Part II. Chapter 1. Principles of the Divine Government; 2. Sin and its Penalty; 3. Justification and Obedience; 4. The Death of Christ Vicarious; 5. The Son of God Died; 6. Doctrine of a Trinity Subversive of the Atonement; 7. What the Atonement is; 8. The Judgment; 9. The Scape-goat; 10. The Kingdom of Christ; 11 and 12. Redemption; 13. Conclusion," followed by two Appendixes, and a closing paper on "The Love of God in Creation."

The book is needed. And now that the author has so well done his part, and the publishers have brought out the work neatly bound in muslin, at so reasonable a price, it should be sent forth on a lively mission. All our people should procure it, and not simply cursorily read it, but study it—study it till the idea is grasped, and the argument understood. Then place it in the hands of candid and thoughtful readers everywhere.

Too many oppose this doctrine because it is misrepresented. Too many think it a dry subject because they do not understand it. Too many are indifferent to it, because of the artificial and imaginary difficulties with which they clothe it. Now is a golden opportunity for all to assist in dispelling misunderstandings, and presenting in its true light and real beauty that marvelous work by which God has shown his love to man, and by which man becomes reconciled to God. See notice on last page.

THE PARABLE OF THE TEN VIRGINS.

BY THE EDITOR.

TEXT: Matt. 25: 10: "And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut."

If there is one point in the Christian's experience which is of supreme importance, a moment which he should contemplate with the profoundest interest and concern, it is that hidden line that marks the limit of his probation, that moment which decides his eternal destiny.

"There is a time—we know not when;

A point—we know not where;

That marks the destiny of men,

To glory or despair."

Such a moment is brought to view in the text. A certain class, there represented as ready, go in with the bridegroom to the marriage; and then the door is shut; and afterward, when another class come and seek admittance, they cannot find it.

Is it possible for us to understand our relation to this decisive moment, and to know when we are drawing near thereto?

In the great advent movement of forty years ago, this parable was instinctively turned to as one which had a vital connection with the movement, and illustrated its principal features. It was given that prominence and importance to which its evidently solemn truths entitle it. The Adventists of that day well understood the general scope of the parable; and although they had not then light sufficient to discern the real meaning of one of its essential features, they had an application for it all, and used it with wonderful effect. We hear not so much about it now. Further light was needed to a full understanding of it, and the subject has grown, to those who have rejected that light, darker and darker. The disappointment of the passing of the time threw them into confusion; their misapplication of the parable threw them into still worse confusion. They have lost their bearings; and, locating in the future what belongs to the past, they now look for the fulfillment of events which they will ever expect in vain; for they are already accomplished.

There is just one key to the solution of this parable, just one subject which explains it; but only one people have as yet been willing to receive the light on this subject. The subject to which we refer is that of the sanctuary, and the people are the Seventh-day Adventists. When we say that Seventh-day Adventists are the only ones who can explain this parable, it is simply saying that they have adopted the only position on the subject of the sanctuary which makes its explanation possible; for without a correct view of the sanctuary question it is no more possible to explain the parable of the ten virgins than it would be possible to explain the movements of the heavenly bodies without a knowledge of the Copernican theory of the solar system. But that Seventh-day Adventists can explain the parable, and make an application of all of its solemn and important lessons, it is the purpose of these remarks to demonstrate.

The intuitions of believers in 1844, as to the importance of this parable, were correct. The occasion, the subject, the speaker, all show this. It follows that discourse in Matt. 24, which is justly termed, "Our Lord's great Prophecy." It is designed to illustrate the experience of the church in connection with the doctrine of the second coming of Christ; for to this point, as its ultimate object, the whole of Matthew 24 is devoted. We are taken down step by step through the whole dispensation from the first to the second advent of the Saviour. The chapter closes with the church standing in the last generation ever to live on the earth, and with a warning against the danger and doom of the evil servant who says in his heart, "My Lord delayeth his coming." "Then" says the opening sentence of the parable, "shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins which took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom." The expression "kingdom of heaven" is here used, as in many other instances in the New Testament, to denote the work of the gospel among men; as in the parable of the net, the mustard seed, the leaven, etc. And by it we are taught that at the time referred to, the experience of the church in the advent movement might be likened to the events of an eastern wedding.

The time and the circumstances being thus clearly defined, let us look at the movements connected with an eastern marriage ceremony, and also at the experience of the church at the time when the coming of Christ is drawing nigh, and mark what events in the latter we are instructed to look for by the illustrations of the former.

The first movement was on the part of the bridegroom, who came with a procession, with torches, timbrels, and song, to the place of the marriage. Meanwhile virgins were waiting to greet him on the way, and join the procession to the appointed place. If there chanced to be some delay on the part of the bridegroom beyond the hour when he was expected, the virgins would naturally incline to drowsiness as they waited, and suffer their lights to grow dim. But when the procession did finally come, they were to proceed with them to the common destination. The householder who made the wedding, provided each guest with a suitable garment in which to appear at the ceremony, called the "wedding garment." And in these garments the guests, having reached the appointed place, were to array themselves. A suitable time being given for this purpose, the master came in to examine them to see if all had complied with the regulations, and were properly arrayed in the wedding garment; then the marriage took place, and the prolonged festivities of the marriage feast in due time followed.

Such were the essential features of an eastern marriage; and through these Christ would instruct us in regard to certain positions which he is to fill, and certain experiences through which the church is to pass in connection with his second coming. First, he is the divine Bridegroom; secondly, there is a definite object called "the bride;" thirdly, there is coming a specific time when a union is to be consummated between the two, called "the marriage of the Lamb;" fourthly, there is a season of joy and heavenly entertainment to follow, called "the marriage supper of the Lamb;" but fifthly, this season immediately follows the redemption of God's people (Rev. 19:1-8), clearly implying that the marriage is, at least, closely connected with the coming of Christ; and sixthly, these events were to excite great interest among men, and cause a movement to be made which would be aptly illustrated by the going forth of virgins to meet the bridegroom at an eastern wedding.

Having now before us the events and the actors concerned in these events, it remains that we locate them and trace, as far as we can, the fulfillment of the parable.

As Christ is the bridegroom, and the leading event of the parable is the coming of the bridegroom, it follows that the virgins represent the church; for the church are the ones to be interested in, and to make preparations for, that event. When Mr. Miller and his co-laborers, at the beginning of the present generation, preached that the Saviour was soon to appear, the church arose, took their lamps—the word of God—and went forth to meet him. This "going forth to meet him" of course implies only the attention that would be given to the subject of the coming of the Lord, and the requisite work of preparation for that event. Ten virgins are introduced to represent the whole body of believers, as that was, perhaps, the usual number who acted this part in the eastern wedding. The fact that just five of these virgins were said to be foolish, shows that no definite proportion was designed to be expressed between the wise and foolish; inasmuch as this is the only division which would not seem to denote definiteness. The foolish virgins, that is, that part of the professed believers in the advent movement represented by them, took no oil in their vessels with their lamps; they had only the oil with which their lamps were first filled; but nothing to replenish them with, when the first supply was exhausted; in other words, they had only the first impulses to carry them forward in the work; the motives by which they were impelled into it were not true and genuine, and they had not the grace to stand should delay occur and a special strain be made upon their endurance.

"While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept." There could not be even a seeming tarry on the part of the bridegroom, until some definite point of time, at which he was expected to appear, had been reached and passed. This shows that in this movement there would be a definite time set for the Lord to come; but the time would pass by, and there would be a seeming delay in his appearing. It was precisely so in the advent movement. The close of the year 1843, Jewish time, which ended with the first new moon after the vernal equinox in 1844, according to our calendar, was fixed as the date which would not pass before the Lord would come. When that time did pass, more or less uncertainty and confusion followed. Those engaged in the movement, being thrown by this unexpected occurrence into a condition of doubt and perplexity, naturally began to lose their faith and zeal. They all slumbered and slept.

"And at midnight there was a cry made, 'Behold the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.'" The use of the term "midnight" clearly implies that the period of waiting would be a time of darkness; and in the very midnight of that darkness, a cry would be raised, "Behold the bridegroom cometh." This must be owing to some new evidence which would spring up, and some new tokens which would appear, to show that the delay was soon to end, that the bridegroom was indeed coming, and that the cry should accordingly be made. Three months from the passing of the time in the spring of 1844 passed by. With every declining day the doubt and uncertainty and darkness of the situation increased. The mid-summer of 1844 was reached—and then occurred a movement which is a phenomenon among religious revivals. All at once was heard in different parts of the land, the cry, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him;"—a cry raised by men simultaneously, although they knew nothing of each other's movements. The result was a sudden awakening and as powerful a spiritual work as has, perhaps, ever appeared in the Christian church. It will be of interest, as it is also necessary to an understanding of the subject, to inquire into the causes which led to this movement.

In this tarrying time the Adventist leaders had not been idle. Men of clear minds and careful thought (and there were not a few educated and able men among them), were earnestly seeking to solve the mystery of the delay. They suddenly discovered new light—some on the prophetic periods, others on the types of the former dispensation, all of which threw light at once on their position. The great prophetic period, the termination of which was supposed to mark the time for the coming of the Lord, and which was the great foundation of the Advent movement, was the 2300 prophetic days (literal years) of Dan. 8:14: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." It was proved beyond all contradiction that those days began in 457 B. C. An argument was then constructed, somewhat loosely as it now appears, as follows: "457 B. C., and 1843 A. D., together make 2300; therefore the days will terminate by the last day of the year 1843, Jewish time." They discovered that if they did end thus, they must have commenced with the very first day of 457 B. C.; for it takes 457 full years before Christ and 1843 full years after Christ, to make 2300. Further study showed that they did not begin with the first day of 457 B. C., but in the autumn of that year; consequently their termination would not be reached till the autumn of the year following 1843; that is, the autumn of 1844. And inasmuch as the event to occur at the end of the days was the cleansing of the sanctuary, they looked back to the type, and found that the sanctuary was always cleansed on the tenth day of the seventh month; which again pointed to the autumn according to our calendar. Putting these facts together, they concluded that the days would end, not in the spring of 1844 as they had at first supposed, but the autumn of the year, on the 10th day of the 7th month, Jewish time, which in that year fell on the 22d of October. That day of that month was therefore set as the time when the days would end, and the sanctuary be cleansed. The sanctuary they supposed to be the earth, and that its cleansing would be by fire at the revelation of the Lord Jesus. Therefore the cry was raised, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him;" and the whole church, like the virgins awakened by the cry at midnight, bounded to their feet as the proclamation rang through the land.

They were all aroused and trimmed their lamps, but the foolish had no oil in their vessels. Some did not seem to be able to enter into the movement with the earnestness, zeal, and joy that others experienced. They were told to go and buy for themselves; that is, to seek for themselves individually, the light and the blessing of the Lord. And it is a significant fact that this movement was just midway between the passing of the time in the spring of 1844, and the autumn of that year where it was finally ascertained that the days would end. The cry thus raised continued to be given with ever-increasing power, though all did not receive it, till that point of time was reached which had been set for the end of the days. "While they went to buy, the bridegroom came."

* The days were to date from the beginning of the work of restoring and rebuilding Jerusalem (Dan. 9: 25); but Ezra and his company did not arrive at Jerusalem till the fifth month (Ezra 7: 9); and certainly they could not have employed less than two months in locating themselves, and getting ready to build, which would carry the date into the seventh month.

Did the bridegroom come when the days ended? He certainly did not come to this earth as they had expected. But is it a coming on the part of Christ, in the clouds of heaven to this earth, which the parable brings to view? The question now to be answered is, "What is the coming of the bridegroom brought to view in the parable?" Is it the coming of Christ in the clouds of heaven? or does it point out some other event? Let it be marked, first of all, that the bridegroom in the parable was coming to the marriage. That, of course, illustrates the coming of Christ to that event which is called his marriage, or the marriage of the Lamb. But does the marriage of the Lamb take place upon this earth? By no means. Then his coming to the marriage is not his coming to this earth. When he comes to his people here, he returns from the wedding. Luke 12: 36. Then his coming to the wedding is some other event. What is it?

To ascertain this, several other questions must be answered; namely, What is the bride? what is the marriage? and when, where, and how, is the marriage to be consummated? A word may be necessary in regard to a widespread misapprehension as to what constitutes the bride. Almost uniformly, in the religious world, the church is called the bride, because Paul uses the marriage relation to illustrate the union which exists between Christ and his church. If this be so, then the marriage of the Lamb has been going on ever since souls began to be united to him. But does any one believe this? No one can believe it, in view of the fact that the marriage of the Lamb is set forth in the Scriptures as a definite event to be accomplished in connection with the redemption of his people; for as they enter the joys of the glorified state, they sing, "Let us be glad and rejoice and give honor to him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come; and his wife hath made herself ready"—not, and we, as the bride, have made ourselves ready. Rev. 19: 7. And certainly the church cannot be the bride in this parable; for here the church is represented by the virgins. The bridegroom does not come to marry the virgins; but the virgins go forth to meet him as he is coming to the marriage to take to himself another party which is called the bride.

The church not being the bride, we extend the inquiry, "What is the bride?" a step further. In Rev. 21: 9, 10, John declares that one of the seven angels which had the seven last plagues (one who has to do with the closing scenes of this world's history) addressed him thus: "Come hither, I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife." Then the angel took him away to a high mountain, and showed him the city of God, the New Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God. This city, then, is plainly called the bride; for we may be sure the angel did not mingle deception with the holy vision he was imparting to John.

To parry the force of this testimony, those who claim that the church is the bride, affirm that this city is merely a symbol of the church. But to make this city, with its four-square form, its foundation stones and wall, its gates and streets, its four outlooks toward the four points of the compass, its river and tree of life, and its throne of God and the Lamb, simply a figure of the church, is too great a paroxysm of mystification to be entertained by any at least for whom these remarks are intended; and we therefore dismiss at once this supposition. Moreover, John says that when this city comes down from God out of heaven, it is prepared as a bride adorned for her husband (Rev. 21:2); and Paul, speaking of the same city (Gal. 4:26) says that it is "the mother of us all." By the phrase "us all," Paul certainly means the church. We, then, are the children of that city, not the city itself. The children must not be confounded with the mother.

With this city, the Lamb, when he takes it as his own, is to be intimately connected. The Lamb's twelve apostles have their names upon its twelve foundation stones. Verse 14. The Lamb's people in twelve divisions have their names upon its twelve gates. Verse 12. The Lamb in connection with God is the temple of it. Verse 22. He is also the light of it. Verse 23. And the Lamb's book of life is the great register of the names of all those who are entitled to enter therein. Verse 27. And above all, and over all, is the throne of the Lamb from which proceeds the river of life that makes glad this city of God. Rev. 22:1; Ps. 46:4. And the prophet Isaiah, addressing this city, as a representative of the new covenant, says: "Thy Maker is thy husband." Isa. 54:5. Paul, in Gal. 4:26, 27, applies this very prophecy to the New Jerusalem above, which is the mother of us all. Christ is the author of the covenant. He is the maker of the city. He is the husband of this city, which, in the illustration used to set forth the events connected with the carrying out of the great plan of salvation, is called the bride.

Having now learned from the testimony of the Scriptures who the bridegroom is, and also what the bride is, it is not difficult to tell what the marriage is—it is a special relation which these parties at some time enter into with each other. Is there, then, ever to come a time when Christ is to enter into such a relation with this city, and so receive it unto himself that the event may be called the marriage of the Lamb?—Most certainly; for this city is to be the grand metropolis of his future kingdom. There is his throne; and when he takes his throne, he receives the city as his own, the ornament and glory of the occasion when he is crowned King of kings and Lord of lords. As he therefore takes the kingdom when he takes the city, his marriage may be described as his reception of the kingdom. But he receives his kingdom before he comes in the clouds of heaven; for he represents himself in Luke 19:11, 12, by the nobleman who went away into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return; so Christ has gone away to receive his kingdom and then return; and when he appears in the clouds of heaven, it is after he has been invested with royalty; for he is then seated upon the throne of his glory. Matt. 25:31. If therefore we can ascertain when, and under what circumstances Christ receives his kingdom, we can tell what the marriage is, and when he comes to it.

THE PARABLE OF THE TEN VIRGINS.

BY THE EDITOR.

(Concluded.)

Text: Matt. 25: 10: "And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut."

CHRIST receives the kingdom of his Father. Ps. 2: 8; 110: 1; Luke 22: 29. The prophet Daniel describes the scene when this kingdom is delivered to the Son. Dan. 7: 13, 14: "I saw in the visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him; and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him." But this coming to the reception of the kingdom is introduced after the scene described in verses 9 and 10. Daniel there says: "I beheld till the Ancient of days did sit [that is, "took his position as Judge in a court of justice;" for so the words "did sit" signify in the Hebrew]; . . . the Judgment was set, and the books were opened." What Judgment scene is this? It is some portion of the Judgment work which takes place before the kingdom is received, as described in verse 14, and consequently before Christ's work as priest is finished. And right here the light of the sanctuary question comes to our aid in the exposition of this subject; for that shows just such a Judgment work as this, as the closing act of our great High Priest in the tabernacle on high, when he finishes his mediation for the world, before he ascends the throne as King. He closes his great round of service as priest, as the round of service in the typical tabernacle of Moses was closed each year, by a brief ministration in the most holy place, which is the making of the atonement, or the cleansing of the sanctuary. This is a work of Judgment; for it is to remove sin, and decide who is accepted of God, and who is to be cut off from among the people. Lev. 23: 29. Such a work of Judgment must be rendered, and all cases be decided before Christ appears in the clouds of heaven; for then no time is given for the investigation of character, but in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, the results of some previous decision are carried out, the righteous living are translated, and the righteous dead are raised from the grave. The sanctuary subject provides a time and place for this Judgment work, and no other subject does this—it is the cleansing of the sanctuary, the close of Christ's ministration which transpires in the most holy place; and immediately on the conclusion of this, he receives the kingdom, which is the marriage of the Lamb.

When, then, did Christ enter upon this work in the most holy place in the sanctuary in heaven? At the end of the 2300 days in 1844; for "then," says the prophecy (Dan. 8: 14), "shall the sanctuary be cleansed." When does he go in before the Ancient of days, according to Dan. 7: 13, 14, to receive a kingdom?—When he goes in before the Father in the most holy place; for he does not leave the Father's presence there till he is invested with the royalty of his own throne. When, then, did Christ go to the wedding in the representation of the parable (Matt. 25: 10)?—At the same time, when he entered the most holy to cleanse the sanctuary and then receive his kingdom.

"While they went to buy, the bridegroom came." The Adventists of 1844 fixed the end of the days on the 22d of October of that year; and the argument still holds good that there they did end: there they thought the bridegroom would come; and there he did come—not to this earth, as they incorrectly supposed; but to the marriage, to the place where he is to be crowned king, receive the bride, the New Jerusalem, as the metropolis of his kingdom, and the allegorical representation of the new covenant through which the children—the church—are to be brought to the new life of the heavenly kingdom.

They simply mistook the kind of coming there referred to. All that the prophecy of Dan. 8: 14, or the parable of the ten virgins warranted them to expect, did there and then take place. The bridegroom came—not to this earth, but to the marriage, to which he was coming in the parable, when the midnight cry was raised. The "tarrying time" of the parable there ended; and the "midnight cry" of the parable was given from the midsummer of 1844 to that time. Some are looking for this cry to be given in the future; but their expectations are vain; for it will never be repeated.

What, then, has been our position since that time? and what is our present relation to the parable? A query may here arise in some minds on this wise: "You say that the bridegroom came in 1844?"—Yes; to the wedding. "But the parable says that they that were ready went in with him to the marriage; and the door was shut—so you have the door shut in 1844, and no admittance, and no mercy, for any one since that time."—Not quite so fast. Here is the turning point in the parable, and where many jump to a wrong conclusion. They did so in 1844. Even those to whom the light on the sanctuary subject had begun to dawn, were fast drifting to the conclusion that as there was no ministry in the first apartment of the sanctuary while the work was going forward in the second, and the door of the first apartment was shut, it signified that during this time, no mercy was offered to the world. A further investigation of the question, however, aided by the spirit of prophecy then beginning to be manifested, soon set them right on this; for they saw that the work in the most holy was a work of forgiveness and pardon to all who would seek for its benefits, as well as the work in the holy place. The offering in the most holy was for all the people; and so also in the antitype. If the door of the first apartment was shut, the door into the second apartment was opened. And the so-called door of mercy cannot be shut while the ministration in the most holy continues.

Mark also the very important modifying clause—they that were ready went in with him to the marriage. But who was ready then? who is ready yet? Here is the test question in the application. When, and how, is it to be determined who are ready? No one can be pronounced "ready" till his case has been examined to see whether he is ready or not. After the bridegroom has come to the marriage, the King must come in to see the guests, to see whether all have on the wedding garment or not. Matt. 22: 11-13. What is this period of examination?—It is the period of the investigative Judgment in the sanctuary above already referred to. Will any of the guests go in to the marriage, before the very last guest is decided to be ready?—By no means. And when will that be?—When the ministration in the most holy place of the sanctuary is finished, and every case is decided. When does the marriage take place, or, in other words, when does Christ receive his kingdom?—When he has finished his work as priest in the heavenly sanctuary. That is, after we pass the ending of the days, and Christ goes to the marriage, and the work of cleansing the sanctuary, or the examination and decision of all cases, begins, then all further events, all further declarations and remaining prophecies, pass over at once to the conclusion of that work when the last act of ministration in the sanctuary shall be done. This work, having once commenced, absorbs for the time being the whole current of the parable; and when that is done, then those of the guests who are found with the wedding garment on, are pronounced "ready;" and then, but not before, they go in with him to the marriage. Then the door is shut, and the marriage is consummated, or Christ receives the kingdom.

Thus it is seen that the events mentioned in the text are not all accomplished at once; but after the first event named takes place, namely, "And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came," the whole period of the ministry in the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary is necessarily thrown in before we come to the next event; namely, "And they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut." Here is where the mistake is generally made in the application of the parable; and from what has been set forth, it can be readily seen why those only who have correct views of the sanctuary subject can give a consistent explanation of it.

Where, then, are we in the fulfillment? The first inauguration of the past Advent movement was the going forth of the virgins to meet the bridegroom. In the spring of 1844, the bridegroom tarried and the virgins slumbered. In the midsummer of 1844, the midnight cry was made. In the autumn of 1844, the days ended, the bridegroom came to the marriage, and the work which then comes in before the marriage is consummated, commenced; namely, the cleansing of the sanctuary, or, which is the same thing, the examination of the guests. The door cannot be shut till this work is done, and those who are found ready go in to the marriage. The door is still open; and other guests may come till this work in the most holy place of the sanctuary is finished. We are now in this period of the examination of the guests, which is to determine who is ready to go in with him to the marriage. More than forty years of this time are already in the past; and the work must soon be brought to a close, and the great question be decided who among the guests is "ready" to go in to the marriage, and who, not being found with the wedding garment on, is to be bound hand and foot, and cast into outer darkness. The time for the marriage is at hand. Those who are ready will then go in; and the door will be shut. As the going in with him to the marriage is a future event, it becomes a matter of special interest to inquire what it will be. On this point we have the following facts to guide us:

1. The marriage takes place in heaven, not on this earth; for it is in heaven that Christ receives his kingdom before his second coming.

2. It takes place before any of the saints are translated to heaven; hence they enter in with him to the marriage, not literally, but in some accumulated sense.

3. No one can go in with him to the marriage till the marriage takes place; and that does not occur till Christ has finished his work as priest in the sanctuary. The going in could not therefore have been in 1844.

4. No person can go in with him to the marriage till he is pronounced "ready;" and that is not till all cases are decided in the sanctuary above, and probation is ended. The time when those who are ready go in to the marriage, is therefore at that moment of supreme importance when their probation closes; and when all probation closes; for after that the door is shut.

Let us then look at some Scriptures which point out the experience and condition of the church at this time, and mark what they indicate.

The apostle Peter, in Acts 3: 19, speaks of the time when sins shall be blotted out (which we know is at the conclusion of the sanctuary work), and says that then "times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." The Lord then comes particularly near to his people, just as their sins are blotted out, and they pass the line of their probation, and the time comes for them to go in with him to the marriage.

Again, the same apostle in his second epistle (1: 19) speaks as follows: "We have also a more sure word of prophecy whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn and the day-star arise in your hearts." According to this testimony a time is coming when the day-star will arise in the hearts of God's people, the day will dawn to them, and they will receive such an unction from on high and illumination of the Holy Spirit, that they will no longer need the word of prophecy, the light of the holy Scriptures, to guide their steps. They will themselves be an embodiment of the spirit of prophecy, and be enlightened with greater light than the prophets have ever been able to impart to them. In regard to what is meant by the day-star which is to arise in their hearts, we read in one of the promises to the overcomer (Rev. 2: 28), "And I will give him the morning star." This must be the same as the "day-star" of Peter's epistle. Before the Revelation was finished, Jesus, speaking of himself, said to John, "I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star." Rev. 22: 16. To the overcomer, then, Christ promises to give himself. How does he do this? Answer: To the last church, the Laodicean, he says, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." Rev. 3: 20. This denotes a state of union with Christ that no church has ever yet enjoyed.

Consider the bearing of all these scriptures and the condition of the church at this time. They are past probation; their sins are blotted out; they are accepted; a refreshing from the presence of the Lord is upon them; the day has dawned to them; they no longer need the light of the Scriptures to guide them; the day-star, the bright and morning star, has arisen in their hearts; and their union with Christ is so complete that they are represented as supping with him and he with them, as friend holds converse with friend at the festal board; they are enraptured with the presence of the Lord; they know his position, and understand his every movement; they are full of the Holy Ghost, as Stephen was; and as that proto-martyr looked up into heaven and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God, so this remnant church, through the divine illumination that is then upon them, behold Jesus their King when he receives from the Father honor, majesty, and power, glory and dominion, when, amid all the pomp and splendor of the heavenly world, his many well-earned crowns are placed upon his brow. What is this, but going in with him to the marriage? It must be this. The time, the place, the circumstances, the scriptures quoted, and the condition of the church at that time, all hold us to this conclusion.

Such is the wonderful period of blessing and exaltation and glory before the faithful. Who will share it?—They who are "ready." All depends upon this. Are we ready? This is the question we should ever address to our own hearts, as we seek with unceasing endeavor to give sure heed to the counsel of the faithful and true Witness, who now urges upon us (Rev. 3: 18) to buy of him the white raiment—the wedding garment—that we may be prepared for that time just at hand when the King shall come in to see if we have that garment on or not, and the investigative Judgment of the sanctuary shall test our fitness for the overcomer's reward.

"Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us." Who are the foolish virgins? If the virgins as a whole represent all those who become interested in the great Advent movement and are called out by it, the wise are those who follow the true light in regard to it, and the foolish those who walk in darkness and adopt unscripural positions relative to that event. There are, alas! many such in the land. There is still another division to be noticed, and that is those represented by the man who though he had come to the wedding was found without a wedding garment. Matt. 22: 11. This man represents those who receive the truth, have the true light, understand in regard to the sanctuary subject and the marriage, and all the truth of this important time, and yet hold that truth only theoretically, and are not sanctified through it, and prepared by it for the Judgment. Such will finally be rejected, and meet as sad a fate as if they had never had a place among the wise virgins at all. They find themselves among the foolish virgins at last, and the more foolish of the two.

After probation ends, the foolish virgins becoming aware, seemingly, that their condition is not right, begin earnestly to seek the Lord for help. This move on their part is represented in the parable by their coming and saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us. They appar-

only expect to find admittance; but it is denied them. Probation is past, but they know it not; the door is shut, but they are not aware of it. They have rejected the clearest light and truth till the day of grace is ended. These are some of those, at least, who are mentioned in Matt. 7: 21, 23: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many shall say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name have done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them I never knew you. Depart from me, ye that work iniquity."

Ah! that is the trouble. While professing to serve God, they have worked "iniquity;" which word means "lawlessness."—"Depart from me, ye law-breakers." They have been the enemies of God's holy law; they have despised his Sabbath; they have refused to reverence his sanctuary; they rejected the special truths God sent forth to perfect his church in these last days; they have been willfully blind to the light, and the willing servants of sin; their interpretations of prophecy have been the reckless imaginings of their own hearts, their light, the sparks of their own kindling, and the Lord does not know them. One of the saddest conditions in the whole domain of religious experience is this state of self-deception into which many will fall, and the terrible disappointment to which they are doomed at last.

Such is the light this parable of the ten virgins throws upon our present position, such the important lesson we believe the Lord designed through it to impress upon us. Will we walk in the light, and profit by the lesson? Oh! to be ready. Upon this condition all depends; and we know not when the test will pass upon us.

"Oh! where is this mysterious bourn
By which each path is crossed;
Beyond which God himself hath sworn
That he who goes is lost?"

The man in the parable of Matt. 22, who was found upon examination without the wedding garment on when asked why he was in that condition had nothing to say; he was speechless. And if when the decision of our own takes place, we are found unprepared, what will be our excuse? The case of this man is presented to show us that we will have no excuse. Did we not know that we were near the end?—Yes. Did we not know that in the illustration of the parable we were in the solemn time of the examination of the guests?—Yes. Did we not know that Christ was about to cease to plead as Mediator between God and men in the sanctuary on high?—Yes. Did we not know that our cases must soon come up for examination and decision?—Yes. Did we not have the wedding garment—a robe washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb—offered us without money and without price?—Yes. Did not the faithful and true Witness warn us that we were not ready, and earnestly urge upon us the necessity of buying this robe of him?—Yes. Then why, it may be asked of us, if, despising all this knowledge, we refuse to prepare—why have you come in hither without a wedding garment? Why did you suffer yourself to come to this decisive hour unprepared? What would we have to say? What excuse would we be able to give? Every soul under these circumstances before that tribunal will be struck dumb with an insupportable sense of shame and guilt.

But we need not be in this condition. Thank God, it is yet possible for us to be found "ready" when the decisive hour shall come. "They that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut." Enough light has been given to lead us to the requisite preparation, if we will walk in it. We may share in the great refreshing which is just before the church, and find our path growing brighter and brighter till it ends in the perfect day. May He who looks upon his struggling children with more than a father's pity, and a mother's love, enable us thus to do.

"An answer from the skies is sent—
Ye that from God depart,
While it is called to-day repent,
And harden not your heart."

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

From the seen, we reasonably look forward to the unseen. To the realm of knowledge, we necessarily anchor a realm of faith. We know that all God's creatures are morally accountable to him. It follows that his favor must be suspended on a compliance with his will, and that some just recompense at his hand must await the incorrigibly disobedient. Then all must at some time be examined that their course may be approved or disapproved by the great Judge of all, and their future condition determined by a decision rendered in accordance with what their course of life has been.

These conclusions deduce themselves from the circumstances in which we find ourselves placed—from conditions of which we take cognizance by our own senses. And in accordance with this is the explicit and oft-repeated testimony of the word of God.

To the Athenians Paul testified of God the Father, that "he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men in that he hath raised him from the dead." Acts 17:31.

God, then, is to judge the world by Jesus Christ, whom he hath raised from the dead; and he has, by thus raising him, given assurance to all men of what he will hereafter do.

To the Romans the same apostle bears this testimony: "There is no respect of persons with God." For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law; and as many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law, in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel." Rom. 2:11-16 (omitting the parenthesis). What God has appointed is sure to come in due time. The Judgment of the great day is therefore an event which is certain to transpire.

This Judgment will embrace all classes of men, both the righteous and the wicked; for thus Solomon testifies: "I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked; for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work." Eccl. 9:17. It will also embrace Satan and all the evil angels, as Jude declares: "And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the Judgment of the great day." Jude 6. Beyond our power of conception will therefore be the number of cases to be acted upon at this great tribunal. But let no one for this reason suppose that the individual will be lost in the multitude, and that consequently he will not be obliged to answer personally for his own sins. No; the Judge will have no difficulty in acting upon every case individually; "for there is a time there for every purpose and every work." "Every one of us shall give an account of himself to God." Rom. 14:12. Christ solemnly assures us that our accountability extends even to our words, and that for every idle word we must give account in the day of Judgment. Matt. 12:36. And Solomon declares that "God shall bring every work into Judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil." Eccl. 12:14.

There will be no lack of time for this work. When Paul says that God has appointed a day in which he will judge the world, he does not mean a day of twenty-four hours. It would be impossible to dwarf the immense individual work which the foregoing texts bring to view within such a compass. Moreover the Bible in one instance sets apart a thousand years as belonging to the day of Judgment. Rev. 20:4. The whole work, according to other Scriptures, occupies even more time than this; how much more we do not know.

And as there will be no lack of time, so God has no lack of agents to do his bidding. The prophet Daniel, describing the opening of the Judgment scene, says: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; and thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him. The Judgment was set, and the books were opened." Dan. 7:9, 10. These thousands are not the multitudes of the human family brought up before God for their final trial. They are, instead, the heavenly host who are there to do him service in the great Judgment work. John, in the Revelation, brings to view the same company, as he unmistakably shows by using the same terms of enumeration; and he plainly calls them angels. His words are these: "And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts, and the elders; and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands." Rev. 5:11. Here, there are distinctly specified a hundred millions of angels; and as if this fell immeasurably far short of the whole number, both Daniel and John add the indefinite and innumerable "thousands of thousands." How vast a work must this be, and of what importance to the human family, that unfolds in its performance such multitudes of the heavenly world!

In the passage quoted from Daniel (7: 9, 10), God the Father, there called the Ancient of Days, is represented as the Judge; for the expression "did sit" means to take a position as judge in a court of justice. And again we read that the Father "hath committed all judgment unto the Son." John 5: 22. And still again, "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" 1 Cor. 6: 2, 3.

These passages have an important bearing on this question; for they cannot all apply at the same time; hence they show that there are great divisions of this work with which these parties respectively have to do, and that there must be order in the arrangement by which it is carried forward. Three essential elements enter into a work of judgment. These are, 1. Examination and decision of cases; 2. Rendering of the sentence; 3. Execution of the sentence. It becomes a matter of great interest to determine when, where, and how these divisions of the work are accomplished in the Judgment of the great day. When Christ appears at his second advent, he says, "My reward is with me to give every man according as his work shall be." Rev. 22: 12. The reward he brings is therefore something which had been determined before he left heaven. He does not come to determine what every man's reward shall be, but he brings with him that which is each man's portion, so far as it can then be carried out, as it had been before determined. Some portion of the Judgment work, therefore, is performed before the second coming of Christ. Here we are forced into our first wide departure from the prevailing views upon this question. It seems to be generally supposed that when Christ appears all the nations are gathered before him and all the generations that have ever lived, and then each case is examined and decided and sentence rendered and executed; and by some mysterious process all this is accomplished in one day, and the work is ended. But a moment's consideration will show that this cannot be the correct view; for when Christ appears the righteous dead are raised, and the righteous living are changed in a moment in the twinkling of an eye, and not a moment is then given for the examination of character and the decision of cases.

This proposition, that a portion of the Judgment work transpires before the second coming of Christ, is a very important one, and should be sustained by the most indubitable proof; and of this there is no lack. Our appeal is to the Scriptures of truth. 1 Cor. 15: 51, 52: "Behold, I show you a mystery: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible and we shall be changed." This testimony applies to the righteous alone; for it is of them alone that the apostle speaks in the preceding verses. In verses 42-44, he says: "So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption. It is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power. It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body." We know that the wicked are not raised in incorruption, glory, power, or spirituality; hence the righteous are singled out for these instantaneous blessings when Christ appears. It must therefore have been decided before his coming who among the dead are worthy of a resurrection to life, and who among the living are then to be changed to immortality. But this decision of cases is a part of the work of Judgment. That portion of it therefore takes place before Christ's coming, and is just when he appears.

Another proof that the Judgment of the righteous takes place before that of the wicked, is found in the fact that the righteous are to judge the wicked, according to the testimony already quoted from 1 Cor. 6: 2, 3. On this point Daniel also testifies: "I beheld and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them: until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High." Dan. 7: 21. And John corroborates this statement in these words: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them: and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, nor in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." Rev. 20: 4.

But as the saints are themselves to be judged, it follows that they must have passed this test before they can thus sit in judgment on the case of the wicked.

Still a third argument on this point may be drawn from the fact that the righteous dead are raised long before the resurrection of the wicked dead takes place. Following the declaration quoted above from Rev. 20: 4, that the righteous dead are raised to reign with Christ in Judgment a thousand years, John continues (verses 5, 6): "But the rest of the dead [this must of course include all the wicked dead and be confined to them] lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This [the resurrection in which the righteous dead come forth] is the first resurrection: Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." Speaking of that resurrection in which he hoped to share, Paul says, "If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead" (literally, "to the resurrection out from among the dead ones"). Phil. 3:11. To the Corinthians he wrote: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." 1 Cor. 15:22, 23.

Here, then, is a resurrection which inspiration denominates "the first resurrection." All who have part in it are pronounced "blessed and holy." On them "the second death will have no power," as it will have power on all the wicked. This resurrection is "out from among the dead." It takes place at the second coming of Christ, and only those who are Christ's have a part therein. And this resurrection of the righteous to immortality must be admitted as decisive proof that they pass the test of the Judgment, and are accepted of the Judge before that time.

There is yet a more explicit statement of this great fact from the lips of our Lord himself. He says: "But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, . . . are equal unto the angels and are children of God, being children of the resurrection." This act of "accounting worthy" must precede the resurrection of the righteous. But this act of accounting men worthy of a part in the kingdom of God, is none other than the act of acquitting them in the Judgment. The investigative Judgment in the case of the righteous, is consequently passed when they are raised from the dead; and as their resurrection is at the advent of Christ, it follows that they pass their examination, and are accounted worthy of a place in the kingdom of God, before the Saviour returns to this earth to take them to the mansions prepared for them on high.

It will be noticed that all this testimony which speaks of that portion of the Judgment which antedates the second advent, pertains to the righteous. This is the Judgment of which Peter speaks, that begins at the house of God, and he adds, "[I]f it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?" 1 Pet. 4:17. If we cannot pass this division of the Judgment which is, as it were, but the stepping of our feet into the brink of the waters, what shall we do in the swelling of Jordan? "If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?"

It becomes now a matter of exceeding importance as well as interest to locate this division of the Judgment, ascertain our relation to it, and trace the steps which follow.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

INASMUCH as the first division of the Judgment work transpires before the coming of Christ, and consists in "accounting worthy" those who are to receive the reward of immortality at that time, it follows that this part of it is accomplished while Christ is yet acting as mediator in the presence of his Father, before he takes his position as king, upon his own throne. Indeed, a moment's thought will make it evident that Christ cannot vacate his position as our High Priest above, till it is ascertained how many have accepted of the offer of forgiveness of sin and everlasting life, through him, as this must be an essential part of his mediatorial work. But on whomsoever the blessed words of acquittal and acceptance are passed, their Judgment is so far accomplished.

But in this part of the Judgment, our Lord cannot be the Judge; for he cannot be both Judge and Advocate at the same time. This, therefore, must be the period during which the Father sits as Judge. And with this agree the words of Daniel, when, describing the very beginning of the Judgment, and the first opening of the books, he declares that the Ancient of days, God, the Father, "did sit" (as Judge), and that one like the Son of man (Jesus, as priest and advocate) came near before him. Dan. 7:9, 10, 13.

A very important and interesting question now arises; namely, in what part of Christ's priestly work does this Judgment scene occur? and this suggests a brief survey of the work of our Lord, in his different offices, and in different dispensations. Three distinct and consecutive positions are assigned him in the Scriptures, in connection with the work of human redemption.

1. His work upon this earth at his first advent was in fulfillment of the prediction by Moses fifteen hundred years before: "And the Lord said unto me, . . . I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him." Deut. 18:18, quoted and applied to Christ, in Acts 3:22, 23.

2. When, having suffered upon the cross as our sacrifice, and being raised from the dead for our justification, he ascended to the right hand of his Father, he became a great High Priest, after the order of Melchisedec. Ps. 110; Heb. 8:1-6.

3. But when he comes again, he is in possession of kingly authority, as promised in the second psalm, and bears upon his vesture the royal title, "King of kings and Lord of lords." Rev. 19:16. We thus find that his prophetic office was the subject of solemn promise (Deut. 18:15-18); his priesthood is established by an oath (Ps. 110:4); and his kingly office is the subject of a fixed decree, as declared in Ps. 2:6, 7. Our field of inquiry leads us to the contemplation of the latter two only, his position as priest coming first in order for examination.

And when we approach this subject, we are not left to the vague and uncertain views under which the Christian world seems to rest in mystified contentment; for Christ's position as priest is clearly defined, the nature of his work is distinctly set forth, the modus operandi of the forgiveness of sin, through his intercession, is made plain by the countless illustrations of fifteen hundred years, the event with which his priestly work shall close is the subject of repeated revelations, and the beginning of the closing division of that work is marked, as will be hereafter seen, by the leading prophetic period of the inspired pages.

When our Lord ascended he took a position "on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens." Heb. 8:1. "Sit thou at my right hand," said the Father to the Son. Ps. 110:1. We are not, however, to understand from these expressions that the Saviour, as priest, is immovably confined to one place, and in a sitting posture. For Stephen, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw Jesus standing on the right hand of God. Acts 7:55, 56. Saul had an actual interview with him while on his way to Damascus. Acts 9:3-5; 1 Cor. 15:8; 9:1. And even when Christ is seen coming in the clouds of heaven, while the Father remains far away in the metropolis of the universe, he is still said to be "sitting on the right hand of power." Mark 16:62.

The expression "on the right hand" refers rather to exaltation and honor than to location. Gesenius defines the Hebrew word yahmeen, right hand, as follows: "To sit on the right hand of the king, as the highest place of honor, e. g., spoken of the queen (1 Kings 2:19; Ps. 45:9); of one beloved of the king and vicar of the kingdom. Ps. 110:1." And so Paul testifies of Christ, that the Father hath "set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality and power and might and dominion, and every name that is named not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all." Eph. 1:20-23. Let us rejoice that he who offers himself as our advocate and friend holds such a position of exaltation and influence and union with him who is the Judge of all.

While Christ thus sits at the right hand of power on the throne with his Father, he performs his priestly office. He is in the fullest sense that which was prefigured by Melchisedec, king of Salem, or Prince of Peace, and priest of the Most High God. His position as priest is thus set forth by the prophet Zechariah: "Behold the man whose name is the Branch; and he shall grow up out of his place; and he shall build the temple of the Lord; even he shall build the temple of the Lord; and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and he [the Branch, Christ] shall be a priest upon his [Jehovah's] throne; and the counsel of peace shall be between them both." Zech. 6:12, 13. No language could more beautifully describe the relation of the Father and Son to each other, as they are together engaged in carrying out the plan of man's salvation. But Christ is hereafter to occupy another throne in his own name, as he says in his message to the Laodiceans: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Rev. 3:21.

The work of Christ as priest was foreshadowed by the typical services of the Mosaic dispensation. The priests of that time served "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Heb. 8:3-5. Paul, in his epistle to the Hebrews, draws out a very full comparison between the earthly priests and our Lord. They had gifts and sacrifices to offer; so he also has somewhat to offer. Heb. 8:2. They had a ministry to perform; he a more excellent ministry than they. Verses 6. They were ministers of the earthly sanctuary, pitched by the hands of men; he is a minister of the true tabernacle in heaven, greater and more perfect, pitched by the Lord and not by men. Heb. 8:2; 9:11. They offered the blood of animals; he offers his own blood. Heb. 9:12. Their offerings could not take away sin, except in figure; his removes sin in reality. Heb. 10:1, 12, 14.

The parallel between them may be easily drawn. In the type there was a real law the transgression of which constituted sin; here we have the same law, and the same results from its transgression. "Sin is [still] the transgression of the law." 1 John 3:4. There was real sin; here the same. There were sinners to be forgiven; here the same. There was the earthly sanctuary; here the heavenly. There was the Levitical order of priesthood; here the Melchisedec. There was the blood of animals; here the blood of Christ. There was forgiveness in figure; here forgiveness in fact. There because men did not long continue by reason of death, a completed round of service was marked off by the the great day of atonement every year; here Christ, not being subject to death, performs but one great round of service, and accomplishes his work once for all, the conclusion of his ministry being marked by a great antitypical work of atonement.

We now secure the forgiveness of sin in the same manner in which sinners then secured it—we through the more perfect service of which theirs was a figure. All through the year, till the day of atonement, the seekers for pardon among the people of Israel brought the victims which they took for their propitiation to the ministering priest at the tabernacle door. Confessing their sin, that sin was then borne, through the blood of the victim and the ministry of the priest, into the sanctuary. The penitent was dismissed with the sense of pardon in his breast, and the priest, if it may be so expressed, had the sin in charge till the approaching day of atonement. Then by a special service in the second apartment or most holy place, performed only at that time, and only in that place, the sins were removed from the sanctuary, and upon the head of the scape-goat borne away into a land of forgetfulness, and Israel were then, in figure, free.

In like manner all through the present dispensation, till the great antitypical work of atonement, seekers after pardon under the sound of the gospel, bring the victim they take for their propitiation—the antitypical crucified Saviour—by faith to the sanctuary on high, where they find the risen Redeemer as ministering priest, through whom they confess their sins to God the Judge of all. And when the time for the final work of atonement comes, then a special work in the most holy place of the temple on high, of which the people may still avail themselves, removes the sins from the sanctuary and the people, and God's true Israel are then forever acquitted from the guilt of transgression.

But this acquittal from the guilt of sin, is acquittal in the Judgment. This is the setting apart of certain ones to be made like Christ when he shall appear (1 John 3:2), the "accounting worthy" of certain ones to escape the things coming upon the earth, and to stand in his presence; which accounting worthy, as we have seen, must take place before the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the just.

One great question is now answered; namely, In what part of Christ's mediatorial work does that requisite investigative Judgment scene occur which decides who are to receive the reward of immortality which Christ brings with him at his coming? The answer is that it is the closing division of his ministry, the solemn work of the atonement with which the service of the sanctuary concludes.

But this ministration in the second apartment, or most holy place, where the atonement is made, is the cleansing of the sanctuary (Lev. 16); and the beginning of this work is marked by the great prophetic period of Dan. 8 : 14. "Unto two thousand three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." These days extend far down into the present dispensation, and hence apply to the sanctuary of this dispensation. They point to the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, the great antitypical work of atonement, the solemn conclusion of Christ's mediatorial work for the world, as the plan of salvation is brought to its end.

The twenty-three hundred days (years) commence with the seventy weeks of Dan. 9 : 24, dating from the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. Verse 25. This commandment for the restoration of Jerusalem, was the culmination of a series of movements in behalf of the Jewish people after their Babylonish captivity, including the decree of Cyrus, B. C. 536, (Ezra 1), the decree of Darius, A. C. 519, (Ezra 6), and reaching their fulness and completion in the grand document issued to Ezra the priest, by Artaxerxes Longimanus, Ezra 7. This decree was issued in the seventh year of the king (verse 7); and this, according to the most authentic chronology, was A. C. 457. Dating from that point, the whole period would terminate, and the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary begin, in 1844. As Ezra commenced his work in the autumn of the year (Ezra 7 : 8), we are carried to the autumn for the termination of the days; and the exact point in the autumn where they would end is indicated by the type which fixed the cleansing of the sanctuary to the tenth day of the seventh month.

Here we pause that the reader may weigh the momentous conclusion to which this argument leads us. If these things be so, more than forty years of the cleansing of the sanctuary, the antitypical work of atonement, the investigative Judgment, have already transpired! Whoever adopts these conclusions must now turn with interest to the nature of the work involved herein.

RH Feb 17, 1885

U.S.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

turn to this branch of the subject, namely, the nature of the work involved in the cleansing of the sanctuary or the investigative Judgment, another class of declarations which we find in the Scriptures at once suggests itself.

In Acts 3: 19, 20 we read: "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you." The original admits of a little different translation. Thus, Mr. Wesley, in his notes on the New Testament, reads the passage: "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, that the times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and he may send to you Christ Jesus, who was before appointed."

Speaking of these two translations, Albert Barnes, in his notes on the Acts, says: "The grammatical construction will admit of either."

So far as the point now under notice is concerned, it matters not which one of these is adopted. One represents the blotting out of sin to be when the times of refreshing arrive; the other makes the blotting out of sin to be the cause of the coming of that refreshing. But neither of them gives the idea that this blotting out of sin takes place when the sinner turns to God. Both of them locate it in the future; and both of them represent it as just preceding the second coming of Christ. And this is especially true of the latter translation which follows the original in using a conditional verb respecting Christ's advent; not as though that were at all a doubtful event, but rather as if his coming to the personal salvation of the ones addressed, depended upon their having part in the promised refreshing, and as if that refreshing was to come in consequence of the blotting out of sins.

The relation of this work of blotting out of sins to the second coming of Christ, determines when it must take place. It just precedes that coming; but the last work Christ does before his coming, is to make the atonement in the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary. This, therefore, must be the time when and the place where this work is done. But if sins are to be blotted out, they must somewhere be written; and before they can be blotted out, the books which contain these records must be examined. On this point the Scriptures are very explicit. Thus, the Lord says by Jeremiah: "For though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before me." Jer. 2: 22. By Moses the Lord speaks as follows: "Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up among my treasures?" Deut. 32: 34. In precisely the same manner speaks the apostle Paul: "But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his deeds." Rom. 2: 5, 6.

Such expressions as these—"iniquity marked," "laid up in store," "wrath treasured up," etc.,—can mean nothing less than that God takes notice of man's sins, and that every one is accurately marked before him. All the texts which speak of the blotting out of sin must have reference to the same great fact. David accordingly prays that God would blot out his transgressions. Ps. 51: 1, 9. Nehemiah prays respecting certain ones that their sins may not be blotted out. Neh. 4: 5. David and Jeremiah make use of similar language. Ps. 109: 14; Jer. 18: 23. In Isa. 44: 22, 23, the prophet speaks prophetically of the blotting out of sin, connecting it with the new creation and final redemption, but using the past tense for the future as is common in prophetic language. And in the previous chapter (43: 25) he speaks of this blotting out of sins as being necessary in order that they may be no more remembered.

The existence of these books of record, and the use that is made of them in the great work of Judgment, are matters of the most explicit revelation. In that awe-inspiring view of the Judgment given to the prophet Daniel, he says: "The Ancient of days did sit. . . . Thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the Judgment was set and the books were opened." Dan. 7: 9, 10. John also saw the books in connection with the Judgment work. He says: "And I saw the dead small and great stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things written in the books, according to their works." Rev. 20: 12. Thus it is evident that the sins of all men are entered upon the unerring heavenly records, and that the time is coming when the sins of all those who have repented and been converted, will be blotted out.

But there are other books besides the one from the records of which judgment is meted out to the wicked, as in Rev. 20: 12. In Mal. 3: 16 we read: "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him. Then shall ye return and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not." Nehemiah offered this prayer to God: "Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds that I have done for the house of my God, and for the offices thereof."

The book here referred to seems to be written for the righteous only, and hence to be designed to record their endeavors in the cause of Christ. No names would be recorded therein except the names of those who enter the service of God. But the Scriptures assure us that not all who enter upon this service will persevere and prove overcomers at last. This book will therefore show just how far they advanced in the work of overcoming, and how and when they failed. The object of this book being to contain only the good deeds of the righteous, such as they have endeavored to perform in the name and for the sake of Christ, it must show all their acts of obedience, sacrifice, self-denial, repentance, confession, and other efforts in the Christian life. When their life record is finished, if they have kept the faith and overcome, then this book will show, when the time comes for the examination of the books in the Judgment, that they are prepared for the ordeal and are entitled to a favorable decision. From the records of this book their destiny must accordingly be determined, and this is the book that is to show them worthy of a part in the first resurrection, and in the world to come.

But there is still another book which is to be taken into account, called "the book of life." Rev. 20:12. It is spoken of also as "the Lamb's book of life." Rev. 13:8; 21:27. Its purpose is to contain the names of all those who have become followers of the Lamb. It is a record of those who will find deliverance in the great time of trouble. Dan. 12:1. "And at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book." It is the grand roll of honor of all those who are entitled to an entrance at last into the city of God. Rev. 21:27. But though a person may have entered God's service, and had his name registered in the book of life, unless he perseveres to the end, his name will be blotted out of that book. Rev. 3:5. "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment, and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father and before his angels." From this declaration the opposite inevitably follows; namely, that those who do not overcome will have their names blotted out of the book of life. And the time when this is to be done is also indicated. It is when Christ confesses the names of his people before his Father, which must be in the investigative session with which the Judgment opens, and which results in "accounting worthy" as many as are entitled to eternal life.

This blotting out of the sins of the righteous is to them an event of the utmost importance; for, once blotted out, these sins can never be brought against them again in the Judgment, since men give account to God only for those things which are written in the books. No individual therefore can have his sins blotted out until the close of his probation. And in order for the question to be determined whether they shall be blotted out or not, the books must be examined.

We now have before us the different books which are to be brought into requisition before the Judgment is completed. These are—

1. The books which contain the records of the sins of all men, in which the names of all men are entered, and from which the sins of the righteous will be blotted out, on their acquittal in the Judgment.

2. The books of remembrance written for the righteous only, in which their names only are entered, and which contain simply their good deeds, that is, their efforts to serve God and overcome sin. From these books all the records pertaining to those who do not succeed in overcoming will be blotted out; for "when the righteous turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and doeth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doeth, . . . all his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned." Eccl. 10:24.

3. The book of life, containing the names only of those who have made a profession of Christ; from which the names of all those who finally fail to overcome are to be blotted out. Rev. 3:5.

All these books are requisite to the opening Judgment scene described in Daniel 7:9, 10; for they each contain records which are affected thereby. The first must be opened that the sins of the overcomers may be blotted therefrom; the second, that all the abortive efforts of backsliders and apostates may be blotted from its pages; the third, that the names of this latter class may also be blotted from its record, leaving the names only of those who have overcome, and who are to have immortality brought to them at the revelation of Jesus Christ.

It is evident that the result of the blotting out work is to draw the final line of separation between the righteous and the wicked and decide all cases. But this, as we have seen, is just what is accomplished by the cleansing of the sanctuary,—the work of the atonement in the most holy place of the tabernacle on high. Such, then, is the nature of the work of the investigative Judgment. It consists in the examination of the books, the blotting out of the sins of the overcomers, and the erasing from the book of life of the names of all who have failed to overcome.

As the object of the investigative Judgment is simply to decide who are Christ's that they may be his "at his coming" (1 Cor. 15:23), it is evident that the only cases which come up for examination in this division of the Judgment with a view to determining whether they are the Lord's or not, are those who have at some time made a profession of his name. For those who have never made a profession of the service of God, have already decided for themselves the only question which it is the object of this investigative Judgment to determine, that is, to which class, righteous or wicked, they belong; for by their course of life they have proclaimed themselves his enemies, and on that question there is nothing further to be decided in their cases. Nor would there be anything further to be decided in case of professing Christians, if it was a fact that all who enter the service of Christ were absolutely sure of overcoming. But all do not hold out to the end; hence the necessity of examining their cases to ascertain who have done this and who have failed.

It follows, therefore, that the important book—the decisive book—in this part of the Judgment, is the book of God's remembrance, containing not the names of the wicked world in general, but only of those who have professed to be followers of God. These cases alone come up in the investigative Judgment; for as we have seen, there is no occasion to introduce any others at this point. The records of this book determine whose sins shall be blotted out of the book where they are recorded, and their names retained in the book of life, and on the other hand whose sins shall remain uncanceled to be answered for in a future division of the Judgment, and their names be blotted from the book of life, and their good deeds from this book of God's remembrance.

The accomplishment of this work strikes the great balance sheet of the world. The records are then all complete. The blotting out of sins and names, from their respective books, is all finished. The names then remaining in the book of life show who are to be raised from the dead, and who changed among the living, at the coming of Christ.

Let it be noticed that this branch of the Judgment work has but one specific purpose, and that is to decide the question of acceptance or rejection, life or death for all mankind. It simply assigns all men to their respective classes, the good or the bad. It does not determine the amount of the reward due to the righteous, or the amount of punishment to be inflicted upon the wicked. Those matters still remain to be settled by the record of the deeds of the wicked, not yet examined at all, and by the records of the good works of the righteous, remaining in the book of remembrance, which have thus far been examined only on the question of character.

In this part of the Judgment God acts as Judge, and Christ as Advocate. Here Christ confesses to his Father the names of those who have confessed him before men; and their names are not blotted from the book of life; and here he also denies before his Father the names of those who do deny him before men; and their names are blotted from the book of life. Matt. 10:32, 33; Rev. 3:5. Thus the Father accepts through Christ all who are his; and this being done, his part in the great work of Judgment ends. Thenceforward all Judgment is committed unto the Son. John 5:22.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

THE sublime scene revealed to Daniel when the Judgment was set and the books of destiny laid in solemn pomp before the heavenly tribunal, did not open unheralded to the world. It was meet that the period of the investigative Judgment, when the cases of all who have ever turned to God were to be examined, their destiny be decided, their sins or names be blotted from the books, the atonement be made, the sanctuary be cleansed, and the probation of all mankind forever closed—it was meet that such a period should be ushered in by a solemn proclamation to the inhabitants of the world.

The work in the most holy of the heavenly sanctuary, the investigative Judgment, began, as we have seen, at the end of the 2300 days in 1844; and right there the voice of a divine message was echoing around the world. The prophecy of this solemn warning is found in Rev. 14:6, 7: "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his Judgment is come; and worship Him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters."

This angel preaches the gospel and yet announces the coming of the hour of God's Judgment. The Judgment here mentioned is therefore some portion of the gospel, and must take place while probation continues. Paul says that the gospel of Christ is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Rom. 1:16. And he declared that no other gospel could lawfully be preached even by an angel from heaven. Gal. 1:8. It is therefore an inevitable conclusion that the message of the angel brought to view in Rev. 14:6, 7, represents some part of the great gospel proclamation. It certainly belongs to that preaching which is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth;" and this fact alone is conclusive proof that this proclamation concerning the hour of God's Judgment must be made while human probation lasts. Two other solemn messages follow the one recorded in verses 6 and 7; and it is evident that the human family are still on probation as late as the last of these messages, which declares that, "If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God." These messages of Rev. 14 are consecutive, as the prophecy plainly shows; but it is not till after all these proclamations are finished that the Son of man is seen coming upon the white cloud to reap the harvest of the earth.

The message of verses 6 and 7, beginning to go in great power as early as 1840, in the advent movement of that time, reached an immense extent and unparalleled power as the world approached the great epoch of the ending of the days in the autumn of 1844. As the expectation of the people had been directed to an event which was not then to take place, believers were thrown into great confusion when the time passed and the Lord did not appear. Many entirely lost their bearings, but some held to their anchorage that God had been in the movement, and it must therefore have been essentially correct. Increasing light soon dispelled the shadows, and solved the mystery of the non-appearance of the Saviour. It was seen that the time had not yet come for the Lord to appear, but the days only marked the time for the cleansing of the sanctuary to begin, and for the hour of God's Judgment to open—the very time and work which the message brings to view. The links of the prophecy were again picked up with a firmer grasp; and the message, proclaimed at first prophetically, was then uttered as an accomplished fact—the hour of his Judgment has come. Additional links were developed, the two messages to follow the first were seen in their true light, and the great truth flashed upon the mind that while the hour of God's Judgment is passing—during this solemn time—the third message (Rev. 14:9-12) was to be proclaimed to the world.

The dawning light of the sanctuary question revealed the true meaning of many scriptures not apparently connected with that subject. One of these is found in Rev. 11:19: "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." The scene here depicted occurs under the sounding of the last, or seventh, of the series of seven trumpets, which span the Christian dispensation from the first great calamities that burst upon the old Roman world, till human history ends amid "lightnings, voices, thunderings, an earthquake, and great hail." This opening of the temple taking place under the sounding of this seventh trumpet (verse 16), it occurs near the close of this dispensation. But could this opening of the temple be understood till it was seen that there is a tabernacle on high where Christ our high priest ministers—a building which has two apartments, a first and second, a holy and most holy, into the latter of which Christ must go to finish his priesthood in the work of the atonement? That the opening of the second apartment of the sanctuary is what is here brought to view is evident from what was revealed therein. "There was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." But the ark never had any other location than the most holy place. It was fixed by divine appointment to that position. Consider further that the most holy was opened only for the purpose of making the atonement and cleansing the sanctuary. The scene described in the first part of Rev. 11:19, therefore took place at the end of the 2300 days in 1844, and was the opening of the investigative Judgment.

A matter of wonderful significance is brought out by what John there beheld. It is nothing less than the fact that the great standard by which all cases shall be tested in that investigative Judgment, now going forward, is the law of God as written upon the tables contained in the ark. "There was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." In the type the priest, in the most holy place, sprinkled the blood upon the mercy-seat, which was the cover of the ark, beneath which blood-stained cover reposed the law which the people had broken, and thus made it necessary that blood should be shed for them. So in the temple above, our High Priest ministers his blood upon the mercy-seat, the cover of that ark John saw in heaven, beneath which reposes God's holy and immutable law, the standard of Judgment for all mankind.

That the ark as John beheld it contains the law is evident from the name he gives it. The ark was called "the ark of the testament," because it contained the tables of the testimony or the law which God wrote on the tables of stone. It was made for this very purpose, and without the law never would or could have borne that name. But John, beholding the ark in heaven, under the sounding of the seventh trumpet, at the opening of the investigative Judgment, still applies the same name, "the ark of His testament." It therefore contains the same law, jot for jot, tittle for tittle, which He wrote with his own hand on Sinai.

Another conclusive evidence that the law for the investigative Judgment is the same as that written on the tables of stone lies in the fact that Christ's work is the antitype of the work of the priests under the Mosaic dispensation. They atoned for sins in figure; Christ atones for them in fact. But sin is the same, and the standard of right and wrong which reveals sin is the same. But the standard then was the law on the tables of stone. With reference to that, the typical atonement was made; with reference to the same law, therefore, the real atonement must be made, or Christ's work is not the antitype of the former. But Christ's work is the antitype; and the ten commandments, just as written on the tables of stone, unrepealed, unaltered in a jot or tittle, constitute the law by which all cases will be tested in this Judgment work.

Another portion of Scripture made very clear by this Judgment work of the sanctuary is found in the tenth chapter of the Revelation: "And I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven clothed with a cloud, and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire. And he had in his hand a little book open; and he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot on the earth. And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to heaven, and swore by Him that liveth forever and ever, who created heaven, and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer. But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." Verses 1, 2, 5, 6.

This prophecy is simply another representation of that movement brought to view by the first message of Rev. 14. The angel in this chapter, as in that, solemnly appeals to the Maker of the heavens and the earth. The message in each case relates to time. The angel of chapter 10 has one foot upon the land and the other upon the sea, showing that his message is world-wide, just as in chapter 14, the proclamation goes to every nation. The angel of chapter 10 has in his hand a book open from which he proclaims his message of time. He declares that "time shall be no longer"—not literal time; for days are mentioned afterward (verse 7); and not probationary time; for a further proclamation of the gospel is brought to view in verse 11—but prophetic time. But it is a fact that the longest and latest prophetic periods are found in the prophecy of Daniel. From no other book could be utter such a proclamation concerning the close of prophetic time. But that book was closed up and sealed to the time of the end. Dan. 12:4. The fact that it was here seen "open," locates this message in the "time of the end," or in the last days. The angel of chapter 14 proclaims the "hour of God's Judgment come;" and here again we are thrown back upon the prophecy of Daniel; for his is the only prophecy which gives a prophetic period marking the beginning of this hour of Judgment. This he does give in the great prophetic period of the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14: "Unto two thousand three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed;" and this cleansing of the sanctuary is as we have seen, a work of Judgment; hence this period of the 2300 days must be the very one the angel of Rev. 10 refers to when he says that time shall be no longer.

The identity between the message of Rev. 14:6, 7, and that of chapter 10 being thus shown, we now come to the point of chief interest in the latter, which is found in verse 7: "But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." In connection with the previous verse, we here have the assertion that when prophetic time is "no longer," or when the prophetic period comes to an end, then the seventh angel begins to sound, and in the early days of that sounding the mystery of God is to be finished. But in Rev. 11:15, 18 we have these wonderful announcements: "And the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever. And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged." The sounding of the seventh trumpet, therefore, marks a momentous epoch for the world. For then the everlasting reign of Christ is at hand; but that reign cannot commence till the investigative Judgment is passed to determine who are to have part with Christ therein. The first part of the sounding of the seventh trumpet therefore covers the period of the investigative Judgment. But as already quoted from chapter 10, during the initial days of that angel's voice the mystery of God is to be finished.

It is now in order to inquire, What is the mystery of God? and what is its finishing? The Scriptures tell us very plainly what they mean by the "mystery of God," in the following passages: Eph. 3:3-6: "How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery, as I wrote afore in few words; whereby when ye read ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; that the Gentiles should be fellow heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel." In this passage the apostle refers doubtless to Gal. 1:11, 12, written six years before, where we find him saying: "But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." Again in Col. 1:26-28, we read further:

"Even the mystery which hath been hid from ages and from generations, but now is made manifest to his saints to whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles: which is Christ in you the hope of glory."

The "mystery of God" is thus clearly shown to be the work of salvation for fallen man through the gospel of Christ. It is that which unites Jews and Gentiles in one body as fellow heirs, having Christ in them the hope of glory. The finishing of the mystery of God must therefore be the accomplishment or finishing of the work of the gospel among men. And when this is finished, mercy is no longer offered, probation no longer continues.

The finishing of the mystery therefore signifies the concluding of two important branches of work pertaining to this dispensation; first the priesthood of Christ, which closes with the last offer of mercy, and the end of probation; secondly, the preaching of the gospel to the inhabitants of the earth, which comes with the final messages of warning. Rev. 14:6-12.

This work of finishing the mystery of God is not accomplished instantaneously; for "days" (years) are allotted to it; but the time is brief; for the "days" only constitute the "beginning" of his sounding: "In the days of the voice of the seventh angel when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished." A period of time is therefore set apart to the finishing of the work of mercy both in heaven and on earth. But this period coincides exactly with the cleansing of the sanctuary, the investigative Judgment, during which the Ancient of days sits as Judge, and Christ accomplishes before him the grand conclusion of his mediatorial work. The 2300 days, as we have seen, ended in 1844. Then the temple was opened in heaven (Rev. 11:19); the majestic scene of Dan. 7:9, 10 was set in array, the investigative Judgment commenced, the seventh angel began his sounding, and the heavenly world entered upon the solemn work of finishing the mystery of God, or bringing to a conclusion the work of salvation for lost men. The wrath of God which follows this period of Judgment is at hand (Rev. 11:18); and angel voices wait to herald in tones of joy, loud as the sound of many waters, the transfer of earthly kingdoms to the authority of Jesus Christ our Lord. Then shall the heathen (the nations) be given him for an inheritance (Ps. 2:8), and thenceforward all Judgment be committed unto the Son. John 5:22.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

Thus the sounding of the trumpet of the seventh angel is the signal for the opening of the investigative Judgment in the sanctuary on high. But care should be taken not to confound this trumpet with the "last trump" spoken of by Paul in 1 Cor. 15:52. The trump of the seventh angel is indeed the last of its series, but the last only in that respect; and it commences to sound while probation still continues; for the early years of its sounding are allotted to the finishing of the mystery of God. Whereas the other, called also "the trump of God," in 1 Thess. 4:16, is the last that occurs in human history and is not sounded till after the mystery of God is finished, or in other words, till after the investigative Judgment has passed, and every righteous person is accepted of the Father; for when that trump is heard, every one who has been accounted worthy of a part in the resurrection to eternal life, is in an instant made immortal. 1 Cor. 15:52.

No important epoch is marked by the seventh trumpet that it will be a matter of interest to look at the events which transpire under its sounding in chronological order. These, though not given in the prophecy (Rev. 11:15-19) consecutively, are nevertheless of such a nature that it will not be difficult to locate them in the order of their occurrence.

1. The opening of the temple. The most holy place of the temple or tabernacle in heaven is opened. We know that this takes place immediately on the sounding of the seventh trumpet; for that trumpet commences to sound just as soon as prophetic time is no longer. Rev. 10:6, 7. But at the end of the great period of 2300 days (Dan. 8:14), which marks the end of all prophetic time, the cleansing of the sanctuary commences, which necessitates the opening of the most holy, and the entrance of the high priest therein. Heb. 9:7, 25, 26. This is the place where our Lord fulfils his priesthood, and where the Ancient of days presides in the Judgment. Dan. 7:9, 10.

2. Finishing the mystery. In the days (years) of the beginning of the voice of the seventh angel, the mystery of God, or the work of human probation, is finished. This as we have seen involves the closing up of the immense work of our High Priest as mediator for all the world. It also requires the proclamation of the final waruals to mankind.

3. Judgment of the righteous. The finishing of the priesthood of Christ thus at the tribunal of his Father, during this time, consists in making the atonement, that is, in looking over the cases of all those who have ever made a profession of the service of God, and blotting out and putting away the sins of all the overcomers. This involves the Judgment of all the righteous dead, with whom this work would naturally, perhaps necessarily, begin, opening with the case of Abel, the first to die, and closing with the living of the last generation only.

4. The coronation of Christ. When Christ finishes his work as priest, he is crowned king (Dan. 7:13, 14); and this coronation, and his assumption of the kingdom, is announced by the great voices in heaven, and by the adoration of the four and twenty elders. Rev. 11:16-17. When Christ begins his reign upon his own throne, he is invested by the Father with that power which Satan usurped from Adam the first. Micah 4:8. The reign of Christ, the second Adam, is to be the re-establishment of the empire of God in this revolted province; and this throne Christ takes just as soon as he has closed up his office of priest-king, which he now occupies at his Father's right hand. Zech. 6:12, 13; Rev. 3:21.

5. The anger of the nations. The national condition of suspicion, jealousy, envy, fear, and anger, brought to view in verse 18, which is now a characteristic of nearly all the governments of the earth, commences soon after the seventh trumpet begins to sound. That commenced, as already noticed, in 1844; and the great monarchical earthquake in Europe, which occurred four years later, in 1848, when so many thrones were overturned, may well be taken as the first installment of the anger of the nations. That revolution threw them into a chronic state of disturbance and hostility which has been increasing to the present day. The East India question, the Russian question, the Turkish question, the Egyptian question, the Franco-German question, the Irish question, nihilism, socialism, communism, and dynamite, have mined all the eastern world, till it already trembles with the first throes of a vast earthquake which seems destined to shake it to ruins. This anger of the nations will reach its climax, when, under the impulse of unclean spirits, they gather to the battle of the great day of God Almighty. Rev. 16:13, 14; 19:19, 21.

6. The wrath of God. "And thy wrath is come," is another of the events announced to occur under the sounding of the seventh angel. This wrath comes down upon the wicked when Christ, having received them under his jurisdiction, after they have rejected the last offers of mercy, begins to rule them with the iron scepter of his justice. Ps. 2:8, 9. This wrath consists of the seven last plagues. Rev. 11:18, 19; 14:10, 11; 15:1, 2; 16:1-17.

7. The reward of the saints. This is also mentioned in verse 18. The reward of the saints commences at the resurrection of the just. Luke 14:14; Matt. 16:27. It will be given in its fullness when they enter upon their final inheritance at the end of the thousand years. Matt. 25:34.

8. The destruction of the wicked. The time is come, continues the prophecy, that "thou shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth." The final destruction of them that destroy (or as the margin reads, "corrupt") the earth is by the second death at the end of the one thousand years of Revelation 20. Rev. 20:7, 9.

The sounding of the seventh trumpet is therefore synchronous with the whole period of the Judgment of the great day. It commenced when the temple was opened in heaven, and the thrones were set for the investigative Judgment, at the end of the 2300 days in 1844, and it ends with the destruction of sin and sinners, root and branch, the arch-deceiver and all his followers, in the lake of fire, at the end of the one thousand years.

So momentous and solemn are these truths that we cannot forbear to remind the reader again of our present position. Prophetic time ended in 1844. There the seventh angel began to sound, the most holy place of the temple in heaven was opened, the judicial thrones of the investigative Judgment (Dan. 7:9, 10) were set (Hebrew), and Christ began the final examination of the cases of his people before the Father, to make the atonement, to cleanse the sanctuary, and finish the mystery of God. More than forty years already have elapsed since we entered this solemn perod, and this work began.

And what follows? The close of Christ's priesthood, the end of probation, the utterance of that solemn fiat which fixes every man's destiny. "He which is filthy let him be filthy still, and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still" (Rev. 22:11, 12), the coronation of Christ upon the holy hill of Zion (Ps. 2:6), the wrath of God, in the seven last plagues, upon the living wicked, the convulsions of the great day, the revelation of Christ as King of kings and Lord of lords in the clouds of heaven, the giving of immortality to every overcomer, and the destruction of all his incorrigible enemies then living upon the earth. Luke 19:27.

When our Lord ascended to heaven to sit at the right hand of his Father, as mediator between him and his people, he also had another work to accomplish. He revealed to the disciples this work in the following comforting words: "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also." John 14:2, 3. This doubtless refers to the glorious city, the New Jerusalem, which is being prepared to be the metropolis of Christ's kingdom, and the palatial abode of those who humbly follow him in this lower world. And in view of the language just quoted we cannot doubt that the work is wrought under the personal supervision of our Lord, during the period of his priesthood. And his people will enter those mansions when that which Christ wills is brought to pass, and they are taken into his presence to behold his glory. Such was his prayer. "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory." John 17:24.

The Saviour being crowned king at the close of his priestly office, begins the exercise of his kingly power by delivering his people, and by bringing to trial, and pronouncing judgment upon, and executing his enemies. This is clearly brought to view in the 110th psalm which speaks of both his kingly and priestly offices. Thus in verse 1 he is assigned the place of honor at the Father's right hand. "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand." It is important to observe that there are two personages brought to view in this psalm, to whom the word "Lord" is applied, - the Father and the Son. The first is from the original "Jehovah," referring to the Father, and is printed in the text, as the reader will observe, in small capitals; the second is from "Adonai," and refers to the Son. Thus "Jehovah said unto Adonai," or the Father said unto the Son, Sit thou at my right hand. But the time he is to continue in this position is limited by an event which changes his office from that of priest to that of king. It is expressed in these words which immediately follow: "The Lord make thine enemies thy footstool." Verse 2 states the very act of making Christ king, and placing his enemies under him as his footstool.

"The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion; rule thou in the midst of thine enemies." The first clause of this verse is parallel to Ps. 2:6: "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion." The heavenly Zion (Heb. 12:22; Rev. 14:1) is the place of Christ's coronation. The last clause, "Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies," expresses the very words of the Father to the Son when he crowns him King. This is obvious from our common English version, but is made still more evident from the French translation of David Martin in which the two clauses are connected by the words, "In saying;" thus, "The Lord shall transmit out of Zion the scepter of thy strength in saying: Rule in the midst of thy enemies."

The next verse states the sympathy of Christ's people with his work when he is thus inducted into his kingly office, and proceeds to exercise his power against his enemies: "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning; thou hast the dew of thy youth." Instead of "the day of thy power," Martin's French Bible reads, "The day that thou shalt assemble thy army in holy pomp." This is the time when the Son of man descends in power and great glory, and the armies of heaven, that is, all the holy angels, attend and surround him. Matt. 24:30, 31; 1 Thess. 4:16-18; Rev. 19:11, 12. The people of God are to unite with Christ in his rule over the nations of wicked men. Rev. 2:20, 27; Ps. 2:6-9. The morning of this verse must be the morning of the day which it mentions. One of the earliest events of that day is the resurrection of the just, when like their Lord they are born from the dead to life immortal. Rev. 20:4-6; Luke 20:35, 36; Col. 1:19; Rom. 8:13, 14; 1 Cor. 15:42-44, 51-54.

By virtue of the authority vested in our Lord when inducted into his kingly office, he proceeds to judge his enemies, or pass sentence of destruction upon the living nations of those who know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. So verse 6 of the 110th psalm reads: "He shall judge among the heathen, he shall fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries." This is his work in the day of his power, to which his people give their willing assent. Verse 8. This is the great day of his wrath, when he shall dash the nations in pieces like a potter's vessel (Ps. 2:9), and none will be able to stand except those whose sins are blotted out. The wicked kings of the earth shall fall before him when he is King of kings and Lord of lords.

Instead of the reading given in the English version, "He shall wound the heads over many countries," Martin's Bible has the singular number, and translates thus: "He shall wound the chief who rules over a great country." Thus the text is made to refer unmistakably to Satan. The Hebrew word rendered "wound" is defined by Gesenius thus: "To smite through and through; to dash in pieces; to crush." And thus shall our great adversary be treated when the God of peace shall bruise the prince of darkness under the feet of his people. Rom. 16:20; Gen. 3:15; 1 John 3:8; Heb. 2:14.

Thus the transition of Christ from his priestly to his kingly office is clearly marked. Human probation closes when Christ ceases to be priest. Those who are found in their sins after our Lord has been crowned king upon his own throne, must be destroyed as his enemies. And the priesthood of Christ terminates when he has obtained the acquittal of his people, and secured the blotting out of their sins at the tribunal of his Father. Then and there he is crowned King (Dan. 7:9, 10, 13, 14); and from that coronation scene he shortly comes to our earth as King, to deliver all who at that examination of the books, are accounted worthy to have part in the world to come, and in the resurrection of the just. Dan. 12:1; Luke 20:35, 36; 21:36.

RH March 10, 1885

U.S.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

We have now traced the work of the Judgment, with its concomitant events, down to the close of the ministry of our High Priest in the most holy of the true tabernacle on high, when the cleansing of the sanctuary is finished, the atonement is made, and the sins of all God's people are blotted out. This constitutes the first division of the Judgment, that part during which the Father sits as Judge, and before whom Christ, as advocate, opens the books of remembrance written for his people, confessing to him the names of all those who are found worthy from an examination of the records therein contained.

Much light, as we have seen, is thus far thrown upon the subject by the tabernacle service of the former dispensation. There was the sanctuary with its two apartments, and the ministry of the priests connected therewith. There sinners brought their offerings to the first apartment, through all the year till the day of atonement, when the ministry was transferred to the most holy place, the atonement was made, sins were put away, and thus the sanctuary was cleansed. All this, Paul says, was after the example and shadow of heavenly things. Heb. 8:8. Hence we have in this dispensation a long ministry by Christ in the first apartment of the sanctuary above, till the great antitypical work of atonement is reached, and the ministry is transferred to the most holy place, where Christ forever concludes his services as mediator, and the work of mercy for the world is ended.

But there was one peculiar service performed on the day of atonement, which cannot escape the notice of the careful student of this interesting subject. When the high priest, in the Mosaic service, made the atonement, when he sprinkled the blood upon the mercy-seat, and thus, in figure, blotted out the sins of the people, this did not finish his work in regard to those sins. He then bore them from the sanctuary, laid them upon the head of the scape-goat, and sent away the goat by the hand of a fit man, to perish in the wilderness. And these sins were not considered as finally disposed of, till the goat, bearing the execrable load, had ceased to exist.

Tracing out the substance by this shadow, we must conclude that when sins are finally blotted out in the sanctuary above, that is not the end of them. And the query then arises, when this portion of the Judgment is finished, what is done with the sins thus blotted out? There must be an antitypical scape-goat who is to receive them, be sent away and perish beneath the load.

Who is this scape-goat? now becomes an interesting inquiry. Let us see what light the Jewish type will shed upon this point. On the day of atonement two goats were presented before the Lord (see Leviticus 16), at the door of the tabernacle. Lots were then cast upon these goats to determine the use which was to be made of them respectively. One lot designated the goat receiving it to be a sacrifice to the Lord; the other set apart the goat upon which it fell to be the scape-goat. The goat upon which the Lord's lot fell was then slain, and his blood was borne into the most holy place by the priest and sprinkled upon the mercy-seat to cancel the sins of the people and make atonement for them. This being done, the priest bore the sins from the sanctuary, and laying his hands upon the head of the scape-goat, confessed over him all those sins, and thus transferred them to the goat himself. He then committed this goat to the charge of some suitable person appointed for the purpose, by whom the goat, thus loaded with sin, was taken away into the wilderness, or land not inhabited, and there let go, or, as is generally supposed, was caused to perish.

The offices which these goats were to perform are thus clearly defined. The Lord's goat was the atoning sacrifice; and the shedding of his blood preceded the ministry of the priest in his atoning work. But the scape-goat was not called into requisition at all till this work of atonement was done, so far as it pertained to the releasing of the people from their sins, and the cleansing of the sanctuary was finished.

The expression, "to make an atonement with him," found in Lev. 16:10, must refer simply to this part he has to perform in the final extirpation of sin.

As applied to this dispensation, and the antitypical work of our Lord, there would seem to be no occasion for any confusion here. Remember that as antitype our Saviour acts in two capacities: First, he is antitype of the offerings; and, secondly, he is antitype of the priests. But he does not act in both capacities at the same time. His first work in connection with his ministry in the sanctuary was to offer himself as a sacrifice, by dying on the cross. This he did once for all. In this act he was the antitype of all offerings for sin, both the individual offerings through the year, and the great offering on the day of atonement. While suffering as a sacrifice, Christ was not acting as priest. But having by his crucifixion provided the effectual offering for all mankind, he was raised from the dead, and now ever liveth to intercede for men, and forgive the sins of all those who will seek such forgiveness through the merits of his blood. The virtue of his sacrifice continues, but he acts ever after his resurrection as priest, and not in any office typified by any animal.

Governed by this fact, it is impossible to understand the scape-goat as a type of Christ, as so many do. For, as we have seen, the scape-goat is not brought into action till the atonement in the most holy place is completed, which finishes the round of the sanctuary service, and then he is brought alive before the priest, and from his hands is forced to receive the load of the sins of the people, under which load, in charge of a fit man, he is sent away by the priest and away from both the priest and people to perish in the wilderness. But when Christ makes the atonement, he is finishing his mediation for the world; he is acting as priest; he cannot therefore be at the same time the scape-goat to be forcibly encumbered with the sins of the people transferred by himself from himself to himself, and then to be sent away by himself from himself and from his people to perish forever!

That any one should attribute to Christ a position involving such movements, betrays a remarkably confused conception of his position and work. Because it is said of the scape-goat that he "shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited" (Lev.

16:29), and John said of Jesus, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" (John 1:29), and Peter, speaking also of Jesus, adds, "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree" (1 Pet. 2:24), many, certainly without due thought, adopt the conclusion that Christ is the scape-goat.

One simple inquiry respecting the time when the declarations above quoted apply would have completely barred the way to such a conclusion. Thus, to what time did John refer when he spoke of Christ as the Lamb which taketh away (Gr. alpa, bears) the sin of the world? To that time certainly when he was acting in the capacity of the antitype of the sacrificial lamb. And Peter states expressly that he bore our sins in his own body "on the tree," or on the cross. This is the only time when Christ did bear, or was to bear, the sins of all the world; for as priest he acts only in behalf of those who seek his help. But on the cross he bore the sins of the world as victim, as sacrifice, not as priest. This was before his ministry as priest in the sanctuary above had even commenced. But when does the scape-goat act his part in bearing away the iniquities of the people? Not till Christ's ministry as priest in the sanctuary above is entirely finished; and then the scape-goat bears not the sins of all the world, but only the sins for which atonement has been made in the sanctuary, sins which then cling to him as an ineradicable curse, till they work the utter extinction of his being. Surely no one should take expressions which refer to Christ before his priesthood begins, to prove that he acts in another capacity and under to him impossible circumstances, more than eighteen hundred years later, after his priesthood ends. As the scape-goat can by no possibility, according to these considerations, be our Lord Jesus Christ, we must look elsewhere; for some being must, according to the type, be found to act this part in the ultimate disposal of the sins of the world.

The very term itself would seem to indicate the direction in which we are to look. In the common acceptance of the word, the name "scape-goat" is about synonymous with scape-grace, any worthless creature who has forfeited all claim to esteem or confidence; and while it is revolting to all our conceptions of the character and glory of Christ, to apply such a term to him, our minds instinctively turn to an opposite character whom the Scriptures style the "accuser," "adversary," "Beelzebub," "Belial," "dragon," "enemy," "evil spirit," "prince of devils," "serpent," "tempter," "seducer," "the father of lies," and a "murderer from the beginning."

But we are not left merely to infer that the scape-goat was a type of Satan; there is direct and conclusive evidence that such was the case. The Hebrew name as given in the margin of Leviticus 16:8, is "Azazel;" and we have testimony that the ancient people of God, both Hebrew and Christian, regarded this word as the name of the Devil.

The Comprehensive Commentary speaks of the scape-goat as follows: "Scape-goat. . . . Spencer, after the oldest opinions of the Hebrews and Christians, thinks Azazel is the name of the Devil; and so Rossmüller, whom see: 'The Syriac has Azazel, the angel (strong one) who revolted.'"

Cassell's Illustrated Bible speaks thus of the scape-goat: "We offer the following exposition as much more likely, and much more satisfactory: that Azazel is a personal denomination for the evil one."

Charles Beecher in his work, "Redeemer and Redeemed," pp. 66-70, says:—

"Two goats were to be presented before the Lord by the high priest. They must be exactly alike in value, size, age, color,—they must be counterparts. Placing these goats before him, the high priest put both hands into an urn containing the golden lots, and drew them out, one in each hand. On the one was engraven, La Yehovah (for Jehovah); on the other, La Azazel (for Azazel). The goat on which the lot La Yehovah fell was slain. After its blood had been sprinkled in the holy of holies, the high priest laid his hands on the head of the second goat, confessed the sins of the congregation, and gave him to a fit man to lead away and let go in the wilderness; the man thus employed being obliged to wash his clothes and person before returning to the congregation."

After examining two views respecting the meaning of the word "Azazel," which he shows to be incorrect, Mr. Beecher proceeds to state his own view as follows:—

"The third opinion is that Azazel is a proper name of Satan. In support of this the following points are urged. The use of the proposition implies it. The same proposition is used on both lots, La Yehovah, La Azazel; and if one indicates a person, it seems natural the other should, especially considering the act of casting lots. If one is for Jehovah, the other would seem for some other person or being; not one for Jehovah, and the other for the goat itself.

"What goes to confirm this is, that the most ancient paraphrases and translations treat Azazel as a proper name. The Chuldee paraphrase and the targums of Onkelos and Jonathan would certainly have translated it, if it was not a proper name, but they do not. The Septuagint, or oldest Greek version, renders it by ἀνομιμας, a word applied by the Greeks to a malignant deity, sometimes appeased by sacrifices.

"Another confirmation is found in the Book of Enoch, where the name Azazel, evidently a corruption of Azazel, is given to one of the fallen angels, thus plainly showing what was the prevalent understanding of the Jews of that day.

"Still another evidence is found in the Arabic, where Azazel is employed as the name of the evil spirit.

"In addition to these we have the evidence of the Jewish work, Zohar, and of the Cabalistic and Rabbinical writers. They tell us that the following proverb was current among the Jews: 'On the day of atonement, a gift to Sammael.' Hence Moses Gerundineus feels called to say that it is not a sacrifice but only done because commanded by God.

"Another step in the evidence is when we find this same opinion passing from the Jewish to the early Christian church. Origen was the most learned of the Fathers, and on such a point as this, the meaning of a Hebrew word, his testimony is reliable. Says Origen, 'He who is called in the Septuagint ἀνομιμας, and in the Hebrew Azazel is no other than the Devil.'

RH March 10, 1885

-3-

U.S.

"Lastly, a circumstance is mentioned of the Emperor Julian, the apostate, that confirms the argument he brought as an objection against the Bible that Moses commanded a sacrifice to the evil spirit; an objection he never could have thought of, had not Azazel been generally regarded as a proper name.

"In view, then, of the difficulties attending any other meaning, and the accumulated evidence in favor of this, Hengstenberg affirms with great confidence that Azazel cannot be anything else but another name for Satan.

"The meaning of the term, viewed as a proper name, was stated in 1677, by Spencer, Dean of Ely, to be Powerful Apostate, or Mighty Recorder."

Prof. Bush is also referred to by Mr. Beecher on p. 72 of his work, as another authority for considering Azazel a proper name for Satan.

Gasenius, the great Hebrew lexicographer, says:—

"Azazel, a word found only in the law respecting the day of Atonement. Lev. 16:8, 10, 21. . . . By this name is probably to be understood originally some idol that was appeased with sacrifices, as Saturn and Mars; but afterward, as the names of idols were often transferred to demons, it seems to denote an evil demon dwelling in the desert, and to be placated with victims, in accordance with this very ancient and Gentile rite. This name Azazel is also used by the Arabs for an evil demon."

Milton represents Azazel as one of the fallen angels and the standard-bearer of Satan:—

"That proud honor claimed

Azazel as his right, a cherub tall;
Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurled
The imperial ensign."—Paradise Lost, b. 1.

These testimonies certainly show conclusively that the scape-goat was a type of Satan; from which it follows that when the investigative Judgment in the most holy of the heavenly sanctuary shall be finished, Satan will receive upon himself all the sins for which atonement has been made in the sanctuary, and which the High Priest bears out from thence, and under that load will be sent away into a "land not inhabited."

The consistency of supposing that these sins will then fall upon the head of Satan, and the guilt of them cleave to him like an ineradicable curse, together with the event by which the sending away of this antitypical scape-goat is plainly brought to view, will next demand consideration.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

To the foregoing reasons for considering the scape-goat a type of Satan, another may be added; and that is, that Satan is so brought to view in connection with the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, and is assigned to such a condition, as to furnish a most striking antitype of the ceremony of sending away the goat into the wilderness on the typical day of atonement.

Tracing out in the type the various steps by which the removal of sin was effected, the following acts are conspicuous: 1. The sin of the transgressor was imparted to his victim, in the manner already described; 2. In the shed blood of that victim, the sin, inhering therein, was borne into the sanctuary; 3. On the day of atonement, with the blood of the sin-offering for the people, the high priest removed all their sins from the sanctuary, and laid them on the head of the scape-goat; and 4. The goat was then sent away into a land not inhabited.

And each of these movements in the type finds a corresponding movement in the antitype as follows: 1. The great offering for the world was made on Calvary; 2. The sins of all those who avail themselves of the offer of Christ's blood by faith in him, are represented in that blood, with which he entered into the sanctuary on high (Heb. 9:12), and are through that transferred to that sanctuary; 3. After Christ, the minister of the true tabernacle (Heb. 8:2), has finished his ministration, and by the atonement has released the sins of his people from the sanctuary, he will lay them upon the head of their author, the antitypical scape-goat, the Devil; and 4. The Devil will then be sent away, loaded with these sins, into a land not inhabited.

In what will this last-named event consist? and do the Scriptures anywhere describe it? If we mistake not, Rev. 20:1-8 brings to view this very scene: "And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more till the thousand years should be fulfilled."

On the supposition that Satan is the antitype of the ancient scape-goat, the movement here described is exactly such as we might expect to occur in reference to him. Having become satisfied that he is the antitype of this goat, we carefully scan the prophecies pointing out the events in which he is concerned, to see if we can anywhere find an event which would fully correspond to the sending away of the goat into the wilderness. To find this event we naturally look to the close of the work of cleansing the heavenly sanctuary. We reach a point of time just subsequent to that work, the time when, in the order of the sanctuary work, the scape-goat in the antitype should be sent away with all the sins of pardoned penitents laid upon him, and lo, an angel comes down from heaven, lays hold upon this very being, Satan, binds him, casts him into the bottomless pit, and shuts him up for a thousand years. And as we look upon this scene, we are not able to restrain the thought that here is the sending away of the antitypical scape-goat. With this view of the subject the relation of the scene described in Rev. 20:1-8 to other events, can be clearly shown, and a plain reason be given why it should occur at that very time. But without this view, the narrative here given comes in to all appearance, abruptly, arbitrarily, and aimlessly; for who can tell on any other ground, why just this disposition instead of some other is made of the Devil, and why it is made at this particular time.

This scene occurs, as we have seen, at just the right time to fulfill the antitype; for it is immediately after Christ has finished his work as priest. Secondly, the right agent is employed. The goat anciently was not led away by the high priest, but by the hand of another person. So here it is not Christ, our great High Priest, who casts Satan into the bottomless pit, but an angel; this angel corresponding most fittingly to that "fit man," who, in the type, led away the goat. Thirdly, Satan is cast into the right place to fulfill the type. Anciently the goat was sent away into a waste wilderness, a land not inhabited. The Devil is cast into what is here called "the bottomless pit;" and this place answers most accurately to the "wilderness" of the type, as will now be made to appear.

The words "bottomless pit" in our English version, are from the single Greek word abussos, which signifies "an abyss, bottomless, deep, profound." It is used in a way to show that it signifies any place of darkness, desolation, and death. Thus in Rev. 9:1, 2, it is applied to the barren wastes of the Arabian desert, and in Rom. 10:7, to the grave. In Gen. 1:2, we have the declaration that "darkness was upon the face of the deep;" and for the word here rendered "deep" the Septuagint uses abussos, the same word which is rendered "bottomless pit" in Rev. 20:8. The Hebrew word תהום, from the root תהו (to perturb, harass, move, excite, to heave, swell, and be tumultuous), designates a waste, desolate, broken up condition. This is applied to the earth in its original state of chaos, when it was "without form and void." And let it be borne in mind that the earth is to be reduced again to the same condition, when the same word will apply to it. The prophet Jeremiah, describing the scenes of the last days, and the effect of the convulsions then spread through all nature, says: "I beheld the earth, and lo, it was without form, and void; and the heavens and they had no light." Jer. 4:19-26. When will this be brought about? At the very time when Rev. 20:8 applies; for that immediately follows the coming of Christ as described in Rev. 10:11-12; and when Christ comes, the earth is transformed into a vast charnel house of desolation and death; for the voice of God has shaken it to its foundations (Hoh. 12:26; Joel 3:10; Rev. 10:17); the islands and mountains have been moved out of their places (Rev. 6:14; 16:20); the seven last plagues have left their withering and blasting footprints over all the fair face of nature, and the earthquake and the hail, with which they close, have shaken down, beaten down, and leveled to the earth, the mightiest works of men (Rev. 16); the burning glory attending the coming of the Son of man has borne its part in accomplishing the general desolation (2 Thess. 2: 8; 1: 7, 8; Jer. 60: 15; Ps. 50: 3); the wicked have been given to the slaughter, and lie unscathed from one end of the earth to the other (Jer. 25: 22, 28); and thus the earth is at this time made empty and waste and turned upside down (Isa. 24: 1), and thus is brought back again to its original chaotic condition, as described by Jeremiah. And then what better term could be used to describe it rolling on in its disorganized condition of darkness and desolation for a thousand years than the term abyssos, "abyss," or "bottomless pit," that was used to describe it when in the same condition in the beginning?

Here is the place to which we therefore believe the arch-deceiver will be consigned at last under the load of the sins of the righteous, which he incited them, while in the flesh, to commit, but from which they have escaped by repentance and pardon through Jesus Christ. This world will then indeed be a desolate "wilderness," or "land not inhabited," well befitting the great antitypical scape-goat. And what more fitting retribution could at this point overtake the author of all our woe, than that he should through all these slow circling thousand years be confined to the world which he has tried to ruin, amid the desolation which his own hands have indirectly wrought, unable to flee from his habitation of woe or to repair in the least degree its hideous wretchedness?

It may be asked, by way of objection to the view here presented, if Paul does not say that Christ "appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself," and if this does not show that sins were all put away upon the cross. Paul indeed uses such an expression; but if we allow him to interpret it as he does in other statements which he elsewhere makes, he means simply that Christ by his crucifixion made provision for the taking away of all sin. But sins could not have been put away, as they are by the atonement, on the cross; for millions of those who will be saved were then unborn, and sin cannot be put away in advance—Christ is not the author of the pernicious system of indulgences. But the provision having been made upon the cross, all sins that are confessed and repented of are taken into the provisions of God's grace, atoned for in the final work of the sanctuary, and laid at last upon the head of the scape-goat, to be thus put away forever. Under this load of sin the goat or Satan himself will ultimately perish.

Another seeming objection may arise relative to the punishment of these atoned-for sins in the person of Satan. If Satan is punished for the sins of the righteous, are not those sins, it is asked, punished twice, once in the person of Christ when he suffered for sins on the cross, and again in the person of Satan, upon whom they are finally laid? The answer comes immediately, that the sins of the righteous are no more punished twice than the sins of the wicked. Christ suffered for all alike—just as much for the sins of those who will finally be lost, as for the sins of those who will be saved. But the lost will at last be punished for their own sins in full measure.

The whole trouble arises, we apprehend, from a mistaken view of the position and work of Christ as our substitute. The idea which the query presupposes is that Christ in his own person suffered all the punishment, that is, the aggregate amount of physical pain, which all the saved would have suffered had they been lost. But, having suffered for all, as the Scriptures assure us he did, did he not, on this view, suffer the aggregate amount of physical pain which will be endured by all the lost as well? If not, we have the most ultra Calvinism to swallow; and in either case those who believe in the eternal misery of the lost have an insurmountable problem with which to grapple. Is not this rather the truth, that Christ appeared before the law as an innocent victim, to meet in behalf of others the sentence, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." The offering was voluntary, and therefore involved no injustice; it was from one of so exalted a position that God could accept it as an equivalent for the injured majesty of his law; and it was of such infinite worth as to be equivalent in value to the life of every member of the human family from first to last taken all together, so that the law could without dishonor to itself relax its claims from all those who would accept this priceless sacrifice as their substitute, even if all the world should do so.

But we have learned from the type that the removal of sin from the penitent by the death of the substituted victim, did not cancel the sin itself, but only transferred it to some other object. The forgiveness, or removal, of the sin was relative not absolute; that is, as related to the sinner, it was forgiven, it no longer stood against his account; but the sin itself was considered as still in existence, transferred to the sanctuary, and to be disposed of by other services yet to follow. Christ has done for us in fact what the ancient offering of animals did for the sinner in figure; that is, he has provided a medium in his own blood through which sin with its guilt may be removed from us, and transferred to some other party. Thus we can be saved; but our sins yet remain to be destroyed in some other vehicle.

Let us now consider upon whom the sins of the pardoned sinner, after leaving him in the process of their removal, would naturally lodge. Sin did not originate with mankind. Human beings in this world were not the authors of this evil, nor its foster-fathers. But they were seduced into sin by the temptation of another. And this we apprehend to be the difference between the condition of men and that of evil angels. With the latter, sin had its origin; and an outbreak so unprovoked and causeless could have no forgiveness. It would endanger the peace of the universe to re-instate to favor those with whom such a course could originate. But with the former class, with men, the case was far different; they were seduced into sin by another party; hence their offense could be condoned, and provision be made for their restoration.

The practice of sin may therefore be fairly compared to a partnership business. In this business Satan is the senior partner; the sinner, the junior. The latter having been brought into that relationship by deception and seduction, is granted the privilege, under certain conditions, of leaving the company, and retiring from the business with all its assets and its tremendous prospective liabilities. Upon whom, then, will these obligations fall? Upon the only remaining member of the firm, the instigator of the whole business, the senior partner, Satan. If the sinner chooses to maintain his partnership in that illegitimate business, he can do so and receive in his own person at last the terrible retribution that every sin must meet when it is purged out of existence by the fire of God.

And this is what we are taught by the doctrine of the scape-goat. The penitent goes free, while Satan receives the sins he has incited him to commit, back upon his own head, to answer therefor in the settlement which he at last must meet.

And it must strike every one as right and consistent that this should be the case. The sinner has been seduced into sin, but he repents. Yet standing behind the overt act, there is one who is the primary author and instigator of all the inciting agent in every sinful deed. And when the transgressor awakes to the true nature of his course, and sees the enormity of his crimes, and seeks to put away his sins, what could be more fitting than that they should fall back upon the head of him who first gave birth to sin, and who has fostered the growth of every branch from that baleful root. In this the decision of every right-minded intelligence must be that God's throne is clear, and that Satan receives no more than his just deserts.

The antitypical scape-goat having thus received the load of sins from which the righteous have become free, and being confined to this desolate earth for a thousand years, is reserved to the day of perdition at the end of that period. This long cycle of years at length expires, and then appears the lake of fire prepared for the Devil and his angels. Into this fiery vortex they are plunged, and all the wicked in league with them are committed to the same doom. Then all the sins ever committed are punished, and in the persons of wicked human beings, evil angels, and Satan the father of all, they perish wholly and forever. Then the scape-goat has come to his end, and never is remembrance made of sin any more.

RH March 24, 1885

U.S.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

We have anticipated a little in order to follow sin to its final extinction in the person of Satan, the anti-typical scape-goat. Let us now return to the cleansing of the sanctuary, the Investigative Judgment—a Judgment which, as we have seen, must precede the coming of Christ—a Judgment which commenced at the end of the 2300 days in 1844, and has now consequently been in progress for over forty years.

The view that such a Judgment as this must precede the coming of Christ, is not confined to S. D. Adventists. The great fact that the resurrection of the righteous is declarative of their acceptance with God, and therefore proof that the investigation and decision of their cases precede their resurrection and the coming of Christ, has been very distinctly seen and stated by some of the clearest minds in the Advent ranks. The late Sylvester Bliss, for many years editor of the Advent Herald, thus states his view of the matter:—

"We are inclined to the opinion that the Judgment is after death and before the resurrection; and that before that event the acts of all men will be adjudicated; so that the resurrection of the righteous is their full acquittal and redemption—their sins being blotted out when the times of refreshing shall have come (Acts 3: 19); while the fact that the wicked are not raised [for 1000 years], proves that they were previously condemned."—Advent Shield, p. 800, published in 1845.

This writer saw with perfect distinctness the fact that there can be no trial of the righteous after they have been made immortal. But it is very evident that he did not well understand how and when the examination of their cases should take place; for the subject of the sanctuary was not then understood.

Ed. Josiah Litch, in the early history of the Advent movement, and then an able writer, states the view even more distinctly than Mr. Bliss. In his "Prophetic Expositions," written in 1842, on pp. 40-54, he says:—

"THE MEANING OF THE TERM 'JUDGE.'"

"1. It is used in the Bible in the sense of a trial according to law and evidence, the idea being drawn from a civil or criminal court.

"2. It signifies a penal judgment; or the execution of judgment.

"The terms are both used in reference to the judgment of the human race. All men will be brought to trial, or into Judgment, and all their deeds and their moral characters will be examined, and their everlasting states will be determined by the evidence produced from God's books, including the book of life, which will decide the moral character and everlasting destiny of each individual of Adam's race. If their names are found in the 'book of life,' they will be saved; and if not found there, they will be cast into the lake of fire, the second death. But the degree of reward or punishment will be graduated by what each one has done.

"THE TRIAL MUST PRECEDE THE EXECUTION.

"This is so clear a proposition that it is sufficient to state it. No human tribunal would think of executing judgment on a prisoner till after his trial; much less will God. He will bring every work into Judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or evil.

"But the resurrection is the retribution or execution of judgment; for they that have done good shall come forth to the resurrection of life. 'We look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body.' 'In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.' Here is clearly a retribution in the resurrection. It will be administered when the saints are raised. But no more certainly than that they that have done evil will come forth damned, or 'to the resurrection of damnation.' They will come forth to shame and everlasting contempt. The saints will be raised and be caught up at once to meet the Lord in the air, to be forever with the Lord. There can be no general Judgment or trial after the resurrection. The resurrection is the separating process, and they will never be commingled again; after the saints are raised, no matter how long or how short the period to elapse between the two resurrections; it is all the same, so far as the separation which the resurrection produces is concerned. If there is no more than a second which elapses between the two resurrections, the separation it makes is dual.

"These two senses of the Judgment are recognized in Rev. 20: 12. 'And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works.' This is the trial of the dead in the invisible and spiritual world before Jesus Christ comes in the clouds of heaven. The only evidence on which the trial proceeds is, the books and the book of life.

"They tell the whole story; and we must abide the issue of the trial on that testimony. The dead as dead were judged. Then follows, in the next verse, the penal Judgment, in connection with the resurrection. 'The sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them, and they were judged [judgment was executed upon them] every man according to their works.' There is no reference here to a trial, or to the opening of the books; but simply a penal judgment. Judgment will be executed finally on each party; the righteous and the wicked, each one at the time of their resurrection; the righteous at the first resurrection, and the wicked at the final resurrection.

"GOD, THE 'ANCIENT OF DAYS,' WILL PRESIDE IN THE TRIAL.

"1. Dan. 7: 9, 10, presents the Ancient of days coming on his throne of fiery flame; the Judgment is set and the books are opened. He is distinct from the Son of man, spoken of in verse 13, when he comes to the Ancient of days.

"THE SON OF MAN WILL EXECUTE THE JUDGMENT.

"Thus the Saviour declares, John 5: 27: 'And hath given him authority to execute judgment also.

because he is the Son of man.' Also 2 Cor. 5:10. 'For we must all appear before the Judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.' Also Paul's testimony in the Acts of the Apostles: God 'hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by that Man whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.' What we are assured of by the resurrection of Christ, is the execution in the resurrection of a righteous judgment on all men.

THE TIME OF THE TRIAL OF THE DEAD.

"It is under the opening of the sixth seal of Revelation sixth chapter, where the servants of God are sealed. . . . And under the seventh seal (chap. 8:1) when there is silence in heaven about the space of half an hour; when the great Mediator ceases to plead for sinners, the day of grace ends; then the judgment or trial will proceed on the living inhabitants of the earth. That done, Christ will appear in the clouds of heaven, and come to the Ancient of days, and the scene of trial, to announce the verdict with a shout, and deliver all his saints as soon as they are declared innocent, or justified, and raise them to eternal life in the twinkling of an eye. We are now justified by faith; we must however be declared justified at the day of Judgment, before the effects of the fall will be taken away, and the saints be restored to God's perfect image and glory."

In subsequent remarks on the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, Mr. Litch even raises the query if this judgment on the dead did not commence at the end of the 1260 years in 1798, when the dominion of the papacy was taken away. In these extracts the reader must be deeply interested as showing how the minds of men were led in the direction of the solution of some of the great problems connected with the closing up of earthly scenes. They are not quoted because every idea can be endorsed, because it cannot be; but they are presented to show how the light on the subject of the sanctuary which has arisen so clearly since that time, relieves of all mystery great conclusions of which they themselves saw the necessity, and for which, in some degree of darkness and confusion, they were eagerly groping. Thus Eld. L. thought that when Christ descended to this earth, was the time when he came to the Ancient of days; but that, as has been shown in former articles, cannot be. His reasoning, however, relative to the investigation and decision of the cases of the righteous before the resurrection, is weighty and conclusive. It is worthy of notice that he places the judgment of the righteous at the tribunal of the Father as presented in Daniel 7. He believed that this part of the judgment work was to be fulfilled while the living were yet in probation; for he suggested that it even might have commenced in 1798. These able writers saw the fact that this work must take place before the resurrection of the just, but they did not see the time and place for this work. They did not see the heavenly sanctuary, and therefore had no clear idea of the concluding work of human probation as presented to us in the Saviour's ministration before the ark of God's testament. The temple of God in heaven reveals the very nature of this work, and the great prophetic period of 2300 days marks the time of its commencement. The stirring proclamation of the angel that the hour of his Judgment is come, and his solemn oath to the time gives to mankind the knowledge of this momentous work, and the certainty that the present is the time for the investigative Judgment and its eternal decisions. This doctrine is of the highest practical importance. It shows that we are now in the antitype of the great day of atonement, and that our chief concern should be the affliction of our souls and the confession of our sins.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

In tracing the events connected with the opening and progress of the Judgment of the great day, we have now reached that moment of transcendent interest when the next event is the coronation of Christ as King of kings and Lord of lords. And it is worthy of remark that each of the visions of Daniel brings to view either this coronation of our Saviour, or that event which immediately precedes it; namely, the close of his priesthood. Thus, in the first vision, interpreting the great image of chapter 2, in verse 44 we read:—

"And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."

The statements of the seventh chapter in reference to the same time and event are much more explicit. The prophet there describes the act of the Father when he takes the seat of Judgment, and opens the heavenly court. Dan. 7:9, 10. Then he represents the Son as being brought in before him, and receiving, at the conclusion of that tribunal, the crown of dominion. In verses 13 and 14 this is stated as follows:—

"I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

This is the kingdom which is to break in pieces all the wicked kingdoms of the earth (Ps. 2:9), and the manner in which this will be done is plainly stated in Rev. 19:11-21. In Daniel's fourth vision, as recorded in chapters 10-12, the coronation of our Lord is also very distinctly marked. In chapter 12:1 we read:—

"And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book."

This standing up of Michael is simply the commencement of the reign of Christ; for Michael is Christ (compare Jude 9; 1 Thess. 4:16; and John 6:25, 28, 29); and to "stand up" means to take the throne. See Dan. 11:2. And this coronation of Christ will be followed by such a time of trouble as this earth has never seen since there was a nation, as will be noticed hereafter. But there is yet another vision of Daniel's to be noticed, the third one as recorded in chapter 8. And although this says not one word respecting the coronation of our Lord, it distinctly marks that event which directly precedes it; namely, the closing service of his priesthood. In chapter 8:13, 14, we have this record:—

"Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

Such is the event to transpire in the conclusion of this vision, or, in other words, in the end of the gospel dispensation. Paul tells us that there are two covenants—the old and the new. Gal. 4:24. The old was confined to the Mosaic dispensation; the new was introduced by Christ and shall continue. Each of these covenants has its tabernacle or sanctuary. That of the old covenant was the building erected by Moses after the pattern showed him in the mount. Heb. 8:5; 9:1-5. The sanctuary of this dispensation, or the new covenant, is the great original or antitype of that, the tabernacle made not by human hands, the temple in heaven. Heb. 8:1, 2; 9:23, 24; Rev. 11:19. The sanctuary to be cleansed at the end of the new covenant dispensation must be the sanctuary of the new covenant. A sanctuary implies of necessity a priesthood. The cleansing of the sanctuary is that event which completes the work of the priest who ministers therein. When, therefore, we read of the cleansing of the sanctuary at the end of the 2300 days, we understand that this is the closing event of the priesthood of the Son of God. It is of necessity a work which brings human probation to a close, and marks the transition from the priesthood, to the kingly office of the Saviour.

CHRIST'S TWO THRONES.

At his ascension our Lord entered into the heavenly temple and sat down upon his Father's throne, a great high priest after the order of Melchizedek. Ps. 110:1, 4; Heb. 8:1, 2. But when he returns in his infinite majesty as King of kings, he sits upon his own throne and not upon that of his Father. Of this return he speaks himself as follows:—

"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." Matt. 25:31.

It is therefore certain that at the conclusion of our Lord's work in the heavenly temple, an appropriate time is set apart in which his priestly office is exchanged for his kingly dignity; and this transition is marked by his relinquishing his place upon the throne of the Father, and assuming his own throne. The Judgment session of Dan. 7:9-14, is, as we have seen, the time and place of this transition. A plain distinction between these two thrones is made in Rev. 3:21. To the overcomers in the Laodicean church, the Lord says:—

"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

The Saviour's reception of his own throne preparatory to his second advent is described in Ps. 45. As psalm 110 makes prominent his priestly office upon his Father's throne, so psalm 45 describes his kingly office and work upon his own throne. Verses 1-7 read:—

"My heart is inditing a good matter; I speak of the things which I have made touching the King; my tongue is the pen of a ready writer. Thou art fairer than the children of men; grace is poured into thy lips; therefore God hath blessed thee forever. Upright thy sword upon thy thigh, O most Mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty. And in thy majesty ride prosperously because of truth, and meekness, and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things. Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies; whereby the people fall under thee. Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever; the scepter of thy kingdom is a right scepter. Thou lovest righteousness and hatest wickedness; therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows."

The personage described in these glowing terms, who is fairer than the sons of men, can be no other than the King in his beauty (Isa. 88:17), who is to be admired in the day of his advent by all them that believe. 2 Thess. 1:10. The time when he rides forth for the destruction of his enemies is presented in Rev. 19:11-21. The apostle Paul quotes and comments upon this psalm, making an inspired application of it to Christ. From this it appears that some of its words are to be addressed by the Father to the Son while investing the latter with kingly power. In Heb. 1:8, 9, he says:—

"But unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever; a scepter of righteousness is the scepter of thy kingdom. Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity; therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows."

It is very important to understand the relation of these two thrones to the work of our Lord, in order to a correct view of the positions which he consecutively occupies. As a priest after the order of Melchisedec who was both priest and king (Gen. 14:18-20; Ps. 110:1, 4; Heb. 7:1-8), the Saviour has had a joint rule with his Father upon the throne of the universe. Zech. 6:12, 13. His office of priest-king continues till his Father makes his enemies his footstool. Then he delivers up this kingdom, which he has shared with the Father, to him alone, that God may be all in all. 1 Cor. 15:24-28. His reign upon the throne of his Father is brought to a conclusion when the promise of Ps. 110:1 is fulfilled, and his foes are delivered into his power for destruction.

The throne which he ascends as king after his priesthood has come to an end, is the throne which he inherits as David's heir. On that throne he will reign over his people, redeemed and made immortal, forever and ever. Luke 1:32, 33; Isa. 9:6, 7. Upon the throne of his Father, Christ exercises a joint rule as priest-king; but upon his own throne his people are to exercise a joint rule with him. The first throne which he occupies with his Father as priest, he surrenders up to the Father at the end of this dispensation (1 Cor. 15:24), that God may be all in all. The second throne, which he occupies as the heir of David, he will occupy forever.

In the light of these facts the relation which both the Father and the Son sustain to the work of Judgment is very apparent. During the Investigative Judgment the Father sits as judge, and the Son acts as advocate. He confesses the names of his people to the Father before the holy angels. Through him the Father accepts them. Christ's priesthood ends with the acquittal of all his people at his Father's bar. This acquittal of the righteous involves the condemnation of all the wicked. All cases are then decided; and this decision of the Judgment rests wholly with the Father. But the execution of the Judgment has not yet come. The next step, and the last act of the Father in the Judgment work of Dan. 7:9-14, is to crown his Son king, that he may carry out the decisions which have been reached in that investigative work. This act makes Christ's foes his footstool, and subjects all nations to him. Ps. 110:1; Rev. 11:16. Thus, while the decisions of the Judgment rest with the Father, the execution of the Judgment is committed to the Son, for which very purpose he receives from the hand of the Father the crown and scepter of his kingly power.

This distinction is recognized still further in John 5, which takes up the Judgment work just where the prophecy of Dan. 7 leaves it. The Father having rendered decision in all cases, and having anointed his Son king, it then pertains to the Son to execute the Judgment—a work which he distinctly acknowledges in John 5. In verses 22, 23, he says:—

"For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son; that all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father."

This cannot apply to the Investigative Judgment; for in that work the Father must sit as judge to fulfill Dan. 7:9, 10. But he must refer to the execution of the Judgment, as we shall see by reading verses 26, 27:—

"For as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself; and hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man."

It is not, therefore, the decision of the Judgment, but the execution thereof, to which Christ refers, and which he even then possessed by promise of his Father. How he will carry out the work he tells us in verses 28, 29, immediately following:—

"Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming in the which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation."

And that our Lord is, in this, simply carrying out the decisions of his Father, is clearly taught in the next verse (verse 30):—

"I can of mine own self do nothing; as I hear I judge; and my judgment is just, because I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which sent me."

The execution of the Judgment by Christ is all in accordance with the decision which he has heard from the Father, and therefore is right and just. It is evident that the investigation and decision must precede the execution; but it is distinctly stated that when Christ comes it is to execute the Judgment. Thus we read in Jude 14, 15, of the second advent of Christ:—

"And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him."

The saints (holy ones) here mentioned are the hosts of heavenly angels who will escort our Lord on his return to this world; for this term is applied to angels as well as to men. Dan. 8:18. The object of the second advent is here clearly stated. It is to execute the Judgment. That event is, therefore, just what Paul describes it, "the revelation of the righteous Judgment of God." Rom. 2:5. And the very act of giving immortality is one part of the work of rendering to every man according to his deeds. Thus again we are brought to the conclusion, of which this whole argument, thus far, has been an accumulation of proofs, that the Judgment of God precedes the advent of his Son from heaven.

The execution of the Judgment, which begins with the coronation and second coming of Christ, must include the passing sentence upon the wicked by Christ and his people (1 Cor. 6:2), which will occupy a thousand years (Rev. 20:4), and the execution of that sentence at the end of that period. Ps. 149:9; Rev. 20:14-15. This whole period is therefore doubtless covered by the prophecy of Enoch as quoted by Jude; for often when the events of Christ's coming are mentioned in the Scriptures, they include not merely those which transpire at the moment when he descends from heaven, but those which take place in consequence of that event. And when men shall at last find just retribution meted out to them for all their sins, they will indeed be convinced of all their ungodly deeds and of all their hard speeches.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

When Christ ascends his own throne, after completing his priesthood, it is the event spoken of in the 19th of Revelation, and in the parables of the 23d and 26th chapters of Matthew, as the "marriage of the Lamb." In this ceremony the heavenly city, the New Jerusalem, is described as "the bride, the Lamb's wife." Rev. 21:9-21. The reason why the city is represented under such a figure is very apparent: Just then completed, a city prepared (John 14:2, 8): to be the everlasting metropolis of the future kingdom, it becomes at once a representative of that kingdom; and when the sovereignty of the city is vested in Christ, it is the ceremony by which he is inducted into his kingly office, and the evidence that henceforth, under God, who is all in all, he rules upon the throne of David.

And the church on earth are not left unapprised of a movement of such interest and importance to them. As they pass the test of the Judgment in the closing of the sanctuary work, and are accepted of God, their names being confessed before him by their great Advocate, a new era in their experience opens before them. Then comes upon them the great refreshing spoken of in Acts 3:19; then the day dawns to them, and the day-star arises in their hearts, so illuminating them with heavenly light, that they no longer need the lamp of prophecy to guide them (2 Pet. 1:19); then the bright and morning star, our Lord himself (Rev. 22:16), is given to them as overcomers (Rev. 2:26), and comes in and sups with them, and they with him (Rev. 3:20); and then, passing their probation, they are sealed with the seal of the living God (Rev. 7:2-4), and are prepared to stand without a mediator and without sin, during the falling of the plagues, till Christ appears to take them to himself. Thus they are enabled, like Stephen, to behold through an open heaven the Son of man on the right hand of God. Acts 7:56. And thus they that are "ready" (having been accounted so by the investigative Judgment of the sanctuary) go in with him to the marriage (Matt. 25:10); that is, with spiritual eyesight miraculously quickened by the Holy Ghost, they behold the coronation of their King in the courts above. And then the door is shut.

To the wicked also a new era opens, when the priesthood of Christ ends, and his reign as King commences; for then the judgments of God, in unmitigated severity, begin to fall upon them. These are the seven last plagues so vividly described in Rev. 15 and 16. These plagues cannot fall upon the earth while a mediator stands between God and man. These are called in Rev. 14:10 the "wine of the wrath of God poured out without mixture," and in chapter 18 it is said that "in them is filled up the wrath of God." There can be no wrath without mixture of mercy until mercy has ceased entirely; and this can only be when Christ lays down his mediating career and probation ends. Therefore when the number of God's people is made up and accounted worthy to escape the things coming on the earth, when the wicked are made his footstool and delivered to him that he may dash them in pieces, he begins to pour out upon them his fury in the seven last plagues, commencing with the very class who reject the message of Rev. 14:6, 10, the last message to be given before the Lord appears upon the great white cloud. How long the pouring out of the plagues as described in Rev. 16, will continue, is not there stated; but in Isa. 34:8, the prophet doubtless alludes to the same time in these words: "For it is the day of the Lord's vengeance and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion." And from this inference seems almost unavoidable, that these plagues will be condensed into the space of a prophetic day, or a literal year. We know they do not commence till after the third angel of Rev. 13 has uttered his warning; and we know that they close before Christ appears on the white cloud; for the scenes attending the revelation of Christ in the clouds of heaven are just such as transpire when the plagues reach their culmination in the outpouring of the seventh vial. See the 24th chapter of Isaiah, Rev. 6:14-17 and 18:17-21.

The plagues having all been poured out, the Lord in fulfillment of his promise in John 14:3 comes to take his people to himself. And the great separation between the righteous and the wicked will be accomplished, as announced in Matt. 25:31-33:--

"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats; and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left."

This coming of the Son of man, with all the holy angels, is described in Rev. 19:11-16 as the riding forth of the King of kings, upon the white horse, followed by the armies of heaven. This must be the same event; for it is declared in verse 11, that "in righteousness he doth judge and make war;" and as has elsewhere been noticed the very object of the Lord's coming is to "execute judgment upon all." Jude 14, 15. Now it is worthy of notice that in the events brought to view in Matt. 25:31-33, and in Rev. 19:11-21, the second event in each series is the gathering of the nations before Christ. In Matt. 25:32 we have simply the announcement, "And before him shall be gathered all nations;" but in Rev. 19:19 the occasion of this gathering is clearly stated: "And I saw the beast and the kings of the earth and their armies gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse and against his army."

That the gathering mentioned in Matthew and the one brought to view in Revelation are the same is evident from the fact that they both take place at the same time and are both connected with the same event; namely, the coming of Christ. The agency by which the gathering is accomplished is stated as follows in Rev. 18:13, 14:--

"And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty."

This text clearly shows that the gathering of the nations is to be effected not by the angels of God, but by the evil angels of Satan. This mighty working of Satan even after men have passed the day of grace, is plainly his final desperate struggle before he is bound. The purpose God has in view in permitting this is thus stated by the prophet. Zeph. 3:8, 9:--

RH April 7, 1885

-2-

U.S.

"Therefore wait ye upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey; for my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms to pour upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger; for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy. For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve him with one consent."

Thus, in the providence of God, the nations are gathered that he may pour on them the fierceness of his wrath in their terrible destruction. The battle of the great day of God Almighty is the very scene described in Rev. 19:11-15, as the treading of the winepress of the wrath of God. The central point of this great slaughter will be according to the prophecy of Joel, the valley of Jehoshaphat, near Jerusalem. Joel 3:2, 9-12. But the gathering may not all be confined to that point; and certainly the slaughter will not be; for "the slain of the Lord shall be at that day from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth." Jer. 25:31-33.

Then the beast is taken, and the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, and they are both cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. Rev. 19:20. This lake of fire is caused by the appearing of Christ, who is revealed in "burning fire." 2 Thess. 1:8; Isa. 40:15. Then the "man of sin," the papacy, is consumed by the spirit of Christ's mouth and destroyed by the brightness of his coming. 2 Thess. 2:8.

The separation of the sheep and the goats (Matt. 25:32) must be at the same time as the separation of the wheat and tares (Matt. 13:30, 40, 41); and of the good and bad fishes (Matt. 13:48, 49); and of the wheat and chaff. Matt. 3:12. This separation of the righteous and the wicked is accomplished by the angels as described in the following texts:—

Matt. 24:31: "And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." See also the parallel statement in Mark 13:27.

1 Thess. 4:16, 17. "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

The angels who do this work are acting under the express orders of Christ; for, as quoted from Matthew, "He [Christ] shall send his angels." And David in Ps. 50:3-5 bears testimony to the same fact as follows:—

"Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him. He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people. Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice."

In thus sending forth the angels to gather his saints unto himself, Christ is only carrying out the decisions of the Judgment previously rendered by the Father. John 5:22, 27; Dan. 7:9-14. The sounding of the trumpet is the signal for the angels to descend from Christ to gather the saints; but at the sounding of the trumpet the righteous are changed to immortality in the twinkling of an eye. And this resurrection which makes a part of mankind equal unto the angels (Luke 20:35, 36); which makes them immortal (1 Cor. 15:51-54); which shows them to be blessed and holy, and not subject to the second death (Rev. 20:6); and which shows that they were that part of the dead which belonged to Christ (1 Cor. 15:23; 1 Thess. 4:16);—this resurrection which our Lord terms "the resurrection of the just" (Luke 14:14), is in the expressive language of Paul declared to be the "justification of life." Rom. 5:18. But this free gift which is open to all men, will be shared only by those who accept the grace and righteousness offered in the gospel.

The righteous dead being now all raised from their graves, and the righteous living all changed to immortality, and the whole company being caught up to meet the Lord in the air, the final separation is accomplished between the sheep and the goats. The former are placed on the right hand and the latter on the left; which expression is simply a figure to show that the one class is accepted of Christ and receive exaltation and honor from him; and the other is rejected and set apart for destruction.

RH April 14, 1885

U.S.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

THE saints having passed the final separation, and having been received to the right hand of honor in the presence of Christ, it remains that we trace a little further the happy experience upon which they now enter. Their next destination is the paradise above, the "Father's house," and the presence of God.

When our Lord was about to leave his disciples to go to his Father, he told them that he was going to prepare a place for them, and that, having prepared it, he would return and receive them unto himself that where he was they might be also; that is, that they might be with him in the place which he should prepare. John 14:2, 3. This is proved by what he told Peter on this very occasion. He said to him that he could not follow him then, to the place to which he was going, but that he should follow him afterward. John 13:36. Did not Christ in this language tell Peter as plainly as words could express it, that when he should have completed the preparation of the place, he would return for him and all the saints, and that then they should have the privilege of following him thither? Our Lord thus becomes the forerunner of his people in all things. When he rose from the dead, it was a sure pledge that all his people would be brought from the dead also; and when he entered into the presence of his Father, it was equally a pledge that his people should likewise enter therein. Heb. 9:20.

Of the first part of this proposition 1 Thess. 4:14 is proof, as follows:—

"For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

Many understand this text to teach that Christ at his second advent will bring the souls of his sleeping saints with him from heaven—a supposition disproved by many considerations: 1. According to the text, it is God, not Christ, who "brings" with him those who sleep in Jesus; but, 2. God does not come to this world, but send Jesus Christ. Acts 8:20. Therefore God does not bring any sleeping saints to this earth. 3. Heaven is not a place of soul-sleeping. Those who believe in the unconscious state of the dead, are sometimes called "soul-sleepers;" but they never carry the doctrine to such lengths as to suppose them all asleep in heaven. 4. The saints cannot be brought from heaven; for they are not there when Christ descends for his people. 5. They cannot be brought to this earth; for they are at that very time sleeping in his dust. Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2; John 5:28, 29. 6. The saints are to be brought according to a certain example; and that is stated in the text to be the rising again of Jesus Christ from the dead; and in the same line of thought with this passage, we read in Heb. 12:20: "Now the God of peace that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep." Thus God brought Christ from the dead; and those that sleep in Jesus—those that are dead as he was—will God "bring" with him—bring from what place and to what place? Answer: from the grave, from which he brought Christ, and to their own inheritance, which will be paradise, into his own presence.

We cannot therefore avoid the conclusion that this "bringing" which God accomplishes for his saints, is bringing them from the dead into his own presence. And he performs this by sending his Son to gather the elect and bring them to himself, as described in 1 Thess. 4. This chapter thus brings to view the great fact taught in our Lord's promise that he would go into the Father's presence to prepare a place for his people, and return for the purpose of taking them to this prepared place. So Christ will present his saints unblamable in holiness before his Father, as he bears them up to the heavenly Jerusalem. See John 14:2, 3; 1 Thess. 3:13; 4:14.

Paradise, which contains the tree of life (Rev. 2:7), and is now in the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:2-4), was prepared for mankind in their innocence, when the earth itself was founded (Gen. 2:8-15; 3:1-24), and is to be given as a part of the overcomers' reward, and will be reached by their entrance within the walls of the heavenly Jerusalem. Rev. 2:7; 22:2, 14. Paradise, the blissful abode of our first parents, and rendered infinitely more glorious by being situated within the New Jerusalem itself, being that place from which Adam the First was expelled, will be that place to which Adam the Second will first introduce the saved of the human family. The giving of the kingdom to the saints begins with the capital of the kingdom, but will not be finished till they take the kingdom under the whole heaven to possess it forever, even forever and ever. Dan. 7:18, 27; Rev. 21. The giving of the kingdom to the saints by the Saviour is simply another act in the great work of carrying out the decisions of the Father respecting his people; for our Lord himself declared that it was the Father's good pleasure to give them the kingdom. Luke 12:32.

THE REWARD IN HEAVEN.

From the foregoing considerations it is evident that the saints receive a portion of their reward in heaven. A few additional proofs may be given in support of the same proposition.

That the Saviour takes his people to the house of the Father, the New Jerusalem, immediately after he has made them immortal, is further evident by what is said respecting the marriage supper. The saints are to partake of this royal banquet directly after they are received into Christ's presence. Luke 12:30, 37. But the marriage supper must be eaten where the bride is; and the bride, as we have seen, is the New Jerusalem, the heavenly city above, which is expressly called by the angel "the bride, the Lamb's wife." Rev. 21:2, 9, 10. The saints do not constitute the bride in this transaction, as is so widely but erroneously supposed; they are simply the children, or the invited guests. Rev. 19:9; Isa. 54:1, 5, 13; Gal. 4:26, 28. Christ is called our "Everlasting Father" (Isa. 9:6); Jerusalem above is our Mother (see texts above); after Christ takes his bride, and the marriage of the Lamb occurs (that is, after Christ receives his kingdom), the saints, experiencing the fulness of the new birth in the resurrection and translation, are ushered into the new life of the heavenly world. Isa. 65:17, 18; 66:5, 13. Hence Christ says to his people in John 14:18: "I will not leave you com-fortless: I will come unto you." For "comfortless" the margin reads "orphan"; and the promise refers to the second coming of Christ, when he will take his people to the city above, to be "forever with the Lord," to be no longer orphans here in this world, but to be with Father and Mother forever at home. Those who make the church the bride make the children to be the mother of themselves, and have no guests at all at the marriage supper!

In support of this proposition, that the saints do go to heaven and there spend a joyful season before their location upon the earth, we have such explicit texts as these:—

Rev. 15:2: "And I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire; and them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. And they sing the song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb."

In Rev. 4:6, we are informed that this "sea of glass" is before the throne of God; and that throne is in heaven (verse 2); and we have no reason to suppose that either throne or sea of glass had been removed from heaven at the time referred to in Rev. 15:2. But John saw the overcomers standing on that sea of glass before the throne in heaven, as they strike the first glad notes of victory over the powers that sought their ruin here upon the earth. Again, in Rev. 19:1, we have these words:—

"And after these things I heard a great voice of much people [not angels but the redeemed of the earth] in heaven [not on the earth] saying, Alleluia: Salvation, and glory, and honor, and power, unto the Lord our God."

It is here in the Father's presence near the throne, that the saints partake of the marriage supper of the Lamb. Rev. 19:1-9; Luke 12:86, 87; 22:10-18. This is the grand celebration of our Lord's assumption of his own throne and of his royal city, the metropolis of his everlasting kingdom. When this is past, the great work of the Judgment upon the wicked remains to be entered upon by Christ and his saints.

As Christ is crowned for the execution of the Judgment (Dan. 7:9-14; Ps. 110; 45:1-7; 2:8-9), so he raises his people up to be sharers with him in this solemn work. Rev. 8:21; 2:26, 27. This exaltation is given them in the morning of the great day. Compare Ps. 49:14, 15; 110:3; 80:5; Isa. 31:11, 12; Rom. 18:11, 12.

Rev. 20:4: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years."

The saints, having been taken from this earth to heaven, return no more till the time comes for the earth to be made new for their everlasting abode; but this is not till the perdition of ungodly men (2 Pet. 3:7-18) after the wicked dead are raised at the end of the 1,000 years. Rev. 20:5. "The thousand years' reign of the saints is therefore in heaven.

The judicial work performed by the saved in conjunction with Christ, is not the determining of the question who shall be saved or lost; for the Father first decides that question himself in the investigative Judgment, and the Saviour carries out that decision by immortalizing the saints at his coming, and thus setting aside all others for the second death. But there remains something more to be done in their cases; for there are degrees in the amount of punishment to be inflicted; and some shall receive greater damnation than others. Luke 20:47; Rom. 2:8, 9; Luke 12:47, 48.

This punishment must be graded according to those books of record which God keeps (Isa. 43:6, 7; Jer. 2:22; Dan. 7:9, 10; Rev. 20:12), and the estimate which he puts upon man's actions when he weighs them and accurately determines the merits of each. 1 Sam. 2:3.

In view of these facts it is not a strange thing that the immortal saints, with Christ at their head, should be commissioned by the Father to determine the measure of punishment which each wicked man shall receive. 1 Cor. 6:2.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

THE saints having been received into paradise, into the presence of the Father, and having partaken of the marriage supper of the Lamb, as already set forth, they are ready, in conjunction with their Redeemer, to enter upon the Judgment of the wicked world, which is now committed to their hands. The sitting of the saints in Judgment must begin after they have been themselves accepted of the Father through Jesus Christ, but before the sentence, "Depart, ye cursed," is pronounced by the Saviour upon the wicked whose cases are considered in this Judgment. The following texts bring to view this great Judgment work of the saints:—

Dan. 7:21, 22: "I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; until the Ancient of days came, and Judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom."

1 Cor. 4:5: "Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the heart: and then shall every man have praise of God."

1 Cor. 6:1-8: "Dare any of you having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust and not before the saints? Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?"

Rev. 20:4-6: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and Judgment was given unto them; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands, and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power; but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years."

We have presented these texts together that the reader might have before him at one view the testimony of the Scriptures on this important point. Let us examine them briefly in order.

The text first quoted declares plainly that the saints are to have a work of Judgment committed to them. But, as already noticed, this cannot be placed in their hands till they have themselves passed that investigative Judgment which decides all cases, and shows that they are accepted of God. All cases having therefore been decided for life or death, the Judgment work of the saints cannot relate to the salvation or damnation of those who are judged by them, but solely to the determination of the measure of their guilt.

The second text forbids on the part of the church the work of Judgment "before the time." This plainly implies that when the appropriate time does come, then this work is to be done by those who at present are forbidden to do it. And that time will be reached when this prohibition expires; and this is limited by the words, "Until the Lord come." This must refer to the second coming of Christ, and locates the Judgment work of the saints immediately subsequent to that event. That the decisions which they will render will be correct, is guaranteed in the promise that the Lord shall "bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the heart." This will no doubt be accomplished by placing in the hands of the saints the books of record which contain an accurate statement of the deeds of those to be judged by them. Barnes in his note on this text makes this remark:—

"And then shall every man have praise of God." The word here rendered praise (iraia) denotes in this place reward, or that which is due to him; the just sentence which ought to be pronounced on his character. It does not mean, as our translation would imply, that every man will then receive the divine approbation—which will not be true; but that every man shall receive what is due to his character, whether good or evil. So Bloomfield and Bretschneider explain it."

The third text states in the most explicit manner, "that the saints shall judge the world." As it occurs in the same epistle which forbids this judgment "before the time, until the Lord come," it is manifest that this is a work which the saints enter upon immediately after they have been exalted to reign with Christ. The nature of the Judgment which the saints are to decide is clearly determined by two facts: 1. It is rendered by the saints after the Lord has brought to light the hidden works of darkness, and made manifest the counsels of the heart; 2. It is said in this same passage and in the same manner, that the saints "shall judge angels," meaning of course those angels that have sinned, whose cases are presented in the following texts:—

2 Pet. 2:4: "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto Judgment."

Jude 6: "And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the Judgment of the great day."

These two facts are decisive as to the nature of the Judgment which the saints are to engage in when exalted at Christ's right hand. They are not to be judges over men in a state of probation, something as the ancient judges of Israel were raised up to rule over God's ancient people; but their Judgment is, to be rendered in the case of wicked men when the Lord brings "to light the hidden things of darkness," and it is to be exercised alike in the case of sinful men, and fallen angels. It is not a Judgment to determine the guilt or innocence of the parties to be judged; for the guilt of the angels was virtually pronounced to be unpardonable when they were cast out of heaven, and delivered to chains of darkness, i. e., to utter despair, and the hopeless bondage of their own sins. And as to wicked men, their lost condition is determined by the investigative Judgment, before Judgment is passed upon them by the saints; and their condition is declared by the resurrection and translation of the just, which separates and sets upon the left hand all others as unworthy of everlasting life. And the fact that the saints thus sit in Judgement to determine the measure of every wicked man's guilt, is the most absolute proof that all the wicked will have a resurrection to consciousness; that they will awake to shame, as declared by the prophet Daniel (12:2), and that God, who he renders to every man according to his deeds, designs, as the apostle Paul declares in Rom. 2:5-8, to inflict "tribulation and anguish" upon every soul of man that doeth evil.

RH April 21, 1885

-2-

U.S.

In reference to the text we are now considering (1 Cor. 6:2), and in harmony with the view here presented, Dr. Bloomfield remarks:—

"Upon the whole, there is, after all, no interpretation that involves less of difficulty than the common one, supported by some Latin Fathers, and, of modern divines, by Luther, Calvin, Erasmus, Beza, Cassanbon, Crellius, Wolf, Jeremy Taylor, Doddridge, Pearce, Newcome, Scott, and others, by which it is supposed that the faithful servants of God, after being accepted in Christ, shall be in a certain sense assessores judicii, by concurrence, with Christ, and being partakers of the Judgment to be held by him over wicked men and apostate angels; who are, as we learn from 2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6, reserved unto the Judgment of the last day."

On the same text Dr. Barnes presents this comment:—

"Grotius supposes it means that they shall be first judged by Christ, and then act as assessors to him in the Judgment, or join with him in condemning the wicked."

We now come to the fourth and last text (Rev. 20:4) relative to this Judgment by the saints. This is a very remarkable one. It shows that the resurrection of the just precedes the work of Judgment by them. It elevates them to thrones of Judgment, where they live and reign with Christ during the period between their own resurrection and that of "the rest of the dead." It measures the space of time to be occupied in this vast work; namely, a thousand years! And this period is certainly none too long for the examination of the books containing the deeds of all wicked men and fallen angels, even though all the saints engage in it, as we have learned that they will.

In this statement respecting the "thrones," there is evident allusion to Dan. 7:9, which speaks of the "thrones" being "cast down," or more correctly rendered "were placed," or "set up," as many able critics affirm. These thrones were "placed" for those who were to engage in the work of Judgment, when the Ancient of days took his seat as Judge in the second apartment of the heavenly temple, and the cleansing of the sanctuary, or the investigative Judgment, began. And when at last "Judgment" is committed to the hands of the saints of the Most High, and they are able to enter into the temple after the pouring out of the plagues (Rev. 15:8), it appears that they sit upon these very thrones, and with the Saviour at their head, finish the work of the Judgment, as indicated in the texts before us. In this exalted state they are priests to God and to Christ, not as mediators with them in behalf of wicked men, but as worshipers of God and the Lamb, even as Christians in their mortal state are a royal priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. 1 Pet. 2:5, 9.

628

RH April 25, 1885

U.S.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Continued.)

We have now soon—

1. That in the great Judgment work, the decision of every case is rendered by God, the Father, in the investigative Judgment in the sanctuary on high.

2. That he then commits all Judgment to the Son, and sends him to execute the same.

3. That the saints have no part to act in the Judgment until the coming of the Lord. The work which is then given to him, he shares with his saints. For his promise is that when he sits upon his throne, all his saints shall sit down with him, as he has set down with his Father upon his throne. Rev. 3:21. A portion of that power which God gives to Christ over the nations, Christ delegates to his saints, that they may share with him in the execution of the Judgment. Compare Ps. 2:8-9; Rev. 2:26, 27.

This fact is very plainly brought to view in Ps. 149:4-9:—

"For the Lord taketh pleasure in his people. He will beautify the meek with salvation. Let the saints be joyful in glory. Let them sing aloud upon their beds. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth and a two-edged sword in their hand; to execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people; to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron; to execute upon them the Judgment written. This honor have all his saints. Praise ye the Lord."

This passage is worthy of careful study.

1. When the meek are beautified with salvation, it will be by the change to immortality. They will bear the image of the second Adam as in this life they bear the image of the first Adam. 1 Cor. 15:47-49, also Isa. 60:17, with 1 John 3:2.

2. This beautifying of the saints and exalting them to glory, precedes their participation in the Judgment mentioned in verses 7-9 of this Psalm.

3. The two-edged sword in their hand is doubtless the same as that which proceeded out of the mouth of Him whose name is called the Word of God. Rev. 19:11-15.

4. And if we consider this Psalm from verses 6-9, we shall see that the work of the immortal saints in the Judgment of the wicked is effected by the examination of the book of God, the sharp sword which they hold in their hands (Eph. 6:17; Heb. 4:12), and the written record of their evil deeds; so that the record of their lives will be compared with the rule given them to govern their conduct, and the measure of their guilt be determined thereby.

When God thus commits Judgment to the Son, and the Son ceases forever the work of Intercession, the words of Ps. 76:7-9 will be found to be true:—

"Thou, even thou art to be feared; and who may stand in thy sight when once thou art angry? Thou didst cause Judgment to be heard from heaven. The earth feared and was still, when God arose to Judgment, to save all the meek of the earth. Selah."

The time when the Son of God saves all the meek of the earth, is when he raises them up from the dust to inherit the throne of his own glory. 1 Sam. 2:8; Matt. 25:31-33; Rev. 3:21. But the adversaries of the Lord will be broken to pieces. Out of heaven will he thunder upon them (Rev. 18:18); he will render decision in strict justice in the cases of all men, and then clothe his anointed king with strength to execute that decision. 1 Sam. 2:10. Indeed, it is because the Son loves righteousness and hates iniquity that he is anointed to do this work. Ps. 45:7; 2:6-9. His arrows will be sharp in the hearts of the king's enemies (Ps. 45:4, 5), and none will escape his just infliction of wrath. Rom. 2:6, 7.

The binding of Satan precedes the resurrection of the just. This seems evident enough from Rev. 20; but it is very plainly taught in our Lord's parable of binding the strong man and spoiling his house. Matt. 12:29; Mark 3:27; Luke 11:21, 22. He is evidently bound before the complete slaughter of the wicked in the battle of the great day. Then the righteous dead, represented by the goods of the strong man (Satan), are taken from his prison house (the grave) by Him who has passed through the tomb and taken away the keys. Rev. 1:18. This is the first resurrection. "Blessed and holy," says Rev. 20:6, "is he that hath part in the first resurrection. On such the second death hath no power." As already shown, their characters were previously decided to be holy in the investigative Judgment.

Satan is cast into the bottomless pit, a term which we have seen is applied to this earth during the thousand years of its complete and utter desolation, between the first and second resurrections. And this binding of the Devil is the antitype of the sending away of the scape-goat on the day of atonement. Here to this earth in its chaotic condition, he, as the antitypical scape-goat, is confined, with his terrible load of guilt upon him, while the saints sit in Judgment upon the fallen angels, and upon all the wicked who joined and continued with them in their great rebellion.

RH May 5, 1885

U.S.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE GREAT DAY.

(Concluded.)

WHAT a historical study will be the work of the thousand years! Then every plan, purpose, and act of rebellion against God, from the beginning of the defection in heaven by the apostasy of Satan, to the last acts of wicked men at the close of time, will come under review; and the record will contain no imperfections through the lack of data, forgetfulness, or misjudgment, on the part of the historians; but all the records will be full to the minutest act, and absolutely true, just as each scene transpired; and everything will appear in its true light.

The work of examining the records contained in the books of God's remembrance, will solve to the minds of the saints many providences which have seemed to them dark and mysterious. For God will then lay open the hidden springs of human conduct, and bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the heart. 1 Cor. 4:5. Then will such scriptures as Matt. 12:41 and Luke 11:31, 32, have their application. For the course of those who have diligently used the comparatively small measure of light which has been granted them, will come up to condemn those who have been favored with greater light and rejected it. And so, likewise, the course of those who have been cut off in their sins, but who would have repented had as great light been given them as was granted to those who lived at a later time, will come up in this examination to condemn most fearfully those who have had the example of their fate, and had seen greater light than they, and yet have not repented. Matt. 11:21, 23; Luke 10:13. But notwithstanding wicked men have been cut off by God's judgments, as an example to those that after should live ungodly, they will come up in the Judgment just the same, for the complete punishment of their own sins. But their cases will be more tolerable in the Judgment than that of those who have had the example of their punishment before their eyes, and have had far greater light than they were favored with, and yet refused to repent. Matt. 10:15; 11:23, 24; Luke 10:12, 14. Thus even the mitigating circumstances are taken into the account of the Judgment of the wicked as certainly as are those of an aggravating character. Thus will God show himself to be in the highest sense just and righteous.

The thousand years at length expire, the examination of the records of the actions of all evil doers is completed, and sentence written according to their deeds. It now remains that the sentence be executed. To accomplish this, it appears that just before the thousand years expire, the holy city with its immortal inhabitants descends to our earth, and rests upon a place prepared for it. See Zech. 14:4, 5; Rev. 21:2. And when the thousand years reach their full termination, the wicked dead hear the voice of the Son of God, and come forth from their graves. John 5:28, 29. It is then that the "unjust" have their "resurrection." Acts 24:15. Then the "rest of the dead" live "again." Rev. 20:5. They come forth from the depths of the ocean, and from the caverns of the earth; for the sea gives up the dead which are in it, and Ades gives them up also; and they come forth alive, for death itself gives them up. Rev. 20:13.

This resurrection of the unnumbered hosts of the wicked, removes from Satan the restrictions under which he has labored during the thousand years, while the wicked have all been in their graves, and the righteous all in heaven, so that he has had no one to practice his deceptions upon. The coming forth of the wicked to be again for a "little season" under his influence, constitutes the "loosing" of Satan; for he now has opportunity to work again among his deceived followers. And he commences just where he left off when he was bound and cast into the bottomless pit—that is, was confined to this desolated earth—at the beginning of the thousand years. He had then gathered the nations to the battle of the great day; but in the midst of the commotion he was suddenly taken, and his followers were destroyed. This was indeed the beginning of the end with them; but the great battle could not then go on to the complete destruction of Satan and all his children; for the measure of their punishment had not then been determined. Hence the destruction is confined simply to the living wicked, and consists in depriving them only of this present life. A lake of fire sufficient for the purpose is made the instrument of this destruction, foreshadowing what will follow at the end of the thousand years. But right at this point the battle is suspended, and the work of the lake of fire is arrested, that the depth of guilt and the consequent measure of punishment belonging to every guilty being may be determined before his final destruction; and for this purpose the thousand years' Judgment by Christ and the saints is now thrown in.

At the end of the thousand years, the wicked, having been "many days" in the "prison"—the grave—are now "visited," that is, are brought forth to their destruction. Isa. 24:21, 22; Eze. 38:8, 9. This making alive again of the wicked is embraced in the statement made by the apostle Paul that "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. 15:22. It was a necessary part of the great plan of salvation, which Christ is engaging to carry out, pledged himself to perform, that all men should be made alive again from the Adamic death, that they might give account of themselves to God, and then pass to a destiny determined, not by Adam's sin, but by their own actions.

Satan, perhaps causing them to believe that he is the one who has given them their new life, true to his nature, begins to deceive them again. He invites them to come up around the "camp of the saints" (the city of God, the New Jerusalem which has then come down from heaven), for the purpose of its capture. Thus by the direct action of Satan, all the wicked, with himself at their head, stand in the presence of Christ, for the execution of the Judgment.

Paul assures us that all men will stand before the Judgment seat of Christ, to receive for the deeds done in the body both good and evil; and as the righteous stand in his presence immediately after they are made immortal, and receive according to their labor, it follows that those who stand before him to receive recompense for their evil deeds, must be the wicked who thus appear before him in the second resurrection.

And now for the first time all the members of the human family are congregated together in one vast assembly. The wicked see the righteous within the city—the kingdom of God—and realize that they themselves are thrust out (Luke 18:28); and when they come to comprehend in some degree the mercy which they have alighted, and the infinite sacrifice made for their salvation in the death of God's only Son, and remember their persistent continuance in sin till he could bear with them no longer, every knee will bow in deepest abasement, acknowledging that God is just, and that their ruin was caused by themselves alone, while the throne of God is forever clear.

We may safely conclude that in this company will be many who have gone down to their graves self-deceived, who will come up in the second resurrection, really expecting to be saved, and all unaware that it is the resurrection of the unjust; and to this class doubtless our Lord's words have reference: "Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you. Depart from me, ye that work iniquity." Matt. 7:22, 23.

Both classes, the righteous and the wicked, now behold the final results of faithful obedience, and of persistent sin—the one crowned with everlasting life, the other ready to perish forever; and as they comprehend the situation they will with one mind and voice declare, "Verily there is a reward for the righteous; verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth." Ps. 58:11. The terrible moment for them has now come when they must hear the Son of God pronounce the sentence, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his angels." Matt. 25:41.

As the whole human family are there assembled, so every sin which has ever been committed is there represented also, the wicked and evil angels bearing their own sins, and Satan bearing his own and all the sins of the righteous also. And now, according to the example of Sodom and Gomorrah, fire comes down from God out of heaven and devours them. Gen. 19:24-28; 2 Pet. 2:6; 3:7; Rev. 20:9. The lake of fire again appears as at the beginning of the thousand years, more potent and wide-spread because now enveloping the whole earth, and seizing upon even the elements themselves. This is the "perdition of ungodly men." 2 Pet. 3:7. And thus the earth itself becomes the "gohouna"—hell—of the wicked. This is the lake of fire in which they will suffer the second death.

The furnace fires fed by the breath of the Almighty, "like a stream of brimstone" (Isa. 30:33), glow more and more fiercely. The elements themselves melt with fervent heat. 2 Pet. 3:10. The earth becomes a molten liquid mass; and the New Jerusalem rides upon the glowing waves of that fiery sea, as the ark rode upon the angry waves of the flood, when the world was destroyed by water. Then the prophet's question can be answered: "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly." Isa. 33:13, 14. Yes, the righteous can endure the scene. There will be safety in the city; and the saints can then, according to another declaration of the prophet, go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men who have transgressed against the Lord, "where their worm dieth not and their fire is not quenched." Isa. 66:24.

Meanwhile the fury of the fiery storm increases until the earth itself is reduced to a gaseous condition, and thus becoming invisible, seems to flee away before the face of Him who sits upon the great white throne, who is doubtless God the Father. Rev. 20:11. Then the city will seem for a time to be suspended in mid-heaven, with no visible resting place. But He that sitteth upon the throne utters the glorious promise, "Behold, I make all things new!" Rev. 21:5. And then these purified elements, with the last traces of sin and the curse purged out of them, are brought by God's re-creating power together again, and the earth assumes its renewed form of more than pristine majesty and glory. The New Jerusalem takes its place as the metropolis of the new earth; and the glory of God shall fill the earth as the waters fill the sea. The saints shall bear the glorious image of the second Adam, and live through endless ages. Through all the universe, from planet to planet, from sun to sun, from the center to the utmost limits of God's creative works, peace and righteousness and beauty, and life and joy shall then reign supreme. Then shall there be no discordant note in the "music of the spheres." And then shall be heard that anthem which John declares shall ascend from every intelligence, of "blessing and honor and glory and power unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."

But being thus destroyed, and all the agents of sin, from first to last, from highest to lowest, being struck out of existence, this evil principle shall never rise up again to mar the handiwork of God. Its temporary history shall drift away, a little speck upon the illustrious past, the remembrance and the lesson alone remaining. And the universe shall be as clean and pure as it was before sin's polluting presence found lodgment in the mind of Satan. Then in its fullness will the reward prepared for the saints be entered upon: "Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Then will our Lord and Saviour take the throne of David to reign over Israel forever and ever, and

GOD SHALL BE ALL IN ALL.

THE ANGEL'S ANSWER.

"Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice and the transgression of desolation to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

So read the familiar passages of Dan. 8:13, 14; but the query has arisen in many minds, what particular connection there is to be found between the question and the answer. What has the cleansing of the sanctuary to do with the time during which the host (the Church) is to be trodden under foot? Some, being unable to see any connection, have fallen into no little perplexity over the matter. But we think the answer is just as explicit and definite as could have been given to the question without transcending the bounds of that information respecting time which the Bible has seen fit to give us, or perhaps that which even the angels themselves possess.

The Church is to be trodden under foot, that is, to be more or less oppressed by worldly and wicked powers, till her final deliverance in immediate connection with the second coming of Christ. Now if the full answer had been given, telling just how long this would be, it is evident that the time of Christ's coming would have been revealed. But the Scriptures have not seen fit to do this. For we read, "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no not the angels of heaven." The information could not therefore be carried to such an extent as to reveal this time. Why, then, was such a question asked?—Because it was designed to give the Church just as definite information respecting the time of her deliverance, as could be given without going beyond the limitations above mentioned; and no other question would bring out this point.

How, then, could the question be answered, and the desired information be imparted?—It could be done only in one way; and that is, by directing the mind to the most definite event that could be found, covering an indefinite space of time, and connected immediately with Christ's second coming and the deliverance of God's people. And that is the very event brought to view in the answer—the cleansing of the sanctuary.

A moment's thought will show that this is the most definite event of its kind, and hence the only one which answers the question as nearly as it was allowable, perhaps possible, to answer it. The time might have been given to the taking away of papal supremacy, or the rise of the United States, or the commencement of Spiritualism; but these are all utterly indefinite as compared with that closing work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary which constitutes its cleansing, which begins at a definite point of time and continues till probation ends, till every case has passed this investigative Judgment, and all the saints are sealed preparatory to the coming of Christ, and delivered from the further power of oppression and evil.

With this view, the force and beauty of the passage appear. The question is the only one that could have been asked to bring out the information desired; and the answer was the most definite that it was allowable to give.

THE JUDGMENT NOW PASSING.

THE present truth in the days of the apostle Paul was that the Son of God, in the person of Jesus Christ, had just been to this earth, and by his death on the cross had made the great sacrifice which was able to redeem men, and purchase back his forfeited possession. Hence, the apostle declared that he determined to know nothing among those with whom he labored, "but Jesus Christ and him crucified." 1 Cor. 2:2. That is, he would labor to "make known" nothing else; this should be his constant theme, iterated and reiterated, till the glad tidings had gone to all men.

The present truth for this time is that this same Jesus, having now nearly accomplished the purpose for which he ascended to heaven, is about to return to this earth again to gather up the fruit of his long and merciful labors in behalf of the children of men; that his work as mediator is almost finished; and that the primary division of the work of the Judgment of the great day must take place before his priesthood ends; for the last work he performs as mediator for his people is to confess their names before his Father and the holy angels (Rev. 8:5), and then their cases are forever decided.

A part of the work of Judgment must therefore precede the coming of Christ in the clouds of heaven; and if he is about thus to appear, the time has already come for this deciding Judgment work. And this is the startling feature of this truth—the time has come, and this Judgment work has been for even many years going forward. Ought not this truth then to be iterated and reiterated in the ears of the people, that the Judgment is now passing, and they all have a case, involving their interests for eternity, pending there? This great truth has not been revealed to be hidden under a bushel, immured in silence, or lost amid the Babel voices of the world. Therefore, even though the reader may be already well-informed upon this subject, we ask him to read again the prophet's sublime description of the scene:—

In Daniel 7:9, 10, the prophet says: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame; and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousands stood before him: the Judgment was set, and the books were opened."

The work of Judgment here referred to and the time when it takes place are usually supposed to be what is termed the 'last Judgment'; and the casting down of the thrones is generally thought to refer to the destruction of all earthly governments by the Son of man. It was doubtless the idea that such must be the meaning that led the translators to use the expression "were cast down," as the translation of a term which literally and primarily signifies just the opposite, namely, to set up, or place. The Hebrew word, q'mah, Gesenius defines as follows: "To place, to set, e. g. thrones (Dan. 8:9); and he further says that it is akin to the word q'mah, a name given to several towns because they were situated on elevated or high places. The Septuagint has q'mah, a word which according to all the lexicons signifies, not to overthrow or cast down, but to set up, place, establish. The Cottage Bible says that Winstie and Boothroyd give it the sense of "were placed." Dr. Clarke, although he thinks the common version a proper one, nevertheless says that the sentence, "the thrones were cast down," might be translated, the thrones were "erected; so the vulgate, positi sunt, and so all the versions." Dr. Hales translates it "were erected."

From the authorities here cited, it is sufficiently evident that the meaning is that thrones were erected or placed, and that the language refers to a time when some special work of judgment was opened, some special tribunal commenced its sitting.

At what time was this to take place? By looking at events to transpire in connection, one of which is given in verses 13 and 14 of Dan. 7, we have light on this point: "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

The "coming of the Son of man" here spoken of, is not his second advent to earth in the clouds of heaven; for he comes to the Ancient of days, God the Father; but God the Father is not located here upon earth. And this coming takes place before his second advent to earth; for in this passage he comes, that is, is brought near before God, to receive from him a kingdom and dominion. This is a gift from the Father to the Son: "Ask of me and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." Ps. 2:8. And the Lord receives this dominion and kingdom before his second advent to earth; for in the parable, Luke 19:12, in which Christ is represented by the nobleman, he goes into a far country to receive a kingdom, and, after having received it, to return.

The propositions thus far stated are beyond dispute. We therefore inquire, When does Christ receive his kingdom? Certainly not while he occupies the office of a priest; and certainly, just as soon as his work in that capacity is completed. But he comes before the Ancient of days before he receives the kingdom, for it is after this coming that a kingdom and dominion are given him. This, therefore, must take place in the closing up of his priestly work. We therefore inquire again, Do we find any event in the close of Christ's priestly work, answering to the movement and change of position here ascribed to the Son of man? We do; and herein we have a most striking harmony in the prophetic word. According to the type, Christ commenced his ministry, when he ascended, in the first apartment of the "true tabernacle," the sanctuary in heaven. The closing part of the sanctuary work, called its cleansing, involved a change in the ministration from the holy to the most holy place. About six hundred years before the complete and final destruction of the earthly sanctuary, it had been announced to Daniel that unto two thousand three hundred days, then the sanctuary should be cleansed. This must of course refer to the heavenly sanctuary, as the earthly was destroyed nearly eighteen hundred years ago. The twenty-three hundred days are shown by arguments which have thus far stood the test of the severest criticism, to have ended in 1844. Then the time came for the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary to commence; and at that point of time we are just as sure that our great High Priest, in accordance with the type, changed his position from the holy to the most holy place of the sanctuary above to finish his priestly work, and close up the plan of salvation, as we are sure that there is any confidence to be placed in type and antitype, or that there is any correspondence between the old dispensation and the new.

Just before this period was reached, the announcement had gone forth, symbolized by an angel flying in mid-heaven, crying with a loud voice, "Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his Judgment is come." And at that point one like the Son of man, came, not the second time to earth, but to the Ancient of days, and was brought near before him; and this was the change in our Lord's position from the first to the second apartment of the heavenly sanctuary to perform the last acts of his office as priest-king on the throne of his Father. Zech. 6:13; Rev. 9:21. It was then that the thrones were erected, and the heavenly tribunal commenced its session. Then the Judgment was set and the books were opened.

That such a scene must transpire, and such a work of investigative judgment be accomplished before the Lord appears, is evident; for at that time the cases of all have been examined so far as to cause it to be decided who among the living are then to be changed, and who among the dead are to have a part in the first resurrection.

The time of the cleansing of the sanctuary, then, is a period of Judgment; and in that period we are now living. We are past the opening of the awfully sublime scene described by the prophet in Dan. 7:9, 10. It is as yet to us a matter of faith and not of sight; but the result will soon be declared. Solemn moment! Do we realize the issue? Are we living so that in a little from this, the decision in our cases will be, "Let him be holy still?"

THE SANCTUARY.

A COMMUNICATION from O. R. L. Crozier to the Bible Banner of May 27, 1886, refers to a report that he wrote an article to the Review and Herald years ago on the subject of the Sanctuary. To this he replies that he never wrote an article for the Review and Herald. This is all true; and how or when or why such a report arose we have no means of knowing, and never heard of it before. He did, however, write an article on the subject of the Sanctuary, giving the first light Adventists ever received on the subject of the Sanctuary in heaven. This was published in the Day Dawn, and copied into the Review and Herald, of May 3, 1851. This article closed with these words:—

"And now we feel safe in stating that there is no Scripture authority for calling anything else the Sanctuary under the gospel dispensation, but the place of Christ's ministry in the heavens, from the time of his ascension to the Father till his second coming. If there be, let it be produced."

So S. D. Adventists until then, and so they have been saying ever since. But the authority called for has not been produced.

— THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB.

On this subject a correspondent proposes for answer the two following questions:—

"1. If the going in to the marriage (Matt. 25:10) is an event in the experience of the people of God to take place after their probation is closed, what is meant by their watching (Matt. 25:13) and waiting (Luke 12:36, 37) for their Lord, when he will return from the wedding?"

"2. If the coming in of the King to see the guests is an event which takes place after Christ's priestly work is accomplished, who is represented by the man found there without a wedding garment on? Will there be some mistake made in the investigative Judgment, so when it is said, Let the holy be holy still, and the King comes in to see his people, he finds some sinners among them, after all, and has to make his decisions over again?"

1. In reference to the first question we would say that Matt. 25:13 and Luke 12:36, 37 doubtless refer to the same time and event. But let us consider a moment what that event can be. Of the three separate events to which the words "coming of the bridegroom" or "coming of the Lord" are applied, there is only one, as we view it, in reference to which it is necessary that we "watch" in the sense of Matt. 24:42-44; 25:13; Mark 13:35, 36; Luke 12:36-40, in order to understand when it takes place. One of these events—the coming of the bridegroom to the marriage—was marked by the ending of the great prophetic period of the 2300 days; and as those days were understood, it was known when that coming would take place, although at the time the nature of that coming was misunderstood. But this could not be the coming of Luke 12:36; for he did not then come to "knock" for admittance. Another of these events is when Christ comes in the clouds of heaven with all the holy angels. But it certainly cannot be said of this coming that he comes to "knock," and that we are then to be ready to open unto him immediately; neither will this coming be liable to find the church "sleeping," on account of its "sudden coming," as in Mark 13:35, 36; for there will be such events, such startling phenomena in both heaven and earth, to mark its approach, that even the wicked will understand that the great day of His wrath is come, before the Lord appears. Rev. 6:15-17. There is but one other time and event in which the term "coming" is applied; and to that, therefore, these expressions must apply. That is the coming brought to view in Matt. 25:10, in these words: "After a long time the Lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them." The Lord did not come to reckon with his servants in 1844; for then he came to the marriage; he does not come to reckon when he comes in the clouds of heaven; for the reckoning is all done before that time, and he simply brings the reward to give to every man as his work shall be. He does come to reckon with us when he reaches our cases in the investigative Judgment of the sanctuary on high. When this coming will take place, we have neither prophetic periods nor signs to tell us; there will be nothing to indicate to us when our cases will come in review before the heavenly tribunal, and be decided; and for this we are to be on our constant watch, lest that hour find us sleeping in our hearts, "My Lord delayeth his coming" (Matt. 24:48), eating and drinking with the drunken (verse 49), and sleeping. Mark 13:30. This is the time when we must stand ready to respond to his first knock, and open unto him immediately. Luke 12:36; Rev. 3:20.

If, then, Luke 12:36 applies to the investigation of our cases in the sanctuary, the query of our correspondent remains to be answered. How can it be said that in this event he returns from the wedding? The answer is at hand. The word here rendered "wedding," is a comprehensive word, and is not confined to the mere ceremony of the union of the two parties. It embraces all the preliminary arrangements, and covers the proceedings throughout, even to the close of the nuptial feast. So that if at any time after they have been summoned, the Lord of the wedding has any interview with the guests, he may be said to come "from the wedding" for that purpose. When the King came in to see the guests, in the parable of Matt. 22, he may be said to have "come from the wedding"—from the place where the parties were waiting the completion of the ceremony—for that purpose. So when the Lord comes to reckon with us as servants, comes to examine us to see if we have on the wedding garment, comes to see if we have reserved for him the entire heart, he comes from the wedding to do this; that is, it is a part of the procedure which belongs to the wedding occasion; and we must be ready to open unto him immediately, be ready to present ourselves to him at once with the wedding garment on.

2. As to the second query, we are at a loss to conceive from what our correspondent gathered the idea that the coming in of the King to see the guests is after Christ's priestly work is accomplished. The Review has never so taught, but, on the contrary, the effort has ever been to show that the time when the King comes in to see and examine the guests is the time of the investigative Judgment in the sanctuary. That work began at the end of the 2300 days in 1844. It has to do first, of course, with the generations of the dead. Beginning with Abel, that member of the human family whose earthly record was first closed, we may reasonably suppose that cases would be taken up in consecutive order from generation to generation down the stream of time. Of these cases examined, some would be found worthy, and the sins of such would be blotted from the books, and their names retained in the book of life; some would be found unworthy, and the sins of such would be left upon the record, but their names be blotted from the book of life. Acts 3:19; Rev. 3:5. Soon the court, having disposed of the cases of all the dead, will reach the cases of the living; and then the conditions of the parable of Matt. 22:11-13, although fulfilled in other cases so far as the mere records are concerned, will be fulfilled in living experience in all the members of the visible church who are not prepared to pass the Judgment test. They will be found without the wedding garment, and be cast out, or forever separated from the people of God. In Rev. 3:10, the faithful and true witness expresses the same fact when he says, "I will spue thee out of my mouth." This examination and decision of cases is not after Christ's priestly work is ended, but is the closing portion of that work; it is not after individuals have passed their probation, but is the time when they pass the line that fixes their destiny forever. The members are here on earth, not in heaven, when this decision is passed upon them. No one is taken into favor and then found to be undeserving of it, and cast out; but this examination and Investigative Judgment is that which draws the line between the two classes, and receives one into God's full favor and blessing, and forever shuts the other out.

Then those who are "ready," go in with Christ to the marriage. How do they go in?—By receiving such an illumination of the Holy Spirit, that, like Stephen (Acts 7:55), "full of the Holy Ghost," they can look up and behold the Son of God, not now simply "standing on the right hand of God," as Stephen beheld him, but receiving from the Father the crown of dominion, a kingdom, honor, and glory. Dan. 7:14. This is the marriage of the Lamb, and his people are in with him at the marriage. This is the rapture of the church at the coronation of their King. The difficulty which seems to some to exist in this subject, we apprehend arises from their understanding that when the bridegroom came to the marriage in 1844 (Matt. 25:10), the going in of his people with him took place then and there. The objection to this is, that the coming of the bridegroom to the marriage is not the marriage itself; that does not take place for some time after he so comes to the place. The marriage does not take place till the guests go in also; and no guests can go in till they are pronounced "ready;" and none are found to be "ready" till their cases are examined in the Investigative Judgment, and they are accepted; that is, till the King comes in to see them, and finds them with the wedding garment on. And when they go in, immediately the door is shut and there is no more admittance. Some seem to have the idea that none can be examined till they have gone in to the marriage; and if they do not thus go in till they pass their probation, the examination must come after that; and as our correspondent says some may have to be cast out, or the decision of the Judgment to be reversed. But the examination takes place before they go in. It will all be made clear by looking at the different features of an eastern marriage, and marking to what point in that our present position corresponds. First, the guests are bidden; the bridegroom comes to the place of marriage; but the bidden guests do not at first go in to the apartment with him, but assemble in an anteroom to put on the wedding garment and wait for the arrangements to be completed, when they will be bidden to enter and witness the ceremony. When all is ready, the King returns from the wedding—from the place where it is to be, at that stage of the proceedings when the preparations are completed (Luke 12:36)—and comes into the anteroom to examine the guests, to see who are properly arrayed in the wedding garment, and ready to enter. Matt. 22:11. They that are found ready go in, the door is shut, and the marriage takes place. In the application, the bridegroom came to the marriage in 1844—came to the place where it is to take place. The marriage did not then take place, nor did the virgins then go in with him to that place; but they came into the anteroom, where they are to array themselves in the wedding garment, and to be examined by the King, before the marriage ceremony transpires. This anteroom represents the position of all those who accept the invitation, and by receiving the truth make themselves candidates for admission into the marriage. In this anteroom the guests began to assemble in 1844; and have been coming in ever since; and they can continue to come till the door is shut. We are now in this anteroom, putting on the wedding garment, or bringing our characters into harmony with the law of God, the standard of righteousness, and so preparing for the time when the King shall come in to examine us, that we may be found "ready." His coming in to examine us is when our cases come up in the Judgment of the sanctuary, though we are here upon the earth. None are in with Christ to the marriage now, but if then found ready we shall go in, as explained above, and the door will be shut.

Then will come the foolish virgins, those who are beating around after oil, adopting any fanciful theory, but refusing to accept the true light of prophetic fulfillment for these last days, on account of the crosses it involves. They will see at last, too late, where the light is, and come and seek for admittance, but then the door will be shut.

But was there not a door opened and a door shut in 1844?—In a certain and a very definite sense, yes. Then the temple of God was opened in heaven, where the ark was seen (Rev. 11:19)—a door of truth and opportunity. "I have set before thee," said Christ to the Philadelphia church, "an open door." There was also another door closed. When the ministry of Christ was transferred to the most holy place of the sanctuary, his ministry in the holy place or first apartment closed. And the door through which any one would seek light and truth from him there, as if no change had taken place, was closed; they can no longer find it there. But the door of Matt. 25:10, we believe to be another door, even the door of salvation, which will be shut when all cases are decided, and probation ends.

QUESTIONS ON THE SANCTUARY.

The following queries are sometimes raised as objections to the views we hold on the subject of the Sanctuary. We ask the candid attention of the reader to the thoughts presented and the scriptures quoted in consideration of them, believing that they not only remove all ground of difficulty, but furnish the strongest evidence that the position we hold is correct. That position, in brief, is this: 1. That the sanctuary and priesthood of the Moosaic dispensation represented in shadow the sanctuary and priesthood of the present or Christian dispensation (Heb. 8:5); 2. That this Sanctuary and priesthood are in heaven, resembling the former as nearly as heavenly things may resemble the earthly (Heb. 9:28, 24); 3. That the ministry of Christ, our great high priest, in the heavenly Sanctuary is composed of two great divisions, as in the type; first, in the first apartment, or holy place, and, secondly, in the second apartment, or most holy place; 4. That the beginning of his ministry in the second apartment is marked by the great prophetic period of 2,800 days (Dan. 8:14), and began when those days ended in 1844; 5. That the ministry he is now performing in the second apartment of the heavenly temple, is "the atonement" (Lev. 16:17), the "cleansing of the Sanctuary" (Dan. 8:14), the "investigative Judgment" (Dan. 7:10), the "unfolding of the mystery of God" (Rev. 10:7; 11:15, 19), which will complete Christ's work as priest, consummate the plan of salvation, terminate human probation, decide every case for eternity, and bring Christ to his throne of eternal dominion.

These propositions once established are absolutely decisive as touching all questions of prophecy relative to the second coming of Christ, and all questions of duty touching our obligation to the law of God. It becomes us, then, to examine with care the foundations upon which they rest, and candidly consider whatever may seem to any as objections to these positions. This we are happy to do. The following points are among those that first occur for examination:—

"1. Heb. 10:20 calls the veil his flesh. Rev. 1:20 explains that the seven candlesticks are symbols of the seven churches. Now if the Sanctuary in heaven is literal and according to the one built by Moses, why this explanation?"

We answer by saying that we do not understand Heb. 10:20 to call the veil his flesh. The verse reads: "By a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh." What is the subject upon which Paul treats in this verse? It is the "new and living way" which Christ hath consecrated for us. Through what does this way lead? Through the veil. And what is this way which he has provided for us?—It is his flesh. Paul's declaration is that Christ's flesh is, not the veil, but the new and living way through the veil. And the meaning evidently is that it is by the flesh of Christ, or, in other words, by the offering which he has provided in the sacrifice of himself, that we are able to enter by faith through the veil into the Sanctuary above for the forgiveness of our sins. This is simple and plain. But with the view that his flesh is the veil, the text would be both confused and imperfect; for then we should find Paul speaking of a way through Christ's flesh which would be an incomprehensible idea; and, secondly, we should find him introducing the subject of a new and living way, and then leaving it without telling us what that way is, or to what it leads. That is neither like Paul, nor the Holy Spirit by which he wrote.

In reference to the candlestick, we think it an entire mistake to regard the seven candlesticks of Rev. 1:12, 13, as the antitype of the candlestick of the sanctuary; for, first, these are seven distinct and separate candlesticks, or "lamp stands," as the word here signifies; but the sanctuary candlestick was only one, with seven branches. Secondly, one like the Son of man was seen walking in the midst of the seven candlesticks; but the high priest never climbed up among the seven branches of the one candlestick of the sanctuary, nor walked around in the midst of them. They therefore have no connection with each other. The seven candlesticks, are simply introduced as symbols of the seven churches. When we inquire for the antitype of the sanctuary candlestick, we find it in the seven lamps of fire which John saw before the throne. Rev. 4:5.

A second difficulty which sometimes arises, is the following:—

"Heb. 10:12, says, He 'sat down [past tense] on the right hand of God,' which must have been in the most holy place. Now if Christ entered the most holy place on his ascension (as these texts plainly imply), the view you hold of the sanctuary and 2,800 days is shaken to the foundation."

In reply to the objection, we answer that we entirely disagree with the conclusion that the expression "at the right hand of God," always means in the most holy place. Stephen said (Acts 7:55), that he saw heaven opened, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. Was this the most holy place? That apartment of the Sanctuary was not opened, nor anything seen there, according to the evidence of the Scriptures, till the seventh trumpet commenced to sound, near the end. Rev. 11:19. Again, our Lord himself said, (Matt. 26:64), "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Is he in the most holy place when he is coming in the clouds of heaven? Yet he is, in that very act, "sitting on the right hand of power," or, which is obviously the same thing, sitting at the right hand of God. These texts show that this expression, "at the right hand of God," simply denotes the position Christ holds in relation to God, as the second in exaltation, power, and glory.

But, for the sake of the argument, let us take it in its strictest sense, as there are scriptures (Heb. 8:21; Zech. 6:13, 18) which speak of Christ as actually seated with the Father upon his throne. And this position of course he assumed when he ascended. Still we claim that there is not the least proof in this that when Christ ascended he entered into the most holy place; for God's throne is not always and immovably in the most holy place. Where is the proof that it is? It will be answered, perhaps, that God is represented as dwelling between the cherubim, which were upon the ark in the most holy place. These expressions are all found in the Old Testament, and have evident reference to the arrangement of the earthly sanctuary. God told Moses that he would meet him from between the two cherubim; and there he manifested his glory. Now suppose that during that period when God communed with mankind through the earthly sanctuary, he ordained to meet them nowhere else but from between the cherubim, would it follow that while in heaven he must be always in that particular place? This conclusion does not seem at all necessary. The law had a shadow, but not the very image of the things.

If it be said that some of these expressions refer to God's position in heaven, as the prayer of Hezekiah (2 Kings 19:15, 16), then it follows that he does not remain fixed in that place; for he left it to come down and communicate with Moses and the elders of Israel. If Ps. 103:1 be referred to, we answer that that verse evidently refers to the time when the earth is to be moved (margin, stagger), or reel to and fro like a drunkard, as Isaiah has it, at the voice of God. Isa. 24:20; Jer. 25:30; Joel 3:16; Rev. 16:17. And at this time his position is between the cherubim in the most holy place, where the priesthood of our Lord then terminates.

But even here upon the earth, although the general rule was that God would commune with Moses from between the cherubim, if these were the cherubim of the mercy-seat, he did not always confine himself to that position; for he sometimes met Moses at the door of the tabernacle. Ex. 33:9; Num. 12:5; Deut. 31:15.

Finally, the throne of God itself, as it exists in heaven, is a living, moving throne. Read Ezekiel's sublime description of this in his first and tenth chapters. Over the heads of living creatures of awful majesty, called cherubim, was the likeness of a firmament, and over that the likeness of a throne, and one above upon it, which the prophet calls "the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord." In chapter ten he calls it "the living creature that" he "saw under the God of Israel." Beyond all question, the prophet here had a vision of God in his holy temple. He himself calls it "visions of God." Chap. 1:1. And this wonderful being, full of eyes and the Spirit of God, is represented as moving about with the Lord of Israel, the Almighty; and the glory of the Lord appeared at times at the threshold of the house, or temple, not always in the most holy place.

All these facts and considerations go to show that we are not to conceive of the throne of God as any earthly throne, composed of inert material, but one of awful life and majesty. Nor are we to conceive of it as an immovable structure, but borne up by the living creatures, and in a measure incorporated with them, who have the power to go and return like a flesh of lightening. Eze. 1:14. Are not these the cherubim between which God dwells? And were not the cherubim placed upon the mercy-seat to represent the fact that these were the foundation of God's living throne? Whoever, therefore, builds a theory upon the idea that God's throne is an immovable structure, and always in the same place, is sure to build an erroneous one.

In John's first view of the heavenly Sanctuary, he saw the throne of God in the holy place. Rev. 4:1-6. Here John beheld, not heaven opened, but a door opened in heaven. And within the apartment opened before him, he saw a throne circled with the rainbow, and glowing like an emerald. The one seated upon the throne was the Father; for Christ is subsequently introduced as the one who took from his right hand the book sealed with seven seals. And before the throne there were seven lamps of fire, the antitype of the candlestick of the earthly sanctuary, which was placed in the first apartment. John's field of vision, therefore, in this instance, lies in the first apartment of the heavenly Sanctuary, and he there beholds the throne of God; and he sees the Father, the Son, the four and twenty elders, the four living creatures, and the innumerable company of angels acting together in reference to the salvation of man. Here, then, is positive proof that the first part of Christ's ministry before his Father was performed in the holy place.

We find equal evidence that when the time comes for a change in the ministration from the holy to the most holy place, there is a change in the position of the Father. The opening of the work in the most holy place is undoubtedly described in Dan. 7:8, 10; and there we find this significant language: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down [placed], and the Ancient of days did sit." The Ancient of days can be none other than God the Father. The expression that he "did sit," shows that he here took a position which, in this work, he had not before occupied. In other words, he changed his position from the holy to the most holy place. He thus having changed his position, there is room for the fulfillment of verses 13 and 14, which represent Christ with his holy retinue as being brought into his presence to receive his kingdom, glory, and dominion. This certainly did not take place at the time of Christ's ascension; and there is no place to locate it, without supposing some such movement as is here suggested, on the part of God. These conclusions are necessary; and as they are the only ones which will harmonize all the Scriptures on the point, we may rest with all confidence on their correctness.

THE SANCTUARY.

A BIBLE reading upon this subject has come under our notice, which we think is calculated to convey a wrong idea and seriously confuse the mind of the reader in regard to the testimony of the Scriptures upon this subject. It says: "God's sanctuary was in heaven during the former dispensation." Ps. 102: 19 is referred to in proof of this. The next proposition is: "In the present dispensation it is in heaven, and Christ is its minister." Heb. 8: 1, 2.

On the basis of this view, the query will arise, who was its minister in the former dispensation? Christ's work as a minister of the sanctuary certainly did not commence till after he had shed his blood here upon earth. If, then, we say that God's sanctuary was in heaven during the former dispensation, who was its minister then?

Again, if the sanctuary of both dispensations is in heaven, what is the difference between these dispensations? Dispensation, testament, and covenant may often be used as synonymous terms. But Paul tells us plainly what the sanctuary of the first covenant was, by describing the tabernacle built by Moses. Heb. 9: 1-5. This, then, was God's sanctuary during that dispensation. And while this stood, the way into the true holy places, or sanctuary in heaven, was not laid open, as we are told in verse 8.

The idea the writer had in mind was probably this, that the pattern from which the earthly sanctuary was built, was in heaven; and this is true; but it did not itself become the sanctuary till its holy places were anointed, and Christ began his ministry therein. Dan. 9: 24.

In Jer. 17: 12 we read: "A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary." The idea taught in this text would seem to be this: that when the plan of salvation was laid in the beginning, the Lord purposed that in his very temple and upon his throne the work of redemption should have its center. In purpose that temple then became his sanctuary, but for a time in purpose only. From this was given the pattern for the imperfect representation contained in the sanctuary of Moses, the shekinah between the cherubim, indicating God's presence, as his throne is supported by the living cherubim on high. Eze. 1: 1-28; 10: 1, 20-22. It is called his sanctuary by anticipation, as in Ps. 102: 19; and became such in reality when in the fullness of time the earthly sanctuary and its ministry gave place to it, at the ascension of Christ.

Strictly speaking, therefore, God's sanctuary during the former dispensation was here upon earth, and during the present dispensation is in heaven.

J. W. MORTON AND THE SANCTUARY QUESTION.

In the Sabbath Recorder of July 21, 1887, appears a very singular article from the pen of him whose name stands at the head of these lines. As it is designed to controvert publicly the position of S. D. Adventists, it challenges some notice at our hands. Had he confined himself simply to the theology of the question, we might have let it pass unnoticed; for when a person still clings to the fog and mysticism of mediæval theology, instead of exchanging that musty patulum for the clearer light and more satisfactory conclusion of modern investigation, in this age of advanced Biblical knowledge, he could hardly be expected to present anything worthy of serious refutation. But when he seeks to hold up the denomination to the concentrated gaze of all whose attention he can secure, and then descends to the work of perverting their views and grossly misrepresenting their position, it becomes a very different matter, and some one is called upon to remind him that he is doing a work very unworthy of his profession, to say nothing of his years.

Respecting his theory on the Sanctuary question, it is unnecessary for us to say anything to those who have investigated our views upon that subject, and understand the reasons upon which they rest. But we can hardly refrain from noticing a point or two, that the reader may get something of an idea of the condition of his mind on this subject.

1. He admits that there is a sanctuary in heaven, but claims that it has but one apartment, and that is the "most holy place." To this it is sufficient to reply that the earthly was a type of the heavenly, and the "pattern" according to which Moses was commanded to make the earthly, was the heavenly Sanctuary itself. Working after that pattern, Moses made a sanctuary with two apartments, a holy place and a most holy place. Yet Mr. Morton says the pattern had but one apartment. Then Moses was a wonderfully stupid builder, so phenomenally stupid that the Holy Spirit itself couldn't save him from such a blunder! But no; the fact that Moses made two apartments in his likeness of the heavenly temple, is a demonstration that the latter has two apartments also; and it is utterly useless for men to deny it. This fact being forever settled, we inquire, if there are two apartments in the heavenly temple, what are they for? Why will not people be constant on this question?—It must be that a priestly service is performed in both; and the priests here on earth, in both apartments, served unto the example of a like service in heaven. So Paul directly testifies. Heb. 8:5. Then it follows, as clear as type and symbol and direct statement can make it, that as the two apartments of the earthly sanctuary typified the two apartments of the heavenly, so the service in each apartment here typified a like service there; and therefore the service in the temple above must follow the same order as that performed here in the shadow which that cast on earth; namely, a long service in the first apartment followed by a short service in the second, which service consisted in making the atonement (Lev. 16), and finished the yearly round of the tabernacle ministry. So Christ will finish his priestly work by a short work of atonement in the most holy place of the heavenly Sanctuary; and then, his work as mediator being done, he will come in all his glory as King of kings and Lord of lords. In strict accordance with the type, this closing work is the cleansing of the Sanctuary; and it is most appropriate that the time when Christ enters upon that momentous division of his priestly work, should be noted in prophecy, as it is in Dan. 8:14: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed."

2. Mr. M. will have Christ perform no service above, except in the most holy place. He says:—

"The services performed by the priests in the court of the tabernacle and in the first tabernacle itself, were all typical of the work of Christ on earth, and were completely fulfilled when he expired on the cross."

According to this, Christ must have performed a portion of his priesthood on earth; but this directly contradicts the apostle Paul, who declares positively that he accomplishes no part of his priestly work here below. In Heb. 8:4, 5, he says: "For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law; who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." That is, all the work of the tabernacle priesthood performed here was to be performed by those priests who were ordained thereto by the law of Moses; and all the priesthood of Christ must be performed in heaven. The text referred to (Heb. 7:26, 27) simply relates to the fact of his giving himself as an offering. But his priesthood could not commence till he had provided the offering whereunto he was to plead for men before his Father.

3. He has Christ make the atonement immediately on his ascension to heaven. He says:—

"In the natural order of things, the atonement preceded the session of Christ on the mediatorial throne. . . . His very first act, therefore, after his ascension, was to present his atoning blood in the holy of holies. There he sat down by the Father's side."

This is no particular improvement over the more common error that the atonement was made upon the cross—an error which inevitably leads to Universalism or the most ultra predestinationism. What he lays down as the "natural order," every reader of the Old Testament knows is exactly the reverse of the natural order; for in that yearly round of priestly service which prefigured the work of Christ in heaven, making the atonement was the closing up of the work, not the beginning of it; it was the last act, not the first. If this is not so, and if Mr. M. is not entirely wrong in his position, then the type deceives instead of instructs us, and the shadow plays false to the substance which cast it.

4. He falls into the usual chaos over Heb. 10:20. Verses 19 and 20 read as follows: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh." In reference to this Mr. M. comments as follows:—

"The veil therefore was an essential part of the earthly sanctuary. This veil represented Christ's human nature—his flesh. Heb. 10:20. When this human nature was lacerated on the cross, and he was in the agonies of death, 'the veil of the temple was rent in twain.' The mortal flesh was thenceforward to be replaced by the glorified and immortal body, in which the worshiper might approach into the presence of God."

The person who can evolve an intelligible idea from such a view of the subject ought to rise and explain. Moses was commanded to make a tabernacle and all its furnishings according to patterns which were shown him. According to the view here set forth, it seems that "Christ's human nature" was shown to Moses, and he was commanded to make something to represent it; and the nearest likeness he could devise was a curtain of fine linen, wrought all over with figures of cherubim suspended before the most holy place of the sanctuary! But it is said that after this mortal flesh, this veil, was "rent in twain," it was "to be replaced by the glorified and immortal body." Then was there not another veil immediately set up when the first was destroyed? And then Mr. M. says that in this we approach to God, but Paul says that we have a way through it. The ancient apostle and the modern expositor are a good ways apart, and one or the other is fearfully mixed. But a slight transposition will free the text from all ambiguity, and make the apostle's meaning clear and consistent. Thus: "Having, therefore, brethren, boldness to enter through the veil into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, that is to say, his flesh, which he hath consecrated for us." Thus it appears that Christ's "flesh," that is, the offering which he has provided, is—not the veil, but the new and living way by which we enter through the veil into the Sanctuary on high, and have access to the one mediator between God and man.

5. To prove that there is but one apartment in the heavenly Sanctuary, Mr. M. quotes those texts in Hebrews which speak about the "holy place," as it is rendered in the common version. Thus Heb. 9: 8: "The Holy Ghost thus signifying, that the way into the holiest of all [or, Revised Version, holy place] was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing." Verse 12: "Entered in once into the holy place." Heb. 10: 19: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus." And, following the Revised Version, he quotes Heb. 9: 24 as follows: "For Christ entered not into a holy place made with hands, like in pattern to the true." Now Mr. M. knows better than to quote these texts thus, and make this application of them. He is a Greek scholar, and well understands that in every one of these instances the word is in the original in the plural number, reading "holy places," and should be so translated. This would seem like a deliberate attempt to deceive and mislead the uninformed. But we will not accuse him of this. His course is rather to be attributed, perhaps, to the bewildering influence of a false theology which has led him, like the translators themselves, to turn their rendering into a lie in obedience to its imperious demands.

6. Speaking of S. D. Adventists, he further says:—

"They teach that when Jesus did enter into the holy place, it was not for the purpose of presenting his blood, and thus making an atonement, for the sins of his people, but rather that he might enter upon what they call 'The Investigative Judgment,' for the purpose of ascertaining from the books of God's remembrance the actual moral and spiritual condition and character of those who in all ages have professed to be his people."

We are utterly unable to account for such a statement as this; for by the insertion of the word "not," which should not be there, it expresses exactly the reverse of the truth. The very thing we do teach, as every reader of our literature knows, is that Christ entered the most holy place for the very purpose of presenting his blood, and making an atonement for his people. And from the very nature of the case, this is the "Investigative Judgment." We do not claim that we find this term in the Bible; but we adopt it as being the most clearly expressive of the nature of this portion of the Judgment work; and a moment's thought must convince any one that just such a Judgment, or investigation of character, and decision of cases for salvation or destruction, must precede the coming of Christ, inasmuch as when Christ appears there is no time allotted for investigation of character, but in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, the two classes, righteous and wicked, both dead and living, are divided, the righteous being made immortal, and the wicked given over to destruction. Well, it may be asked, could not God do this?—No doubt he could; but he has seen fit to reveal to us that when the Judgment sets, books are opened (Dan. 7: 9, 10), and from the record therein men are to be judged according to their works. Rev. 20: 12. Mr. M. thinks our view contrary to the Scriptures because it is as King that Christ judges the people. In this he overlooks the fact that in all judgment work there are two divisions: the judicial, through which examination is made and sentence passed; and the executive, through which the decision rendered is carried into effect. It is as King that Christ engages in this latter work of Judgment, not in the former; as King he executes the Judgment, but does not investigate. This latter work is all done in the Sanctuary, while the "Ancient of Days," the Father, sits in Judgment (Dan. 7: 9), and Christ, as he makes the atonement, presents the cases to him for acceptance.

7. He speaks of us as "the self-styled 'Remnant Church.'" This is no self-styling of our own. The Bible calls the last generation of Christians, those who will be living at the second coming of Christ, "the remnant of the woman's seed." Rev. 12: 17. Now whether there is such a body on the earth to-day or not, all depends on the question whether or not we have reached the last days and Christ is about to appear. If we have reached that time, as we suppose, there is a "remnant" of those who have constituted the church, now on earth. And whenever that time comes, all who are ready for Christ's coming will belong to that "remnant." Even Seventh-day Baptists, if they are saved, must help compose it. We really do not see the call for the sneers with which he interlards his essay on this point.

8. He says that the 2,300 days are literal days, and that the prophecy has been fulfilled, and that if he knew more of history he could tell where. It will be enough if the reader will consider what a wonderful prophecy, on this ground, this would be. Twenty-three hundred literal days are not quite six and a half years. And when the angel propounded the momentous inquiry, "How long shall be the vision . . . to give both the Sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" how sublime would be the answer, would it not, "Unto six years and a quarter; then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed"? He admits that in Num. 14: 34 and Eze. 4: 4-6 days represent years, yet cannot see how in the symbolic prophecy of Dan. 8: 14, days can also represent years. He says:—

RH August 2, 1887

-3-

U.S.

"I am perfectly satisfied, on the contrary, that there is not a single passage in God's word in which it is clear from the context that this word [day] has any such meaning."

Has he ever read Dan. 9: 25? Here a period of sixty-nine weeks is marked off, to reach from the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem to the Messiah the Prince. All expositors, except Jewish, understand this to refer to the revelation of Christ at its first advent. In sixty-nine weeks there are 483 days. Were these days literal, or do they represent years? It would be the merest quibble to object that the word "days" is not here used. No one can deny but the same principle is here involved. If the time is literal, it is 483 literal days. If it is symbolic, it is 63 years. According to Mr. M. it must be literal. But who supposes that a prophecy was given covering only sixty-nine literal weeks—about a year and a half—before the manifestation of Christ as the Messiah the Prince? Or who supposes that a commandment to restore Jerusalem went forth a year and a half before Christ came? The idea is too absurd to mention. But if the days in Dan. 9 are symbolic, a day for a year, the days in Dan. 8, which Dan. 9 is given to explain, are also symbolic.

9. Enumerating a few of our "so-called expositions," he calls them the most "complete column of assumptions," he has ever seen set up. In answer he simply writes down "assumption," offering no proof whatever. But as his ipse dixit is worth no more than so much air issuing through any other human larynx, we pass it by.

10. We now come to the crushing climax of his whole effort. He says:—

"What I have written above respecting the teachings of the self-styled 'Remnant Church,' I have written in all sincerity and good will, but with very little hope that any member of that body will be influenced thereby. I know full well that though the doctrines criticised above are diametrically opposed to the Bible, they are in perfect accord with the teachings of their prophets, whose so-called revelations [revelations?] are permanent with those who believe in her inspiration. If the apostles contradict her 'visions' and 'testimonies,' so much the worse for the apostles! But I do most earnestly entreat those of God's dear people who still believe in the Bible, and the Bible alone, as the rule of faith and manners, to pause and weigh the matter carefully before plunging into this miry pool of human invention."

We are sorry Mr. Morton could not finish his essay without unveiling to public view a darkened chamber of his soul out of whose murky recesses the serpent of falsehood thrusts its head to bias, and the blind owl of bigotry and prejudice lifts up its voice to hoot. If he has investigated the subject at all, he knows that the views we hold on the question of the Sanctuary were not suggested by any vision from sister White, and in all our investigations of the subject we never appeal to any of her writings, but rest the argument wholly upon the Scriptures, taking the ground on this, as upon all other subjects, that whatever is not sustained by the Bible must fall. But he must have his fling at the "prophets," even though it be at the expense of truth; he must endeavor to raise prejudice against us, by representing that we would deliberately set aside a positive statement of the apostles, in behalf of a vision or testimony from sister White. All this foolish clap-trap about the Bible and the Bible alone, which we italicise in the foregoing extract just as he published it, is getting a little stale. The profession of "good will" with which he prefaces these statements might well have been dispensed with. We will forego that, sad as it would be, if he will keep himself in harmony with facts. A little less "good will" and a little more truth would be a wonderfully good exchange for him in our opinion. On the subject of the Sanctuary we have no misgivings. It throws a flood of light most wonderful on the philosophy of the plan of salvation, the relation of the two dispensations, and the position and work of Christ, the Redeemer of men, in our behalf. Nothing can exceed the beauty and harmony of the view which it presents. If it is truth, all the mighty hosts of heaven are enlisted in its behalf, and it cannot be overthrown. Mr. M. calls upon his brethren to be careful not to plunge into "this miry pool of human inventions." We call upon our brethren to give themselves to God by a new, more full, and perfect consecration, that they may everywhere become the vehicles of divine power, and channels through which the light of the glorious gospel may go forth to those who sit in darkness.

The Review and Herald.

"Sanctify them through Thy Truth: Thy Word is Truth."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., SEPTEMBER 27, 1887.

URIAH SMITH, EDITOR.
L. A. SMITH, ASSISTANT EDITOR.
GEO. I. BUTLER, }
R. N. BAREFILL, } CORRESPONDING EDITORS.

THE SANCTUARY.

A BROTHER inquires what relation the subject of the Sanctuary bears to other subjects in our system of belief.

A volume would better convey an answer to this question than a brief article. A synopsis of the subject only can be here attempted.

1. The subject of the Sanctuary is essential to an understanding of many of the prophecies. The event to occur at the end of prophetic time—the 2800 days (Dan. 8:14)—is the cleansing of the Sanctuary. Without an understanding of this, one must necessarily go astray in applying the prophetic periods.

2. The view of the Sanctuary as held by S. D. Adventists is the only subject which provides a place for, and brings to view, the preliminary Judgment which must precede the coming of Christ—a work which for the sake of convenience, as best expressing the nature of the work, we call "the Investigative Judgment." That such a preliminary Judgment, or decision of cases for life and death, does take place before Christ appears, is absolutely certain from the very nature of the case; for when Christ is revealed in the clouds of heaven, with the suddenness of a flash of lightning the line is drawn between the righteous and the wicked, and the righteous are made immortal, the righteous dead being raised, and the righteous living changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. There is no time here for investigation of character, decision of cases, or rendering of sentences. This work is evidently already done, and what is here seen, is but the carrying out of a previous decision. The view of the Sanctuary which we hold to be the scriptural view, presents Christ as finishing up his work as priest with this very service, examining cases, making the atonement, blotting out sins, and making up the blessed list of the subjects of his ever-lasting kingdom. Aside from this view, no time nor place for this necessary work can be found. This point has given a deal of trouble to first-day Adventists.

3. Such prophecies as Rev. 10:5-7 and Rev. 11:19, are utterly unintelligible without an understanding of the subject of the Sanctuary.

4. It is a most wonderful auxiliary to the argument on the Sabbath question. While the Sabbath can be shown to be binding by independent lines of arguments from the Scriptures, the Sanctuary argument is absolutely and forever decisive on this question. Any person who is established on the subject of the Sanctuary, can never have the first shadow of doubt or misgiving on the subjects of the law and the Sabbath.

5. The same may be said of the question of the second coming of Christ. While it can be proved that the coming of Christ is at the door by scriptures not directly connected with this subject, yet the Sanctuary subject is a demonstration on that question. For if Christ is now closing up his work as priest—which is very soon to be finished, it is absolutely certain that the second coming, also, is very soon to occur; inasmuch as, his priesthood being finished, his next position is that of king, and his next move is to come for his people.

6. It guards against time-setting for the Lord to come, as it shows that no prophetic period reaches to the coming of Christ.

7. It is the only question which explains the great Advent movement of the past, as viewed with reference to the disappointment of 1844, and binds the past and present movements together as one consistent whole.

8. It holds us to correct views in regard to the condition of man in death, by showing that rewards and punishments cannot be given till the atonement of Christ is finished.

9. It guards against the two errors, Universalism on the one hand and predestination on the other, which spring from the popular error of placing the atonement on the cross, by showing that the atonement is the last work of Christ before his coming, and pertains to those only who have sought an interest in it by repentance and faith.

10. It brings before the mind Christ as a tangible Saviour, and his work as a reality, as they are not brought out in any other theme treated upon in the word of God.

11. It explains the parable of Matt. 22:1-14.

12. It explains the important parable of the ten virgins of Matt. 25:1-13.

13. It is the foundation of the Third Angel's Message of Rev. 14.

But why enumerate further. As a light on theological subjects and an incentive to the highest practical godliness it ranks with the choicest of all Bible themes. Especially is it the great citadel of the truth for the last days. Every believer should be as familiar with it as with his mother tongue. Every time we seek the Saviour we go to the Sanctuary; and there our eternal interests center.

March 6, 1888

US

BETWEEN THE CHERUBIM.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "In investigating the subject of the Sanctuary, we find it stated in Ps. 80: 1 and 99: 1, that God's throne, or dwelling-place, is between the cherubim over the mercy-seat. And in Rev. 4: 3 John saw his throne in the outer apartment of the heavenly Sanctuary. Were the mercy-seat and cherubim ever in the outer apartment of the earthly sanctuary? If not, how do you reconcile the two scriptures?"

Our correspondent has stretched the two texts in Psalms a little, by attributing to them the statement that God's throne is between the cherubim, "over the mercy-seat." There were other cherubim besides those over the mercy-seat, and to some of these reference may be made. We do not suppose that the throne of God was, or is, inseparably connected with the mercy-seat. To be sure, he chose, as the most appropriate place in which to manifest the outward symbol of his presence, the glorious shekinah, here upon the earth, the one spot where he could consistently manifest his presence, the holiest spot in the most holy place of the sanctuary, over the mercy-seat, beneath which reposed his holy law. But these restrictions would not exist elsewhere. Before the fact that the shekinah was manifested over the mercy-seat can occasion any trouble with Rev. 4, it must be shown that even though God did meet and commune with his servants from between the cherubim of the ark here below, so much so that it is spoken of as his "dwelling-place," it must also be so in heaven. But this would not inevitably follow; for in his intercourse with men this might be the best mode of procedure, but not necessarily so in heaven.

Further, it must be shown that the cherubim between whom God dwells on high, are the cherubim of the ark. But this cannot be shown; for it appears from Ezekiel's vision of God and his throne, in Ezekiel, chap. 1 and 10, that the throne of God itself is a living throne, supported by the most exalted order of cherubim. And the most appropriate representation of this fact that could be given here on earth, was to designate the locality between the cherubim over the ark, as his dwelling-place, in his ordinary intercourse with the human race.

And again, it must be shown that God's throne in heaven is immovably fixed to one place. But this cannot be shown; for in Ezekiel's vision above referred to, it is represented as full of awful life and unapproachable majesty, and moving whithersoever the Spirit was to go. And as in the earthly tabernacle, so here, it sometimes stood at the door of the Lord's house. Eze. 10: 18, 19.

According to Ezekiel's sublime description, the Creator of the universe, the upholder and ruler of all this vast realm, is not immovably confined to any one locality. And yet he dwells "between the cherubim," because his throne itself is upheld by those wonderful beings.

Thus there is no difficulty in supposing that when Christ ascended to commence his ministry above, he took his position at the "right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens," in the first apartment, or holy place, of the Sanctuary. And we know from Rev. 4: 1-4, that he did commence his ministry in that apartment.

We have further evidence of the fact that the Father's throne was in the holy place till the time came for the ministry to begin in the most holy, at the end of the 2800 days in 1844; or at least that it was not in the most holy where the ark is, till that time. For Daniel in describing the opening of this scene, says: "I beheld . . . till the Ancient of days did sit, and . . . the judgment was set and the books were opened." The word here rendered, "did sit," means according to the standard lexicographers, "to take a seat as a judge in a court of justice." This is exactly the position the Father occupies during the cleansing of the Sanctuary. He here sits as the awful Judge in this great tribunal, and accepts or rejects men, as Christ presents their cases before him, accordingly as they have accepted or rejected Christ here upon earth. Matt. 10: 32, 33; Luke 12: 8, 9; Rev. 8: 5.

This representation clearly implies a move on the part of the Father. He takes a position which he has not before occupied. And inasmuch as this judgment work is the only work which transpires in the most holy place, and he holds that position during all the time he is there, it follows that before he took that position, before he "did sit," as Daniel declares, he must have occupied some other location.

All is harmonious and consistent when we suppose that during Christ's ministry in the holy place, God's throne was there. When the time came for the opening of the judgment scene in the most holy place, the Father first moved his throne thence and took his position as judge in that court. And then the Son of man, the mediator, now to enter upon the last brief division of his great work for a lost world, escorted by clouds of heavenly angels, is brought in and comes near before him. Dan. 7: 13, 14. See the whole subject discussed in the work on the Sanctuary, pp. 230-236. Some other queries from another correspondent, on the subject of the Sanctuary, we shall endeavor to notice next week.

THEN SHALL THE SANCTUARY BE CLEANSED.

As announced last week, we now offer a few remarks upon this subject, in response to queries of another correspondent in addition to the points then noticed. This writer has no difficulty with the view that there is an inseparable connection between the eighth and ninth chapters of Daniel; that the vision of chapter nine is the key to that of chapter eight; that the seventy weeks are the first portion of the 2800 days of Dan. 8:14, they being cut off from those days, and that therefore the computation of the whole period is determined by that of the seventy weeks, and that beginning in 457 B. C., they terminated in 1844 A. D. But his query is how we can tell that this has any connection with the cleansing of the Sanctuary as we view it, and the investigative Judgment, inasmuch as the margin of Dan. 8:14 reads, not, then shall the Sanctuary "be cleansed," but "be justified."

The word "justified" is given in the margin as being a more literal definition of the Hebrew word; but the "justification" involved in the term must be secured by removing or cleansing from something which so long as it remains prevents such justification. Thus it must be that "to cleanse" also conveys a proper meaning of the word, or the translators would not have incorporated it into the text in place of the word "justify."

The word rendered "cleansed" (margin, "justified"), in Dan. 8:14, is tsadag; and one of the definitions given to this word in Bagster's Hebrew lexicon is, "to be purified"; and Dan. 8:14 is referred to as the passage where it has this meaning. Bagster refers also to the Septuagint and Vulgate as using the word in the same sense. This is the term which Paul uses in Heb. 9:28, when speaking of the cleansing of both the worldly and the heavenly Sanctuary. He says: "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these." The Greek word here used is katharizo, which is defined, "to cleanse, to render pure; by metonymy, to cleanse from sin, purify by an expiatory offering, make expiation for, Heb. 9:22, 23."

Thus we see that there is complete harmony between the Hebrew and the Greek, and between the Old and New Testaments on this subject. Daniel uses a word which means "to purify": "Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the Sanctuary be purified." And Paul follows with a comment saying that "the heavenly things themselves" (by which terms he refers to the heavenly Sanctuary, Heb. 8:3; 9:28) must be "purified." And this purification is a "cleansing from sin by an expiatory offering." The words used in the original convey the idea more accurately than the English translation; for the English word "to cleanse," suggests first the idea of removing literal or physical impurity, and so gives an objector a chance to quibble over the idea that there is any thing physically impure in heaven; but the words used in the Hebrew and Greek do not admit the idea of cleansing from physical uncleanness, but only from the defilement of sin; and this is not accomplished by soap and sand, but by the blood of an offering. Of sins only is the Sanctuary to be cleansed. Sins, by the plan of redemption, are treated as real objects, and are considered as lodged in the Sanctuary when they are removed from us by the mediation of Christ; and from the Sanctuary they are to be removed by the work of atonement which Christ accomplishes in the most holy place; and when they are thus removed, the Sanctuary is purified, justified, or cleansed from sin.

The cleansing of the Sanctuary in the type (Lev. 16), was "a shadow" of this work, but not the "very image" (Heb. 10:1); for that work pertained to the congregation as a whole, but this pertains to individuals; and as Christ's atonement reaches each individual case, that case is decided; for when a person's sins are atoned for and put away, he is forever saved. But this decision of cases is a work of judgment; for that is a part of the work of judgment, to decide the case of the person under trial; and it is the very first step in the work of judgment; for decision of the case, as between guilt and innocence, must be made before sentence is rendered and executed. This decision of cases is the very work done in the Sanctuary, and the only work accomplished there. This is why we call the cleansing of the Sanctuary a work of judgment; and this work of judgment ends probation and closes the plan of salvation so far as offers of mercy and pardon are concerned.

Our correspondent further says: "If Dan. 7:9, 10 refers to this work of cleansing the Sanctuary, is not the Father the one that cleanses; as we all agree that the 'Ancient of days' is the Father?"—No; he does not do the work; he acts as judge only. The phrase, "the Ancient of days did sit," means to take a seat as judge in a court of justice. Then Christ is brought in before him (verses 13, 14) to accomplish with his thousand thousand and ten thousand times ten thousand heavenly assistants, the work of examination of cases and blotting out the sins of those whose names he confesses to his Father (Matt. 10:32; Luke 12:8; Rev. 3:5), and whom the Father accepts as the fruits of his Son's great sacrifice; thus Christ cleanses the Sanctuary, submitting his work to the Father as judge. This being accomplished, all further judgment, that is, in reference to the sentence and the execution, is committed by the Father to the Son. John 5:22, 27. The Son then exchanges his priestly for his royal attire (Rev. 19:16), and commences the work of carrying out the decisions rendered in the Sanctuary, by appearing in his glory in the clouds of heaven (Rev. 22:12), to take his people to himself (John 14:3; 1 Cor. 15:51, 52) and to break the nations with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel. Ps. 2:9; Dan. 2:34, 35, 44; 2 Thess. 1:7, 8.

Thus opens the millennium, the thousand years of Rev. 20:4. During this period, the saints, sitting on thrones with Christ at their head (Rev. 3:21; 20:4), fix the sentences to be executed on the subjects of the second resurrection, at the end of that time. 1 Cor. 6:2, 3. The years expire; the wicked dead are raised, and the sentence written is executed upon them. Ps. 149:9. Then the new creation (Isa. 65:17; 2 Pet. 3:10; Rev. 21:1-8) is brought in, and the saints possess the kingdom under the whole heaven. Dan. 7:27. Thus the Judgment, the preliminary stages of which are now being accomplished in the Sanctuary on high, will be fully completed.

The question is further asked, what we mean by Christ's entering into the most holy place, or second apartment of the Sanctuary; if that implies that he had not been there at all till the end of the 2300 days in 1844. We mean that the service which is performed in the Sanctuary, was, till that time, performed in the outer apartment. No service pertains to the second apartment but the work of atonement, which is the cleansing of the Sanctuary; and this work did not commence till the end of the 2300 days in 1844. But we believe it did commence then according to the prophecy, and will soon be finished.

NOT THE VERY IMAGE.

In Heb. 10:1, Paul says: "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices, which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect." The book of Hebrews contains Paul's great argument on the change of dispensations from the Mosaic to the Christian, the change of the priesthood from that of Aaron after the order of Levi, to that of Christ after the order of Melchisedec, and from the sanctuary and its ministry in type, to the greater and more perfect tabernacle and its ministry in antitype.

In the course of his argument, he finds it necessary to guard against an error which he seems to anticipate some would be in danger of falling into, and that is, to take every little particular of the type, and every circumstance, and all its minutiae, and try to find a counterpart to them all in the antitype; and so he says that the law had a shadow of good things to come, but not the very image of the things. Its great and central truths are to be looked at, and its leading features to be studied and applied. These shadowed forth marvelous and blessed provisions of grace to be offered to men through the gospel. But any typical service confined to this earth and performed by mortal men, must necessarily contain limitations and imperfections not to be duplicated in the higher and heavenly services which they foreshadowed.

It was so in the tabernacle and Levitical priesthood here on earth, as compared with the tabernacle in heaven and the priesthood of Christ. Here the tabernacle in its size, materials, and changeable conditions (to adapt it to circumstances for the time being), bore, of course, no comparison to the true tabernacle on high, which the Lord pitched and not man. And yet in some of its main features, its two holy places, its furniture, and the purposes for which it was designed, it was "a figure for the time then present," "pattern of things in the heavens," "figures of the true."

And so also with the priesthood. The priests had offerings to make for themselves, which our Saviour does not. They performed a complete round of service each year; Christ performs the round of his ministry once for all. They had a variety of offerings to present; he but the one offering of himself. They also had particular and multiplied services to perform in their work, which are not necessary, nor to be looked for, in the work of our great High Priest above. But yet, as the apostle declares, those priests served "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Great truths were prefigured in their service, such as these: that a priest higher than they was at some time to undertake the cases of penitent men; that an offering better than theirs had been provided; that as they atoned for sin in figure, the sins of the penitent were at length to be atoned for in fact; that this service was to be performed in heaven by a divine mediator between God and man, in the true sanctuary built by the Lord, of which their sanctuary built by Moses was a figure. These were the great general truths set forth; but it does not follow, and no one ever dreamed, that instruction such as was given to the earthly priests according to the first chapters of Leviticus, was to be carried out in the antitype, or that such stated and repeated services as the daily morning and evening sacrifices, the extra offerings on the Sabbath, etc., were to re-appear in the heavenly ministration.

The facts of the type, and the argument of Paul in his Epistle to the Hebrews, certainly lay an immovable foundation upon which to build such conclusions as these; namely, 1. That as the earthly sanctuary was expressly provided with two apartments, a holy and a most holy place, which were designed for a special purpose, and without which the services of the sanctuary could not have been carried forward, they were essential features of the sanctuary, and, as such, must have been designed to show that the great antitype of which this sanctuary was a figure or pattern, had also the corresponding apartments,—a holy and a most holy place. 2. That as the ministry of the earthly priests was as clearly separated into two divisions, as the sanctuary itself was into two holy places, and each division was confined to its appropriate place the work in the holy place never being performed in the most holy, nor that of the most holy place, ever being attended to in the holy place, it follows that if the ministry of these earthly priests was a shadow of the ministry of Christ in heaven, as Paul so positively asserts, his ministry also must consist of two divisions, and each division be performed in its appropriate apartment, a portion of it in the first apartment, and another portion in the second apartment corresponding to the typical work which the priests performed in these apartments respectively, in the sanctuary here on earth. If this is not so—if the heavenly sanctuary has but one apartment, corresponding to the most holy place, and Christ ministers only therein, it follows that two thirds of the sanctuary, as constructed by Moses (the holy place), was an unwarrantable addition, and had no antitype, and that all the service of the priests through the entire year, except one solitary day, was performed unto the example and shadow of nothing! Such teaching is an insult to the sacred record.

Yet when we reason thus respecting the work of Christ, in accordance with the light shed upon the subject by the teaching of the Bible in reference to the sanctuary, an effort is made in the very way indicated above, to turn it into nonsense. Thus in replying to Mr. Morton's attack upon our position on this subject, we made this statement: "The fact that Moses made two apartments in his likeness of the heavenly temple, is a demonstration that the latter has two apartments also." And again: "The priests here on earth, in both apartments, served unto the example of a like service in heaven." In his reply Mr. M. quotes these statements, and then makes answer as follows:—

Now, Jesus is the only priest in heaven, and he must perform this "like service." The earthly priests offered, every day, the morning and evening sacrifice, sprinkling the blood of fresh-slain victims in the outer sanctuary. So for more than eighteen hundred years, Jesus, according to Mr. M., must have offered his own fresh-shed blood in the outer apartment of the heavenly sanctuary twice every day; that is, more than thirteen hundred thousand times from his ascension to 1844. This is the logical result of Mr. Smith's "demonstration." The apostle says (Heb. 7:27): "This he did once for all, when he offered up himself." Thus the "demonstration" flatly contradicts the Scriptures.

It is more calculated to excite feelings of sadness than resentment to read such an argument as this; it seems so like trifling with sacred and momentous themes. What Christ did "once for all" was to give himself upon the cross, a sacrifice of such infinite merit as to be able to cancel the guilt of the whole world. Through this sacrifice every sinner must come to God. How it is made to avail for us, we may not say. On this point we have ever felt to adopt the language of the late Eld. Andrews. Speaking of the fact that Christ obtains from God the pardon of the sinner through his blood, he said, "Whether by its actual presentation or by virtue of its merits, we need not stop to inquire." So we say, and have ever said. What, then, can Mr. M. mean by asserting that our position leads to the conclusion that Christ must have offered "fresh-shed" blood, or have gone through again the scene of the crucifixion, twice a day for the past 1800 years? Christ shed his blood, and the merits of that sacrifice he pleads before the Father for the sinner. How often does he do this?—As often as a sinner comes to him. Does Mr. M. believe that Christ has pleaded his blood only once before the Father? The trouble with him, as with religious teachers generally, is that he confounds the sacrifice with the ministration, the offering of the victim with the atonement. Though Christ died once for all upon the cross, the virtue of that sacrifice is often called into requisition. It is applied in the case of every penitent sinner who comes to God through Jesus Christ. And this we sincerely trust was done oftener than "twice every day" from the ascension to 1844, or more than "thirteen hundred thousand times" during that time, and as often down to the present time. And when at last, not only thirteen hundred thousand, but "a great multitude which no man could number" (Rev. 7:9), stand before the throne, "clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands," it will be because to every one of these cases the precious blood of Christ has been applied to cleanse them from their sins.

Thus the "flat contradiction" which Mr. M. imagines to exist between our "demonstration" and the Scriptures, turns out to be only his misconception of the subject, and so far as we are concerned, vanishes into thin air. Other points we propose to notice hereafter.

Apr 24, 1888 US

WAS CHRIST A PRIEST ON EARTH?

ON this subject the apostle Paul, in Heb. 8:3-5, makes what seems to us a very explicit statement, as follows: "For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man [Christ] have somewhat also to offer. For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law: who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle; for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount."

The apostle is here speaking of Christ, who, as a priest after the order of Melchisedec, has superseded the Levitical priesthood of the former dispensation. He shows that the Levitical priesthood was a type of the priesthood of Christ; and that, consequently, as those priests were ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices, Christ must also offer gifts and sacrifices. He then proceeds to state where Christ was to perform his priestly work. It was not here on earth, but in heaven; for they served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. And he emphasizes this fact by saying expressly that if he (Christ) were on earth, he could not be a priest, because a class of priests had already been ordained here who were to do all the literal work of the priesthood that was to be accomplished on earth; therefore Christ could not be a priest here also, as there could not be two lines of priests operating at the same time. All Christ's priestly work is therefore performed in heaven, in connection with the sanctuary of which he is the minister. Heb. 8:1, 2.

Following out the logical sequence of these statements, B. D. Adventists come to the conclusion that the sanctuary is heaven, to be the counterpart of the sanctuary here on earth, must have its two apartments also; and that Christ's work, to be the counterpart of the work of the priests on earth, must be performed in both the apartments of the heavenly temple, as theirs was performed in both the apartments of the type, the Mosaic tabernacle.

Another step brings us to our present position; namely, the ministry in the first apartment precedes that in the second. So Christ must first minister in the holy place or outer apartment of the heavenly temple. The ministration in the second apartment, or most holy place, followed. It was comparatively a brief work, was the great and closing work of atonement, and completed the round of the sanctuary service. So in Christ's work as the great Mediator for the world, the time must come when he finishes his general work in the first apartment of the sanctuary on high, enters upon the special work of the holy of holies, which is to make the atonement, cleanse the sanctuary, and bring to a close his work as intercessor for lost men.

And the time when this momentous change in the ministry of Christ is reached, is marked by a prophetic period: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8:14. That period being computed, is found to end in 1844; and thus it is shown that we are in the time of the cleansing of the sanctuary, and that the close of probation, and the second coming of Christ must be at the door. The truth on these points is as simple as the a, b, c, and as impressive and beautiful as it is simple.

But all this badly upsets modern theology, and consequently meets with corresponding opposition. The church has lost sight of the heavenly sanctuary, and hence has but vague and confused ideas of the position and work of Christ on high. They will have it that Christ has but one apartment in which to minister since his ascension to the Father, and that is all heaven, and has but one kind of ministry to perform, with nothing to indicate when it is about to close. So to meet the views referred to above, they set up the claim that Christ performed here on the earth that part of his priestly work corresponding to the work of the Levitical priests in the first apartment of the sanctuary, and hence has only the antitype of the most holy to enter in heaven. Thus Mr. J. W. Morton, in his essay against our views of the sanctuary, says:—

The services performed by the priests in the court of the tabernacle, and in the first tabernacle itself, were all typical of the work of Christ on earth, and were completely fulfilled when he expired on the cross.

In our reply to this, we objected to the view here expressed, inasmuch as it represents Christ as performing a portion of his priestly work here upon the earth, contrary to the declaration of Paul in Heb. 8:4, that Christ could not be a priest on earth. In his rejoinder, Mr. M. still contends that Christ did act as a priest here on earth, and says:—

This is indeed a precious Bible truth. He died as a sin-offering. Mr. M. does not deny this. Now, who offered that offering? Was it a Levitical priest?—Certainly not. The apostle says: "He offered himself;" and he himself says (John 10:15, 18) "I lay down my life for the sheep." "No one taketh it away from me, but I lay it down of myself." If Caliph had offered him, that would have been a priestly act; was it any less so because he offered himself? I repeat what was said in the essay: "The last sin-offering that could be acceptable to God was slain on Calvary." If Christ had not presented that offering as a priest, his death would have been nothing but a common murder. If I may borrow Mr. Smith's language, I will add, that it is "the merest quibble" for him to quote Heb. 8:4, 5 as he has done. He utterly misapplies the apostle's argument in that passage. What the apostle meant was, that if the Mosaic economy had continued in force, Christ would have no priestly work to perform. In other words, that the Levitical priesthood ended where his began, at the cross.

With the inspired record before him, we will leave the reader to judge whether or not we have utterly misapplied the apostle's testimony. Why Mr. M. should present a statement utterly foreign to any idea which the apostle's language would convey, and then boldly declare that that is what he "meant," is more than we will attempt to account for.

In the foregoing extract we have another instance of the confounding of things distinct, which has brought so much confusion into the theological world. From some unexplainable cause, men seem utterly unable to distinguish between Christ as a sacrifice and Christ as a priest; between Christ dying as a victim, and Christ acting as a mediator. So Mr. M. says that Christ offered himself on the cross "as a priest." Reader, have you ever found, in looking over the whole field of types, an instance in which the victim was acting also as priest? or an instance in which the priest offered himself as the victim? That Christ fills the offices of both victim and priest, we well know. But he does not fill them both at the same time. While he is victim, he isn't priest; and while he is priest, he isn't victim. Attributing both offices to him at the same time, betrays that very confusion of ideas which is so much to be deplored in Biblical teaching. Christ is first a sacrifice, to shed the blood without which there is no remission; then being raised from the dead, he takes his place as priest to plead that blood in behalf of penitent sinners; and he "ever liveth" to make intercession for them.

But did not Christ "offer himself"?—Yes; so far as giving himself up to die as a sacrifice. And he would have given his life, even had none been found sufficiently pharisaic by sin to put him to death. But God suffered the Jews to fill up their cup of iniquity by nailing him to the cross; and so far as they were concerned, it was a murder. Stephen, in his scathing charge upon the Jews, said: "Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? and they have slain them which showed before of the coming of the Just One; of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers." Acts 7:52. And Peter said of Christ: "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain." Acts 2:23. And on another occasion the apostles testified: "The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins." Acts 5:30, 31. Mark that his work as a Saviour (priest) to grant repentance, is located after he is raised up to the right hand of God. Peter in the temple, re-iterated the same truth: "But ye denied the Holy One, and the Just, and desired a murderer to be granted unto you; and killed the Prince of life, whom God hath raised from the dead." Acts 3:14, 15. The prophet Isaiah said: "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." Isa. 53:6, 7.

Compare these declarations of Scripture, all representing Christ as having surrendered himself a helpless sufferer, a passive victim, in the hands of his enemies, with Mr. Morton's idea that he was at this time acting as a priest before God! He was only providing that divine and infinite sacrifice which afterward as priest he could plead before his Father in behalf of men.

Another point Mr. M. seems to have overlooked. According to the first four chapters of Leviticus the general law of sacrifice was for the penitent to slay the victim himself, and then the priest took the blood and performed his ministry therewith. So with Christ. The blood having been first provided in his death, he could then, after being raised up, make use of that sacrifice in his priestly work.

In Zech. 6:12, 13, there is a prophecy of Christ, and the relation he sustains to the Father while the plan of salvation is in process of fulfillment between them. The prophet declares that Christ, here called "the Branch," "shall sit and rule upon his throne;" that is, upon the throne of his Father; "and he shall be a priest upon his throne." He has no priesthood till he is raised up to the throne of his Father; no priesthood till he "is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens," and installed as "a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. 8:1, 2.

Yet, according to Mr. M.'s position, it took the Levitical priests the whole year, except a part of one day, to typify what Christ was to do in only one day as a priest here on earth, where Paul says he could not be a priest, and only a part of one day to typify what he has been doing in heaven for over 1800 years!

We will not follow his argument on this particular branch of the subject further. It grows more and more preposterous, the more we examine it. We do implore him to cast aside the mysticism of a "medieval theology," and accept the clearer light that is shining in this age of "advanced Biblical knowledge."

THE BLOOD OF CHRIST.

The question whether Christ, in his office of mediator before his Father in heaven, actually presents his blood in behalf of the sinner, or ministers simply by virtue of the great sacrifice he has made, without the real presence of blood, is one upon which no small amount of thought has been bestowed. As stated two weeks ago, we have always been content to leave it an open question, using in this respect the language of Eld. Andrews, "Whether by its actual presentation, or by virtue of its merits, we need not stop to inquire."

But a brother has taken so much interest in our remarks that he has sent us an article by Daniel Steele, D. D., published in the Advocate of Bible Holiness, December, 1882, in which the position is taken that Christ's blood was no more subject to decay than his body; that he took it with him to heaven, where it ever remains fresh and pure from corruption, to be pleaded as a living sacrifice in the presence of God. There is a certain force and impressiveness in Mr. Steele's reasoning, so much so that we think our readers will be interested to examine it. His position seems to be confirmed by the view John gives us of Christ in Rev. 5:6: "I beheld, . . . a Lamb as it had been slain;" that is, as if in the very act of being slain.

Two sentences in which Mr. S. betrays his adherence to the common error, that Christ on his ascension entered the holy of holies and made the atonement, we omit. But he rightly maintains the distinction presented in last week's Review, between Christ as a priest and Christ as a victim. He says: "He became the high priest as soon as he ceased to be the victim." This we can heartily indorse, but can never sanction the confusion which makes Christ both priest and victim at the same time. As to our views of the time when the atonement is made, we will speak in next week's paper. But to Mr. Steele's article, which reads:—

I am not a polemic, nor is the Advocate a medium for theological controversy. Yet I must solemnly protest against a statement in the November number which dishonors my adorable Saviour. I am pained, yea shocked, to read that the blood of Christ "dried and decayed on the ground." My objections are the following:—

1. It is derogatory to the dignity of the Son of God and plucks the crown of divinity from his head, to assert that one part of his humanity, and that a vital part, is permanently subject to death. If death retains the blood of Jesus, the vehicle of his earthly life, under the dominion of corruption forever, then the king of terrors is in an important sense Christ's eternal conqueror.

2. It is taking the first step in the path which ends in "counting the blood of the covenant . . . an unholy [common] thing;" i. e., like the blood of an ordinary man.

3. The Christian man who asserts that the blood of Jesus was decomposed like that of an animal, can give no better reason for his assertion than to say, "This is the law of nature." In saying that natural law had its course in disposing of the blood of Christ, the writer has put himself into a position where a skeptic can logically force him to make the same admission respecting the body of Christ. Thus one half of the fortress of supernaturalism is needlessly surrendered to the enemy, who will use his advantage to force the surrender of the other half.

4. If it is said that Christ's resurrection is proved by positive Scripture testimony, we say that the incorruptibility of his blood is established by just as strong testimony of Holy Writ; for Peter (Acts 2:27) asserts that the prediction of the psalmist, "Thou wilt not . . . suffer thine Holy One to see corruption," is fulfilled in Christ. This covers the blood, the very medium of life; if it does not, the Holy One saw corruption.

But still more plainly does Peter proclaim the undecaying nature of Christ's blood in his first epistle (ch. 1:18, 19): "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, . . . but with the precious blood of Christ." Alloys may dissolve silver and gold, but no chemical agent can decompose the precious blood of the Lamb of God. If Peter does not assert this, then he asserts nothing intelligible on this question.

In refuting this error, we are not under obligation to show what became of the blood of Christ, but for the information of the reader we will say that two theories have divided theologians and exegetes:—

1. That it was restored to his veins when he arose from the dead. This is a modern theory devised by the Romanists after they had begun to deny the cup to the laity. They were told that the touch of the priest changed the water into the veritable body of Christ, and that, since the blood was in the body, the laity received the blood in the water. There is not a shadow of a hint in the Scriptures on which to base this theory of the restoration of the blood. It is a pure invention of popery.

2. The view of eminent Christian writers, including some of the greatest names in church history, such as Chrysostom, Calvin, and Bengel, is that the blood always remains blood shed, ever fresh and pure from corruption, in the presence of God, having been carried into the heavenly sanctuary by Jesus, the great high priest, after his resurrection. Heb. 9:12: "By his own blood he entered in once into the holy places, having obtained eternal redemption for us." Since the whole office of a priest, especially of a high priest, was blood-sprinkling, it follows that Jesus, the great antitype, must (Heb. 8:3) have had blood to offer in the tabernacle not made with hands.

In John 20:17, we have an intimation that this high-priestly act was performed on the resurrection morning, immediately after appearing to Mary. He says to her, "Go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father." If this refers to the ascension after forty days, why did Jesus use the present tense? and why did he send such a message to his disciples whom he was to see and speak to nine times during that period? Mary could have delivered no other message than this: "Jesus is ascending to his Father." His great errand could have been none other than to carry his own blood into the holy of holies above, and to sprinkle it before his Father. He became the high priest as soon as he ceased to be the victim. This beautifully explains the difficult prohibition, "Touch me not." . . . Hence Jesus gives the reason for his prohibition, "For I am not yet ascended to my Father." Later in the day he permitted and commanded his disciples to touch his person. The conclusion is natural that, between the morning and the evening, Jesus ascended and performed the office of high priest, carrying his own blood with him. . . . Again, since this ascension of Jesus was his initial glorification, he was prepared to give to his disciples on the evening of the first day, a foretaste of that gift, the fullness of which he was to impart after his full glorification. Hence he breathed on them, and said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost,"—a real impartation of the Spirit, but in less measure than at the Pentecost.

I know that my readers may feel a shrinking back from the incongruity of material blood in heaven, a sphere of purely spiritual realities. But there is no greater incongruity in the presence of Christ's material blood in that sphere, than there is in the presence of the very body that was laid in Joseph's tomb. The advantages of this doctrine are:—

1. It makes the atonement a vivid, present reality, eternally fresh and efficacious, as if the blood of the divine victim were continually flowing before the eyes of all moral intelligences.

2. It explains the studied peculiarity of the Scripture phraseology. Our redemption is always through the blood shed, and not through the shedding of blood. As our redemption is eternal, the price remains eternally existent, just as if the Redeemer hangs on the cross daily, and daily dies for us. It is fitting that the price of our redemption should ever remain an objective reality, the immutable basis of faith.

3. It gives a beautiful symmetry and a wonderful significance to the Lord's supper, the bread being the shadow of a true substance, the really existent body; and the fruit of the vine the shadow of a true substance, the really existent blood of Christ, and not the shadow of a shadow, the non-existent blood of atonement.

4. It gives a powerful leverage to my faith, when I attempt to move God in prayer. Says Bengel, "He who will not straightway shrink from that which seems at first a paradox, will soon after taste its sweetness with the progress of faith." My experience has abundantly verified this remark of the great exegete in his extended note on Heb. 13: 24, where he shows that we have in Jesus a living mediator, and in his blood (a separately existing material substance), the ground of eternal salvation. Ye are come unto "Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling."

5. It affords an intelligent conception of the truth that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin. For the shed blood stands in the presence of God as the eternal basis for administering pardon to the penitent believer, and the eternal purchase price of the Holy Spirit, the regenerator and sanctifier. Thus Christ, through faith in his blood, immediately pardons, and mediately, through the Spirit, purifies from all sin, actual and original. This is what is signified by the application of the blood of sprinkling to the soul of the believer.

THE CHRONOLOGICAL POSITION OF THE ATONEMENT.

Christ's work as priest is not all a work of atonement. While his work in general is that of intercession, pardon, and reconciliation, there is a portion of it which is specifically called "a work of atonement." This is made certain by the services of the Levitical priesthood under the type. Let it ever be borne in mind that those priests "served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things" (Heb. 8:5); that is, unto the example and shadow of Christ's priesthood in heaven. But their work was not all a work of atonement. Their daily work was to receive the blood of those offerings which the people brought to be their propitiation, and perform therewith a ministry in the tabernacle, all of course with reference to a final work of atonement to be subsequently accomplished (Lev. 4:20); yet there was a particular time set apart in the year, and a specific work appointed, which were called, the "day of atonement," and the work of atonement. "And this shall be an everlasting statute unto you, to make an atonement for the children of Israel for all their sins once a year." Lev. 16:31. See verses 20-33, and chap. 28:27-32.

This is the picture we have to teach us in regard to the work of Christ. They served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. So we say that, according to this evidence, Christ must have a long general work to perform, and besides this, a comparatively short and specific ministry to accomplish, called, the making of the atonement. If this is not so, then less than one three hundred and sixty-fifth part of the work of the earthly priests was a shadow of Christ's work in heaven, and three hundred and sixty-four parts of it, out of three hundred and sixty-five, were a type and shadow of nothing. But Paul says that they "served [certainly more service than that indicated above] unto the example and shadow of heavenly things," or the work of Christ in heaven.

Now, in what portion of Christ's ministry is this work of atonement located? Does it occur at the commencement, in the middle, at the close, or where? We boldly aver that nearly all Christendom, losing sight of the great subject of the sanctuary, have gone astray on this point. Failing to distinguish between the slaying of the offering, and the making of the atonement, they have come generally to locate the latter at the time of the former, and assert that the atonement was made on the cross.

Mr. Morton, in his essay against us on the sanctuary question, falls into substantially the same error; for although he does not have the atonement made upon the cross, he does have Christ enter the most holy place immediately on his ascension to heaven, and then and there make the atonement, before taking his seat on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens. On this ground we objected to Mr. M.'s view, because it makes the atonement precede the other acts of Christ's priesthood. He accuses us of greatly misrepresenting him on this point. He says:—

What I said was: "In the natural order of things the atonement preceded the session of Christ on the mediatorial throne." Mr. S. ought to know that this is a very different statement from what he attributes to me. How did he come to make this misrepresentation? Was it a blunder? Or was it intentional? He surely knows that I hold that Christ's first priestly act, since his incarnation, was the offering of himself on the cross, and he must admit that this was prior to the atonement. And surely he will not say that his "sitting down on the mediatorial throne" was a priestly act. Will he undertake to give us a scholarly exegesis of Heb. 1:3 and 10:12, or of either of them, that will be consistent with his theory, that Christ's atonement was first made in 1844? Though I am no prophet, I venture to predict that he will not attempt to do so.

We positively disclaim any "intentional" misrepresentation in replying to Mr. M.; and we do not plead guilty to even a "blunder." We do not suppose that Mr. M. will deny that Christ is now, and has been ever since his ascension, our great High Priest above; that he has during all this time been doing a priestly work, pleading his blood in behalf of all who would come to him. But as he has the atonement made when Christ ascended to heaven, over 1800 years ago, he has the atonement precede all this priestly work, or stand at the beginning of this long ministry; whereas the Scriptures place the atonement as the close and not the beginning of his priesthood; and it was this service through all the Christian dispensation down to 1844 that we had in mind. So far as the real issue is concerned it matters not a particle whether we place the atonement on the cross, or forty-three days later, at the ascension. We showed in No. 17 that the crucifixion was not a part of Christ's work as priest; but suppose we grant with Mr. M. that it was, that Christ performed one priestly act before he made the atonement at his ascension, the whole objection, from our standpoint, still remains; for this atonement on this ground is followed by a long priestly service, which according to the type, and other scriptures is not possible.

To illustrate: Let us suppose a young man leaves Battle Creek for Ann Arbor, there to take a four years' course of study in the University of Michigan, and then graduate. Now, it would not matter one whit whether his friends should claim that he graduated when he took the cars at Battle Creek, or that he graduated when he reached Ann Arbor. We know that the one statement is equally false with the other; for his graduation is not to come till he has completed his course of study.

So with the ministry of Christ. The great work of atonement is the graduating service, if we may so express it, of his priesthood; that is, it is the closing part of it, and does not transpire till a long preceding work has been accomplished. On this point Mr. M., in his essay, objects, as follows:—

Now, if Jesus, the only true priest, did not enter the holy of holies till 1844, it follows that the church and the world were left without any atonement for more than eighteen centuries! Not one drop of his blood was, during all those ages, sprinkled upon, or before the mercy-seat! For it could be offered only in the inner tabernacle where God resides. This is the plain teaching of the Levitical law, and is in full harmony with New Testament teaching.

This objection is based on the idea that all Christ's work is the atonement. The church and the world don't need the atonement till the time for the atonement comes. But meanwhile they were not left without a sacrifice, without a priest, without the cleansing blood, and pardon of sin and reconciliation to God. During all the time previous to the antitypical work of atonement, the church and the world had just what Israel had through all the year previous to the day of atonement; that is, opportunity to come and confess their sins over their offerings, and through that blood and the ministrations of the priest have them borne into the sanctuary, and so receive pardon for them. So ever since Christ entered upon his priesthood, every true penitent has secured pardon through him, and had his sins transferred to the sanctuary of which Christ is minister.

In the type the daily service went on through the year, the sins accumulating all the while in the sanctuary. From these sins it must be cleansed. For this purpose the day of atonement with its special service was instituted. Then the high priest went into the most holy and sprinkled blood upon the mercy-seat, the only time he did so in all the year. By this means the sins were removed from the sanctuary, and the sanctuary was cleansed.

That sins are thus treated as entities and transferred from one object to another, first from the sinner to the offering, then from the offering to the sanctuary, and from the sanctuary to the scape-goat in whom they perish, is plainly stated in Lev. 16:21. For as the concluding service of the year's ministry and the atonement, the record states: "And when he hath made an end of reconciling [cleansing] the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat, and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness." Thus the sins of the entire nation which had accumulated during the year were disposed of, and we can easily trace them from inception to end. They first attached to the transgressors who committed them. Through the prescribed offerings they were transferred to the sanctuary, and by the services of the day of atonement they were removed from the sanctuary and placed upon the head of the scape-goat in whom they perished.

Each year's work, in the type, was complete in itself; and the same service was repeated year after year. Paul gives us the reason why the earthly ministration was divided up into such short periods. It was because those priests were not able to continue by reason of death (Heb. 7:23); and by making the length of a complete round of service one year, ordinarily the same priest would go through the entire service, and so the better typify Christ in the one round of service which he performs in the heavenly sanctuary. In Christ's ministry, the service does not need to be divided up into short periods, because he "ever liveth," and hence, however long the period may be, he, as the deathless priest, is able to perform it all.

Now, as each individual yearly round of service in the type, represented Christ's whole work as priest, who performs but one round of service, it follows that any distinct divisions of his work will occupy the same relative position in the period covered by his ministry, that the type of such division occupied in the aforesaid yearly typical service. And there were two such distinct parts: the common or daily service, and the atonement. And the atonement was the last and closing service; it completed the year; it finished the round of the representative ministry of those priests. Had it not been for the yearly repetition, after the atonement had been made no more sacrifices would have been offered; and when the atonement was made, and the sanctuary was cleansed, then the work immediately began again in the holy place, just as it had begun the year before.

So in Christ's ministry; his work of real atonement, answering to the typical atonement, must be the very closing portion of his work as priest. It comes at the end not at the beginning of his ministry. To locate it to any other place is to utterly ignore this beautiful structure of the type, and do violence to many scriptures. Yet Mr. Morton has the atonement made when Christ ascended, and a long priestly work of over 1800 years following it! We leave the reader to contemplate the incongruity and unscripturalness of such a position.

Though professing himself no prophet, Mr. M. ventures to predict that we will not attempt an exegesis of Heb. 1:3 and 10:12. We think it would have been better for him to stop with his disclaimer of being no prophet, rather than to venture forward as he has done, and prove himself a false one; for there is nothing in those texts to cause the least hesitation in the way of exposition. The first one says of Christ that he, "when he had himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high;" and the second reads: "But this man [Christ], after he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God." The last text explains the first. Christ gave himself up as a sacrifice for men; and in that sacrifice he made, or provided, expiation for our sins. (See Greek.) And this is the one only sacrifice which is available with God. And this alone has been pleaded, and will be pleaded till probation shall end. There is no force in Mr. M.'s reference to these texts from his stand-point, unless he would have us believe that Christ purged or atoned for our sins before he sat down on his Father's throne on high. Does he believe this? Does Christ atone for, purge, or put away sins before they are committed? Has he atoned for the sins of all men, so that all will be saved, and Universalism prove true? or has he atoned for only a few who consequently must be saved, and passed by all others who consequently cannot be saved? If so, here we have the doctrine of predestination in its most ghastly and hideous form. Has Christ atoned for any one's sins in a general way? Then he may plunge into every form of vice and crime, and still reach heaven; for atonement has been made for all those sins, and that has canceled them. But are the sins specified for which atonement has been made? Then it has been ordained just what sins one shall commit, and in committing them, he is no free moral agent, but acting under compulsion which he cannot resist, and hence is not responsible. But if a person's sins have not been atoned for, then no matter how hard he may agonize to enter heaven, the gates will be inexorably closed against him. Away with such a travesty of the divine government!

Heb. 1:3 simply means that Christ has made provision whereby sins can be purged, or put away; but whether they will be or not depends upon our own action in accepting or rejecting the provision. A parallel to this method of speech may be seen in Eze. 24:18: "I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged;" that is, I have endeavored, provided means, to purify thee, but thou didst not accept of them. Rom. 2:4: "The goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance;" that is, endeavors, or tends, to lead thee. Gal. 5:4: "Whoever of you are justified by the law;" that is, seek to be justified. Many like passages might be quoted.

So with Christ's blood; it has purged or expiated our sins in the sense of providing means whereby they may be expiated, if one will avail himself of it. It is the blood which has secured pardon through all the ages, and is employed in making the atonement at last. And as the atonement comes in as the closing service, it can be made, and will be made, only for those who have sought it on the prescribed conditions and so are entitled to it. Thus the error of Universalism is avoided on the one hand, and predestinationism on the other, and everything comes in, in its proper place. The session of Christ on the mediatorial throne, is his priesthood; and the "natural order" is, not for the atonement to precede it, as Mr. Morton says, but to follow it.

THE FINAL SEPARATION.

According to the parable recorded in Matt. 13:24-30, the wheat and tares grow together till the harvest. At the time of the harvest the reapers gather the tares into bundles to be burned. The wheat they gather into the garner.

In Christ's explanation of the parable (verses 36-43) he says that the good seed (the wheat) are the children of the kingdom, but the tares are the children of the wicked one; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. "As therefore," he continues, "the tares are gathered and burned in the fire; so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father."

From this we learn that the righteous and the wicked will be associated together till the end of the world. A separation will then take place between them; the righteous reaping the blessed reward of obedience, the wicked suffering the fearful consequences of rebellion against God.

In Matt. 25:31-46, we have a description of the closing scenes of this world's history, and the different destinies awaiting the righteous and the wicked, combining as perhaps no other portion of Scripture does, the sublime and pathetic, the glory of the advent of the King in his mighty power, and the utter helplessness of his enemies before him; an enumeration of humble and tender services performed by the righteous, and the appropriate reward they will receive, contrasted with the gross neglect of their Lord by the wicked, and the just punishment which will be visited upon them therefor.

The passage opens with this sublime description: "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats; and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Then follows a series of beautiful statements showing why they are thus honored and blessed. The wicked are at the same time told to depart, and the reasons are given why they are thus judged. The conclusion of the scene is stated in these words: "And these [the wicked] shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal."

The consecutive order of these events is an interesting object of study. To some it seems difficult to determine it; but we think the Scriptures afford abundant data for this purpose.

It is to be noticed, first, that the events called the "end of the world," the "day of the Lord," and the "day of judgment," are not events which take place instantly, or in a single day; but they cover a period which is of more than a thousand years' duration.

This we know because the events which are declared to occur, for instance, in the day of the Lord, are some of them located more than a thousand years apart. Thus both Joel and Zephaniah assign to the "day of the Lord" those judgments and calamities which come down upon the world just before the second coming of Christ and the first resurrection. But Peter (2 Pet. 3:10) includes also in the "day of the Lord," that time when ungodly men shall be judged and go into perdition, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. But this we know cannot be till after the wicked come up in the second resurrection, which is a thousand years subsequent to the first resurrection at the second advent of Christ. Rev. 20:5-7. But these are all included in "the day of the Lord;" which consequently covers all this time.

The day of judgment covers a period a little longer still; for it begins with the investigative judgment which must precede the second coming of Christ, and does not end till the sentence against the wicked is executed upon them at the end of the thousand years. Ps. 149:9; 2 Pet. 3:7; Rev. 20:9.

The seventh trumpet covers the same time; for it commences at the close of the prophetic periods (Rev. 10:6, 7) when the temple of God is opened in heaven, that is, when the investigative judgment commences in the most holy place of the sanctuary on high, where the ark is (Rev. 11:15, 19), and does not cease till the saints are fully rewarded, and those who destroy, or corrupt, the earth are themselves destroyed (verse 18); which brings us again to the destruction of the wicked at the end of the thousand years.

So the "end of the world," taken in its complete and extended sense, must cover all the changes through which this earth passes from the close of human probation to the time when the new heavens and new earth shall take the place of the old. Not till then has it fully ended, though so far as the generality of the people, the unconverted, are concerned, it ends when their worldly pursuits, and hopes, and schemes, and life itself, end with their destruction at the second coming of Christ.

Bearing in mind the facts just stated will help us to understand some of the parables and condensed discourses of our Lord touching these great themes. For it would be nothing strange or inconsistent, if, when speaking of events in the same series, he should pass by a sudden and unannounced transition, from events at the beginning to events at the close; if, for instance, after mentioning events at the opening of that period called "the day of the Lord," he should suddenly pass to events with which that day will close.

Let us briefly glance at some of the events to transpire, according to the plain evidence of many scriptures, and see if, on this rule, other scriptures, which at first sight may seem at variance therewith, or difficult of location, do not in reality agree perfectly with them.

1. At the end of the prophetic periods, the grand antitypical work of atonement commences in heaven, the last priestly work of Christ to be accomplished before his second advent.

2. When this work is completed, probation ends; for there is no more sacrifice for sins. Rev. 15:5-8. But between the close of probation, and the appearing of Christ in the clouds of heaven, the seven last plagues intervene. Revelation 16. These plagues cannot begin to fall till the ministry of Christ as priest is finished; for up to that time there is mercy for the world; but there is no mercy when the plagues begin; for in them is filled up the wrath of God; and that is the wrath threatened by the third angel (Rev. 14:10), which is poured out without mixture, that is, unmixed with any mercy. Rev. 22:11, 12, also shows that probation ends, and the cases of all are decided before Christ appears. Up to the beginning of the plagues the righteous and the wicked are more or less individually associated together in the social and commercial pursuits of life. Luke 17:34-36. But the testimony contained in this reference to Luke, speaks of the commencement of a separation between the two classes. Of two men in one bed, one is taken, the other left; or, as it should be translated, "one is seized, the other escapes;" so of two women grinding at the mill, one is seized, the other escapes; and of two men in the field, one is seized, the other escapes. Who escapes? and from what does he escape? It must be some calamities or judgments that are referred to; and from all such we know that the righteous are the ones who escape, while the wicked are taken or seized by them. We know also from the context, that this scripture (Luke 17:34-36) applies just before the coming of Christ, when the seven last plagues, being due, will be falling upon the world. We therefore conclude that the reference is to this scene; that the seven last plagues (compared to eagles, verse 37) come down upon the wicked (compared to a body or carcass, etc.; Matt. 24:28), while the righteous escape, the promise to them being that no plague shall come nigh them. Ps. 91:4-7. This difference in circumstances, coupled with the fact that, probation being then ended, the righteous can no longer do the wicked any good, naturally throws the two companies apart, and begins the separation between them.

3. Christ soon appears, and then all the righteous ones living upon the earth are changed in a moment, and caught up to meet the Lord, while all the living wicked are left here upon the earth to perish by the, to them, terrible manifestations of the great day. This brings a more complete and wide-spread separation between the righteous and the wicked. And this extends even to the dead; for all the righteous dead are then raised and caught up also to meet the Lord, while all the wicked dead are left to the dominion of death, still in their cases unbroken. Thus the whole human family, living and dead, are divided into two great classes according to character—the living righteous changed to immortality, join their companions raised in incorruption from the grave, and together ascend to be forever with the Lord; while the living wicked join their companions in death, to slumber in dishonored and hopeless graves a thousand years, till the sentence can be written which is to be at that time executed upon them. This separation between the two classes is complete and final; for they are never again to be associated together in any capacity, and only come together again at the end of the thousand years, the one class as criminals, the other to assist in executing upon them the sentence written. Ps. 149:5-9. During the thousand years, how sharp the contrast between the two parties: the righteous, all the righteous, in the mansions of the Father's house (John 14:2, 3) above, every fiber of their being pulsating with the bliss of immortal life, praising God in plenitude of joy, and reigning on thrones of judgment with Christ their king (Rev. 20:4); while all the wicked are slumbering in the bowels of an exploded world (Jer. 4:23-27), the Devil and his angels meanwhile tearing up and down in impotent rage over their sepulchers, this charnel-house of sin.

4. At the end of the thousand years, the judgment to be executed upon the wicked having been determined, they are raised from their graves to meet the account of their own personal sins, for which up to that time they had suffered nothing, to stand condemned in face of the open book of their deeds, in face of the multitude of the saved, and the open book of life containing the names of these holy ones, and to receive the punishment due to their deeds. Fire comes down from God out of heaven and devours them. Here Rev. 20:7-15 applies. With them the "second death," here inflicted, "ends all;" and the fires of their perdition become so potent in their cleansing power, that all the works on earth are burned up, the elements themselves melt with fervent heat (2 Pet. 3:10), the earth itself is dispelled into invisible gas, and thus appears to "flee away" (Rev. 20:11) from before the great white throne, and every stain and defilement of sin, and scar of the curse is forever purged away. Then the elements come together again, to form the new heavens and new earth for the everlasting possession of the saints. Here the wicked receive the full desert of their deeds which is to last through eternity; and here also the righteous receive the full measure of their reward, to go forward on this plane through endless ages.

By the side of these facts let us now place two representative scriptures, and mark the application:—

1. The parable of Matthew 13. The growing together of wheat and tares, righteous and wicked, is during the time of human probation. The harvest is the end of the world. The righteous are gathered as wheat into the garner at the second advent. The tares, that portion of them representing the living wicked at the second advent, are then burned up. 3 Thess. 1:8; Rev. 14:10. This earth is the territory of the future kingdom. Dan. 7:27; Matt. 5:5. But from this kingdom "all things that offend, and them which do iniquity" must be gathered out, which cannot be till sin and sinners are destroyed forever at the end of the thousand years. Then "the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." Matt. 13:41-43. Thus the parable in its entirety seems to include events at both the beginning and the end of the thousand years, the burning of the tares in the parable (verse 30) referring to the destruction of the living wicked at the second advent, while the "furnace of fire" in the explanation (verse 42) refers to the greater scene of the same kind, the destruction of all the wicked in the lake of fire, at the end of the thousand years.

2. Matt. 25:31-46. The coming of the Son of man in his glory (verse 31) undoubtedly refers to the second advent of Christ. The "all nations" gathered before him, should probably be limited to the nations living on the earth at that time. Among these are a few righteous ones, who are separated from the others by a change to immortality and ascension to the Lord. Some prefer to consider the "all nations" as embracing the dead as well as the living. It is true that a separation between the righteous dead and the wicked dead, here takes place, and there is no objection (if it may be called an objection) to including them in the "all nations," only that we should be obliged, in that case, to take the expression "gathered before him" in an accommodated sense; for the wicked dead are not raised till long afterward. This point, however, is not pertinent to our present discussion, and we pass it.

Verses 41-46 bring to view the judgment of the wicked for their personal sins, and their sentence to final punishment. But the wicked, either living or dead, are not judged and sentenced at the second advent. But they will be judged and sentence executed upon them at the end of the thousand years, and then only. Hence Christ somewhere in his discourse makes a transition from the beginning to the end of the thousand years. There is nothing incongruous in this, according to the rule above suggested, since he is speaking of events of the same class, which cover all this time. Where is this transition?—Naturally between verses 33 and 34; for the narrative from verse 34 to verse 40 is of the same nature as that from verse 40 to the end of the chapter, and evidently belongs with it. But there is no place for any such judicial proceeding with either the righteous or the wicked, at the second advent. Hence, we would apply verses 31, 32, and 33, of Matthew 25, at the beginning of the thousand years, and the remainder of the chapter at the end of the thousand years, where Rev. 20:7-15 applies.

It has been supposed by some that the volume, "Man's Nature and Destiny," p. 308, applies Rev. 20:12 and Matt. 25:31-46 to one and the same time and event. It was not the intent of that work so to teach; for the author held the same view then that he now holds, as presented above. The argument there set forth is simply to show that the popular view that men are judged one by one as they die, is not true, because God has set apart a definite period for all cases to be taken up and acted upon, and all wait to that time. Matt. 25:31-33 and Rev. 20:12 are both referred to, because they are both parts of the same period of judgment, but not the same part. The judgment is there spoken of as a whole, with no attempt to locate its different divisions. When this part of the subject is made the theme of examination, and the events considered above are all duly located, it is seen that Matt. 25:31-33 and Rev. 20:12 apply respectively to scenes which, though similar in nature, are widely apart in point of time.

RH May 22, 1888

U.S.

THE INVESTIGATIVE JUDGMENT.

It has been shown in S. D. Adventist literature, in books, pamphlets, tracts, and frequent newspaper articles, that before Christ appears in the clouds of heaven at his second advent, so much of the judgment appointed for the world (Acts 17:31) must have transpired as is necessary to determine the character of all men, and separate them into two great classes,—the righteous and the wicked.

Such a position is no far-fetched, fanciful conception, but one that is absolutely necessary under the circumstances; for when Christ appears, certain events take place instantaneously which are the result of a work of judgment; but for this work of judgment on which these events depend, no time is given at the moment of Christ's appearing. Thus, certain ones among those who live to see Christ come, are in an instant changed from mortal to immortal, from corruptible to incorruptible, at that time. "Behold," says the apostle, "I show you a mystery: We shall not all sleep [die before the coming of Christ], but we shall all [all of the church who do not die] be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead [in Christ] shall be raised incorruptible, and we [the living] shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." 1 Cor. 15:51-53.

The same apostle states to the Thessalonians the same great truth, in these words: "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trumpet of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be [changed and] caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. 4:16, 17.

Now, we cannot conceive of such changes as these passing upon men—a resurrection to life and incorruption on the part of a portion of the dead, and a change to immortality on the part of some of the living, and the ascent of all these to meet the Lord in the air—before they are judged! Such an idea would not be worthy of a moment's credence; for it is the very object of the judgment to decide just such questions as these in relation to mankind.

But there is nowhere brought to view a work of judgment in reference to these classes after Christ appears, and before they are caught up to meet him; nor is there any time for such a work. Does the judgment sit in mid-heaven, and is there an examination of cases there held to determine what ones the Lord has come to save? to ascertain what ones ought to be raised from the dead, and who among the living are entitled to a change? Absolutely nothing of this kind. But the loud blast of the trumpet of God announces the appearance of the Lord, coming in power and glory in the clouds of heaven; and at the sound of that trumpet, in the twinkling of an eye, the righteous living are changed, and the righteous dead are raised, and the wicked are given over to destruction. Mark, we do not say that the wicked are as instantaneously destroyed, but they are given over to destruction; that is, they are openly abandoned to their fate. The taking of all the righteous to heaven, is at once an open announcement of the status of all who are left. Their fate is declared. They are doomed to destruction; which in due time comes upon them. We refer in these statements to the living wicked, and the loss of their natural life, in connection with the second coming of Christ. But if any wish to claim the statements as referring to the wicked dead also, they will be equally true even then; for the bringing up from the grave of all the righteous, declares just as plainly the status of all who are left in the grave; they are the wicked; and they are given over to destruction, which will come upon them when all the wicked are destroyed together, at the end of the thousand years, in the second death.

Therefore we most positively and confidently aver that the only position which will stand the test of either fact or reason, is, that so much of the judgment as is necessary to determine the character of all men, and decide to which class they belong, the accepted or rejected, must take place before Christ comes. And to this extent the sentence rendered can be carried out when the Saviour appears, in taking all the accepted ones unto himself, and leaving the others to be disposed of in a proper manner at a subsequent time.

But it may be asked, "Where is the need of any previous investigation? does not God know all men? does he not know his people? and can he not give them immortality at once through the exercise of his own omniscience?" We reverently admit that he could do this; but his word informs us that he has not chosen to do so. If God by an act of his own omniscience decides all cases and visits rewards or punishments upon each "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," where is that process called "the judgment," which is so clearly revealed in the Bible? We appear before the judgment-seat of Christ to "receive [sentence for] the things done in the body" (2 Cor. 5:10); and it is expressly declared that when men are judged, they are judged (that is, decision is made and sentence is rendered) according to a record of their deeds kept in books which may be called the books of judgment. Rev. 20:12. In the very opening scene of the judgment (Dan. 7:10) it is said, "And the books were opened;" and in the closing scene (Rev. 20:12) it also reads, "And the books were opened." Therefore what is experienced by the righteous and wicked at the coming of Christ does not proceed from the workings of God's omniscience at the moment exercised, but is the result of decisions previously arrived at in their cases.

It may be asked further, "Do not the Scriptures declare that Christ will judge the living and the dead at his appearing: 'Who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom' (2 Tim. 4:1)?"—Very true; but what kind of judgment does he then render?—He carries out a sentence previously decided upon, and gives immortality to his people. He declares when he appears, "And my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Rev. 22:12. A "reward" must follow investigation and decision previously made. It should be remembered that the words "judge" and "judgment" are used with reference both to the judicial and executive divisions of the judgment separately considered. It is first decided who are to be saved; then that sentence is carried out at the second coming of Christ, by the bestowment upon all such, of immortality. Then the cases of the wicked are examined with a view to determining the degree of their punishment; and this sentence is carried out in the second death. First, the investigation before Christ comes, is called "the judgment" (Dan. 7:10); secondly, the execution of the sentence, thus far, at the second advent, is called a work of judgment (2 Tim. 4:1); thirdly, the examination of the cases of the wicked during the thousand years, is called "judgment" (Rev. 20:4): "Judgment was given unto them: . . . and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years" (see also 1 Cor. 6:2, which unquestionably applies during this time); and, fourthly, the execution upon the wicked at the end of the thousand years, of the judgment written (Ps. 149:9), is called "judgment," 2 Pet. 2:9: "Day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." Thus the day of judgment covers all this time, and the work of judgment embraces all these divisions. And there is order and consistency in the arrangement: First, the cases of the righteous are examined (judgment begins at the house of God. 1 Pet. 4:17), and sentence is executed. Then the cases of the wicked are examined, and sentence is executed.

Having thus ascertained that a portion of the judgment must precede the coming of Christ, which, to distinguish it from other divisions of the work, may properly be called "the investigative judgment," the inquiry next arises, What is the nature of this work, and how is it carried out? The answer is obvious. It must involve an examination of books of record, and making decisions according to the deeds written therein. On this point we refer to Rev. 20:12; but we find that the reference is by some entirely misapprehended. It is taken to mean that we apply Rev. 20:12 to the investigative judgment of Dan. 7:10; which is not the case. Never have we so applied it. The reference to that text in this connection was, and is, simply to show that books are used in the judgment, and what use is made of those books; and we take this text as determining the matter in all cases where books are mentioned or alluded to in the judgment work; for we apprehend that the method of showing forth the innocence or guilt of all parties is the same throughout the entire work. One rule is not adopted for one class and another for another. Now Dan. 7:10 speaks of books being opened, but does not state for what purpose they are used. This refers to the opening of the judgment, and Rev. 20:12 to the close; but we refer to this latter text in reference to the books, to show that the books in the judgment scene of Daniel 7, must be used for the same purpose; that is, to examine the deeds written therein, and render judgment accordingly.

The closing work in the sanctuary involves this very procedure. It is for the purpose of making the atonement, and cleansing the sanctuary, by putting away sin. But when sins are put away, how is it done?—They are blotted out; for so Peter testifies: "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you; whom the heavens must receive [or retain] until the times of restitution of all things." Acts 3:19-21.

Here, just before Christ comes, Peter declares that the sins of those who have repented will be blotted out. Blotted out from what?—From those books wherein human deeds are written before God. Thus we are brought back again, by unavoidable steps, to the "books" brought to view in Dan. 7:10. No place is found for this work except in the view of the sanctuary, which we have not a shadow of doubt is the correct one, held by S. D. Adventists; and here it comes in necessarily, harmoniously, beautifully.

But the objector stands ready with his protest at this point. He asks, "What was there in the earthly sanctuary corresponding to the 'investigative judgment' in the heavenly? Did the earthly high priest investigate the characters of the Israelites? But if there was no 'investigation' in the earthly sanctuary, there can be none in the heavenly; for the rule says that 'the type must correspond to the antitype.'"

To the candid, thoughtful mind, this must sound much like a mere cavil. Who would naturally imagine that earthly scenes must equal heavenly, or that man can read the character of his fellows as accurately as it is recorded by the divine penman on the books above? Paul says the law had a shadow but not the very image, of good things to come. Heb. 10:1. And we would like to have the objector tell us what better illustration could have been given here among men, of the real atonement and blotting out of sin, the "investigative judgment," than was furnished in the earthly sanctuary on the day of atonement? It was the great day of solemnity for all Israel. They were to afflict their souls, and every one who did not do this was to be cut off from among the people. It was a day of judgment for them. The work could be only a shadow, and the offerings were necessarily imperfect; but sin was dealt with as fully and effectually as mortals had power to deal with it, and was in the only manner and to the fullest extent available to them, put away. In Christ's work, the real atonement which he makes, pertains to individuals, not to a nation as a whole; it puts away sin, not merely in shadow, but in fact; and Peter declares that this is blotting it out; and this involves an examination of the records of men's deeds, from which all judgment proceeds; and this decision of cases is a part of the judgment; and this part precedes the coming of Christ. There is no evading of this conclusion. However capriciously disposed a person may be, it seems to us that there is no room here for either doubt or quibble.

But there is nothing which seems to stir the indignation of Mr. Morton, whose positions we have of late been examining, like this view. In his rejoinder to our first reply, he says:—

Thus, this doctrine of the "investigative judgment," as taught by the "remnant church," which, at best, rests upon an uncertain and improbable interpretation of Dan. 7: 9, 10, gives the lie to Jesus, to John, to Paul, and to Peter. Is it any wonder that evangelical Christians should hold it in abomination? It is not only unscriptural, it is equally unphilosophical and unworthy of the well-known character of God. The thought that a God of infinite justice and fair dealing would, by a sort of "star-chamber" process, judge and sentence to utter destruction, millions of his own creatures, without a hearing, is the very epitome of absurdity. It is little short of blasphemy. I know of no more truth-denying, God dishonoring doctrine in the whole range of modern theology. This is my deliberate testimony.

He prefaces this fearful thunderbolt by transcribing Matt. 25: 31-41; 13: 36; Rev. 20: 12; Rom. 14: 10-12; 2 Cor. 5: 10; and 1 Pet. 1: 4, 5; which he would represent as all applying to the same time. We explained our position last week in reference to Matt. 25: 31-41, and Rev. 20: 12; and the other references are wholly indefinite as regards the matter of time. Mr. M. is still confused with the old "medieval" idea of the judgment, which ignores all order and regularity in the work, but has the whole human family come up in one indiscriminate, conglomerate mass, and one by one receive their examination and sentence. How much time would this occupy? Take, for example, the lowest computation of the present generation, 1,400,000,000, and give to the judgment of each person one minute, which would certainly be short enough time, would it not? and how long would it take to judge just this one generation? Reducing the number to hours, days, and years, omitting fractions, we have, 23,333,333 hours, 972,222 days, 3,668 years. That is, it would take over two and one half thousand years to go through the present generation, according to Mr. M.'s "orthodox" view, and gather out those who are to be made immortal at Christ's coming, and which Paul declares is accomplished "in the twinkling of an eye," at the sound of the trumpet. Twinkling of an eye, forsooth! If it takes Mr. M. as long as that to twinkle his eye, he is a slower man than we had supposed.

But the most singular part of his criticism is that he accuses God of pursuing a sort of "star-chamber" process unless he gives all the wicked "a hearing" at the judgment. A hearing, indeed! What kind of a hearing does he suppose the wicked are entitled to, or will be accorded to them? Will they be permitted to come up and deny the crimes recorded against them, or charge the heavenly records with partial or exaggerated statements, or urge palliating circumstances in extenuation of their evil deeds? What other evidence could come in to influence the findings of the court, when they have before them the complete life record of the culprit, with every thought, motive, purpose, and secret thing—the whole character photographed upon the page of destiny exactly as it is? Can a person have any further "hearing" than this? Cannot the court make up a just sentence from all this, and justly bring the doomed man up afterward to hear that sentence? The question answers itself.

The sins of the righteous are blotted out before

Christ comes bringing with him the reward of immortality for them, or both Peter and Paul have testified incorrectly, and there is no lesson to be learned from type and antitype. And the wicked have their sentence prepared in the judgment of the thousand years, for so John states, in Rev. 20: 4. But this does not preclude the idea of their personal presence before the tribunal at the proper time and place. All men will indeed personally appear before God in the judgment. At the end of the thousand years, for the first and last and only time, the whole human family are together before the throne: the righteous in the city, the wicked outside. Luke 18: 28; Rev. 20: 9. There sentence is pronounced upon the wicked, and executed; and in that sentence they "give account" of their idle words, and "answer" for all their abominable deeds. Then the King pronounces the great blessing upon the righteous, and invites them to take possession of the renewed and purified earth, the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world, which they are to possess forever and ever.

With a rational, consistent view of this subject, the testimony of the whole Bible comes together in the completest harmony.

HISTORY AND PROPHECY.

History Supplies Conditions on which a Prophecy is Based. Shall We Believe?

THE 2300 days of Dan. 8:14 ended in 1844. The profoundest opponents of the Adventists at that time, admitted that the argument on chronology was invulnerable. The prophecy said that then the sanctuary should be cleansed. Two Bible facts show us what this is: 1. The Bible reveals the fact that the cleansing of the sanctuary covers a period of time, and consists of the work of the High-priest in the second, or most holy, apartment of the sanctuary, during which he makes the atonement and finishes a complete round of the sanctuary service (Leviticus 16); 2. The Bible reveals another fact, which is, that the sanctuary of this dispensation (1813 years of which had passed when the 2300 days ended in 1844) is in heaven, where Christ, our High-priest, ministers for us. Hebrews 8. We therefore believe that at that time the last work in the heavenly temple began (because the prophecy said it was thus to be), that Christ entered the second apartment of the true sanctuary on high, to perform his brief work of making the antitypical atonement and cleansing the antitypical sanctuary, and thus close up forever his mediatorial work for man.

Here, then, is a tremendous truth, the first part resting on tangible, undeniable, historical evidence within our own hands; the second resting on the plain declaration of God's word, which we therefore believe. Now, John describes the beginning of this work in the second apartment of the sanctuary in heaven, when, beholding events to take place under the sounding of the seventh trumpet, near the close of the gospel age, he says: "And the temple of God was opened in heaven." Rev. 11:19. We know he is speaking of the sanctuary; for he immediately adds, "And there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament;" and we know that the ark is found only in the most holy place of the sanctuary.

John's declaration that the ark was seen there, is significant. Seen by whom?—By men on earth, most certainly, for whose benefit this revelation was given. And how can men show that they see it?—Only by doing some special work which that sight leads them to perform. This brings us again within the sphere of human action, and we inquire if there is any evidence of this kind now apparent to show that the temple has been opened in heaven, and that men are beholding by faith therein the ark of God's testament?

The answer is plain: Most assuredly there is; it is the third angel's message now going to the world, proclaiming the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus; relating both to the law contained in the ark, and the ministry which our great High-priest is there performing before that ark. This message covers the very time occupied by Christ in his closing ministry in the most holy place of the tabernacle on high, and is based upon that very work. It is because the temple has been opened, and the ark is seen there, that this message is going forth here. And all the facts in the progress of this message now patent to the world, are so much evidence, and evidence of no mean strength, that we have reached the time when the ark of God is seen in the temple above, and Rev. 11:19 is fulfilled.

Can men or devils annihilate these great facts that the days have ended, that the temple is opened, and that the ark is seen?—Certainly not. And can they stop the movement going forward on the earth, based on these great facts?—By no means; for Christ says to his people in the last days, "I have set before thee an open door [the open door of the sanctuary], and no man can shut it." Rev. 3:8. The facts cannot be ignored; the light cannot be obscured; the truth cannot be repressed; the movement cannot be stopped. And here is a movement which has already risen to no small proportions, which can be accounted for on no other ground than that we are now witnessing the fulfillments of prophecy here indicated. Multitudes of thoughtful minds are beginning to be attracted by this manifest fulfillment, and they are seriously inquiring if these things are so. Thus the message is becoming strong by presenting such proportions and such manifest evidence of the truthfulness of its claims, as to challenge attention and examination.

THE VAIL OF HEBREWS 6.

"Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail; whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high-priest forever after the order of Melchisedec."

[A correspondent asks what vail is referred to in the foregoing scripture. Answer: A vail of the heavenly sanctuary, which sanctuary, according to Paul in this Epistle to the Hebrews, has two vails, a first and a second. Heb. 9:3. In the typical sanctuary, as described in Exodus 25 and onward to the end of the book, we find the same two vails. The first constituted the door of the holy place, or first apartment of the sanctuary; the second divided between the holy and the most holy, or second apartment, of the sanctuary, constituting the door from the holy place into that apartment.

To distinguish between these two vails, Moses calls the first "an hanging" for the door, etc., as in Ex. 26:36, 37; 35:15; 36:37; 39:38, etc. And the second he calls "the vail," as in Ex. 28:31, 33, 35; 27:21; 30:6; 36:35, etc. But they were both vails, and both doors; for they were made of exactly the same material, as the references show, were hung in the same manner, on the same kind of pillars, and served the same purpose; one being the door into the holy place, the other the door into the most holy.

Paul, in the book of Hebrews, does not distinguish between these vails by calling one a "hanging" and the other a "vail," but regards them both as vails, and distinguishes the inner one by calling it "the second vail," showing that he regarded the other as the first vail, and that when he uses the term "vail" without that specifying adjective "the second," he must mean the first; else his writing would be illogical and hopelessly confused.

In the sanctuary every priest who ministered in the holy place went within the first vail. Christ when he ascended and commenced his work in the sanctuary above, began his ministration in the first apartment, or holy place. This he must have done to be true to the type. To that time Heb. 6:19, 20 evidently refers, and the vail there spoken of must, consequently, be the first vail. Christ did not enter through the second vail into the most holy place, till the end of the 2300 days in 1844, when he went in to commence the work of cleansing the sanctuary. Heb. 6:19, 20 cannot be confined to this work, but must be true through the whole period of his ministry in the sanctuary above.]

To our correspondent's second query—whether we know anything more of Melchisedec than is stated in the Bible, the answer is, We do not. We have the historical record in Gen. 14:18-24; the prophecy concerning Christ in Ps. 110:4; and the fulfillment recorded in Hebrews by Paul. Melchisedec was some man of whom just enough was known to make him a fit type of Christ in his kingly priesthood.

QUERIES ON THE SANCTUARY.

The following queries have been presented by Bro. S. S. Smith and J. S. Lee, with a desire that they be answered through the Review:—

"1. If Christ did not enter upon his mediation until his ascension (see 'Sanctuary,' chap. 20, par. 5, 3d clause), who was mediator for the Aaronic priest when he made a sacrifice for himself? Could he be his own mediator?"

Answer.—This query seems to overlook the distinction between the mediators of Christ as a whole, and that specific part of it which consists of his work as priest in the sanctuary on high. We understand that he has been the mediator between God and men ever since the plan of salvation was adopted. Sacrifices were then instituted by which men were to show their faith in the promised Redeemer. Through these sacrifices, properly offered, the people of all preceding dispensations secured forgiveness of sins, the same as we now secure it by complying with the ordinances of the gospel. For they were acts of faith, and connected them with Christ through whom alone all actual forgiveness of sin, from first to last, is secured. As soon as men under the plan of salvation and the mediators of Christ, were put upon a new probation, the books of record were opened, upon whose pages were to be entered all their deeds as they should occur from day to day,—their sins and repentance, their faith and unbelief, their sacrifices and all their efforts to worship God, in the hope and belief of a coming Saviour. And in those records the whole measure of their repentance and faith is preserved, to be acted upon when those records are examined in the closing investigative judgment of the sanctuary above. And the plan once having been formed, the mediator provided, the way to manifest faith in him pointed out, and the books opened for the record of all their deeds, it was not necessary that Christ should all the while be engaged in the performance of the actual duties of a priest. But he was all the while, nevertheless, the mediator, a part of whose work would be finally to finish that office by performing the specific duties of a priest. So the Jewish high-priest had the same mediator through whom to present his offering, that Abel had for his.

"2. If there was no service in the sanctuary in heaven until Christ's ascension, what purpose did it serve?"

Ans.—It was the temple and palace of Jehovah. It is called the "Lord's holy temple." Ps. 11:4: "The Lord is in his holy temple; the Lord's throne is in heaven." Jeremiah says: "A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary." Jer. 17:12. It thus appears that when the plan of salvation was laid the temple and throne of God was taken to be the place where all the work connected with the carrying out of that plan should center. And as the temple and throne of Jehovah, it served just as good a purpose before Christ's first advent as it did after he, subsequently to his incarnation, was raised up to sit with the Father upon his throne, and be a priest before him upon his throne. Zech. 6:13.

"3. If there was no service in the heavenly sanctuary before Christ's ascension, how do you explain Heb. 8:4, 5? Could the work precede the example, or the shadow the substance?"

Ans.—This is explained on the principle laid down in Rom. 4:17, that God "callesth those things which be not as though they were." The purpose was definitely formed and was sure to be accomplished. Christ is represented as a lamb "slain from the foundation of the world." Rev. 13:8. He was not actually slain for over four thousand years after that; but it was in the purpose of God, and therefore was sure to be. The death of Christ, long before it was literally accomplished, cast its shadow back into the former dispensation, as seen in the death of the passover lamb and other sacrifices, because it was at the proper time to be accomplished. So the Jewish priests ministered, after the "example and shadow" of the priesthood of Christ, though he was not then performing his work as priest, because in God's purpose that work was a fixed fact, and was sure to be.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

THAT the Lord is to reveal himself personally to the inhabitants of this world, the Scriptures plainly declare. That this coming is to be in the clouds of heaven, attended with divine pomp and splendor, with inconceivable power and glory, they just as clearly state.

But that there are many passages seemingly referring to this subject, which cannot all apply to the same event, is very evident. From a misapplication of some of these, a very erroneous view has sprung up, and is misleading the minds of many. There are a number of texts which speak of a coming which is not at the time expected, which takes place suddenly, which comes as a thief, unawares, and is liable to find some of the Church asleep and unprepared. (See Matt. 25:42, 44; Mark 13:35, 36, &c.)

From these passages, some, for what reason we know not, unless it is to make out that more has been fulfilled than has been, set up the claim that the second coming of Christ will be like a thief, stealing in upon the world unawares, secret, silent, unobserved, and unknown. This gives them opportunity to set up any view concerning it, which they please, even to the assertion that that coming has already taken place; and so we find them teaching that the prophecy of the second advent has been fulfilled, and Christ is now here doing his work among men silently and unperceived. Thus we have in our day a class analogous to those with whom Paul had to contend, who, in his day, rose up and claimed that the resurrection was past already, and overthrew the faith of some. 2 Tim. 2:18.

But as soon as they take this position that Christ comes in a silent, secret manner, they are confronted with another large class of scriptures which most emphatically assert that the Lord will come openly in the clouds of heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, in flaming fire, in the glory of the Father with all the holy angels, when every eye shall see him, and all the wicked shall wail because of him, and the earth and sea shall give up the dead in them, and the greatest and mightiest men of this world shall utter their despairing wail to the rocks and mountains to fall on them, and hide them from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne. (See Matt. 24:27, 30, 31; 25:31; Mark 13:26, 27; Luke 21:27; Acts 1:9-11; 1 Thess. 4:16, 17; 2 Thess. 1:7, 8; 2:8; Rev. 1:7; 6:15, 16.)

And what do they do with this larger and more explicit class of texts? — These, marvelous to relate, they claim to be figurative, while the first class are literal; and to them the meaning of this latter class must be made to conform. And then they attempt to explain them away in a manner which would apply to any other part of the Bible as well, and would transform the whole volume into a mass of nonsense and nothingness. We present one specimen: We are told by Paul in 1 Thess. 4:16, that the "Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God," and these expositors attempt to harmonize that shout with their silent coming of Christ, in the following manner: They say that "shout" does not mean the utterance of a voice from heaven, but the word "shout" means a message designed not only to alarm and terrify, but to assist and encourage; in this case the shout is a shout or voice of encouragement. Then to find a fulfillment, they make the following assertions: "The aspect of affairs in the world, for the past fifteen years very strikingly corresponds with this symbol in the outbursts of world-wide encouragement for all men to wake up to a sense of their rights and privileges as men, and to consider their mutual relationships, the principles on which they are based, and the ends which they should accomplish." This, then, we are to understand, is all there is to the "shout, the voice of the archangel, and the trump of God," which are to accompany the revelation of the Lord himself from heaven!

If such language as 1 Thess. 4:16, 17, can thus be spiritualized away into nothing, the whole Bible can be just as well, and its threatenings and its promises, its histories and its prophecies, amount to nothing at all, and are not worthy one moment's attention. It is sad that men will thus devote themselves to the baleful work of destroying confidence in the Scriptures, in order to bolster up some phantom of their own imagination.

All the difficulty that exists concerning the texts which speak in these different strains concerning the Lord's coming, arises from a lack of information or understanding pertaining to the subject of the sanctuary. This subject is the great key, and the only key, to the situation in the last days. This understood, every text falls into line, no violence is done to any scripture, and there is consistency and harmony throughout.

Let us, then, look at some of the seemingly contradictory texts, to ascertain what they teach, and where, consequently, they must apply. It is evident from the list of texts above referred to, such as Matt. 24:30, 31; 1 Thess. 4:16, 17; Rev. 1:7, &c., that when the Lord visits this earth the second time, in that event which is generally known as the second advent, second coming, or second appearing, of Christ, it will be a literal, personal coming in the clouds of heaven, visible to all, and attended with such phenomena in the convulsions of nature (Rev. 6:14; 16:18-21) as this earth has never experienced. Such a coming as this cannot be in any sense as a thief; it will not be silent nor secret, and so far as the event itself is concerned, it will not be unexpected; for such promissions will appear as its precursors, as will indicate to all the immediate revelation of Christ. Even the wicked, as appears from the closing verses of Revelation 8, are aware from their terrible surroundings that the great day of wrath has come, before Christ actually appears.

This point being settled, the next question that arises is, Are there any other events in the experience of Christ and his Church, which are called a "coming of the Son of man," and "coming of the Lord?" We answer, Yes; two other events, both of which are brought to view in the subject of the sanctuary, both of which are explained by that subject, and by that alone, and all the apparent discrepancies cleared away. This will appear if we look at a few features of the sanctuary work which relate to this question, and the scriptures which apply to them.

The only points that need be noticed for our present purpose, are these: 1. Christ, after performing the work of a priest in the first apartment—the holy place—of the heavenly sanctuary, during the time allotted for the work in that department (Dan. 8:14), then enters upon that part of his ministry which is the antitype of the atonement made by the ancient Levitical high-priest on the great day of atonement in the type. Leviticus 16. To do this work he enters into the second apartment, or "most holy place," and performs a work of atonement or blotting out of sin. This decides the eternal destiny of all to whom this work pertains; for whoever is found worthy to have his sins finally atoned for and blotted out, will be saved. This, then, is a work of judgment, for the first step in any work of judgment is to reach a decision and render sentence in all cases. And this judgment scene is opened by the Ancient of days taking his position as judge in a court of justice, as the verb "did sit" signifies in Dan. 7:9, where the scene is described. Christ is then brought in before God amid the shining hosts of his heavenly attendants. Here decisions are rendered (which involve an examination of the books from which all judgment is determined, Rev. 20:12), and atonement is made for all who have overcome. The cases of the living of course come last into this investigation, and this is called the "reckoning" of the Lord with his servants. Matt. 25:19. This is the moment of supreme importance in the experience of the Church. And to both these movements—the entrance of Christ into the inner sanctuary, to make the atonement for his people before his Father, and finish his work as priest, and his coming to his people to reckon with them, in the manner indicated above—the terms "coming of the Son of man," "coming of the bridegroom," and "coming of the Lord," are applied, not in the exact form of the foregoing expressions, but expressing exactly the idea.

Proof: 1. Dan. 7:13, 14: "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man [Christ] came with the clouds of heaven [myriads of holy angels; for this is not the atmospheric heaven, where literal clouds are], and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him [not to this earth, for God, the Ancient of days, is not here]. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom."

Here is a coming, not to this earth, but to the Ancient of days after he has taken his position in the judgment scene described in verses 9 and 10. Here, then, is one movement, taking place wholly in heaven, which is called a coming of the Son of man.

This is the same coming that is brought to view in Matt. 25:10: "And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came." Christ is the bridegroom; and at this point in the parable of that chapter, he comes, not to this earth, but to the marriage, which is his reception of the kingdom; and he receives his kingdom before he comes. Luke 10:12. He receives it when, having been brought in before the Ancient of days, as described in Dan. 7:13, 14, he concludes his priesthood with the atonement, and then, arraying himself in royal attire, is inaugurated king.

2. On the second point, that the decision of our cases in the sanctuary above, is a coming of the Lord to us, Matt. 25:19; Luke 12:36, and Rev. 3:20, may be offered as proof.

(a.) "After a long time the Lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them." Matt. 25:19. All reckoning with the servants of the Lord, to decide in regard to their faithfulness, as in this case, takes place before the Lord comes, for when he comes, without any further reckoning or judging, the righteous living are changed in a moment (1 Cor. 15:51, 52), and the righteous dead are raised. 1 Thess. 4:16. This reckoning must therefore be the investigation of character and decision of destiny, involved in the atonement, as Christ finishes his priesthood before his coming as king to this earth; and this is called a "coming of the Lord" to those servants to reckon with them.

(b.) "And ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will return from the wedding; that, when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately." Luke 12:36. This cannot apply to the coming of Christ in the clouds of heaven to gather his people to himself; for he does not then come to knock, to see if he can find admittance; for then all cases are decided, and he comes to confer immortality upon his people. The coming and knocking must therefore refer to the same time as the "reckoning" of Matt. 25:19; that is, to the time when our cases come up for decision in the sanctuary; and this, again, is called a "coming" to us.

(c.) "If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." Rev. 3:20. Here is brought to view a condition of union with Christ which comes from hearing his voice and opening the door to him. It is a condition which cannot be reached till sins are atoned for and blotted out (Acts 3:19); and yet it is something which the Church is to enjoy here before the Lord appears in the clouds of heaven; for after that, he does not plead and knock for entrance. This must refer to the same time as Matt. 25:19 and Luke 12:36. And this is called "coming in" to the Church.

Thus we find three events to which these phrases concerning the coming of the Lord are applied: 1. His coming to the Ancient of days, when he enters the most holy of the heavenly sanctuary; 2. His "coming to reckon" with his servants, when our cases come up for decision in the conclusion of the sanctuary work; 3. His coming in power and glory with the sound of a trumpet and amid the last convulsions of nature, personally and visibly in the clouds of heaven.

Let us now see to which of these three, if any, that element of suddenness and unexpectedness which some of the texts bring to view, pertains.

1. The first coming, that to the Ancient of days (Dan. 7:13) and to the marriage (Matt. 25:10) took place at the end of the 2300 days (Dan. 8:14) in 1844. That coming was marked by a prophetic period, and that period was understood. That could not come, therefore, at an hour when they (the Church) thought not. Matt. 24:44.

2. We pass over to the third coming, that in the clouds of heaven, and find, as already noticed, that so many signs and convulsions (Revelation 6 and 16) will herald it, that the event itself, when it takes place, will not be unexpected even by the wicked; but—

3. When we look at that second coming, the coming to reckon, we find nothing to indicate the time when it will be; that is, nothing to show us just when our cases will be reached in the judgment and come up for decision. This, then, is liable to come suddenly, unexpectedly, and find us sleeping and unprepared. Matt. 24:44; Mark 13:35, 36.

It is to this that the illustration of the coming of the thief applies. "If the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched and would not have suffered his house to be broken up." Matt. 24:43. So if any one knew at just what time, the very day, his case would come up for examination and his eternal destiny be decided, as the hour approached, dismissing every other consideration, he would give himself to self-examination and prayer, repentance and confession of sin, and buy of Christ the gold tried in the fire, that he might be rich, and white raiment (the righteousness of Christ) that he might be clothed, and would anoint his eyes with eye-salve that he might see (Rev. 3:18), that he might be "ready," and that this supreme hour of destiny might not find him "sleeping," and take him unaware. Luke 21:34. But no time, when the Lord will come to reckon with us as his stewards, is made known. We know not when the time is. We only know that we are already many years in the period since the judgment in the sanctuary commenced; and when the cases of the dead are passed, the work will come to the living. So it will sometime reach our cases; in how long or short a time we do not know. Hence the danger that we begin to feel that the time is not so near as we supposed, and say, "My Lord delayeth his coming," and let our attention become all engrossed in other things, and the work of preparation go neglected, and so before we are aware, "at such an hour as we think not," when we "look not for him," and "in an hour that we are not aware of," the Lord comes to us as servants (Matt. 24:50) to reckon with us, and we are not ready.

It is to this time that we believe all passages of the nature of Matt. 24:42-44, 50; Mark 13:35, 36, &c., have their application. With this view, it is plain to be seen that there is no conflict between these passages and those which speak of another coming of a different nature, in the clouds of heaven. And we are saved from the error of supposing that the second coming of Christ to this world is to be in a secret, silent, invisible manner, and are spared the painful necessity of trying to harmonize with this silent, stealthy coming, those strong and unequivocal texts which proclaim the majesty and glory, the flaming fire and the mighty thunders, the voice of the trumpet and the consuming brightness, of his second advent to this earth.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

(Continued.)

The paper presented on this subject last week, became too lengthy before the examination of it was completed. A few thoughts on another division of the question were therefore deferred to the present time.

As appeared in the testimony published in last week's paper, there are three events to which the expressions "coming of the Lord," "coming of the Son of man," &c., are applied: 1. A coming to the marriage (Matt. 25:10), or "to the Ancient of days." Dan. 7:13, 14. This coming took place at the end of the 2300 days in 1844; 2. Coming "to reckon" with his servants (Matt. 25:19), which includes the last generation of Christians, and will be fulfilled to us when our cases come up for decision in the sanctuary above; 3. "Coming in the clouds of heaven," which will be a pageant of overpowering splendor and glory visible to all men. Matt. 24:30, 31.

Of these three comings the first and third cannot be the coming which is like a thief, sudden and silent, and at an hour when not expected; for though the first is not a coming to this earth, and was, consequently, not seen by men, it was marked by a prophetic period (the 2300 days, Dan. 8:14) which was understood; so that event was not unexpected—was not at an hour when they thought not, although its nature was not at the time understood; and the third will be accompanied by such immediate precursors, that all the world at the moment when Christ personally appears, will be looking in consternation for him to be revealed in the clouds of heaven. All expressions, therefore, which bring to view a silent, sudden, unexpected coming, must refer to the one named above as the second, or to the coming of the Lord to reckon with his servants. For this we are to "watch" and be "ready," for we know not when the time is.

The point now to be noticed is, that when these different comings are spoken of, the distinction between them is clearly indicated by the words used to describe them. Two words, with one or two exceptions, cover all these passages. These words are, the verb erchomai, in its various forms, and the noun parousia. In every case where a coming like a thief, sudden and unexpected, is referred to, the first of these words is used; that is, some form of erchomai; but in every case where the leading idea is the personal presence of Christ in his glory, the second word is used—the noun parousia.

A comparison of the two classes of texts will make this distinction plain. Thus in Matt. 24:42, 43, 44, 46, and 48, we find the word erchomai. In Matt. 25:8, 13, 19, and 27, we have the same word. These are comings connected with the parable of the ten virgins, and the reckoning. In Mark 13:26, 28, 32, we have the same word: "Lest coming [elthōn, from erchomai] suddenly, he find you sleeping." In Luke 12:36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 43, 45, we find the same word. In Luke 19:12, 28, still the same. And all these comings, it will be noticed, are of the same nature.

Let us now notice another class of texts in which the word parousia, referring to the personal presence of Christ, is used; and these, it will be seen, must all apply to his visible appearance in the clouds of heaven:—

Matt. 24:3: "What shall be the sign of thy coming [parousia], and of the end of the world?" Verse 27: "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming [parousia] of the Son of man be." In verses 37 and 39 the same word is used. The principal idea in these verses is the destruction of sinners; and as that is to be at the appearing of Christ, parousia is the word to use in those instances.

1 Cor. 15:23: "But every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming [parousia]." This refers to the resurrection of the dead, which will take place at the personal appearing of Christ. Hence we have this word.

1 Thess. 2:19: "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming [parousia]?" There can be no mistaking of the circumstances to which this must refer.

1 Thess. 3:13: "At the coming [parousia] of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints"—his "holy ones," or angels; referring to the time when he comes with all his holy angels with him. Matt. 25:31.

1 Thess. 4:15, 16: "We which are alive and remain unto the coming [parousia] of the Lord, shall not prevent [go before] them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout," &c. Here certainly we have the personal appearing of the Lord; and therefore the same word is used. So also it is used in chap. 5, verse 23.

2 Thess. 2:1: "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming [parousia] of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him." The time when the saints are gathered, is when the angels are sent for them, as the Lord appears in the clouds of heaven. Matt. 24:30, 31.

Verses 8, 9: "And then shall that Wicked [the papacy] be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming [parousia]; even him, whose coming [parousia] is after the working of Satan," &c. This can refer only to the visible coming of Christ in his glory; and here we find the word again.

James 5:7, 8: "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming [parousia] of the Lord; . . . for the coming [parousia] of the Lord draweth nigh." Both these instances evidently refer to the coming of the Lord in the clouds.

2 Pet. 1:16-18: "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming [parousia], of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty, . . . when we were with him in the holy mount." This refers to the scene of the transfiguration, which was a representation of the coming of Christ, when he shall appear in power and glory.

2 Pet. 3:3, 4: "There shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming [parousia]?" The only coming scoffers have any idea of is Christ's personal coming in the clouds of heaven. This shows what event must be referred to here. In verse 12 the same word is appropriately applied to the day of God, when the heavens shall visibly pass away in flaming fire.

1 John 2:28: "And now, little children, abide in him, that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming [parousia]." This is fixed to the time when he "appears"; and there can be no doubt but that expression refers to his coming in the clouds.

There are three texts which at first sight might seem to destroy the force of this argument, based on the use of the words erchomai and parousia. These are Matt. 24:30; 25:31, and Rev. 1:7, all of which refer to the time when Christ comes in the clouds, and in each of which the words "coming," "shall come," and "cometh" are from the Greek erchomai. But the reader will notice the distinction drawn in the former part of this article; namely, that in every instance "where the leading idea is the personal presence of Christ in his glory," the word parousia is used. But in the texts before us, it strikes us that this is not the leading idea, but rather the fact that such an event as the second advent is taking place. Thus in Matt. 24:30, that which strikes terror into the minds of the tribes of the earth is not the idea that they are to encounter the personal presence of Christ, but the fact that he is coming at all; that the great day of wrath is come, and the advent of the Lord is taking place. So of Matt. 25:31 and Rev. 1:7.

All has now been said, that need be said, to meet the purpose for which these articles are written; namely, to show the error of the view set forth in the "Millennial Dawn," that there is no second coming of Christ but such as is like a thief, secret, silent, and unknown to the world, and that that coming has already taken place. For there are events to which all such expressions may apply, which are not his coming in power and glory to change the living and raise the dead. This event is just before the world; and we cannot explain away the scriptures referring to it, as the aforesaid book attempts to do, without incurring the guilt of fearfully wresting the plain and unmistakable declarations of the word of God.

WITHIN THE VAIL.

A ~~person~~ asks for an explanation of Heb. 6: 19, 20, which speaks of the entrance of Jesus, as a forerunner for us, within the vail, and which declares that he had so entered at the time the book of Hebrews was written. He says he can find no place where the term "the vail" seems to mean anything else but the vail dividing between the holy place and the most holy place, of the sanctuary. And if such is its meaning, does not Heb. 6: 19, 20, he asks, disprove our view that Christ, when he ascended, commenced his ministry in the holy place, instead of the most holy place, of the heavenly sanctuary?

Well, let us see. All agree that the vail spoken of is a vail connected with the sanctuary. We then inquire how many vails the sanctuary had. In Ex. 26: 31-37, we find the instruction that God gave to Moses concerning the vails of the sanctuary. The command to Moses was to make a vail of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine-twined linen, and hang it upon four pillars overlaid with gold, which should divide between the holy and the most holy place. In other words, this vail constituted a door from the holy into the most holy place.

Moses was commanded further, to make a hanging for the door of the tabernacle, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine-twined linen, and hang it upon like pillars, overlaid with gold, to form the entrance into the holy place. This was the door of the first apartment. No one could go into either the holy or the most holy place, without passing this curtain at the entrance.

Here, then, are two vails belonging to the sanctuary: one is the door of the holy, the other the door of the most holy place; they were made of precisely the same material, constructed by the same means, suspended in the same manner, and served the same purpose. Where, then, was there any essential difference between them? If one was a vail, was not the other equally so?

But it may be said that they are not both called vails. It is true that Moses applies different terms to them, calling one a "hanging" and the other a "vail;" and the reason he does this seems obvious. It was, doubtless, to afford a convenient means of distinguishing between them. And as he thus speaks of them, it is not surprising that, when the subject is spoken of in a general way, the term "vail" should come to signify the inner curtain, dividing between the holy and most holy apartments of the sanctuary, as used by the evangelists.

But when we come to the book of Hebrews, we are to note the fact that Paul is not speaking in this general way, but is giving us a discriminating examination of the different parts and purposes of the sanctuary. Hence he calls both curtains, vails, as they really were, and distinguishes between them, not by calling one a "hanging," as Moses does, and the other a "vail," but by calling the first one a "vail," and the other, "the second vail." His use of the term in Heb. 9: 3, settles definitely the question of how he uses it throughout this book, in which alone the expression under discussion is found. There cannot be a "second" without a "first," and when a person, writing, as Paul did, with an accuracy begotten of the highest culture, and with the enlightenment which comes from inspiration, speaks of "the second vail," as connected with the sanctuary, he shows that he has before his own mind a first vail, connected with the same; and to that, by implication, he also refers the mind of the reader. And inasmuch as he says in chap. 9: 3, "second vail," when he means the second vail, it follows that if in any other part of the book of Hebrews he means the second vail, he should have said "second vail" there also. Therefore if in chap. 6: 19, he means the second vail, he should have written, "Which entereth into that within the second vail, whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus," etc. But if, on the other hand, by the term "vail," unqualified, he means the inner vail in the sanctuary, then in chap. 9: 3 he should have written, "And after the vail, the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all." But he does neither the one nor the other, but in chap. 6: 19 simply says "vail," showing that he means the first vail, and in chap. 9: 3 says, "second vail," showing that he discriminates between the two curtains or entrances to the two apartments of the tabernacle, recognizing them both as vails, and distinguishing between them by regarding one as the first, and the other as the second.

In discussing Heb. 6: 19, the only point to be ascertained is, how Paul uses the term "vail." It matters not if Matthew, Mark, and Luke, speaking in a general way, call the inner curtain simply "the vail." There is nothing in this to prevent another writer like Paul, when giving a treatise on the construction and design of the sanctuary, which requires him to be more definite, recognizing the two vails, and making the distinction he does between them. Heb. 6: 19, 20 therefore sustains the view that when Christ ascended, he commenced his ministry in the holy place of the heavenly sanctuary.

For a further discussion of the subject, see the chapter entitled "Within the Vail," in the work on the sanctuary, pp. 221-230.

THE COVENANT OF HEB. 9:1.

This passage reads: "Then verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary." The word "covenant" in this verse appears as a supplied word. Is it the proper word to be supplied, or should it be some other? Is Paul in this instance speaking of the covenant or of something else?

From the 6th verse of chapter 8, the apostle's subject is certainly the new covenant, treated from the stand-point of a comparison with the old covenant. The one is called the "first," and the "old," covenant; the other is called the "better," and the "new," covenant. But it will be noticed that in verse 7 and verse 13 of the 8th chapter, the word "covenant" is supplied; yet as we read these passages it is at once seen that no other word but "covenant" is at all admissible; and the connection, we think, will show the same for chap. 9:1.

In 8:7 we read: For if that first had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second." Here the word "first" certainly refers to covenant understood. In 8:13 we have this statement: "In that he saith, A new, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away." A new what?—A new covenant, certainly. The "first old;" first what?—First covenant, most assuredly. Now passing to the very next verse (9:1), the division of chapters being only man's work for convenience of reference, we read: "Then verily the first had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary." First what?—First covenant, certainly, by every sound principle of comparison, interpretation, or application. What is Paul's subject here?—The covenants, first and second; and twice before, in the immediate and unbroken connection, he has used the term "first" in exactly the same manner, when by no possibility can it be made to refer to anything else but covenant. On what ground, then, can we arbitrarily make an abrupt change in 9:1, and say that Paul means something else there, of which he has not spoken before?—It cannot, on any reasonable ground, be done.

But we are told that the word to be supplied there should be "tent" or "tabernacle." What sense would the passage then make? "Then verily the first tabernacle had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary." Did the tabernacle have a sanctuary?—No; the tabernacle was itself the sanctuary. The tabernacle did not have a sanctuary, but the covenant did. Moreover, the terms "first" and "second" are not applied to the sanctuary till we come to verses 2, 6, and 7 of this chapter, when "first" refers only to the holy place, and "second" only to the most holy place, of the sanctuary. Not till we come to verse 8 of chap. 9 do we find the term "first" applied to the tabernacle as a whole.

The following comment on Heb. 9:1, by Meyer, the celebrated German commentator, called "the prince of exegetes," is just as decisive on this point as any textual criticism can be. He notices the claim put forth that the supplied word should be tabernacle instead of covenant, and says:—

"But the addition of skēnē [tent or tabernacle] is condemned as a gloss by the fact of its being wanting in all the uncial MSS., in many cursives, in Syr. utr. Basm. Aeth. Arm. It. Vulg., with Gregory Thaumaturgus, Cyril, Chrys. Damasc. Theoph. Photius, &c. On the ground, too, of internal evidence it is to be rejected, since, on the one hand, the coherence with 8:13, and through that with 8:7, &c., leads to diathikē [covenant] as the main idea to be supplemented; and, on the other hand, the expression he protē skēnē, 9:1, would be made to denote something quite different from that which the same expression denotes in 9:2. For while in verse 2 the outer division of the tabernacle is indicated thereby, in verse 1 only the first or Old Testament, earthly tabernacle in opposition to the New Testament, heavenly one, thus something entirely dissimilar, could be intended by this expression."

ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE THIRD ANGEL'S MESSAGE—NO. 2.

We have now briefly examined three remarkable prophecies which set forth a mighty work to be accomplished during the last generation that lives before the coming of Christ. And we have called attention to the great Advent movement of the present generation, as answering to these prophecies in every respect, being in nature and extent just such a work as said prophecies call for, the first movement of the kind since the prophecies were given, and therefore demonstrating itself to be the fulfillment of those scriptures. This movement has been in progress over half a century, and can be accounted for only on the ground that the word of God is herein being fulfilled. If this is true, a movement holding so important a place in the work of God, and destined to make itself felt so deeply in the religious world, must have many interesting incidents connected with its development and progress.

William Miller, of Low Hampton, N. Y., was the man who, in the providence of God, was raised up to lead out in this work. And although he began the study of the prophecies in 1818, it was not till 1831 that he made his views public. Having become satisfied that the end of this dispensation was near, his conscience would not permit him to rest till he had made known his conclusions to his fellow-men. To this end he published a series of articles in a paper in Vermont, showing that the second coming of Christ would occur about the year 1843. From this time his course of life was changed. His articles attracted wide-spread attention. Letters came pouring in from all quarters, and urgent calls for him to come and preach in person the new and wonderful things he had learned from the Scriptures. These appeals he could not resist, and from that time he gave himself to the promulgation of these views. The year 1831 may therefore be set down as the year when the first angel's message began to be proclaimed. Many men of earnest piety and rare talent soon joined Mr. Miller in his work, and most blessed spiritual awakenings everywhere followed their earnest efforts. There were many honest souls in the various churches, who were hungering for something that would give them new life in their religious experience. And the idea of the soon coming of their precious Saviour dawned upon them as a blessed truth by which, like Peter, they were "begotten again to a lively hope."

In 1838 an exposition of prophecy was brought out which more particularly attracted the attention of pew and pulpit, press and people. Elder J. Litch made a calculation of the prophetic period of Rev. 9:15, called "an hour, a day, a month, and a year," amounting in all to 391 years and fifteen days. He applied it to the Ottoman Empire; and finding that the period would end on the eleventh day of August, 1840, he boldly predicted the fall of the Ottoman Empire at that date.

This was at once recognized as a sort of test case; for, said the people, if that event takes place as stated, it will demonstrate the correctness of the principle of interpretation adopted by the Adventists, and show that all their calculations are worthy of attention. As soon as the news could reach this country, in those days of no ocean telegraphs, and slow steamers, lo! it brought word that on that very day that very event did take place!

This unquestionable and striking fulfillment of prophecy gave a mighty impetus to the Advent movement. The ears of the people were gained, and there were more calls for preaching than could be filled. Elder J. V. Himes began the publishing work, and the years between 1840 and 1844, were years of great activity in the cause. Through the enterprise of Elder Himes, a large tent was procured, seating 4,000 persons, and was moved from place to place, drawing immense crowds. During this time the custom of holding camp-meetings was also inaugurated, and quite a number of meetings of this class were held in different places.

Thus the country became more and more stirred from month to month and from year to year. The fruits were everywhere most excellent. Bibles were studied as never before, and multitudes were led to seek a greater consecration to God.

The close of the year 1843, according to the Roman calendar, that is, reckoning from January to January, was passed without any particular excitement; for the idea was not questioned in any quarter that in Bible prophecy, the years must be reckoned by Bible rules; and the year 1843, according to Bible time, would not end till the first new moon after the vernal equinox in 1844.

But this point was at length passed, and the Lord did not come. This was the first disappointment, and it threw some doubts and confusion into the ranks of believers. But right here, even though by disappointment, we begin to see the special providence of God in this work; for writers and preachers were compelled to look over with new care all the grounds of their faith. Some even suggested that all they had been warranted to expect, had perhaps taken place. Attention was turned to the types as it never would have been if this disappointment had not occurred.

And soon a great light dawned which put at once a new complexion upon the work. The chief pillar in this prophetic temple was the 2,300 days of Dan. 8:14. "Unto two thousand three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

The place of the sanctuary in the type was considered so far as to inquire in what part of the year the fulfillment might be expected; for as the spring types—the passover, the wave sheaf, and the Pentecost—were fulfilled in the same part of the year, the same month, and day of the month, in which the types were observed, so the fall types—the blowing of trumpets, the atonement or the cleansing of the sanctuary, and the feast of ingathering—might naturally be supposed to occur in the portion of the year corresponding to the type; namely, in the fall.

Then it was also seen that a correct application of the 2,300 days would lead to the same conclusion; for if the 2,300 days are reckoned from the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, as Dan. 9: 25 states, they must be reckoned, not from the time when the document was issued giving authority to build, but from the commencement of the work of building, as stated in the last part of verse 25 and the beginning of verse 26. And in Ezra 7, where the fulfillment is recorded, we find that those who returned from Persia to build Jerusalem, did not reach the place till the fifth month, and two months more is none too much time to allow for them to get located and ready to commence the work of building the city. This would bring us to the seventh month; and when we look at the type we find that it was on the tenth day of this month that the sanctuary was to be cleansed.

The conclusion, therefore, was that the 2,300 days had not then ended, but that they would end on the tenth day of the seventh month, which in that year (1844) fell on the twenty-second of October. It was only about three months before the date named, that these points were clearly brought out. The time was short. What was to be done must be done quickly. Those who saw the light felt impelled to adopt the words of the parable of Matt. 25: 1-10, to arouse others to the importance of the subject: "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him."

A little further consideration of that parable served to show that it well illustrated the movement in which they were engaged, and doubtless had an application to that movement. In the spring of 1844 began the tarrying time—the night of the parable. A mistake of six months had been made in reference to the ending of days, the true termination being in the fall instead of the spring of that year. And midway between these two points, the light had been discovered that the time extended to the fall, and that the cleansing of the sanctuary pointed to the fall. The thrill of joy that filled the hearts of those who felt that they had found their footing again, and the revived hope of soon seeing their Lord, took verbal form in a mighty cry raised simultaneously in different parts of the land—"Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him."

This movement, which is called "the midnight cry," took a deeper hold upon the people from the time of the Exeter camp-meeting, in August, 1844. And we refer to this particular gathering to meet the charge that this movement was a burst of blind and wild fanaticism; for here, in the providence of God, his work and the work of fanaticism were placed side by side, so that no candid mind could fail to discern the difference between them.

A company of fanatical spirits had come upon the ground, who made the days wild and the nights hideous with their boisterous and incoherent shoutings and gesticulations. Their work had no scriptural basis, and showed no well-defined object. It was a cyclone of emotional frenzy. But it had a terrible power. It broke down one of the preachers in his sermon, and threatened to secure the balance of influence, and to control and ruin the meeting.

Under these circumstances a minister at one of these services was wading dryly through the usual arguments so much dwelt upon in those days, when a sister calmly rose in the congregation, and said: "Brother, it is too late to be dwelling on those familiar topics; there is new light and truth for this people; and there are those here who are prepared to give it." Then raising her voice in clearness and power, she exclaimed, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him."

The light was called for, and presented, bringing out the points set forth above. Calmly and carefully the people listened, learned, received the truth, and rejoiced. The Spirit of the Lord attended the preaching of the word, and pervaded the camp. The fanatics, taking no part in this work, no longer attracted any attention. They got out of stock and slunk away, being heard of no more. But the truth went forth with new power; for those who received it at the meeting, as they went to their homes, were like flames of fire spreading it through all the land.

A reaction in the popular churches drove from their communion 50,000 believers. And as they left, they gave the second message: "Babylon is fallen, is fallen."

Papers were now published in Canada, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Rochester, and Cincinnati. Other men were soon heard of in England, on the continent of Europe, in Asia and Africa, who were giving the same message of the soon coming of Christ in glory.

Probably no religious movement since the days of the apostles ever became, in so short a time, so wide-spread, or was so zealously carried forward, and achieved so substantial results, as the great Advent movement at the time of which we speak.

And thus we come up to that ever memorable epoch, the tenth day of the seventh month, Oct. 22, 1844.

ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE THIRD ANGEL'S MESSAGE—NO. 2

THE tenth day of the seventh month, Jewish time (Oct. 22), 1844, had been set by processes of reasoning already described, as the day for the Lord to come. To that day attention had been turned, as it had not probably to any other day in all the world's chronology. Thousands had centered all their hopes upon it. The principle of interpretation adopted by the Adventists had shown itself to be true in other points; and so, it was argued, it must in this. And accordingly by thousands upon thousands every calculation and provision for continuance of life in this world after that date, was absolutely discarded; and both Church and world, in breathless anxiety, awaited the result.

When the time passed and the Lord did not come, the disappointment which fell upon the Adventists was more crushing than any that ever fell upon any other people. It was as much greater than that of the first disciples (Luke 19:37-40; 24:21), as the issue supposed to be involved in this, was greater than the one involved in that. They supposed that Christ was to set up a kingdom and reign as temporal king; these expected the kingdom of God in all its glory, and eternal life therein. The sudden collapse of their hopes was a disappointment beyond description—almost beyond endurance. Add to this the sarcastic shout of triumph which went up from the world, and the bitter reproaches of the enemies of their faith, and they felt that indeed the dregs of a full cup were wrung out to them.

And now appears the inherent power and vitality of the truth. Was not this enough to cause every one to give it all up at once, and renounce the whole movement? So some thought, and gave it up; but with multitudes of others it was not so. They had seen enough evidence of the workings of the Holy Spirit in connection with the movement, to know that the providence of the Lord God of Noah and Elijah had been leading the way; that it was a work in which Heaven was interested, and it could not be given up. Sometime and some how they believed that all would be made plain.

They were right. God had led in the work. His Spirit had enlightened the minds of his servants to bring out rich truth from his word. Their principles of interpretation were sound; their reckoning and application of the prophetic periods, incontrovertible; and their view of the symbols of Daniel 2, 7, 8, and 9, and Revelation 2, 3, 6, 8, 9, 12, and 17, were substantially correct. The sanctuary of Dan. 8:14, the second symbol of Revelation 13, and the third message of Revelation 14 were reserved for further light, which to those who in a proper frame of mind waited for it, was not long in coming.

This second and greatest disappointment threw them back upon the study of the types with more earnestness than ever. The types seemed to be the only avenue left through which to look for an explanation of the situation. In The Voice of Truth of Nov. 7, 1844, Joseph Marsh said: "We cannot admit that our great High-priest did not on that very day [the tenth day of the seventh month] accomplish all that the type would justify us to expect. We now believe he did."

Naturally, almost of necessity, the Adventists of that time came to the conclusion that their work for the world was done. Whether they felt so or not, it was, for the time being, virtually the fact. First they knew not in what way to try to work further for the world; and, secondly, every heart was steeled and every ear closed to whatever they might try to do for them. They had but to submit to circumstances. Naturally enough they looked for some scriptures applying to the situation.

They had recognized the parable of Matt. 25:1-13, as applying to the Advent movement in which they had been engaged; and in that parable they found a time when the bridegroom came and the door was shut. They began to see that the coming in that parable, was to the marriage; and the marriage was something to take place in heaven, not here on the earth. So as they had had the midnight cry, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him," they began to reason, Has not the bridegroom come to the marriage, and is not the door shut?

Soon Mr. O. R. L. Crozier brought out additional light on the subject of the sanctuary; namely, that the sanctuary was in heaven, and the cleansing of the sanctuary was the entrance of the High-priest into the most holy place, to make the atonement; but that while he was thus making the atonement, the door of the outer apartment was closed. And so the conclusion suggested by Joseph Marsh, that all had taken place which they were warranted from the type to expect, was confirmed; that is, that the bridegroom had come to the marriage,—that Christ, our great High-priest had entered into the most holy place to make the atonement and cleanse the sanctuary, which in a few days or weeks, at most, they supposed would be finished, and then the Lord would come for his people. And all this, it was thought, involved the idea that the door of mercy was closed.

But notwithstanding the error of the shut door, which under their circumstances it would have been difficult to avoid, a mighty stride had been made in the direction of further light, and toward a solution of their perplexing situation. The truth had fully dawned that there was a work to be done in heaven before the Lord would return to this earth; that the sanctuary was in heaven, and was to be cleansed there; that the cleansing of the sanctuary was the removing of sin by the blood of Christ, and not the burning of the earth in the fires of the last day; that the bridegroom had come to the marriage; and that the cleansing of the sanctuary was going forward.

In the midst of this evolution of new views, a few weeks after the passing of the time, and while many were making shipwreck of faith, sister White had her first vision. In it she was shown that "the midnight cry," which they had just passed through, was a great light set up behind them, and was not to be rejected; that if kept in view, it would shed light on the pathway clear through to the end; but if rashly denied, darkness and ruin to such souls would follow. Now says the objector, "The visions taught the shut door, because the shut-door view was connected with that of the midnight cry; and the vision taught that the midnight cry was not to be given up." The conclusion does not follow. It is a false charge. The vision said nothing about the shut door. But the midnight cry was a vital pillar of truth, and was not to be surrendered, though some errors had been connected with it. To give up the midnight cry was to give up the whole work, and make utter shipwreck of faith. And any one did reader can judge whether it were better to give up that truth on account of an error which men had attached to it, and so wholly apostatize, rather than hold fast to the truth, and wait patiently till the Lord should remove the error which men had connected with it. Every one will say the latter. And this they did; and the explanation and correction came in due time.

ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF THE THIRD
ANGEL'S MESSAGE.—NO. 5.

With the situation set forth in the last preceding article, the year 1844 closed. By a bitter experience, by the irresistible logic of circumstances, the people had been driven to an examination of the subject of the sanctuary, which was to prove the great key to the solution of the perplexities surrounding their position, the avenue which was destined to lead them forth into another field of light and truth and labor. But its place in the work soon became apparent, and its harmony with other truths recently made known, was a source of encouragement and strength.

In 1844 Mrs. Rachel D. Preston, a Seventh-day Baptist sister, introduced the Sabbath to the Adventists at Washington, N. H., and some forty of that church embraced the keeping of the seventh day according to the fourth commandment. Elders Cook and Preble for awhile advocated it, but not connecting it with prophecy, they failed to realize its importance, and soon gave it up. In 1845 Elders Joseph Bates and James White began to observe the seventh day as the Sabbath, and to advocate that view. In 1846 the subject of the sanctuary was more fully developed in the light of Rev. 11:19, where it is said, "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." It was clearly perceived that if our High-priest was in the most holy place, cleansing the sanctuary, he was standing before the ark, still called, under the sounding of the seventh trumpet (where Rev. 11:19 applies), "the ark of his testament," and thus showing that that ark in heaven contains the law of God, the ten commandments, the same as the ark in the type. This connected the Sabbath with all those who would accept the light on the subject of the sanctuary, and forever linked that truth to this movement. No one who adopts the view of the sanctuary as brought out in connection with the third angel's message, can for a moment waver on the Sabbath question.

Another truth introduced among Adventists in 1844, was seen to harmonize most accurately with this subject, and that was the subject of conditional immortality as then advocated extensively in England and introduced into this country by Geo. Storrs. In this was brought out the teaching of the Scriptures on the condition of man in death, and the destiny of the wicked. It was shown that the dead were unconscious, and that the wicked will be destroyed. So the sanctuary question shows that men are not judged when they die; but the records are kept in the books above, and then examined when the time comes for the sanctuary to be cleansed,—that is, for the atonement to be made, and the investigative judgment to decide the cases of all men for life or death.

This makes room for another necessary work which cannot be provided for outside of the sanctuary subject; that is, the decision that must be made in all cases before the Lord comes; for when he comes, he does not come to investigate character, but his reward is with him to give every man as his work shall be; and this reward will be to bestow life instantly upon all who have been, through some preceding judgment process, accounted worthy to receive it. Luke 20:35; 21:30.

In the same year, 1846, the views of sister White began to be published and circulated among the people. In a few years Bro. J. N. Andrews brought out the true light on Rev. 13:11-18, as connected with the third angel's message of Revelation 14. Thus the great essential pillars of present truth were developed, and the third angel's message assumed definite proportions as a link in the prophetic chain.

Its work had now begun. It came with an explanation of the great disappointment, with the true light on the prophetic periods, the parable of Matt. 25:1-10, conditional immortality, the Sabbath, the sanctuary, the two-horned beast of Revelation 13, and the message of Rev. 14:9-12. And it had in its midst the manifestation of the spirit of prophecy which was to characterize the last church before the coming of Christ. Rev. 12:17; 14:12; 19:10. The prophetic field it had to fill was a broad one, and well-defined. It will be worth while to survey briefly the ground it was to occupy. The message and the work it embraced take in the following scriptures:—

1. It was the finishing of the mystery of God of Rev. 10:7, in the first years of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, which follows the work of verses 1-6, which symbolized the first message.

2. It was the prophesying again before many peoples and nations and tongues and kings, of verse 11, presenting before believers another world-wide movement.

3. It was the opening of the temple of God in heaven, and the light which shone forth from the ark contained therein. Rev. 11:19.

4. It brings out the company of Rev. 12:17, a remnant which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.

5. It is the Sabbath reform of Rev. 14 : 12, which brings out a company distinguished by some peculiarity in reference to the keeping of the commandments of God in connection with the faith of Jesus. But in these days, among those who profess to be followers of Christ, there is no difference of opinion or practice in reference to the commandments of God, except in the matter of Sabbath-keeping. He who takes the commandment as it reads, and observes the seventh day, is at once distinguished from the majority around him.

6. It is the warning against the work of the two-horned beast of Revelation 13—against the worship of the beast or his image, or the reception of his mark. And this is the last issue that is to arise, and the last stand the people of God have to make against the powers of error, before they receive their final deliverance. Rev. 16 : 2, 3.

7. It is the period during which the guests who are summoned to the marriage are examined to see if they have on the wedding garment (Matt. 22 : 11), which is the righteousness of saints (Rev. 19 : 8), the white raiment which the True Witness counsels the Laodicean church (the church of the present and last generation) to buy of him. Rev. 3 : 18.

8. It is the final and imperative call to the supper according to the parable of Luke 14 : 16-24, wherein the servants are directed to go out with an urgent message into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in, that the Lord's house may be filled.

9. It is the period following the coming of the bridegroom to the marriage, in the parable of Matthew 25, during which time it is to be ascertained who are ready to go in with him to the marriage. This is the same as the coming in of the king to see the guests, of Matt. 22 : 11 ; and when the work is finished, and all who are to be saved are found ready, then they will go in with him to the marriage, and the door will be shut.

10. It is the period covered by the message to the last (the Laodicean) church (Rev. 3 : 14-22), in which they are counseled to buy those things which it is all-essential that they should possess to be able to pass the test of the judgment.

Thus well defined is the substance of which the third angel's message is composed, the field it has to occupy, and the work it is to do. It is a field everywhere white for harvest, and stretching out imploring hands for help, and raising everywhere Macedonian cries,—Come over and help us ! It is grand and glorious, but a most solemn and searching work. It is that which, while it ripens the wheat for the heavenly garner, develops the clusters of the vine of the earth, for the wine-press of God's wrath. Happy he who gives heed to the message, accepts its truths, performs the duties it reveals, and, sanctified through obedience to it, is ready for the solemn issue to which it leads !

THE DAYS OF THE SEVENTH ANGEL.

"In the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound," said the angel to John, "the mystery of God should be finished." Rev. 10:7.

When, according to this testimony, is the mystery of God to be finished? To answer this, let us consider the definition of terms, and the scope of the trumpet.

The "mystery of God" is the gospel. Rom. 16:25, 26; Eph. 3:3; Gal. 1:11, 12; Eph. 1:9, 10; 1 Cor. 2:7. The gospel has a certain definite work to do, that is, to gather out from all nations, during the time that sin is running its course, a people for God. This is not to continue forever; the time will come when its work will be accomplished, the gospel will no longer be proclaimed, and the mystery of salvation through Christ will be accomplished.

The finishing of the mystery of God, therefore, is the closing of the work of the gospel for the world, which means the close of probation, and the fixing of the final destiny of every man.

This is to be accomplished "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel." But the trumpet of the seventh angel is one, the sounding of which covers a great length of time. It embraces the entire time of the third woe. Rev. 11:14, 15. It begins some little time before probation ends, according to Rev. 10:7, and it extends to the close of that scene of destruction in which all sin and sinners will perish at the end of the thousand years of Revelation 20. This is shown by the testimony of Rev. 11:18. It continues, therefore, more than a thousand years.

The question now arises, In what part of this long period does the finishing of the mystery of God come in? It is not at the close, nor at any intermediate division of that period; for the scripture reads, "When he shall begin to sound." And does this mean that the finishing of the mystery is an instantaneous work, to be accomplished the very moment the trumpet begins to sound?—That cannot be; for there are "days," plural, doubtless used in a prophetic sense, meaning years, allotted to this work: "In the days of the voice of the seventh angel."

Two facts are thus established: first, that no part of the sounding of the seventh trumpet could be given before the work of finishing the mystery of God is entered upon; for in that case it would not be in the beginning of his sounding; and, secondly, that that work cannot be accomplished instantaneously; for in that case it could not occupy "days," as the testimony says it will. So the conclusion is inevitable that the work of finishing the mystery of God, and the sounding of the seventh trumpet commence together; that is, the commencement of that work marks the time when the trumpet begins to sound; but the years in which the work will be accomplished are so few in comparison with the whole period of the sounding of the trumpet, that they may be called the "beginning" of his sounding.

The work of the gospel closes with a special work called the cleansing of the sanctuary. Dan. 8:14. To this work, in the type, one day was allotted called the "day of atonement," because the cleansing of the sanctuary was the making of the atonement. Lev. 16:20, 29-34; 23:27. This work in the antitypical ministry of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary, begins at the end of the 2300 days (Dan. 8:14), which period ended in 1844. Then the temple of God, or the inner apartment of the sanctuary on high, where the ark is, was opened, as stated in Rev. 11:19. This, in the type, was the apartment in which the atonement was always made; and in the antitype this work is the closing up of the ministry of Christ, which of course synchronizes with the work of the gospel. Hence the cleansing of the sanctuary, the making of the atonement, and the finishing of the mystery of God, are all one and the same thing. And this work began at the end of the 2300 days in 1844, when the seventh trumpet began to sound, and the temple of God was opened in heaven. But this work is all to be finished, "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound." Nearly forty-seven years have already elapsed. During all this time the finishing of the mystery has been going forward. The end must be indeed very near.

S. D. ADVENTISTS AND THE ATONEMENT.

Those who write and speak against the views of S. D. Adventists, would greatly oblige us if they would confine themselves to straightforward legitimate argument, and not deal so largely in misrepresentations. The man who has not discernment enough to understand our position, or, understanding it, has not candor enough to state it correctly, would better not exhibit his accomplishments or his character before the world.

These thoughts are suggested by the reception of a little tract which a friend has sent us, written by one Wm. Keston, of Wellington, issued from the "Bible Truth Press," of New York, and being scattered, we are told, quite extensively through the country. This man professes to be horrified at our views of the atonement. He is evidently a person of no investigative turn of mind, and his views being run in a theological mold furnished by others, he can only repeat parrot-like what he has been taught. And when any variation is suggested from his established runway, he seems to know not what to do but to fall into a panic, and work himself up into a great fury until he subsides in a fit of nervous prostration.

A few expressions will reveal his state of feeling. Speaking of our doctrines, he says: "They are the worst—the most blasphemous I ever read or heard of, and shock, or ought to shock, every soul truly born of God." And then occasionally, as he goes on misstating and perverting our views, he interlards the exclamations, "How awful!" "What a revolting idea!" etc., etc.

Now, we presume this man has read or at least "heard of" the worst and wildest blasphemies uttered by the wickedest men on earth; but he says the doctrines of S. D. Adventists are worse than these. Truly, then, they must be something phenomenally awful and revolting. And what is it that he is so disturbed about?—Oh! we do not believe the atonement was made on the cross; and we do not believe the atonement is yet finished. But what is there so terrible in this? He goes on to draw the false and foolish conclusions that if this is the case, Christ did not bear our sins in his body on the tree, that Christ's blood does not atone for sin, and that Christ has not appeared in the presence of God for us, or at least had not till he entered the most holy place, as we hold, in 1844. Then he accuses us of having the Devil make the atonement, etc.

To any one who will read our views with even ordinary care, it will not be necessary to say anything with reference to such misrepresentations as these. This man fails to see the distinction between Christ bearing our sins as a sacrifice, which he did upon the cross, and his bearing them as a priest, which he does as our mediator before God. He ignores Christ's service in the first apartment of the true sanctuary above, into which Christ entered when he ascended, and where he was in the presence of God, just as much as he is in the second apartment. He can see no difference between one bearing sins, as the priest did, to atone for them and put them away, and one bearing them, as the scapegoat did, to perish with them. According to his view, Christ must at last go into eternal destruction and oblivion. And these distinctions are generally overlooked in the theological world; and so we have the sacrifice and the priesthood, the offering and the atonement, the forgiveness and the extinction of sin, all thrown together into one "conglomerated mass," which is a veritable Pandora's box of vagueness and confusion which have so long afflicted the religious world on this all-important subject.

Mr. E. takes great exception to the idea that the atonement is not yet completed. But is it? Let us see. Are sins atoned for before they are committed, repented of, or forgiven? If so, the most ultra doctrine of predestination, election, and reprobation, is true; the human race is in the inexorable grasp of fate; there is no free moral agency; every one is a machine, and may as well, first as last, submit to the inevitable. If the atonement was made upon the cross, either the horrible doctrine just stated is true, or the doctrine of universal salvation is true; for Christ there bore the sins of the world. Why will not men learn the character and order of events in the work of Christ for the salvation of men? According to the type, the atonement comes at the conclusion, not at the beginning, of Christ's work as priest in behalf of sinners; and those only will secure its blessings who have sought them through his name.

TO MAKE INTERCESSION.

In Heb. 7:25 we read, "Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." There is one clause in this text that is calculated to afford most wonderful comfort and encouragement to the doubting, trembling soul, that is seeking after God; and that is, that Christ "ever liveth to make intercession" for such. Take in the whole force of that infinitive, "to make intercession." And what does he do that he may make intercession?—He liveth. Thus it is represented that the very object of Christ's life now is that he may make intercession for those who desire to come unto God by him.

While he was upon the earth, he lived not unto himself. And this text shows that even while he is in the heavenly courts above, he lives not to the holy angels, nor to himself alone, but he lives to make intercession for his people here in the midst of the trials of their earthly pilgrimage.

Are you tempted to doubt that he will intercede for you? Why should he not, since he liveth for that very purpose? A thought upon his position shows him surrounded with every circumstance that is calculated to inspire confidence in the heart. Do you think your case is such as to need a very special advocate?—Well, the next verse says that "for such a high priest became us," that is, that he is just such an one as is adapted to our case. Do you feel that while he might have acted for others in days past, we have now come so far down the stream of time since the sacrifice was made, that he cannot plead for us? The text says, that he "ever liveth." Do you feel that to reach your case the advocate must be one of exceeding power and lofty rank? The first verse of the next chapter says that he "is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens." Thus he is such an High Priest as "became us," able to meet every emergency, and to cover every feature of our case.

He is a merciful High Priest. He undertakes in our behalf, not for large fees, but because he loves us. He is a capable High Priest. He understands the cause of those for whom he pleads, and the laws of that court before which he stands. He therefore knows what to present and what to reject of our petitions. He makes every case which he presents his own. He has borne our nature, and can be touched with a feeling of our infirmities. Known to him are all our wants, sorrows, and desires; and the ground of his efforts for us is not our deserving, but his great love; not what we have done or can do, for ourselves or for him, but what he can do for us.

His intercession for sinners is his interposition in their behalf, by virtue of the satisfaction he has made to divine justice in his own sacrifice. And then, the thought that he ever liveth for this very purpose, to make intercession for us, covers all the ground! Not what we are, or what we merit, by nature and practice, comes into the account at all, but that he has purchased us and received the object of his purchase from the Father, and only waits for men to receive his proffered grace, saying, "Break off thine iniquity by righteousness, and thine iniquity by showing mercy to the poor." Dan. 4:27. Who can harbor a shadow of misgiving respecting the love that inspires, or the mercy that all may freely receive from, his gracious mediation? He liveth to make intercession, and will make it for all who will come to God through him.

THOU SHALT STAND IN THY LOT.

It was a moment of most thrilling interest in the experience of the Israelites, between Egypt and Canaan, when they stood upon the borders of the land, and the inheritance was divided unto them by lot. Num. 26:25. The lot was cast, and each tribe was given its portion as it was assigned to it.

Like the other events in the history of that people, this also was an example, and is written for our admonition upon whom the ends of the world have come. 1 Cor. 10:11. As those who stood upon the borders of the earthly Canaan, had their inheritance assigned to them by lot, so the lot is to be given again for those who stand upon the borders of the heavenly Canaan, and who are to have an eternal inheritance assigned to them.

It was said to the prophet Daniel, "Thou shalt rest, and stand in thy lot at the end of the days." Dan. 12:13. The days referred to are the 2,300 days, which terminated in 1844. They brought us to the beginning of the work of the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, which work, in the experience of the last church, corresponds to the dividing of the inheritance by lot to ancient Israel, as they stood upon the boundary line just ready to pass over and possess the land.

The word spoken to the prophet, "Thou shalt stand in thy lot," does not mean a certain number of rods of real estate, but "that which is determined by lot, decisions based upon certain conditions, the determinations of Providence." This work of judgment in the sanctuary determines all cases, assigning to each his proper place. It is here that Daniel stands in his lot; and here all that have been overcomers will stand in their lot when their cases are reached. They will pass favorably the test of the judgment, while, as David says (Ps. 1:5), "The ungodly shall not stand in the judgment."

This, then, is the position of the church to-day. We stand upon the borders of the heavenly Canaan; and it should be to us a moment of thrilling interest, as much greater than that in the experience of ancient Israel as the inheritance to which we look is greater and more enduring than was theirs. Before them was the earthly country, with all its limitations and evils; before us is the heavenly Canaan, with all freedom from everything that can destroy or offend, and with its "eternal weight of glory."

For nearly fifty years the investigative judgment of the heavenly sanctuary has been going forward. Soon its decisions will all be rendered; and the question for each one to ask himself, is, When its work is done, what will be the lot assigned to me? Shall I have a portion set apart for me in that heavenly country to which we are called?

We are assured that all heaven is interested in what is transpiring in connection with the Lord's work in the earth to-day; yea, that all heaven is astir in expectation of the decisive scenes soon to take place. To what an hour have we then come! The last generation is reached; the last warning pertaining to the issues of eternity, is going forth; the work of our Mediator in the sanctuary on high is almost finished; the one scene of rebellion which has been permitted in the universe, is soon to be brought to an end; the great plan of redemption, otherwise unknown, is soon to be consummated, and its final and eternal fruits appear. But, meanwhile, the Babel of error is swelling its notes of confusion over all the world. Above it all, however, faith hears the blessed assurances of the great Captain of our salvation, saying, "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." It hears the counsel of the faithful and true witness, "Buy of me gold tried in the fire, and white raiment, and eyesalve," and this counsel is given us, that we may not be found poor, naked, and blind, in the decisive hour. And these graces are offered, nay, urged upon us, without money and without price. Thus there is every hope and comfort offered for every sincere and earnest heart.

"Fear not, brethren, joyful stand,
On the borders of your land;
Jesus Christ, your Father's Son,
Bids you undimmed go on."

THE HEAVENLY THINGS.

Heb. 8:1-13.

Verse 1: "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens."

By the words, "the things which we have spoken," the apostle refers to what he had written in the previous portion of this epistle, contained in the first seven chapters. What he now introduces is the "sum" of his argument. This is the summing up of what he had just stated. And what is it?—It is that we, Christians, have such an High Priest. What kind of High Priest?—Why, that priest who was promised by the oath of God, a priest after the order of Melchisedec, about whom he had been instructing them. And who is this priest?—The Lord Jesus Christ, as previously set forth. And where is he?—At the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens. And what is his position and work while there? This the apostle describes in the next verse.

Verse 2: "A minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man."

Paul here advances a step farther in his argument to introduce the place where Christ performs his ministry. He reveals the fact that there is a sanctuary in heaven, that Christ, while at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty there, is in that sanctuary, that he is its minister, and that that is the true tabernacle, pitched by the Lord, and not by man. How completely he answers every objection which might be raised by a Hebrew against Christianity. He shows that Christianity is only the enlarging, unfolding, and completion of the system which his Hebrew brethren had been following for 1500 years. Did the Jew insist that Christianity had no priesthood? Paul shows that it has a priest, after the order of Melchisedec, holy, immortal, and exalted higher than the heavens. Did the Jew affirm that Christianity had no tabernacle? He shows that it has, the true tabernacle, pitched by the hand of God, in the heavens. Did they say that it had no altar and sacrifice? Paul shows them that so far from that, it has the only true and effectual sacrifice, the offering of the Son of God himself. And the relation of these two systems he more fully explains in the verses that follow:—

Verse 3: "For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer. 4. For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law: 5. Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle; for, see, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount."

Here the great and interesting fact is set forth which was the connecting link to unite the two dispensations. Moses, the leader of the Hebrew people, the mediator of the Jewish covenant, was directly instructed by the Lord in regard to the establishment of that whole economy. So the tabernacle that he made was according to the pattern showed to him. It was only a copy; the original was in heaven; and the priesthood ordained to serve in connection therewith, was not an independent priesthood, but one which served only unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, or to that which was afterward to be accomplished by a priest in heaven. Moses was a type of Christ as the mediator of the new covenant. The priests were types of Christ, as the great High Priest after the order of Melchisedec. The victims they offered were types of Christ, as the great sacrifice for the world; and the place where the earthly priests officiated, the tabernacle of Moses, was the type of the place where Christ ministers, the tabernacle in heaven, the great original, which constituted the pattern, after which Moses was commanded to make the earthly building. That was pitched by man, made by the hands of the Israelites, but this was made without human hands; it was pitched by the Lord himself in heaven. And now Paul would have them understand that the time had come for the change, the transfer, from the earthly to the heavenly, from the old dispensation to the new, from the Levitical priesthood to that of Melchisedec, in the hands of Christ. The law had been changed; and the antitypical Priest had appeared from the tribe of Judah; the great Sacrifice for the world had now come, and had been offered; the work had been transferred to heaven, whither Christ had ascended; and there he ministers in the true tabernacle, which is the antitype of the earthly building.

He then shows that no part of the work of Christ, the true priest, could be performed on this earth; for there had been an order of priests ordained, namely, the Levitical priesthood, to do all that was to be done by the service of the priesthood on the earth. Therefore no part of Christ's work as priest was to be performed by him on the earth. He was not acting as priest while on the cross. He was then simply the victim in the hands of wicked men, giving his life an offering for sin. The expressions about his "offering up himself," "making an offering for sin," etc., refer only to his consent to die for man, giving himself a sacrifice for the world, and becoming "obedient unto death, even the death of the cross."

Verse 6: "But now has he obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises."

To minister in realities, as Christ does, is better than to minister in shadows, as the Jewish priests did. It is as much better, as the covenant of which Christ is the minister, is better than that under which the Levitical priests officiated. The apostle now introduces the new covenant, established upon better promises, which he discusses as he proceeds in his argument.

Verse 7: "For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second: 8. For finding fault with them, he saith, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: 9. Not according to the covcovenant that I made with their fathers, in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord. 10. For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: 11: And they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. 12. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sin and their iniquities will I remember no more."

This "first covenant" was that which was made with Israel at the exodus, as recorded in Exodus 19. In this the Lord took the initiative. Remembering his covenant with Abraham, that he would bring out his people from the house of bondage (Gen. 15: 13-16), he proposed to take them to himself, to be an husband unto them, and bring them out on eagles' wings. So, through Moses, he offered to bestow upon them certain blessings upon certain conditions. He promised to make them a peculiar treasure to himself, above all people, and a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation, if they would indeed obey his voice and keep his covenant. The people agreed to it; and further negotiations between God and the people were carried on through Moses with them, to chapter 24, where we find the record that the covenant was ratified with the blood of sacrifice. Verses 7 and 8. Moses was then called up into the mount to receive the tables of stone containing the conditions of the covenant on God's part. Verse 12. And here the ten commandments are by themselves called a "law."

But while Moses was in the mount, the people fell into grievous sin, transgressing the very conditions to which they had just subscribed. All did not fall into this sin, and none of them need to have done so. They contracted to do nothing that God had not provided grace to enable them to perform, if they would only have availed themselves of it. Moses rehearsing the history of that people forty years afterward, as recorded in Dent. 28:16-19, declares that God still stood to his part of the covenant, and that what he proposed to do was a "promise" on his part. This shows that the arrangement was a regular covenant, based on the mutual promises of the contracting parties. The promises were not all on one side. Had they been, it could not have been a covenant.

Nehemiah also refers to the great transgression of Israel in the wilderness, and declares that God did not cast them off on that account. He says: "Yet thou in thy manifold mercies forsookest them not in the wilderness: the pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither the pillar of fire by night, to show them light, and the way wherein they should go. Thou gavest also thy good Spirit to instruct them, and withholdest not thy manna from their mouth, and gavest them water for their thirst. Yet, forty years didst thou sustain them in the wilderness," etc. With such provision for their guidance and support, they certainly need not have fallen into sin and transgression against God. Then Nehemiah goes on to say that the Lord gave them kingdoms and nations, and brought them into the land concerning which he had promised their fathers, and made their children as the stars of heaven for multitude. The blessings of the covenant still continued open to them, but they never complied so fully with the conditions as to secure in their completeness the blessings promised under that arrangement. The nearest they came to it was probably under the reigns of David and Solomon.

But the new covenant, Paul says, is founded upon better promises. What were these? The promises that pertain not to temporal things merely, but to spiritual and eternal things; for let it be borne in mind that the covenant with Abraham looked in two directions, and involved two kinds of blessings: first, blessings upon his literal descendants in the land of Canaan, in the life; and, secondly, spiritual blessings upon all nations through his seed, which is Christ, reaching its complete fulfilment in the world to come. To carry out the first, or preliminary arrangement, the old covenant, made at Horeb, was necessary, to carry out the second, the blessing upon all nations, the new covenant, made by Christ, was necessary.

This new covenant did not exist before it was thus made. When the Lord said (Jer. 31:31), "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah," he referred to something that was to be done in the future, to a covenant that would not exist till it was thus made. The new covenant was not the Abrahamic covenant, but a covenant necessary to be made to carry out the promises of the Abrahamic covenant. Christ was the seed to whom the promise was made. Gal. 3:19. This covenant contains provisions by which sin is taken away in fact. Its blood speaketh better things than that of Abel. It reaches over into the redeemed state, beyond the time when the sins and iniquities of God's people are to be blotted out; for they are to be remembered no more forever. And this state of things once reached is to be everlasting. The blood of Christ is therefore the blood of the everlasting covenant.

This is a covenant in the proper sense of that term, a mutual agreement founded upon mutual promises. We, on our part, covenant to do the will of the Father (Matt. 7:21), to keep the commandments (Matt. 10:17), to take Christ's yoke upon us, and bear his burden (Matt. 11:28-30), and to deny self and follow him. Matt. 10:24. And he covenants on his part to receive us (John 5:37), to write his law in our hearts (Heb. 8:10), to be our God (id.), to make us a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, and a peculiar people (1 Peter 2:9), to be unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption (1 Cor. 1:30), and that we shall sit with him at last upon his own throne. Rev. 3:21. In that blessed and eternal state they will not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for all will then know him from the least to the greatest.

The word "faultless," as applied in the old covenant, in Heb. 8:7, means simply that it was not adequate to secure the end in view. Read the first clause of verse 8, as follows: "For intimating his dissatisfaction, he saith to them," etc. This is the construction some place upon it whose views are entitled to great weight. The idea then will be simply this, that God signified his dissatisfaction with that arrangement, or, in other words, that it was not regarded as the final development of his plan, when he said to them through the prophet Jeremiah, over 600 years before Christ, that he would make a new covenant with them, not according to the covenant made at first. And the apostle would now have them understand that that covenant was made with them through Christ, and was the fulfilment of that prophecy.

Verse 13: "In that he saith, a new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away."

Thus the old covenant continued till Christ brought in the new, as he says in chapter 10:9, "He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second."

FROM OLD TO NEW.

A Study of the Book of Hebrews

CHAPTER 9, verse 1: "Then verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary."

It will be noticed that the word, "sanctuary," in this verse, is a supplied word, but that it is rightly supplied, there can be no manner of question. A few old manuscripts, which Dr. Clarke says are without authority, supply the word skēnē (tabernacle); but this construction will hardly stand with no better support than this. Such authorities as Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelein, Alford, Wordsworth, and Meyer, are all against it. In the verse before, which speaks of "a new covenant," the word, "covenant," is also supplied; but there it can mean nothing else but covenant, and "the new," which that verse mentions, is the same as "that first," mentioned in the verse before us. In verse 8 of chapter 8, the Lord says, "I will make a new covenant," where the word, "covenant," is definitely expressed; and this is the subject of his discourse thenceforward. Therefore it is of the first covenant that he is speaking in verse 1 of chapter 9, and that is the only word that can properly be supplied. The worldly sanctuary, consequently, and all its services, pertained to the first covenant. In other words, that covenant took in that whole system. It was a typical covenant, and continued till that typical service came to an end.

Verse 2: "For there was a tabernacle made; the first, wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the shewbread; which is called the sanctuary. 3. And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all; 4. which had the golden censor, and the ark of the covenant overlaid roundabout with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant; 5. and over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy seat; of which we cannot now speak particularly."

These verses describe the tabernacle of Moses too plainly to be misunderstood. A full description of this building will be found in the 25th chapter of Exodus, and onward. It was the sanctuary which God caused to be erected, that he might dwell among them. The most proper definition, therefore, of the word, "sanctuary," is, "the dwelling-place of God." The building consisted of two apartments, the first, or outer apartment, being called, "the holy place," and the second, or inner room, the "most holy place." These rooms were of the same width and height, but the holy place was twice as long as wide, and twice as long as the most holy place, which latter was a perfect cube in its dimensions. The same proportions were maintained when the movable tabernacle of Moses gave place to the larger and permanent structure of the temple, erected by Solomon, at Jerusalem.

The first apartment contained the golden candlestick with its seven lamps, the table of shewbread with its twelve loaves, and the altar of incense before the veil. The second apartment had the ark, containing the tables of the law, the cherubim overshadowing the mercy seat, which was the cover of the ark, a cherub on either end, with their faces turned looking toward the law reposing beneath, and the golden censor. In the larger sanctuary by Solomon, in addition to the golden cherubim on the mercy seat, there were two cherubim of gigantic proportions, one on either side of the ark, midway between it and the wall of the apartment, and so extending their wings that two of them touched each other in the center over the ark, and the other two extended in opposite directions till they touched the outer walls of the apartment, a beautiful symbol of the fact that the dispensations of God's grace touch each other, and that God's holy law is the center of them all.

The description here given applies to the time of Moses, when the ark contained the golden pot of manna and Aaron's rod that budded. (See Ex. 16: 33, 34; Num. 17: 10.) When the ark was placed in the temple that Solomon built, as stated in 1 Kings 8: 9, the manna and the rod had been removed; for there was nothing there then, says the record, but the two tables of stone. The manna and Aaron's rod had at some time and by some means been taken away, and doubtless placed in the ark in the heavenly temple. (See "Early Writings," p. 26.)

A veil divided between the holy and the most holy place, which in verse 3 is called the second veil. This is positive proof that the hanging at the door of the tabernacle was also known as a veil, and would be, consequently, the first veil. And this shows further that when Paul speaks of Christ as having already entered within the veil, when the book of Hebrews was written (see chapter 6: 19, 20), he means the first veil, since, if he had meant the second veil, he would have so specified it, as he does in the verse before us. Christ began his ministry, of course, within the first veil, in the first apartment, or holy place, of the heavenly sanctuary.

The word "cherubims," in verse 5, should be cherubim. This is the Hebrew plural of cherub, which is what the apostle designed to express; but it is absurd to add to the Hebrew plural, the letter "s," the sign of the English plural.

Verse 6: "Now when these things were thus ordered, the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God. 7. But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people."

Having described the tabernacle, the apostle here gives an epitome of the service connected therewith. The priests ministered daily in the first apartment, or holy place. The word, "tabernacle," is evidently used with two meanings, first as denoting the whole building, as in verse 2, and secondly, as applying only to the different apartments of the building, separately, as in the case before us. The sinner brought his offering to the priest at the door of the sanctuary, confessed over it his sin, then took its life as a testimony that his own life had been forfeited by sin, and that he presented in his stead a substitute, which the Lord had mercifully offered to accept. The priest took the blood, which was the life (Lev. 17:11) charged with imputed guilt, and ministered with it at the altar, or in the holy place, usually the latter, and thus the sin of the individual was transferred to the sanctuary. Here by this process, sins accumulated through the year till the great day of atonement described in verse 7. On that day, alone, the high priest entered into the most holy place with a sacrifice for the whole people. (See the service fully described in Leviticus 16.) There before the ark containing the law, and upon the mercy seat, the cover of the ark, beneath which the law reposed in its majesty and grandeur, he sprinkled the blood and made atonement for the sins of the people. The priest then bore the sins to the door of the sanctuary, and laid them upon the head of the scapegoat, which was then sent away with them to a land not inhabited, and there with his load of guilt, perished forever. Thus was completed the yearly round of service; and each year's service thus finished, typified the one great round of service which Christ performs once for all in the tabernacle in heaven. The relation of the two systems is noted in the two following verses:—

Verse 8: "The Holy Ghost thus signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing: 9: which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience."

The word here rendered "holiest of all," is in the original in the plural number, and should have been rendered, "holy places," referring to the two holy apartments of the heavenly sanctuary. But the translators, conceiving that there could be nothing but a most holy place in heaven, and knowing that this must refer to Christ's entrance into heaven, took the unwarrantable liberty to change the plural into the singular, by which they did violence to the record, as well as lost sight of the whole force of the passage. While the first, or earthly tabernacle, stood, that is, while that system was in force, the way into the heavenly holy places, the sanctuary above, was not made manifest. That is, the attention of the people was not called to it, and their service was not to be directed thereto. During that time their attention was given to the earthly tabernacle and its services, and to the truths which it taught them in figure, and the good that they could receive by learning through the shadow to take hold by faith upon the substance. That was "a figure" for the time then present; and though the gifts and sacrifices which it had to offer could not in themselves lift any burden of sin from the guilty conscience, it served its purpose by pointing forward to something better to come. The contrast between the shadowy and the real is next set forth.

Verse 10: "Which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation. 11. But Christ being come as high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; 12; neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us."

The service consisted only in the particular uses of certain meats and drinks, divers washings and ordinances which pertain to the body, imposed on them till the time of reformation or rectification, when what was imperfect in that system would be remedied. The whole statement implies that the services they were required to perform were not pleasant or attractive. Peter calls them a "yoke of bondage," which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear. Acts 15: 10. But Christ came a High Priest of the better things to come. His tabernacle is greater and more perfect. The blood he has to plead is more efficient; for it is his own precious blood, and by this he has obtained eternal redemption for us. This explains how Christ's ministry is more excellent, and shows some of the better features of the new covenant.

The expression, "holy place," is here again, in the original, in the plural, and refers to the two holy places of the heavenly sanctuary. He entered in once for all into these holy places when he ascended and began his ministry on high; not that he entered into both of them at once; but he became a minister of the tabernacle above, to minister in both apartments when the proper time comes and during the proper period for each. Both may be properly spoken of in connection with his entering into the heavenly temple; for his own offering is the blood which is to be ministered in both apartments. By his offering he has obtained eternal redemption for us, but it will do us no good unless we will accept it as he freely offers it to us.

Verse 13: "For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh; 14; how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your consciences from dead works to serve the living God."

The typical services of the former dispensation served to relieve the offender from ceremonial defilement, and to avert from him temporal punishments. This is called "the purifying of the flesh;" but the blood of Christ takes hold of the inner nature, and purges even the conscience from dead works, that is, from the pollution contracted by works of sin and death, that the person so purged might be able to serve God acceptably. Under the former economy, before persons could present themselves properly before the Lord, they must pass through a process of ceremonial purification. So we must have our consciences purged from dead works by the blood of Christ before we can offer acceptable service unto the living God.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.

A Study of the Book of Hebrews.

CHAPTER 9, verse 15: "And for this cause he is the mediator of the new testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance."

The new testament is the new covenant, and Christ, by the infinite merit of his offering, which through the eternal Spirit he presented without fault to God, and through the infinite efficacy of that offering, by which he secures eternal redemption to all who will receive it, is thus qualified to be the mediator of this new covenant. And his death is retroactive. It reaches back and redeems, or makes propitiation for, the transgressions that were under the first covenant; and those under that covenant who will receive the benefits of it, are those who expressed their faith in it through the types that were provided for that purpose. So all from the very beginning who would accept the call, receive the promise of the eternal inheritance prepared for the overcomer.

Verse 16: "For where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator. 17. For a testament is of force after men are dead; otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth. 18. Whereupon neither the first testament was dedicated without blood. 19. For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book and all the people, 20, saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you."

Reference is here made to the dedication of the first covenant, as recorded in Ex. 24:8-9; and in accordance with the principle that a testament is not of force while the testator is living, but takes effect after his death, Paul refers to the fact that the first testament, or covenant, was thus dedicated with blood. But it was the blood of an animal, and that blood typified the blood of Christ, and this shows the typical nature of that arrangement. It was dedicated with typical blood. Its ministers and services were typical. But when Moses sprinkled the book and all the people, he had not yet received the ten commandments; for it was not till after this, that he was called up into the mount to receive the tables. Ex. 24:12. The ten commandments were never, therefore, dedicated with blood, and were no part of the old covenant. The covenant of types continued till the antitype came; but when Christ, the testator of the new covenant, died upon the cross, the new covenant was then in force.

Verse 21: "Moreover he sprinkled likewise with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry. 22. And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission. 23. It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. 24. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us."

When the dedication of the first covenant, recorded in Ex. 24:8, took place, the sanctuary had not yet been built; and it was not built till after the great transgression of Israel in making the golden calf, and the intercession of Moses in their behalf, and the renewal of the tables of stone. But the sanctuary, when it was built, was dedicated with blood; and it was the blood of that covenant. The arrangement was not therefore broken up by Israel's transgression; but that covenant had, as Paul states in the first verse of this chapter, a worldly sanctuary and ordinances of divine service.

And with the dedication, the apostle connects the cleansing, of the sanctuary. "Almost all things," he says, "are purged with blood;" and the purging, or cleansing, is a purging of sin; for it is immediately added, that without the shedding of blood there is no remission, and remission refers to the putting away of sin. As we have seen, sin had to be removed from the earthly sanctuary, and it was done by the blood of animals on the day of atonement. But as that sanctuary and its services prefigured the true sanctuary, and the real service in heaven, it is necessary that these heavenly things also be cleansed, or the ministry here on earth would not be a true figure of that in heaven. And the heavenly things must be cleansed also with blood; for "without shedding of blood there is no remission." But it must be a better blood than that of animals, which was used in the earthly service. And so it was, for it was even the precious blood of Christ himself.

If any object to the idea of there being anything in heaven to be "cleansed," they must discuss their objection with the apostle himself. He says there is something there to be cleansed, and with us that settles the question. But all should remember that it is sin of which he speaks, not physical, or material, tangible impurity. Our sins, according to the type, are borne into the sanctuary above, by the ministry of Christ for us, and from them that sanctuary must be cleansed. Here the earthly holy places are called "patterns of things in the heavens," and "figures of the true;" and our translators have no difficulty in giving expression to the plural number when it refers to the earthly tabernacle. But if these were indeed figures of the true, then the true must have plural holy places, and the word, in the plural, that describes them, should be translated accordingly.

Verse 25: "Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others; 26; for then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself."

The fact, elsewhere stated, is here emphasized, that Christ in his work does not perform a round of service every year, as the priests in the type did; but the completed yearly service which they performed, represented the one great round of service which Christ performs once for all. A round of service embraces the propitiatory sacrifice and the atonement; and after the atonement, any further ministration can rest only upon another sacrifice. Therefore, if Christ performed a round of service every year, he must die every year, which would be indeed offering himself often. Christ makes the atonement before he comes again; and when the atonement is once made, there is no more offering for sin, and consequently no more pardon for sinners, unless Christ shall again die as a sacrifice for men. Those, therefore, who imagine that there is to be probation after Christ comes, are bolstering up their souls on a falsehood; for such a thing cannot be, unless Christ shall die again, and that he will never do. He dies no more. Acts 13: 34; Rev. 1: 18.

Christ pleads his own blood in his work, but the Levitical priests did not offer their own blood, but the blood of another, and with that they entered into the "holy places" (plural), "year by year," as the last part of verse 25 should be translated. Read also the latter clause of verse 26, as follows: "But now once for all in the end of the ages, he hath been manifested for the putting away of sin by the sacrifice of himself." The Common Version gives the idea that he put away sin by his dying on the cross, which is not what is expressed in the passage. He there made provision by which it could be put away, giving his own life a sacrifice. But he puts it away when he makes the atonement, at the close of his priestly ministration.

Verse 27: "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: 28: so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."

If we adhere closely to the analogy of the apostle's argument, we must consider verse 27 as applying to the work of the priests under the old dispensation. They presented their sacrifices, and in them were counted as dying, and after that the judgment followed, or the work of atonement was made, and their sins were borne away; "so," that is, in like manner, Paul reasons, "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many;" and when he has put them away through the atonement, he will come again without sin, either the sins themselves or the sin offerings, and receive his people to salvation. When he comes the second time, he will appear to all, for all shall see him, but he appears unto salvation, only to those who are looking for him, which implies also a preparation to meet him. These are they of whom the apostle elsewhere speaks, when he says that to all those who love his (Christ's) appearing there will be given a crown of righteousness in that day. 2 Tim. 4: 8.

CHRIST THE PERFECT PRIEST.

A Study of the Book of Hebrews.

CHAPTER 10, verse 1: "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices, which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect. 2. For then would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins."

The law, the Levitical system, could not present in all its features, and in no respect in its reality, the mediatorial work of Christ, which it was designed to prefigure. The sacrifices could not make men perfect, that is, they could not really take away sin. The term "year by year," being used, shows that the reference is to the annual services of the day of atonement; and if that atonement had actually taken away their sin, and rendered them thereafter free from sin, as the real atonement of Christ will do, then there would have been no need of further sacrifices, and then, as verse 2 (margin) says, "They would have ceased to be offered;" for thereafter the person would have had no sin, and would have felt no consciousness of, or condemnation for, the same. But the fact that an atonement was made the next year for the same individuals, showed what the apostle here claims, that the sacrifices they offered were not effectual to cleanse from sin. The reason he states in the two verses which follow.

Verse 3: "But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year. 4. For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins."

The great task which the apostles had to perform with reference to the Jews, was to remove from their minds the conception which had taken deep root therein, that their offerings were effectual to take away sins. They had lost sight of the significance of the ceremonial system, the medium through which they were to show their faith in a Redeemer to come. It was a means and not an end; but they had reversed it, and made it the end and not the means. It is necessary to bear this fact continually in mind to understand much that Paul writes with relation to the Mosaic and Christian dispensations. The argument which he here uses to prove his point; namely, the repetition of their services, would have great weight with the Hebrew mind. Then, after stating the insufficiency of that system as they conceived of it, he turns to the true sacrifice which was to come.

Verse 5: "Wherefore, when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me: 6. In burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure. 7. Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God. 8. Above when he said, Sacrifice and offering and burnt-offerings and offering for sin thou wouldst not, neither hadst pleasure therein; which are offered by the law; 9. Then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. 10. By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all."

The sacrifices and offerings made by men were never designed of God to be the ultimate means of accomplishing the end in view, the removal of sin, and the sanctification of the sinner; and it is in this respect that God had no pleasure in them. When presented in this way, they were not acceptable to him. The purpose of God was the incarnation of Christ and his divine sacrifice, for which purpose he appeared in a human body in this world: "a body hast thou prepared me." And sacrifices and offerings were acceptable to God only when used as prefiguring this sublime event. Christ came to do the will of God in giving his Son to die a sacrifice for men. In the 40th psalm, verses 6-8, from which this quotation is made, we read, "Yea, thy law is within my heart." Thus, Christ came into the world, lived a sinless life, gave himself a divine sacrifice for sin, the antitype of all the offerings and sacrifices which had gone before. This was the advanced stage in the development of the plan of salvation which they had then reached. Under the new covenant we come to Christ, not through the medium of earthly sacrifices and a human priesthood, but directly "to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant." Chapter 12: 24. And so the former system of offerings and sacrifices was taken away, that the divine sacrifice, the Son of God, might appear as the great antitype of all the sacrifices previously offered. If the first covenant had been faultless (that is, if it had been efficient and capable of accomplishing the end in view), then should no place have been sought for the second. Chapter 8: 7. "He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second." And by the accomplishment of God's will by Christ, in offering himself a sinless, perfect sacrifice to God, we are sanctified. We have now a sacrifice which can take away sin in fact, and no longer perform the service which took away sin in figure.

Verse 11: "And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins: 12. But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God; 13. From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool. 14. For by one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified."

The one offering of Christ suffices for all his ministry; and when that has been offered to all men, till all have accepted of it who will do so, then there is no more offering to be made for sin. This one is "forever." There is no further probation for those who do not accept of this. God accepted the sacrifice of his Son, and placed him at his right hand on his own throne (Rev. 3: 21); and there he will remain as priest king (Zech. 6: 12, 13), till his foes be made his footstool. This is in accordance with the promise in Ps. 110: 1, where the Lord (Jehovah) says unto Christ, "Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool." It is Jehovah that subdues Christ's enemies to him, or subjects them to his power. And this is the kingdom which Christ gives up to the Father when he takes his own throne. 1 Cor. 15: 24-26. This reign which Christ is now enjoying with his Father, is, by that theory known as the "Age-to-Come," thrown over into the future thousand years, and Christ is represented as giving up the kingdom at the end of that time. Thus that view misplaces by a thousand years an event which Paul so plainly locates here. And being so widely off the track here, "Age-to-Come" believers cannot be correct in any of the deductions which they draw from this, as a starting point. Paul contrasts frequently the one offering of Christ, with the repeated offerings of the Jewish priesthood. The one offering of Christ is sufficient, because it perfects them who are willing to be sanctified through it, and frees from sin forever them for whom atonement is made by it. But the Levitical priests had continually to repeat their offerings, because they did not take away sin.

Verse 15. "Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us: for after that he had said before, 10, This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them; 17; And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more. 18. Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin."

Further evidence is offered in these verses that Paul is contrasting conditions under the old covenant and the new, and he shows that the promise of the new covenant, that God will no longer remember the sins and iniquities of his people, is secured by this work which Christ does in forever putting away sin by the true atonement made only by his blood. When sins are thus atoned for, or remitted, there is no more offering for sin. There is no need of any further offering; for this has accomplished all that was intended in the removal of sin, and the perfecting of all that would accept of it; and there is no possibility of any further offering for sin; for Christ is not to die again. There is, therefore, no future probation, nor salvation for unrepentant sinners. How people can deceive themselves into the idea of a future probation, in view of such testimony, it is difficult to conceive. They could not if they would study the word of God and believe what it says; for "now is the accepted time," and "now is the day of salvation."

THE LIVING WAY.

A Study of the Book of Hebrews.

CHAPTER 10, verse 19: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, 20, by a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh."

The apostle having now set forth the doctrine of the priesthood of Christ from every point of view, so that like a many-sided and well-polished diamond it emits the bright rays of its efficiency and superiority from every angle, he now turns to the practical side of this question, showing what effect such a truth should have on the lives of believers. He starts out with the encouraging assurance that we have boldness to enter into the holy places by the blood of Jesus. The word "boldness," is in the margin, "liberty," and means full and free access in the entrance to the holy places, where Christ ministers for us. The word translated "holiest," is in the plural, and should have been translated "holy places," meaning both the holy places of the heavenly sanctuary. Christians do not, of course, follow their Lord by faith into both the holy places at once; for our Lord does not enter them both at once. He ministers first in the holy, and then in the most holy, place. But while he was in the holy place, Christians had free access to him thereby faith, and now when he is in the most holy, they can still follow him there. So by the blood of Jesus, which he offered once for all, Christians come to their Lord in both the holy and the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary according to the time in which they live. The veil, of verse 20, refers to the veil which constituted the door of the sanctuary. Through that veil into the sanctuary we enter in by a new and living way, and this way is his flesh. Let it be noticed that he does not say that his flesh is the veil, as those contend who oppose the view of a literal sanctuary in heaven. But his flesh, his sacrifice, is the new and living way. It is called "new," because no one had ever before had the privilege of thus coming directly to Christ; and it was a "living" way because though Christ is the sacrifice, yet he lives, and thus can plead his own sacrifice as if newly offered. Indeed this is the way in which he is set forth in the book of Revelation. John saw in the midst of the throne "a lamb as it had been slain;" that is, as just in the act of being slain. Rev. 5:6. Thus it is a living way, because it is his own flesh, his sacrifice. But he, having given his life an offering for sin, was raised from the dead and so lives, making a living way of access to God.

Verse 21: "And having a high priest over the house of God; 22; Let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water."

With a high priest such as had been previously described, one who is touched with all the feeling of our infirmities, one who is able to save, and has promised to save, to the uttermost, all that seek him, what encouragement we have to come to the throne of grace. "With a true heart;" that is, feeling our absolute need of help, and being truly in earnest to obtain it. Seeking grace not for selfish ends, but that we may thereby glorify God. "In full assurance of faith;" that is, having not a shadow of distrust that God is able and willing to bestow upon us all that we need. "Hearts sprinkled;" referring to the sprinkling of the blood upon the mercy-seat to atone for sin. By this application of the blood of Christ in our behalf, the heart is cleansed from guilt, the conscience is made right, and the load of condemnation is lifted from the soul. "Bodies washed with pure water." The priests and Levites, before they engaged in the services of the Lord, were to wash their flesh in water so as to be physically without defilement. It is quite usual to refer this expression to baptism, as in Acts 22:16; but that speaks of washing away sins, not washing the body merely. The old adage is, that "cleanness is next to godliness;" and the expressions here used seem to be written to set forth the state of inward and outward purity which the Christian should secure and maintain.

Verse 23: "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering; for he is faithful that promised."

Although our Common Version has the word "faith," in this passage, the now generally accepted reading is, "hope." Let us hold fast the profession we have made of hope in Jesus Christ. And this accords with the last clause: "He is faithful that promised." Caryl says that there are four things ascribed to God in Scripture which may assure us that he will be certain to perform all his promises: (1) He remembers them all; (2) he is unchangeable; (3) he has power to perform them; (4) he cannot deny himself, and so will not falsify them.

Verse 24: "And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works; 25; Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another; and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching."

"Consider;" that is, "to have regard for." "To provoke;" "to incite, stir up, encourage." There is too much considering of one another to criticize and pick flaws and find fault and censure and condemn on false reports and misunderstandings. Instead of this we should "have regard" for one another, to help those who are weak, encourage the faltering, and comfort the feeble-minded. "Bear ye one another's burdens," is the apostle's exhortation in another place. By example let each lead the others on in the way of love and good works. And one important aid in this direction is the frequent meeting together in the worship of God. What more impressive sight is there than a congregation of believers earnestly engaged in the service of the Lord? How different from other assemblies; and how often the united presence and voices of our brethren and sisters give life and encouragement such as is rarely attained by individual and lonely prayers. The word "exhort," is used in the sense of "encouraging." As the great day is seen approaching, with the trials, persecution, and distresses which we must pass through before we reach it, we need to encourage each other to hold fast, and endure hardship as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. This exhortation is given with special reference to the nearness of the end, the days in which we are now living. But some even in these days will allow their love to wax cold, will forsake the house of God, will become evil servants, and depart from the faith.

Verse 26: "For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, 27. But a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries. 28. He that despised Moses's law died without mercy under two or three witnesses: 29. Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden underfoot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unbloody thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace?"

The willful sin here mentioned, can be nothing less than utter apostasy from Christ. The "unpardonable sin," rejects Christ and his sacrifice. Any sin that does not do this, can be forgiven; for there is provision to reach it. But when one rejects Christ, he cuts himself off from the only means that can reach his case and rescue him; and for such an one there can, of course, be no hope. By the terms, "Moses's law," is meant the requirements and institutions of the Mosaic system. To some of these the death penalty was attached, as in Lev. 23:30. This does not refer to the ten commandments. The great moral law of God is never called, the "law of Moses." But Moses's law was the type; and if he who heaped contempt upon the type, suffered the heaviest penalty that could be inflicted in this world, how should he be treated who heaped contempt upon the antitype, and treads underfoot the Son of God himself? He shall have "sorer punishment," even the second death in the lake of fire. Rev. 20:11-15.

There is great significance in the fact that the apostle brings in verses 26-29 right after his reference to the coming of the great day, in verse 25, showing as it does, that they apply in the last days. And right here in our own time, Spiritualism has come up, developing more of the class here described, than any other religious movement the world has ever seen. From this point of view, the verses become prophetic; and how accurately the prophecy has been fulfilled.

Verse 30: "For we know him that hath said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, The Lord shall judge his people. 31. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."

This language implies that this spirit of apostasy will result in bringing persecution and trouble upon the true church; and we are forewarned that an unrighteous alliance between apostate Protestantism, Roman Catholicism, and Spiritualism, will commit this government wholly into the hands of the powers of darkness, whose great object is to exterminate the truth of God from the earth. But the people of God should then "commit the keeping of their souls to him [God] in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator" (1 Peter 4:19), knowing that vengeance belongeth unto him, and that he will in due time vindicate his cause and people, in a glorious victory over all their foes.

Verse 32: "But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions; 33. Partly, whilst ye were made a gazing stock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, whilst ye became companions of them that were so used. 34. For ye had compassion of us in my bonds, and took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance."

These verses no doubt describe the experiences of those who were contemporary with the apostle, and were associated with him in the trials and tribulations of the gospel work. The record of it is given here because their course was to be an example to believers in all coming time, and their experience was to be duplicated in every age. Especially would it be so with the last church, and very appropriate to them is the exhortation to "call to remembrance the former days." The saints have in heaven an enduring substance. There is then something there tangible and material.

Verse 35: "Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. 36. For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. 37. For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry. 38. Now the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. 39. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

The confidence we are not to cast away, is our liberty of access to God, our confidence in his truth, and our assurance of divine aid to carry us safely through to the end. Do not, is the exhortation to us, throw away so great a privilege. Verse 37 shows that this applies to the last days, when the Lord is about to come. There has been a seeming delay in the returning of the Master, so that, after having moved out in the work of preparing for, and proclaiming, his near coming, there is need of patience or endurance, to stand fast, and bear uncomplainingly, the trial of the waiting time. The language of verse 37, has, in the original, an intensiveness that is not shown in the Common Version. Literally it reads, "For yet a very, very, little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry." The coming referred to, is the coming of the Lord Jesus, in all his glory, in the clouds of heaven. That appearing is near at hand. And during the time we are waiting for it, the just are to live by faith. The word as here used, includes everything that is embraced in that term. If the believer lives that life which is "by the faith of the Son of God," quickened and vitalized thereby, he will hold fast his profession without wavering, will remain steadfast, and not apostatize from the truth. This, we apprehend, is what the apostle here especially warns against; for he immediately adds, "But if any man draw back." The drawing back is placed in contrast with the living by faith. The words, "any man," as applied in our Common Version, are without warrant. The word to be supplied, is the regularly understood subject of the verb; namely, "he," referring to the "just," mentioned immediately before. One may have been a partaker of the heavenly calling, may have entered upon the Christian life, and been called out to wait for the Lord from heaven; but if, when the time of patience and tarrying comes, he draws back, the Lord will cease to take any pleasure in him; for he places himself among those mentioned in Rev. 3: 16, who will be spued out of the mouth of the faithful and true Witness.

The words "draw back," mean more than simply departing from the faith. They involve the meaning of slinking away, or hiding away, through fear. If, in view of the trials and persecutions which the people of God are to meet, as the last conflict between truth and error looms up before us, a believer becomes timid and half-hearted, and shrinks away through fear, and compromises his faith, and seeks to save his life, he will lose it. But if he remains steadfast in the faith, he will save the life which others seek to save by drawing back, and lose in consequence. Let us be of that company of heroes who can say, "We are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

THE ATONEMENT.

Not Made On the Cross—In Process Now.

During the week of prayer, when the reading on the Atonement was presented in the Tabernacle, the reader took occasion to digress, and speak of some of the errors that have sprung up in the Christian world on account of a misunderstanding of the subject of the sanctuary and the atonement. Among these errors is the idea that the atonement was made upon the cross. Being requested to write out some of the thoughts for the Review, we present the following on this point:—

In the reading occurs this statement: "Every man's destiny will be decided when this work [of atonement] is finished; for they for whom atonement is made, and who thereby have their sins removed, will be saved; while those whose sins are not thus put away, will have them to answer for, and will perish with them at last in the lake of fire."

That this statement is true, is self-evident; for if it is not true, the atonement amounts to nothing. But if it is true, it will be seen at once that it has an important bearing upon the prevailing belief that the atonement was made upon the cross; for that which Christ did upon the cross was for the whole multitude of mankind. John said, pointing the people to Christ, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away [margin, "beareth"] the sin of the world;" and Peter adds, "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree." John 1:29; 1 Peter 2:24. Now if this was the atonement, the first conclusion would be that the sins of all men have been atoned for, and that consequently all will be saved. This would be universal salvation in its broadest sense. This would also be atoning for sins before they were committed, which would be universal license; for if an atonement has already been made for all the sins a person may commit, he has perfect liberty to commit them, and it does not diminish in the least his prospect of salvation.

But Universalism cannot be true; for the Lord declares by the prophet that "the soul that sinneth, it shall die;" and Christ will say to a multitude at last, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his angels." Ezek. 18:20; Matt. 25:41.

So, to avoid this dilemma, another conclusion is resorted to, which is that Christ did not atone for all men on the cross, but only for a chosen few, whom God purposed to save. But this would be also to atone for sins before they were committed, it would be foreordination and predestination in its blindest and most repulsive form; and it would contradict the testimony of both John and Peter, as quoted above. Thus, in view of the fact that what Christ did upon the cross was for all the world, these two huge and hideous errors have sprung from supposing that he there made atonement for the sins of men.

But if that was not the atonement, then what was it that Christ did upon the cross for all the world? and what is the atonement? and when is it made? If the subject of the sanctuary had not been lost sight of in the Christian world, and the priesthood of Christ had not been buried up under a load of fog and mysticism, theology would never have fallen into the error and confusion which prevail upon this subject.

In the sanctuary service we have presented before us an object-lesson on the process of the forgiveness of sin. The repentant sinner brought his offering to the door of the sanctuary; he confessed over it his sin, and thus transferred the sin from himself to the victim; the victim thus bearing the sin was then slain, and his blood ministered by the priest in the sanctuary. At the end of the year, the priest with another offering, went into the most holy place, the second apartment of the sanctuary, and sprinkled the blood upon the mercy-seat, beneath which reposed the law of God, the transgression of which made men sinners, and thus atoned for the sins which had accumulated in the sanctuary during the year, and bore them from the place, to be sent away on the head of the scapegoat, and to perish with him in the wilderness. This day was therefore called "the day of atonement;" and with this service, and with this day, the yearly round of ministration came to an end.

Now, all the offerings and all the sacrifices of the ancient, typical sanctuary find their antitype in Christ and his work, as the sacrifice and High Priest for the world. He acts in the capacity both of offering and priest. He is the antitype of the expiring victim, as well as the antitype of the ministering priest, but not both at the same time. And it is not a little surprising that people, in contemplating the work of Christ, should overlook the distinction between these divisions of his service. When he stood as the antitypical victim, the great sacrifice for sin, he was not acting as priest. But it is the priest only who makes the atonement, not the victim. And what part of his work was it that Christ did upon the cross? He there gave his life as the great offering for sin, the sacrifice on which the sins of all the world were laid. But he was not then acting as priest. "If he were on earth," says Paul, "he should not be a priest." Heb. 8: 4. That is, no part of his priestly work is performed on this earth. All of that is accomplished in heaven. On the cross he bore the sins of the world, as the offering for sin. In heaven, having provided the offering, he pleads his blood, as priest, for all those who will come to God through him for pardon. These two positions should not be confounded. On the cross Christ offered himself as the sacrifice; in heaven he pleads his blood as priest, and makes the atonement. Therefore, though he bore on the cross the sins of all the world, that is, made a sacrifice which would be of sufficient merit to cover and cancel all the sins of every person who has ever lived, or is to live, on this earth, it does not follow that all will be saved; for all will not come to him that they might have life. John 5: 40. But for all who will come to him and seek and accept his pardon, he will grant it on the strength of his sacrifice, and make atonement for their sins when the time comes for his mediation for the world to close and probation to end. For it will be noticed that according to the type, the atonement was the last act of the yearly round of service; and so, in the antitype, the atonement will be the last work of Christ in behalf of his people.

Thus, by a true view of this subject, Universalism is avoided on the one hand, and foreordination and reprobation on the other. For while provision is made for all, only those who will seek for it, will receive the benefits of it. Thus the atonement will be made by Christ at last only for those who have sought pardon through his blood, and it comes after its subjects have lived and committed their sins, and repented of them that they might be saved.

The subject from any point of view is full of interest and instruction; but its great solemnity at the present time lies in the fact that the final work of atonement by our Lord Jesus Christ has been going forward since the end of the prophetic period (the 2300 days of Daniel 8) that marked its beginning, in 1844, for almost fifty years. In the type it occupied only an indefinite portion of one day in the year. In the antitype, though there is nothing by which to fix the exact proportion of time, it must be comparatively brief, and that auspicious day be near when sin will have all been put away, and Christ appear without sin (a sin-offering) unto salvation, King of kings, and Lord of lords, to take his people to himself.

377.—THE ANGEL'S ANSWER. DAN. 8:13, 14.

How did the answer of the angel, in Dan. 8:14, meet the question asked about treading the sanctuary under foot in verse 13?

INQUIRER.

Answer.—Light is thrown upon this question by Rev. 13:4-7. This brings to view the same power that was to tread under foot the sanctuary and shows one of the ways in which it was done; namely, by blaspheming God, blaspheming his name, blaspheming his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven; that is to say, burying the truth of God in regard to those important objects under a mass of error and superstition. Now, when the angel said, "Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," he shows that light would come forth, which would first of all dispel all those papal errors about the temple in heaven, the law, the work of Christ there, and thus bring a people out from under the error of Romanism in this respect. And this has been going on ever since the light of the sanctuary has been preached to the world. Of course the accomplishment of the full object takes time, and the literal destruction of that power is to follow in due time. So, it seems to us that the answer of the angel was quite pertinent to the question. The sanctuary is trodden under foot, first, in being buried up in a mass of error, and having the minds of the people turned away from that place to Rome and the pope; and the first thing to do to remedy that state of things would be to dispel from the minds of men those errors, set those objects in their true light, and finally destroy the antichristian power literally. This work was begun by the light that came in regard to the sanctuary, at the end of the 2300 days, in 1844, according to the words of the angel, and will be fully accomplished when the people of God, being all established in the truth of his word, are called out of all error, and that great oppressive system is destroyed by the brightness of Christ's coming.

THE SANCTUARY.

THE subject of the sanctuary is one which should specially engage the attention of Seventh-day Adventists. It is a subject peculiar to this people. There is no other denomination whose views on this question correspond with, or even approximate, the views set forth in the works issued by this people. Every one of our people should therefore make it a point of first importance to become thoroughly conversant with this subject.

But not merely for the reason already named should we study this question. We should do it on account of its intrinsic importance. It is a safeguard against error. It is a citadel of truth. We still frequently meet with articles on this subject in our exchanges from First-day Adventists advocating the various, and hence bolstering up specious errors. Not enough can be said in favor of those views to make even the framework of a respectable argument; yet they tenaciously cling to them. At first thought, this seems very strange; yet it is perhaps not to be wondered at so much after all; for it does not take a very long look at the subject for any one to see that if the view we hold be adopted, it makes absolutely necessary the adoption of certain other views which some seem determined neither to accept nor to obey.

Looking at the subject in a general sense, that which is perhaps most calculated to excite our wonder is the fact that a question so intimately connected with, and so essentially modifying, some of the most important subjects of the Bible, should have lain so long unnoticed. And this furnishes all the greater reason why, now that light is shining upon it, and its commanding position in the great temple of truth is discovered, the most earnest efforts should be made to bring it to the attention of the people.

This subject is intimately connected with the prophecies, and this may be one reason why it has not sooner engaged the special attention of Bible students; for it has been reserved to this present generation, living in "the time of the end," to behold the seal broken from the prophetic page and to see a wonderful increase of knowledge respecting its soul-inspiring utterances. But an understanding of the subject of the sanctuary is essential to the understanding of some of the most important of these prophetic records.

There is, it is said, in Rome, a room, the walls of which are covered with tracings which to the beholder, as he enters, appear but a mass of inextricable confusion. But as he reaches one certain point in the room, immediately all lines fall into place, all forms assume their due proportion, the laws of perspective assert their sway, and immediately out of the chaos rise order and beauty in harmonious and beautiful proportion.

The sanctuary occupies this true point of perspective in the prophetic apartment of the sacred Scriptures. From it the unity and harmony of the prophetic lines can be seen as from no other standpoint.

It is interwoven also with subjects of the greatest practical importance. It has a wider bearing and involves a greater number of important topics than any other subject to which our attention is called by the unfoldings of prophecy. It especially reus up to the work of a preparation of character for the test of the judgment, and the coming of the Son of man. Study the subject of the sanctuary.

THE MYSTERY OF GOD.

When Is It to Be Finished?

In the course of the revelation vouchsafed to John on the isle of Patmos, the angel made to him this solemn announcement: "In the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound [the declaration of the oath angel of Revelation 10 was that], the mystery of God should be finished." Rev. 10:7.

The mystery of God is certainly some department of his work among men; and when the time comes that any division of God's work is finished, and brought to a close, that is a solemn hour. Can we tell from this testimony when that will be? To answer this question let us consider the definition of the terms here used, and the scope of the trumpet under the sounding of which this is to occur.

The "mystery of God" is the gospel. Rom. 16:25, 26; Eph. 3:3; Gal. 1:11, 12; Eph. 1:9, 10; 1 Cor. 2:7. The gospel has a certain definite work to do, that is, to gather out from all nations, during the time that sin is running its course, a people for God. This is not to continue forever; the time will come when its work will be accomplished, the gospel will no longer be proclaimed, and the mystery of salvation through Christ will be accomplished. The finishing of the mystery of God, therefore, is the closing of the work of the gospel for the world, which means the close of probation, and the fixing of the final destiny of every man.

This is to be accomplished "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel." But the trumpet of the seventh angel is one, the sounding of which covers a great length of time. It embraces the entire time of the third woe. Rev. 11:14, 15. It begins some little time before probation ends, according to Rev. 10:7, and it extends to the close of that scene of destruction in which all sin and sinners will perish at the end of the thousand years of Revelation 20. This is shown by the testimony of Rev. 11:18. It continues, therefore, more than a thousand years.

The question now arises, In what part of this long period does the finishing of the mystery of God come in? It is not at the close, nor at any intermediate division of that period; for the scripture reads, "When he shall begin to sound." And does this mean that the finishing of the mystery is an instantaneous work, to be accomplished the very moment the trumpet begins to sound?—That cannot be; for there are "days," plural, doubtless used in a prophetic sense, meaning years, allotted to this work: "In the days of the voice of the seventh angel."

Two facts are thus established: first, that no part of the sounding of the seventh trumpet could be given before the work of finishing the mystery of God is entered upon; for in that case it would not be in the beginning of his sounding; and, secondly, that that work cannot be accomplished instantaneously; for in that case it could not occupy "days," as the testimony says it will. So the conclusion is inevitable that the work of finishing the mystery of God, and the sounding of the seventh trumpet commence together; that is, the commencement of that work marks the time when the trumpet begins to sound; but the years in which the work will be accomplished are so few in comparison with the whole period of the sounding of the trumpet, that they may be called the "beginning" of his sounding.

The work of the gospel closes with a special work called the cleansing of the sanctuary. Dan. 8:14. To this work, in the type, one day was allotted called the "day of atonement," because the cleansing of the sanctuary was the making of the atonement. Lev. 16:20, 29-34; 23:27. This work in the antitypical ministry of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary, begins at the end of the 2300 days (Dan. 8:14), which period ended in 1844. Then the temple of God, or the inner apartment of the sanctuary on high, where the ark is, was opened, as stated in Rev. 11:19. This in the type, was the apartment in which the atonement was always made; and in the antitype this work is the closing up of the ministry of Christ, which of course synchronizes with the work of the gospel. Hence the cleansing of the sanctuary, the making of the atonement, and the finishing of the mystery of God, are all one and the same thing. And this work began at the end of the 2300 days in 1844, when the seventh trumpet began to sound, and the temple of God was opened in heaven. But this work is all to be finished, "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound."

Fifty one years have already elapsed since this closing work in the heavenly sanctuary began. How much longer can it continue? Only a portion of one day out of the year devoted to this work in the type, though it gives us no basis for any definite calculation, does reveal unerringly its comparative brevity in the antitype where we now are. And the finishing of this work draws the line of separation forever between the righteous and the wicked. Are we prepared for the issue?

u. s.

THE JUDGMENT.

It is worth one's while to make a careful and thorough study of the great subject of the judgment, not only because of the vital importance which attaches to it, but also because there is a beauty and consistency in what is revealed concerning it, which cannot be discerned without a clear understanding of its various features. The different phases of the judgment work are not brought out so clearly in any other subject as in that of the sanctuary.

There are the two usual branches in God's judgment work, the same as is illustrated in judicial proceedings among men. These are, first, the investigation of the cases of those who are to be brought into judgment; and secondly, the execution of the sentence passed upon each case.

The first question to be decided is the question of who are righteous, and who are wicked; that is, the dividing line is to be drawn between the two classes. This part of the judgment work is, in our phraseology, named "the investigative judgment." This question must be decided before the second advent of Christ; for when he appears in the clouds of heaven, and the trumpet sounds, all the righteous then living on the whole earth are changed to immortality "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye" (1 Cor. 15:52), and all the righteous dead are at the same time raised from their graves. 1 Thess. 4:16, 17. This shows that a previous work of decision, setting each man in his appropriate class, has been accomplished. This work is performed in the sanctuary, or temple, in heaven, being the last portion of our Lord's ministry as mediator there, and is called "the cleansing of the sanctuary;" for this part of Christ's work is simply to present to the Father, for his acceptance, the names of those who have been followers of the Lord Jesus, and have been overcomers in his name.

Let it be carefully noted that this portion of the judgment work is to decide this one point,—who are victors in the warfare with sin, who have overcome, and are therefore to receive eternal life. This is proved by Rev. 3:5, which speaks of this very time when Christ confesses the names of his people before his Father and the holy angels, or accepts them as his children; and the whole burden of the proceedings at this time is whether the names of those whose cases are then under investigation shall be blotted out of the book of life, and their sins remain against them as those who have not overcome, or whether their names shall be retained in the blessed book of life, their sins be blotted out, and they be sealed for everlasting life.

In this part of the judgment, God alone is Judge. The Ancient of Days sits as judge (Dan. 7:9), and Christ, as mediator, comes in before him. Verses 13, 14. Christ acknowledges to his Father those who have taken him as their sanctification and redemption, and the Father, as judge, accepts them as the trophies of the grace of his beloved Son. This is as far as the Father acts as judge in the matter. Beyond this, he "judgeth no man." John 5:22. Beyond this, he "hath committed all judgment unto the Son." Id. The Son has charge of all further investigations that are necessary, and all the execution of judgment upon every class that is to follow. The investigative judgment, in which God acts as judge, began at the end of the 2300 days in 1844, when the prophet declared that the sanctuary should be cleansed. Dan. 8:14. It will continue till the close of probation.

This part of the judgment having been accomplished, probation having ended, and the line of division having been drawn between the righteous and the wicked, and the righteous sealed for everlasting life, there is necessary at once a change in the status of the respective parties. Some token must be placed upon the righteous to show that they are overcomers, and have received the first instalment of the glorious hope for which they have so long believed and labored. To this end the second coming of Christ takes place. He comes forth to crown his people with a nature which is incorruptible, and a life which is immortal. But this is also a part of the judgment; for it is but the carrying out of the decisions made in the sanctuary before Christ changed his position from priest to king. So this event is spoken of as a work of judgment: "I charge thee therefore before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom." 2 Tim. 4:1. In what respect does Christ judge the quick (living) and the dead? He does not at this time investigate their characters; for that has then already been done. But he does carry out the decisions made in the investigative, or sanctuary, judgment; in other words, he executes that portion of the judgment so far as its decrees apply, which is, to make manifest who are approved of God, and who are rejected. This he does by changing the righteous living, and raising the righteous dead, to glory and immortality, and leaving all the wicked in their graves till the second resurrection.

And this is not only called a judgment, because it is a part of the great judgment work, but it is also called rewarding every man according to his works (Rev. 22:12), because it is a part of the reward which is to be given them. The word "reward" means both favor bestowed and also punishment; and it will be indeed no small reward to feel for the first time the thrill of immortality coursing through one's veins; and it will be no small punishment for one to realize that his doom is to be the second death. But the second coming of Christ does not exhaust the rewards and punishments any more than it covers all the work of the judgment. There is more to follow—more judgment and more execution of the judgment.

The saints being made immortal, enter upon their work of the thousand years. That is a work of judgment; for it is said that "judgment was given unto them." Rev. 20:4. That being subsequent to the time when the Father "committed all judgment unto the Son," Christ is judge in this scene; for these saints live, and reign, and do a work of judgment, with him a thousand years. Id. This is the time when the overcomers sit with Christ on his throne, as he has overcome and has set down with the Father on his throne. Rev. 3:21. And what is the work of judgment in which they engage?—It must have to do with the wicked; for the saints are some time to judge the world (1 Cor. 6:2); and here is the only place where that work can come in; for the saints can judge no one till they themselves are made immortal; and as soon as they are made immortal, the thousand years begin; and at the end of that period all the wicked are destroyed, and cannot of course be judged after that. The thousand years are therefore the only time when they can do this work, and right here it is said that judgment is given unto them, and they live and reign with Christ. Daniel speaks of the same time and work when he says that "judgment was given to the saints of the Most High." Dan. 7:22.

But in reference to these wicked, a certain portion of the judgment had already taken place before the thousand years began; that is, it was decided that they were reprobates, and were doomed to the second death. To what, then, can this judgment of the thousand years pertain?

—It can be only to determine the amount of punishment due to their deeds, according to which every man is to be rewarded. And the Bible clearly teaches degrees of punishment. Speaking of the time when the Lord shall reckon with his servants, we read: "And that servant, which knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes." Luke 12:47. So also there are to be degrees in the reward of the righteous. "There is," says the apostle, "one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars: for one star differeth from another star in glory." 1 Cor. 15:41. This he applies to the immortal state. None of these particulars are decided in the investigative judgment now in session. That, as we have seen, decides only one question—who have gained, and who have lost, the salvation offered to us in Christ. But all these other particulars can be adjusted during the thousand years.

Then comes the fourth division of the judgment work, the execution of the sentence, or the destruction of the wicked at the end of the thousand years. This is the perdition of ungodly men. 2 Peter 3:7. They disappear forever in the lake of fire. Rev. 20:9, 14, 15. Neither is it till this time that the saints enter upon their full reward; for it is here that the King says to them on his right hand, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Matt. 25:34.

Thus there are four stages in the judgment work: (1) The investigative judgment just before the coming of Christ, now in session; (2) The execution of the decisions of this judgment at the coming of Christ; (3) The determining of the degrees of rewards or punishments appropriate to each case during the thousand years; (4) The carrying out of these sentences at the close of that period. In this process ample time is given for this great work, and all its divisions come in, in regular and harmonious order. In the first scene, God is judge and Christ mediator. In all the remainder of the work, judgment is committed unto the Son, who carries forward the divine purpose till every vestige of sin is removed, and his people are established in their everlasting kingdom of righteousness and glory. U. S.

QUESTIONS ON THE SANCTUARY.

To him who has acquainted himself with the plain teaching of the Bible on the subject of the sanctuary it seems marvelous that this question should so far have been lost sight of as it has been in the Christian world. It is a question of surpassing interest. Its relation to, and bearing on, the main features of the great plan of redemption through Jesus Christ are essential to a proper understanding of the modus operandi of the office and work of a mediator between God and man. The first view of the Scripture testimony on these points is like a new revelation to the student of prophecy; and it is natural that many queries should arise in every investigative mind, in reference to the different stages of the progress of the work.

For a clearer view of this point, let us look at an outline of the picture presented in the Scriptures: (1) The tabernacle built by Moses was the sanctuary "made with hands" (Heb. 9:24). It was the tabernacle for the time then present (verse 9), or for the typical dispensation, and was a type of the greater and more perfect tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man (Heb. 8:2; 9:11), a literal glorious temple not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; (2) The ministrations of the priests in the earthly tabernacle for a whole year, with the exception of a work of atonement, which occupied a portion of one day in the year, was performed in the first apartment, or holy place; (3) To make the atonement, the high priest passed into the second interior room of the building, or "most holy place," and performed a service before the ark of God's testament, which contained the ten commandments; (4) The day on which this service was performed was the tenth day of the seventh month, called "the day of atonement," and was the most solemn and momentous occasion of the whole year, on account of the peculiar and decisive nature of the work then performed. It was the climax, the conclusion and summary, of the work of the entire preceding year. Though sinners had brought their offerings for themselves, individually, at different times through the whole year, if they failed to secure an interest in the great work of atonement, all went for naught; (5) The sinner availed himself of the benefits of the atonement, not by bringing his individual offering to the priest at the door of the tabernacle on that day, as he had done through the year, but by coming, in the spirit of reverent worship, to the tabernacle, and afflicting his soul with the company gathered, in intense devotion, around the tabernacle, by the express direction of the Lord, on that day, thereby showing that he had an interest in the general offering, which was then being presented for the people, to atone for their sins; (6) These earthly priests, both in the nature of the different divisions of the work in which they had to engage, and the apartment of the tabernacle in which it was done, were serving unto the example and shadow of the priestly work of the Lord Jesus in the tabernacle on high (Heb. 8:1-5), from which it follows that when Christ ascended up on high, and entered upon his work as mediator for the world, he began his ministry in the first apartment of the heavenly temple. And his work was there to continue till he reached the work of atonement, the last act in the sanctuary service.

Over twenty-three hundred years ago, prophecy pointed out the time when this last specific portion of Christ's work, the making of atonement, should begin: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8:14. It has also been demonstrated that that period falls within easily ascertained dates, 457 B. C. to A. D. 1844; and in this we are brought to the very day of the fulfillment; for the calendar of the antitype follows that of the type; and the sanctuary was cleansed on the tenth day of the seventh month. That day, Jewish time, when harmonized with the modern calendar in 1844, fell on October 22. To that date we are held as the time when Christ entered upon the last great division of his work; that is, to make the atonement, cleanse the sanctuary, and finish the mystery of God (Rev. 10:7; Gal. 1:11, 12; Eph. 3:3-6), the gospel, or good news to perishing men. — all this, unless we throw away openly furnished and unquestionable data.

And now the questions arise, How does this view of the change of Christ's position in the heavenly sanctuary affect the status of the religious world? How does it affect the relation of men to Christ? Was there no work performed in the first apartment of the typical sanctuary on the day of atonement? And is there no service in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary now? If not, how can those find Christ now who are not aware of the change that has taken place in his position? By what offering were the sins of the people which were committed on the day of atonement, removed? If sins can be pardoned while Christ is in the most holy place, does it not show that there was some service in the type for the pardon of sin on that day? Did the high priest confine himself to the service in the most holy place on that day?

We have received a communication from a correspondent, including, substantially, these questions, which shows that there is a spirit of investigation abroad, which we are glad to see; and we take pleasure in making a brief response. In comparing type with antitype, on this subject, we should bear in mind the words of Paul, in Heb. 10:1: "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things," etc. Just emphasize the words, "and not the very image of the things," and let them relieve any perplexity that may arise on account of some variation between type and anti-type.

Thus the type had only imperfect agents and means to carry out its work. The priests were mortal, short-lived men; hence a complete round of service was limited to one year, in order that the same high priest might complete it without interruption, and so be a proper type of Christ, who will perform once for all his high and holy mediatorial work. Again, the earthly high priest, being himself a sinner, had to make an offering for himself, and have his own sins atoned for, before he could properly minister for others. Christ does not have to do this, hence need not wear the garb of humility which was used by the earthly priests. In accordance with this, the Testimonies speak of him only as clothed with garments of beauty, power, and state. Several years ago a minister repudiated the Testimonies, on the strength of this fact, not seeming to perceive that a costume which would be appropriate for a sinful mortal high priest, would not be appropriate for the sinless, ever-living One, who ministers for us above.

But more than this: the offerings of the earthly priests furnished only the blood of animals, which could not be preserved through the year; hence it was necessary to provide a fresh offering for the day of atonement: but the blood of Christ being once shed, is not so: its virtue remains; and it is ministered in both apartments, whether literally, or by virtue of its merits, is immaterial. He is our living sacrifice; and the blood he shed on Calvary is an ever-present means of expiation in courts of heaven; and by faith all have access to him in either place. Heb. 10:19 reads: "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest [Greek, plural, "holy places"] by the blood of Jesus:" not, of course, to enter both places at the same time, but in the order in which the work pertains to each respectively,—in the holy place while Christ ministers there, in the most holy when he is there. Faith is the way of access to him in the most holy, as in the holy. But how about those who do not know that he has moved into the most holy place, and are still seeking him in the holy?—Such very likely have little idea of his position in either place; and to such, doubtless, Acts 17:30 would apply, while their faith would be honored, if sincerely exercised according to the best light they had. Why, then, seek to enlighten any one on this question?—Because this knowledge gives new beauty to the work of Christ; it gives us a new and thrilling interest in the question of our eternal welfare, as we see the momentous nature of the hours that are now-passing. It is of the same value and benefit, in a general way, as any truth, and has connection with so many other truths, and throws light on so many other Scripture themes, as to make it of exceptional interest and importance. Go into the sanctuary. Behold the great Assize sitting in the investigative judgment. Stand with Christ before the ark of God in heaven; and in the light of that standpoint of destiny, examine heart and life. The King is soon coming in to see the guests. Have on the wedding garment. Matt. 22:11-13.

U. S.

A WORD MORE.

LAST week a short article appeared in the Review, in reference to some questions that naturally arise concerning the work of Christ in the sanctuary, especially as it pertains to that part which is performed in the most holy place, and the ministration which is there going forward in the present stage of the work, as the subject is laid before us in prophecy. A few additional words on the same subject may still be in place.

A feeling of doubt, uncertainty, or indefiniteness seems to exist in some minds, in regard to the service performed in the most holy place, and the conditions that exist in other departments of the work, when that particular division, called the atonement, is going forward. The questions which arise first and foremost are, What definite portion of time is included in the work of atonement? Can the forgiveness of sin be secured by the people at large while that work of atonement is in progress? What are the lessons of the type on these points?

There is one great fact which, if kept in mind will greatly simplify the situation from this point of view; and that is, the special offering which was provided for all the people on the day of atonement, of the benefit of which all were directed to avail themselves. It was shown last week why a new sacrifice was required on that day in the type, which is not required in the antitype, because the blood of Christ avails for the whole period of his ministry, in the most holy place as well as in the holy place.

But if there is no ministry in the holy place while the atonement is taking place in the most holy (as there is not. Lev. 16:17), and we have come, in the antitype, to the work of the most holy place, how are those to receive the benefit of that work in the most holy, who know not that Christ has changed his ministry to that apartment, and have no real conception of the sanctuary work at all.

While, as shown last week, it is a blessed thing, and a great advantage, to know all the particulars of Christ's ministry, because it adds great beauty and definiteness to his work; yet herein is seen one of the provisions of the grace of the gospel. In that one is not cut off from hope, though he may not at once and always be fully acquainted with all the instruction that the word of God has given us in reference to the philosophy of the plan of salvation. Heb. 6:9; 4:15.

Let us again look at the type. Israel were summoned to the tabernacle, on the day of atonement, not to present their individual offerings, but to join in the great general offering which the priest presented for the people on that day, and to afflict their souls, thus showing that they had a personal participation in the service then going forward for them, and thus securing the benefit of the atonement.

But suppose one of the people, not familiar with their liturgy, and not knowing that the atonement was in progress, had then come with his offering to the door of the tabernacle, in the usual form, what would have been done with his offering? It could not have been received then, and a ministry performed with it for him; for there was to be no man, no priest, in the first apartment while the atonement was going forward in the second. Lev. 16:17. Would he then have been rejected? — No. He would have been told that the great offering for the atonement was just then being presented, and he could have a part in that, the same as the others, by joining with them, in complying with the conditions of that day. Thus he would have found a better, a larger, sacrifice than he had provided for himself; he would have found a more ample provision for the pardon of his sin than he had anticipated, waiting for his reception on that day.

The specific work of the atonement occupied only a portion of the day, so far as we have any record. What proportion of the day it was, we do not know. And when that specific service was ended, even if the day was not more than half gone, the usual service in the holy place would naturally be at once resumed, and the ministration of another year he entered upon.

Thus, for Israel, there was no break in the service of the sanctuary, and there was not a moment when the way was not open for any one to seek and find the forgiveness of sin. There is nothing therefore in the type to indicate that there is any limitation in the antitype, or any time before the actual close of the work of mediation for the world, when the sinner may not seek and find by faith our great high priest in heaven. Inasmuch as his one sacrifice covers his whole ministration, and is the offering used both in the holy and the most holy place, the close of his work in the holy, and the beginning of it in the most holy, does not diminish the flow of the fountain of life, nor cut any one off from the Saviour.

We enter, Paul says, into the holy places, plural, by his blood. Heb. 10:19, 20. There any one can still present the sacrifice of praise to God, through him, giving thanks to his name. Heb. 13:15. The way which he has opened for us, the new and living way, which is his flesh, his offering for sin, is the way in which the sinner still must and may come to him; and this way will never be closed till the last soul who will yield to his love has yielded, and the last one who can be reached by his mercy, has been rescued.

And just now to all who are seeking, or depending upon, Christ's intercession in the holy place, there should be borne the glad tidings that there is even now being carried on a broader ministration, a fuller intercession, of which they may be partakers, — even the blotting out and sending away of all sin forever, and the sealing of themselves, in righteousness forevermore. And this is simply the blessed tidings of the third angel's message. Sound its glad notes abroad to all people to the ends of the earth.

A PRELIMINARY WORK OF JUDGMENT.

WHAT we mean by this expression is that when the great work of the final judgment of this world is accomplished, it will be found to be composed of several distinct divisions, each specific in its nature, and assigned to a particular time and place.

That there is such a work of judgment determined, which shall decide all characters to be either good or bad, and affix appropriate penalties to every evil course of conduct, and assign suitable rewards to everyone whose course of conduct has been righteous, and carry out all such decisions to be fixed for eternity, is one of the plainest propositions set forth in the sure and unchangeable word of God; and it is one of the most momentous subjects that can engage the attention of the human mind.

Paul sobered the frivolous minds of the Athenians, by laying upon their hearts this tremendous truth: "Because he [God] hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead." Acts 17:31.

The first thought suggested by the word "day" is a period of twenty-four hours; but a moment's consideration will convince anyone that no such limited time would suffice for such a work as this. See also 2 Peter 2:9; 8:7-12; Jude 6; Matt. 25:31-34; etc. These texts show that a comparison of the Scriptures is necessary, in order so to adjust their testimony that they shall present a consistency and harmony as to time and place in the work called the judgment.

There are subjects which throw light on all these points, which thereby become subjects of paramount interest and importance. Some of these are connected with the great subject of the sanctuary, with which the readers of this paper are supposed to be familiar. An examination of that work known as the cleansing of the sanctuary, leads into a series of subjects of the most timely and important character, — subjects which explain some statements of Scripture that are otherwise obscure; which harmonize lines of prophecy that otherwise seem disconnected, and hard to understand; and which answer some vital questions concerning events connected with the crowning of all events, the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, which otherwise seem unanswerable.

Take, for instance, this one point: When Christ comes, it is with the suddenness of a snare to the inhabitants of the earth. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Matt. 24:27. This is a crucial period with all the people. There will be just two classes then, — those who rejoice to see him, and those who wall because of him. The people of God are then singled out for a great and instantaneous change to be wrought upon them, while all others remain as they were. Then, also, those who are asleep in Christ, in their graves, are raised in glory and power from their tombs, while all those who are not the dead in Christ sleep on in their graves for a thousand years. 1 Thess. 4:16; Rev. 20:5. And as for the living, the same distinction and separation are instantly made. The righteous living are changed from mortality to immortality in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye (1 Cor. 15:51, 52), while all the others are given over to perish under the judgments of the Almighty. 2 Thess. 1:7-9.

This change is wrought at the last trump, — that trump which is heard when the Lord himself descends from heaven with a shout, and with the voice of the archangel. 1 Thess. 4:16. And this separation between the righteous and the wicked is accomplished, and the righteous are made immortal, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. Thus the people of God are delivered; but who are the people of God? This question opens to us the fact that some decision must have been reached respecting them previously to this time; but all decision of character for the purpose of determining rewards or punishments is a work of judgment, and is a part of what constitutes the judgment of the great day, the solemn theme of the Bible. The goats are to be placed on the left hand, and the sheep on the right, when the nations are summoned before the King in his glory. Matt. 25:34, 41. The wicked shall be severed from among the just. Matt. 13:49. The righteous are to be saved, and the wicked destroyed. And the destiny of all is decided from the records that are kept of the deeds of all men; for so God has ordained. This is why we read that when the judgment is set, millions of angels minister before the Lord, and the books are opened. Dan. 7:10; Rev. 20:12.

Thus it is evident that there must be some examination of cases, and the assigning of certain ones to their respective classes, before the Lord appears in the clouds of heaven; for it will be noticed that the decisions are then instantly declared, there being no time then to investigate cases. Consequently, this portion of the work of the judgment must be accomplished before the Lord comes. But when, and by what means, can this be brought about? How can Christ come to reward every man as his work shall be (Rev. 22:12), without an antecedent judgment, to pass upon such cases? and if there is such a judgment, where and in what order of events does it come in?

This has been a puzzling problem to many students of prophecy. From the standpoint of the common theology, this has presented a real dilemma; and here are some of the hypotheses that have been resorted to, to meet it: It is claimed, by one class, that the dead, both good and bad, are all raised together, at the trump of God; are judged, and then sentenced to their respective rewards or punishments; while the living are disposed of in the same manner; and thus the judgment is gone through. But consider for a moment how long a time would be necessary for this work. Would one minute be too long a time to devote to each case, to examine the records, and fix the sentence according to his works? If not, taking the common estimate that there are fifteen hundred million persons living on the earth at the present time, it would take one billion five hundred million minutes simply to decide the cases of those now living. But if we should go back, and take in only one other generation, equally enormous, which would certainly be conservative enough, we should have three thousand million human beings to be judged; and giving one minute to each, it would require three thousand million minutes, fifty million hours, over two million days, or over fifty-seven hundred years, to accomplish the work, to say nothing of the unnumbered generations of the past.

But more than this: such a supposition runs point-blank against the testimony of the Bible itself; for the Bible plainly declares that after the righteous are raised, a thousand years pass away before the wicked are called from their graves: "But the rest of the dead lived not again till the thousand years were finished." Rev. 20: 5. So this scheme will not work at all.

Then another attempt is made to adjust the matter, which is this: that when the righteous dead are raised, they are raised without any change, mortal, as they went down, to be changed afterward. Then they are judged, and made immortal — all this to avoid any judgment before Christ comes. But this scheme, besides being out of the time limit stated above, is also directly contradictory to the Bible, which plainly declares that the righteous dead are raised in power and glory, incorruptible, with a spiritual body, and to die no more; while the unrighteous living are changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, to the same holy state. There is no time allowed here for the examination of the books and the investigation of character. Hence this hypothesis also absolutely fails, as it makes no provision for that previous investigation of character which must take place before Christ appears. We know of no system of belief that has in its provisions any consistent time and place for such a necessary work, except that held and advocated by Seventh-day Adventists. This is an important consideration, and should commend the position of this people to the favorable consideration of everyone who is seeking for a consistent and harmonious understanding of the Scriptures.

Mark well the situation: There must be a period of judgment, and the decision of the great question of probation before the Lord returns to this earth.

But this work of rejecting or accepting people for his kingdom, belongs to the priestly work of Christ. But where does it come in? Christ's last work as priest before he takes his throne as king, is to cleanse the sanctuary. That being ended, his work as priest is forever done. The very time for this work to begin is pointed out. At the end of "two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8:14. It has been found that those days ended in 1844. Then our High Priest entered the most holy place of the heavenly temple, and the final work of atonement for the world began.

The subject of the sanctuary, rightly understood, solves all the perplexities herein alluded to. The cleansing of the sanctuary is a work of judgment. It provides the very place for the preliminary work that is necessary to be done before the Lord comes, and its cleansing is a work of exactly the right nature. Christ's work as priest being designed to gather out from the human family a people for his name and kingdom (Acts 15:14), it must continue till that result is reached. Then it will have been decided how many have accepted of Christ's offers of life and salvation, and become his people. It is the putting away of sin that determines this point; and this is the very work Christ performs in the most holy place of the sanctuary above, at the conclusion of his ministry; and this is the cleansing of the sanctuary. This involves an examination of the books; for the plan is that all judgment shall be rendered to each individual, according to his works as they have been recorded in the books. Rev. 20:12.

Only one conclusion can be drawn from such testimony, and that is that a faithful record is kept of the course of every person, for which he must answer at the bar of God. If one repents and maintains a Christian life, his sins are at last all blotted out. So Peter exhorts: "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." Acts 3:19. Of the same class Christ speaks, in Rev. 8:5: "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels." Again he says, "Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven." Matt. 10:33; Luke 12:8,9. And this is when Christ is about to come as a thief upon all them who do not watch for his return. Rev. 3:3.

The subject of the sanctuary places all these points in a clear and vivid light, and thus clothes itself with glory. Thus before Christ appears, the saints are all prepared for their reward. And when Christ has taken them up to his Father's house (John 14:2,3), they reign with Christ, examining and passing sentence upon the incorrigible dead, preparatory to the execution of the judgment in their cases, at the end of the thousand years. In this work they occupy a thousand years. Rev. 20:4. Here is the "time of the dead that they should be judged" (Rev. 11:18); for then "judgment is given to the saints of the Most High." Dan. 7:22.

Bearing in mind the fact that there are more than two hundred million assistants in this work (Dan. 7:10; Rev. 5:11), a thousand years gives ample time to examine and adjudge all cases. There is no embarrassment for time, no haste, and no confusion. As the cases of all the saints had been examined, and they were ready for immortality at the second coming of Christ, so at the end of the thousand years the cases of the wicked have all been examined, and they are then ready for destruction. The thousand years end; and the final lake of fire, which is the second death, ends the scene of all evil and of all the wicked. Rev. 20:7-15. Then the righteous go forth upon the earth made new for an eternity of joy.

O. S.

ABOUT THE JUDGMENT.

ON this stupendous subject there seems to be a degree of perplexity in some minds on account of the variety of statements that are made concerning it. There are diverse scenes involved in the judgment, and different agents have a part to act therein, and the problem seems to be to locate these different divisions of the work, and identify the agents who carry it forward. Summed up to one point, the query is, Who is, or is to be, our judge?

For instance, we read in Acts 17:31: "Because He [God] hath appointed a day, in the which He [God] will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom He hath ordained; whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead." This would suggest the idea that the world in the day appointed is to be judged by the Father. But we read again in John 5:22: "For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son." Comparing this with Ps. 50:6, we have this statement: "And the heavens shall declare His righteousness: for God is judge himself." A scene opened to the prophet Daniel represents God, on a certain occasion, acting as judge. The scene is one of unparalleled sublimity, and must powerfully impress every one who, with a reverent spirit, reads the description: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of Days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of His head like the pure wool: His throne was like the fiery flame, and His wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before Him: thousand thousands ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened." Dan. 7:9, 10.

This passage, if we mistake not, furnishes a key to the solution of the main difficulties of the situation. Here is a judgment connected with the opening of the books. The Ancient of Days, God the Father, presides in it. There are over one hundred million heavenly intelligences engaged in it. "Ten thousand times ten thousand" are a hundred million, as we compute numbers, and besides these there are "thousands of thousands." These are not the great multitude of the denizens of this world assembled to be judged, but those who minister unto the Ancient of Days, in this work. This applies to a time when the great plan of salvation is unfolding and closing its vast movements. The thrones which are here said to be "cast down," so rendered by the translators, who evidently supposed them to be earthly thrones of human government, which are to be overthrown in the last day, are not such thrones, but thrones connected with the judgment; and the words should not be rendered "cast down," or overthrown, but established, or "set up." What thrones, or seats of judgment, are to be set up when the judgment scene opens? The time is when "judgment is given to the saints of the Most High" (verse 22); and where are the saints when judgment is given to them, not judgment of them as accountable beings, but judgment for them to exercise over others? John saw the whole situation right in connection with this very time. He says, "And I saw thrones, and they [the saints] sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them." Rev. 20:4.

Right here the subject of the sanctuary throws its all-penetrating search-light on this subject. Jesus Christ is the mediator for men, and a priest of God after the order of Melchisedec. Heb. 5:5, 10. It appears from this testimony and from Acts 17:31 that He has been appointed, or ordained, to that position: "Because He [God] hath appointed a day, in the which He will judge the world . . . by that man whom He hath ordained; whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead." It is appropriate that that one who is the mediator for the world should have a part in the general judgment of the world, so the testimony is that God "hath appointed a day, in the which He will judge the world . . . by that man [Christ] whom He hath ordained;" and He has given assurance unto all men that this period of judgment must pass upon all men, because He hath raised Christ from the dead. That is the pledge of that work. One can go back and undo the resurrection of Christ as well as to think of escaping the test of judgment.

The plan of Christ's office as mediator, and its modus operandi, was doubtless all arranged in the beginning of His work. And while God has ever held the general management of the affairs of this world, and has often let loose judgments upon sin, as in the case of the antediluvians, the Egyptians, the Sodomites, etc., to which cases Ps. 50:6 would apply, there are different divisions of the judgment work which must all have their place, and be considered in their relation to one another and to the work as a whole. This distinction is seen even here in human courts. There is, first, the investigation of the case to determine the degree of guilt of the parties, and fix the punishment; and secondly, the execution of the sentence. And in its general phases divine justice must be administered on as equitable basis as this. And this is just the method pursued in this work, according to what is revealed.

It is all contained in the prophecy of Dan. 7:9, 10. We think in this stage of the progress of the Third Angel's Message we are justified in assuming that the reader understands something of the sanctuary and its ministration. The sanctuary, where the plan of redemption is carried forward, was a building, or tabernacle, located in the midst of the camp of Israel, as a dwelling place for God. Exodus 25. There was the law, the priesthood, the sacrifices, the symbols of pardon and forgiveness. There the penitent came confessing his sins, and sending them, through the blood of the victim and the ministration of the priest, into the sanctuary. There the atonement was made, and sins, in figure, put away.

All this Paul tells us (Heb. 9: 1-7) was a worldly sanctuary under the first, or old, covenant; but now we are under a new covenant introduced by Christ, more ample and efficient in its provisions than the old, furnished with better sacrifices, even the precious blood of Christ, who pleads that blood for sinners in a more complete sanctuary, the true and more perfect tabernacle, pitched, or erected, not by Moses, but by the Lord himself. This heavenly tabernacle, or sanctuary, has two apartments, as the earthly had. In the first, or holy place, Christ, as priest after the order of Melchisedec, receives the confessions of Christians now, just as the Aaronic priest received the confessions of Hebrew penitents under the Mosaic system.

Now, following the type, we easily go forward to the time when the program of the world's redemption must close. There the scene of scenes takes place. The sanctuary must be cleansed, and sins be blotted out and put away, that they may not mar the kingdom of heaven, disturb the saints, and remain a cloud upon the memory of God.

To accomplish this, a great change is made in the heavenly courts. The second apartment of the heavenly temple, unoccupied till this change came due, was opened (Rev. 11: 19); and the ministration and the ministers moved therein. The work for the world's salvation assumed a new phase. This is noted and described in the prophecy of Dan. 7:9, 10, 13, 14. When the work in the sanctuary began, at the ascension of Christ, the throne of God, and God, at whose right hand Christ took His position, were in the first apartment of the sanctuary.

Rev. 4: 2, 3, 5. This is proved by the seven lamps of fire which were before the throne—antitype of the candlestick of the sanctuary with its seven lamps. Ex. 37: 23; Heb. 8: 1, 2. Daniel's record here describes the change: "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days, and they brought Him near before Him." Dan. 7: 13. But was not the Son of man near before the Ancient of Days when He was at His right hand in the holy place?—Very true; but the Father made a move: "I beheld till the thrones were set up [or placed in position—thrones of the four living beings and the four and twenty elders. Rev. 4: 8, 10], and the Ancient of Days [God the Father] did sit." Dan. 7: 9. This affirms that God took a new position; for the words "did sit" mean, and should be so translated, that He "took a position as judge in a court of justice." The work in the most holy place, the cleansing of the sanctuary, is a work belonging to a court of justice; for here every case that has come within the sphere of Christ's mediatorial work is examined, and the decision made whether they have overcome, or are to be rejected. In this scene God acts as judge. Christ presents the cases before Him, pleads His blood, and God decides whether or not He can accept them through Christ. Thus God judges them by that man whom He has ordained for this work. Acts 17: 31. If accepted, their part is made sure in the everlasting kingdom, the subjects of which are then being made up. This is the investigative judgment. Here the King comes in to examine the guests according to the Saviour's vivid parable, to see if all have on the wedding garment. Matt. 22: 11-13. The man who has it not on is bound hand and foot, and cast out into outer darkness, never to see the light of life again. O that men could realize what a vital interest they have in Christ at the present time!

Daniel's record (7: 14) continues: "And there was given Him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve Him." When does Christ receive the kingdom as here predicted? Not when He enters the most holy; not till the work in that apartment is finished, and all the guests who are candidates for the kingdom have been examined and accepted. Then Christ comes with His reward, to give immortality to all who have accepted it. Rev. 22: 12. Then He can send forth His angels to gather out of this earth, the place to be occupied by His kingdom, all that offend, and them which do iniquity (Matt. 13: 41-43), which He will do by the seven last plagues and other judgments with which He sweeps the world of its guilty inhabitants. Rev. 19: 19-21. The investigative judgment being thus passed, and the line being drawn between the saved and the lost, an investigation of the cases of the wicked must follow; for every one who has ever been on probation must give account for the deeds done in the body. This is accomplished by the saints, in conjunction with Christ, who reign during the thousand years of Rev. 20:4-6. The saints having passed their own judgment, are at this time redeemed, and can then judge wicked men and angels. 1 Cor. 6:2-4. This work being done, the end of the thousand years is reached; and the execution of the judgment upon all the wicked takes place. Then punishment is visited upon every sin ever committed, and every sinner involved therein. They are destroyed root and branch in the final lake of fire. Rev. 20:12-15. This fire and destruction were originally prepared only for the devil and his angels (Matt. 25:41), and the only human beings destroyed therein are those who joined the devil in his rebellion, and persistently continued in it to the close. This is the fire that accomplishes the judgment (the execution of the judgment) and perdition of ungodly men. 2 Peter 3:7. Then the last vestige of sin and sinners is destroyed. The last stain and scar of the primal entrance of evil and its curse into the universe is wiped away; the old earth, racked by convulsions and blighted by miasma and mildew for six thousand years, will be healed and made new (2 Peter 3:13); the tabernacle of God will come down into our midst, God himself will be our companion and our God (Rev. 21:3, 4); and then will rise and fill the whole heaven of the new creation the song of jubilee from "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, . . . saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." This is eternity's amen to the work and ways of God in the salvation of men. Rev. 5:13; 7:11, 12.

The Threefold Message of
Rev. 14: 6-12

"The Hour of His Judgment"

For many centuries the world has looked forward to a coming judgment. Thus the psalmist, after testifying that "Jehovah hath made known his salvation," and that "all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God," says: "Let the hills sing for joy together before Jehovah; for he cometh to judge the earth: he will judge the world with righteousness, and the peoples with equity." Many of the messages given through the prophet Isaiah are based upon the idea of a court and a judicial trial. After stating in the first part of the first chapter the backslidden condition of Israel, the prophet speaks these words from the Lord: "Come now, and let us reason together, said Jehovah," or, "Come now, let us plead together." And again the prophet says, "Let all the nations be gathered together, and let the peoples be assembled: who among them can declare this, and show us former things? Let them bring them witnesses, that they may be justified; or let them hear, and say, It is truth. Ye are my witnesses, said Jehovah, and my servant whom I have chosen; that ye may know and believe me, and understand that I am he." These are judgment scenes.

The prophet Daniel saw in vision when "one that was ancient of days did sit," and "the judgment was set, and the books were opened."

In his teaching Jesus often spoke of "the day of judgment." He presented it as the time when just awards would be given, as men would be judged in righteousness, and not according to appearances.

When addressing his pagan audience on Mars Hill, the apostle Paul declared, "The times of ignorance therefore God overlooked; but now he commandeth men that they should all everywhere repent: inasmuch as he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness in the man whom he hath ordained." And the same apostle, in speaking before Felix, talked of "the judgment to come," and wrote in the epistle to the Hebrews: "It is appointed unto men once to die, and after this cometh judgment."

The revelator thus describes the judgment scenes as presented to him: "And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat upon it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, the great and the small, standing before the throne; and books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of the things which were written in the books, according to their works."

The appointed day of the settling of all human accounts was to be proclaimed to the world. A most solemn announcement was to be made that the Judge is at the door, and that the close of human probation was at hand. This would emphasize the call to repentance and the need of a preparation to stand in the final hour. And so the message must be given, "Fear God, and give him glory; for the hour of his judgment is come." The end of the long prophetic period of twenty-three hundred days (years) in 1844 marked the beginning of the judgment hour, and it was also the time of the beginning of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, concerning which we are told, "In the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he is about to sound, then is finished the mystery of God, according to the good tidings which he declared to his servants the prophets."

Thus the announcement of the arrival of the hour of God's judgment is an integral part of the closing work of the gospel—a part of the message which is to be given in the last generation to prepare the way of the Lord. And this is the message which we are charged with giving. We are to make it clear by the words of the prophets that the time which they foretold has arrived; that even now the work of the judgment is in progress; and that soon the last case will be passed upon, and the decree will go forth, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still. And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be."

A more solemn time was never known in the world's history, and yet it is just the time when the people of God are to lift up their heads, knowing that their redemption draweth nigh. The judgment-hour message will bring the close of the judgment hour, and usher in the glories of the eternal kingdom. Let the giving of this message be hastened, that we may speedily enter into the joy of our Lord.

"Call to Remembrance the Former Days."

The following article from A. Hale will be read with interest and profit. In the main we believe it to be correct. But the idea of the "door of mercy" being shut is unscriptural and untrue. The Bible mentions no such door. An expression alike unscriptural may be seen in the same number of the "Herald," in the remarks of J. V. Himes, headed "An open door in Canada." He says, "I am more convinced than ever since I came to this Province, that Jesus yet sits upon the mercy-seat." The mercy-seat was placed upon the ark containing the commandments of God, and was overshadowed by the cherubim of glory. Its place was within the veil, in the "holiest of all." The high priest alone entered that place only once a year, and then to cleanse the Sanctuary; but certainly he never got up upon the mercy-seat. That would be a singular position indeed for the high priest. Jesus could enter the holiest of all to cleanse the Sanctuary, the "True Tabernacle," only at the end of the 2300 days. But he never was, and never will be, on the mercy-seat. We freely admit that our Great High Priest has entered the Holiest, but to say that he "sits upon the mercy-seat," is one step further than we can possibly go.

It is also evident that to "suppose," as A. Hale does in this article, "that the condition of things at the shutting of the door, would be very much as it was after the day of stonement among the ancient Jews," is incorrect. The shutting of the door of the Holy Place, is preparatory to the antitypical tenth day stonement for the cleansing of the Sanctuary.

But we recommend the article to all. It should be read carefully. It is well calculated to improve the faith and piety of those who are weak in faith. By this article it will be seen that the view we cherish, that the parable was designed to apply to the Advent movement, was advocated by one of the editors of the "Advent Herald," in 1845. A large portion of the Advent brethren then held this view; but few, however, have been able to bear the cross, and endure the scoffs arising from this position. Let us "call to remembrance the former days."

BROTHER HALE'S ARTICLE.

There are three questions in which every Adventist must feel the deepest interest at the present time.—1. What is our position in the line of prophetic events, by which God has brought us down to the end?—2. What is our position in reference to the termination of the prophetic periods which we have supposed to bring us also to the end?—3. What are the duties which this position demands of us? and what are the particular trials to which it subjects us? 1. What is our position in the line of events? In reference to the bearing of the events brought to view in the history of nations, and the signs pointed out by the Saviour, upon our relation to the end, there is no difference of opinion among Adventists. It exists only in reference to the particulars, the details, in the events which all admit, who admit them at all, cluster around the end itself. Let us come directly to some of these particulars—to the question, Have we had the event denoted by the cry, in the parable of the virgins? On this question three several opinions would be found to exist.—1. That which supposes the parable is not to be applied to the history of the people of God, in any of its particulars, but that it is only designed to exhibit the importance of a preparation to meet the Lord, as a general truth. 2. That which supposes the parable is to be applied in its particulars, but that the cry has not yet been made. 3. That which takes the ground that the parable is to be applied in its details, and that we have had the cry, if, indeed, we have not advanced to a further point in its fulfillment. To me the choice is only between the first and the last of these views, viz:—"That we are not to understand the parable in its details at all, or, that it is to be so understood, and that we have passed through its fulfillment, at least, to a point as late as that to which we are brought by the cry. And although I could find no very great difficulty in accounting for all that we have experienced, should I adopt the first of these two opinions, as the special application embraces all that can be designed by the general application, and so must be the most safe; and, further, as the special application, which generally prevails among us, is the result of events in our history which were entirely unlooked for till they came, and which all must admit are remarkably in accordance with the successive steps marked in the parable, I must act on the special application of it, till some decisive argument from the word of God, or time, if it must be so, shall make it appear that that cannot be the true application. Should that be the case, I trust I shall not then, any more than at the present time, reject the general truth supposed to be intended.

That the discourse of the Saviour, including the 24th and 25th chapters of Matthew, carries us down from his day to the end, no one will deny. That it was his design to inform his church upon the manner of his coming, and upon the dangers to which they would be exposed about the time of his coming, is also placed beyond dispute.

The parable of the virgins, which makes a part of that discourse, we understand as a distinct sketch of the Advent movement. It may help our memory and piety to repeat the illustration.

Verses 1. "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom." Then—at the time when the faithful and the wise servants, having marked the signs which were to indicate that the Son of Man must be near, according to his word, are giving the meat in due season to the household; and the evil servant saith in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming, and begins to smite his fellow servants, (the wise and faithful,) and to eat and drink with the drunken,—then the kingdom of heaven shall be likened unto the scene and the transactions, of which the Saviour speaks, in which ten virgins went forth to meet the bridegroom.

Among those who took a part in this movement, as among the servants whose office it was to give meat to the household, and also among the "all nations," (Matt. xxiv, 9,) who were to hate the disciples of Christ, and to whom the gospel was to be preached before the end, and who are to be gathered before the Son of Man, when he shall sit upon the throne of his glory; so among those who fulfill this sentence of the kingdom of heaven there are two classes:—

Verses 2. "And five of them were wise," careful, "and five were foolish," careless.

Verses 3 and 4. "They that were foolish," careless, "took their lamps, and took no oil with them: but the wise," careful, "took oil in their vessels with their lamps." These lamps were evidently what we call torches, made by winding a bunch of flax or cotton upon the end of a stick, and saturating it with oil; and as this would soon burn out unless it were often supplied with oil, the oil in the vessel for that purpose, though a small matter in itself, was indispensably necessary. The omission indicated a want of hearty interest in the marriage arrangement. The lamp, or torch, as a symbol, doubtless denotes the Bible, as the oil does grace. Grace is to the word, what oil is to the lamp. The vessels may denote the means of grace, which are adapted and designed to make the word give light. It is the highest folly—the most fatal carelessness, as to the great purposes for which the word of God is given to men, to think of deriving light from it, while we refuse, through pride, fear, or the love of human praise, to avail ourselves of those means of grace which are necessary to the understanding of its lessons, the observance of its requirements, and the attainment of its promises.

It was the Bible alone which produced this Advent movement. Those who embraced the Advent doctrine were distinguished, from the first, by their strict regard for the Bible. This was exclusively peculiar to them. Every question was decided by that. No fair argument has ever been brought from that against their doctrine; and to this day the individual who is unfashionably familiar with his Bible, is sure to fall under the odium of their faith: and it was the supplying themselves with such means of grace—ministers—conferences, meetings—Bible classes—publications—religious associates, &c. &c., as harmonized with their supreme regard for the Bible, which served as the most severe test, upon the interest of the professed believers in the doctrine, in the great event of Christ's coming. This also was their grand offence against "the churches." And on the other hand it was the want of the oil in the vessels—proper means of grace—which has occasioned the depletion of those who remained in "the churches," a depletion which the individuals and the churches themselves confess and begin to deplore.

Verse 5. "While the bridegroom tarried they all slumbered and slept." The wise slumbered, the foolish slept. Every one knows the difference between these two states, naturally; and between the states with which they correspond, spiritually, and every Adventist is familiar with the condition of things during the period to which it applies. "The bridegroom tarried."—They must, then, of necessity have had a time appointed in which they expected him, for it would be nonsense to speak of a person tarrying who was not expected at any particular time. Its application to the case of the Adventists is too striking to need comment.

Verse 6. "And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh! go ye out to meet him." If other parts of the parable had spoken of days or nights, it might be supposed at once that this "midnight" was a chronological mark; though it may be understood in that light, it is more likely to express the state of things when the cry is made—the security of midnight. Have we not had that cry? A query has arisen in some minds, whether we have had the true midnight cry, since it is found that "all" who were looking for the Lord were not particularly affected by the preaching of "the seventh month." But it is well known that the universal terms, all, every, &c., are not always to be understood in the absolute sense; (see Matt. iii, 9; John iii, 26; xi, 48; 1 Cor. x, 33;) and even if the term "all" is to be so understood in this case, is it not true that "all those" who went forth in the beginning of the Advent movement, also arose from their slumbering and sleeping in the seventh month? Certain it is that the "cry" originated, humanly speaking, and did its chief work in that part of the great field which was first visited with the Advent doctrine in its more general form. And as that was the only section in which the interest had passed the crisis, which was followed by the slumbering and sleeping, so it was the only one which could be, or needed to be, affected by the cry. Those who had not had time to fall into that state, after receiving the Advent truth, could not be aroused from it.

If we have not had the true cry, it is difficult to determine why the Saviour, in a discourse designed to guard his church against the dangers which they must be exposed to, at the period of his second advent, should not have warned us of such a false movement, as he must have seen it, if the movement of the seventh month be "a false alarm." As he has given us no intimation of such a counterfeit movement among his people, I must believe we have had the cry denoted in the parable. I do not see how we could have one bearing more of the genuine marks than that. But further, if we have not had the cry, that parable cannot be a sketch of our history; it must belong to another people and another time. Those who are denoted by these virgins must have had a time fixed in which they expected the Saviour; as soon as that time passed, he must have tarried; and from that time, till the cry was raised, they all, i. e. a large proportion of the body, must slumber and sleep. All this must be found in their history, or the parable cannot have a special application. But the time in which we expected the Saviour has passed, and the period since that should have been, with us as a body, an unbroken period of slumbering and sleeping, if we have not had the cry. Who, now, will presume to say that this has been the condition of the Adventists since the time passed in which they expected the Saviour? It might as well be denied that they have ever professed to expect him. Just as certainly, therefore, as the Adventists have had the state of comparative listlessness broken, into which they generally fell, after the passing of their time, we have had the cry; for "while he tarried," till that was made, they slumbered and slept. Is it not as evident that we have had the cry, as that the virgins have gone forth to meet the bridegroom, or that we have had the tarrying time? Would it not be as dangerous to expect the cry hereafter as to look into the future for any of the way-marks by which we have been guided in the past.

Verses 7, 8, 9. "Then [when the cry was made,] all those virgins arose and trimmed their lamps; and the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out; but the wise answered, saying, Let there be not enough for us and you, go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves." The "and so" of our version, supplied by the translators, gives the answer of the wise virgins a harshness that does not belong to it. The reading here used is authorized by the best critics. (See Dr. Clarke.) They had proceeded so far, as companions, and the wise would have aided the foolish, if it could have been done with safety to themselves; while they pity them, they give them the only advice which can be of any service.

All this was fulfilled in the seventh month. The cry aroused all those who were first affected by the proclamation of the Advent doctrine. The Advent meetings were thronged. Those who had "slept" because they had denied themselves the only proper means of grace, came, in the full character of the foolish virgins: The preaching under which they sat was unsatisfactory, and their other means of grace with their religious associates, had not only failed to aid them, but had been a positive hindrance. They must hear Advent preaching—join in their devotions—make them their associates. Confessing that all was darkness, they said almost in so many words, "Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out."

They were met by the Adventists in the full character of the wise virgins: "We cannot help you. Our destination, our dependence, our necessities are so great, we are barely provided for, so as to hope in the mercy of God, 'Go ye to them that sell, and buy for yourselves.' In God only can you find help."

How is it that we can have forgotten these memorable traits in that scene? It seems as incredible as that the Israelites should have forgotten the awful splendors of Sinai, in view of which they trembled and durst not behold, so that before Moses descended, they had forgotten all the claims of the true God, and were dancing before the calf they had made.

Verses 10. "And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut." The same carelessness which disposed them to go forth without oil, at first, seems to have marked this last effort also. The advice could not have been a mockery; they did not follow it as they should have done.

As this parable, viewed as an outline of our history, has been fulfilled, beyond dispute to my mind, down to a point as late as that to which we are brought by the cry, the only questions to which it can fairly give rise are these,—Has the bridegroom come? or, does the cry still present to us our duty: Go ye out to meet him? And so far as our prospects, as to the nearness of the advent, and our duties, are concerned, it would make but little difference which of these positions we take. In either case we should be required to take a position of constant expectation. In either case the end of our probationary state is involved, and our work in behalf of the world must be, in the main, performed.

There is hardly room, indeed, since the parable has evidently been fulfilled down to the cry, for any other question than this—

Has the Bridegroom come?

The decision of this question must depend upon what is to be understood by his coming to the marriage. If it means his visible coming in glory, he has not so come. If it means some other event, which is to precede his coming in glory, though intimately connected with it, the bridegroom may have come in the sense of the parable. But will it not be spiritualizing to understand the text to refer to anything but his coming as the King of Glory? We have taken it for granted that it does speak of this, and have read the text, in our minds, as it is read, "And while they went to buy, the Lord himself descended from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God—the dead in Christ were raised, those who were his among the living were changed, and these all were caught up together to meet him in the clouds, to be forever with the Lord." These are precisely the ideas we have attached to these words; but is there anything like them here? Certainly not. It will be seen, then, at once, as indeed the form of speech requires, that the parable is to be interpreted in the spiritual or figurative sense: and as no one supposes that Christ will be married, as human beings are married, the only point to be settled is, What is denoted by the coming of the bridegroom to the marriage?

In the interpretation of the parable, thus far, we have visible as well as literal facts to prove its fulfillment, and have therefore spoken in more positive terms than we may use in what remains. Though the facts to which we shall refer are as literal as those in the past, as they cannot, in the nature of the case, be visible to us, we must speak with more caution in speaking of their accomplishment.

That we may proceed intelligently, and for the particular benefit of those who may have forgotten them, I shall give an extract or two from Mr. Miller's rules of interpretation, which are substantially those of every judicious interpreter of the word of God:—"Figures sometimes have two or more different significations;"—"To learn the true meaning of figures, trace your figurative word through your Bible, and where you find it explained, put it on your finger; if it makes good sense you need look no further; if not, look again."—"Parables are used as comparisons to illustrate subjects, and must be explained in the same way as figures."

Let us proceed. As there is to be something in this movement in "the kingdom of heaven," which is to be "likened" to the coming of the bridegroom "to the marriage"—what may be denoted by that part of the scene? There are but two events which the coming of the bridegroom to the marriage can be supposed to denote.—1. The appearing of Christ to gather his Church to himself.—2. His actual inauguration, or coronation, as the Lord of the whole earth.

Now let us trace "the figure through the Bible." And where shall we find the appearing of Christ to gather his people, exhibited by the figure of a bridegroom coming to a marriage, or, the act of uniting himself to them, at that time, exhibited by a marriage? The existence of such a case is unknown to me. I know that the relation between Christ and the Church is brought to view in connection with the relation of marriage; and the strongest case even of that kind is given by Paul; Eph. v, 23—25. But there is not even a metaphor here, much less a parable or allegory. A literal and well known fact is referred to, to show what should characterize another literal and well known fact. He refers to the subjection of the Church to Christ, to show the proper subjection of wives to their husbands, and to his love to the Church, to show the love husbands should cherish for their wives; and not to the relation of marriage, to illustrate the relation of Christ to the Church.

The figurative analogy between the two cases, as forms of speech, is entirely wanting. Besides, it refers to what then existed, in the Apostle's day, and not to something to take place in the future.

Again. It is assumed, that in the marriage of the Lamb, presented by the Revelator, the holy city, symbolized as the Lamb's wife, is a symbol of the Church, or at any rate, must comprehend the Church. Shall we suppose the bride to be the city, and the city the church, and apply the figure in order to see the "good sense" it makes? To say nothing of the "sense" of making a figure of the explanation of a figure, we would ask,—If the bride—the city—is the church, who are the nations of them that walk in her light?—Rev. xxi, 24. If the city, the tabernacle of God, is the church, who are the "men" "his people," with whom the tabernacle or church is to be?—Rev. xxi. If the "wife" is the church, who are they that are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb, as guests?—Rev. xix. If the city is the church, who are they "that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city?" If Jerusalem which is above, the mother of us all, is the church, who are "the children?" and how could Isaiah say of her: "this is the heritage of the servants of the Lord?" Compare Gal. iv, 26, 27, and Isa. liv, 1—17.

If this is sufficient to show the "good sense" of this meaning of the "figurative word," when we "put it on your figure," shall we suppose the bride to comprehend both the city and the church, and see what "sense" it will make? We have only to apply the foregoing questions, varied to express this meaning, and we shall see that the consistency and harmony of the figure are equally destroyed. If the bride is brought to view in the figure, as both the city and the church, who are the other parties—"the children"—those of whom Christ says, "he shall be my son?"—"his people?"—those "who are called to the marriage supper?" &c. &c.

And we know that the interpretation of figurative language, parables in particular, "all its parts must be perspicuous and pertinent."—Horne.

But we may add here, that the manner in which the parable closes does not appear to coincide with events which take place at the actual appearing of Christ, according to other portions. When he appears it is "to execute judgment." The judiciary trial and decision having been previously made by "the Father," "the Son" carries the decision into effect. And so in the case of the evil servant, at the coming of his Lord, he is cut asunder, and his portion is appointed with the hypocrites, where there are weeping and gnashing of teeth. The unprofitable servant, in the parable which follows that of the virgins, is treated in the same manner. But in this parable, after the bridegroom has come, and the door is shut, there is the common mark of a revival of religious interest. Prayer is heard: "Lord, Lord, open unto us." If the coming of the bridegroom denotes the actual coming of Christ, and the shutting of the door the rejection of the wicked, to be left here to perish, is it possible, that after Christ has appeared, and the dead are raised, and the righteous caught up to meet the Lord, that such a state of things can exist? To me it seems impossible. It would seem to coincide much more naturally with the judiciary trial which precedes the execution, (the judgment which begins at the house of God,) than with the execution itself. It seems impossible to get to that point, by any figurative exhibition of the scene that agrees with this under consideration, without referring to the other parable of the marriage, to the fate of that one of "the guests" which had not on the "wedding garment." "Then (when the King came in to see the guests) said the King to the servants, Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Matt. xxii, 11—13. That must coincide with the execution of judgment by Christ, as the office of the King does with the preliminary decision of the case. In this parable of the virgins no such execution of judgment is expressed.

Again. Supposing that the appearing of Christ, as the Judge, is denoted by the coming of the bridegroom, and the execution of judgment, at least in the case of the righteous, is denoted by the shutting of the door, it is difficult to harmonize the words of Christ in Luke xii, 35—38, which were certainly spoken in reference to his coming, if they were not a part of the same discourse that Matthew records in the 24th and 25th chapters. Compare Luke xii, 39—46, and Matt. xxiv, 43—51. In Luke, the point in the figurative representation of the truth, at which the saved actually meet the Lord, is at his "return from the wedding." Now we know that the successive steps of the marriage scene are these. 1. The coming of the bridegroom to the marriage. 2. The marriage itself. 3. The return from the wedding.

We would ask, then, is it natural, is it like him, i. e. if we suppose these several particulars were designed to be applied in the interpretation, to speak to us, by a reference to two different points in the same imagery of only one event?

Once more. It seems to be impossible that the coming of the bridegroom to the marriage can denote the actual appearing of Christ as King and Judge, since it must be that the only act which can be denoted by the shutting of the door, and the consequent state of things must be realized, before his appearing as King and Judge.

What may we suppose the shutting of the door to denote? (Some of our brethren talk as if there were a literal door to be closed, for, say they, "If the door is shut there is no passing in or out." It is singular, indeed, if we have become so very literal, that we cannot see anything beyond an admitted figure, but the figure itself. By this act is undoubtedly denoted the exclusion from all further access to saving mercy, those who have rejected its offers during their time of probation. And none will deny that whenever the Bridegroom shall have come, that change in the condition of the great mass of the world will have taken place. That change must take place when Christ closes up his work as mediator for the world at large, in order to become King, not at that moment to possess his kingdom, the renewed earth, but to become king prior to its possession. Is there any evidence from the word of God to show that that change in his work is to take place any perceptible time before he appears in his glory—before his people are made immortal?

It must be considered as settled beyond dispute that this change in his work and office takes place before he appears in his glory as king. 1. When Christ appears to save his people, he appears in his glory as King and Judge. Matt. xxiv, 30, 31; xvi,

34. 2. The kingdom of the God of heaven, over which the Lord Jesus is to reign forever, is to be set up during the existence of the earthly kingdoms.—Dan. ii, 44. One like the Son of man came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages, should serve him.—Dan. vii, 13, 14. "He returned, having received the kingdom."—Luke xix, 15. "Then all his enemies are slain before him. As 'the King of kings, and Lord of lords,' he makes war with, subdues and exterminates 'the kings of the earth.'—Rev. xvii, 14; xix, 11—21. 3. There must be a change in his office and work, in reference to the world at large, before, or at the time he becomes king; and in the very nature of the case, this change must precede the appearing of Christ as king, or the setting up of the kingdom; for he performs the work typified by the "daily ministering" of the priests, until his enemies are made his footstool, (1leb. x, 11—13,) i. e. are given over to him as enemies doomed to death; and are no longer the subjects of his intercessions. And this change in his work and office must precede his appearing to gather his elect, for, 1. a part of his elect are under the dominion of death, one of the enemies to be destroyed, and he will not destroy that enemy till he has been put into his hands; and, 2. as he appears in his glory when he appears to gather his elect, he must have received that glory before he appears in it.

Now, as it is almost impossible that this order of events should not also require order of time, it would seem that some time must elapse, how much we cannot tell, between the closing of Christ's intercessions for the world, and his appearing to gather his elect. May not that time be marked by the Lord himself—the first point by the coming of the bridegroom, when the kingdom of heaven is likened unto the virgins who go in with him unto the marriage; the last point by his return from the wedding, when he shall receive them to the marriage supper?

We admit that this does not of itself prove that the door is now shut, but as we must be very near the end, and that act must take place before Christ appears as king, what reason is there why it may not have taken place, which would not exist at any future time, before the actual appearing of Christ? So far as the condition of things around us bears upon the question, it goes to confirm it. Vs. 11, 12. "Afterward came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not." The master of the house has risen up, the careless are too late.

And what do we see and hear all around? Why, "the churches," after having given a full rein to the scoffers, the fashionable and formal among them, in "fairs," "tea parties," &c. &c., are now willing to accommodate the more scrupulous—the class most affected by the Advent doctrine, but who were unwilling to confess it publicly, by taking oil in their vessels with their lamps—(foolish virgins,) and we hear of their calls to prayer, and special efforts to "get up a revival." "Lord, Lord, open unto us." But what is the result? By their own testimony, it does not appear that there is a single case which would have been considered, ten years ago, hardly a noticeable case of religious interest. Whether those cases which are reported, are worthy of being considered conversions to Christ, is more than doubtful. Would not the preaching of the most obvious truths in the gospel "stop these revivals?" If such revivals are to be received as genuine, it is time for the adventists to return to the churches, and not only make their confession, but renounce their hope. It may be shown from a large number of facts, that the last special cases of spiritual interest among the professed churches were the result, directly or indirectly, of the Advent doctrine; that where the doctrine has been avowedly opposed, and its believers silenced, spiritual death has followed, our enemies being judges. And we do not know of a single case of noticeable religious interest but where the doctrine is received, or at least not opposed; and these cases are so limited in their extent and number, that they can form no objection to the supposition that the door is shut, but rather go to confirm it.

However, as our brethren seem determined that if our position is correct, nothing more is to be done, therefore we hold that there is nothing more to be done, we may be pardoned in saying a word upon that point. Now we can see how that all our brethren can do, may be done, in perfect harmony with our views. The question, here, is not, whether there is anything to be done, but, what is to be done?

We believe there will be enough to do till mortality is swallowed up of life, especially since there must be, among such a diversity of opinions, "brethren who do err from the truth." But we can no more resume our old plans of spreading the Advent doctrine, than we can labor for "the conversion of the world."

We will try to make this plain. We suppose the condition of things, at the shutting of the door, would be very much as it was after the day of atonement among the ancient Jews. Let us visit old Jerusalem as it was in the days of the prophets. It is the tenth day of the seventh month—the day of atonement. The preparation to partake in the benefit of its services are plainly made known, it is "a day for a man to afflict his soul," and it is a jubilee year, to "break every yoke and let the oppressed go free," or he is "cursed," and liable to be "cut off from among the people." The appointed sacrifices are prepared, and the son of Aaron appears in his priestly robes. The court of the temple, and every avenue which leads to it, are crowded with the multitude of worshippers. Here are the devout and holy Isaiah's, and Jeremiah's and Daniels, ready to take the position which secures the blessing. Here are backsliders who see their wanderings and are stricken at heart with a sense of their sins,—they too are ready to take the required position. Here also are the penitents who are awakened to a sense of their condition, and these are ready to take the required position. All these, being ready at the time, may receive the blessing. To the case of infants, idiots, and others whose circumstances relieve them from the responsibilities of the truth, God adapts the provisions of his mercy by a special arrangement. By the careless, the worldly, and those who worship merely because others do—the largest class by far, no benefit is realized.

Now if the transactions of this day are the last to be enjoyed, for this largest class there would be no further hope. So, too, if the devout, and the returning backslider, and the penitent turn away from their righteousness, knowingly and willingly, there is no further hope for them.

All now depends upon their holding fast, and going forward. Just so must it be, we suppose, when Christ finishes the work of atonement. But is there nothing more to do in such a state of things? God forbid. There is everything which the danger they are in of "falling away,"—of "drawing back unto perdition"—can enjoin; everything which the desire for the salvation of a brother can prompt; everything which the holding fast the profession of our faith, in the way of laboring to enter into that rest, may demand.

But can any impenitent sinners be converted if the door is shut. Of course they cannot, though changes that men would call conversions may take place.

As it is a fundamental principle in the economy of heaven, that "it is accepted according to what a man hath," we know that at the closing of the door of mercy, all who fear God and work righteousness, according to the light they have, must be embraced by the arms of his mercy; though as the measure of light they might then have, would be different, the apparent form of their character must differ. And there may be changes in the form of their character, which we might call conversions, though it would imply no change in their inward character before God. That such may be found, for whom we should labor, there can be no doubt; and in fact, it is with such a class only, few indeed is their number, that our labors are in any way successful. The few that makes up this class, would, therefore, form the limits of our labors, excepting that we exhort one another.

If then it is so very doubtful whether the union of Christ with his church, at his second coming, is ever spoken of by the figure of a marriage, is it any more certain that the marriage refers to the reception of the throne and kingdom? And if so, what are the reasons for supposing that Christ has closed up his work, to become king, and that the door is shut?

Let it be understood that we do not doubt that Christ is to be united to his church, but that that is the act denoted by the figure; nor do we doubt that Christ is to come literally and personally. And the act which we suppose the coming of the bridegroom to the marriage to denote, is as literal an act as the personal coming—just as the first step in descending a flight of steps, is as literal as the last step.

RH May 6, 1852 Roswell F. Cottrell

OUR PROPHET, PRIEST AND KING.

BY R. F. COTTRELL.

When Jesus dwelt below,
Proclaiming through the land,
Saying, Repeat, for lo!
The kingdom is at hand!
He was the Prophet long foretold
By Moses' mouth, in days of old.

Since he ascended high,
For us to intercede;
To hear his people's cry,
In every time of need,
A faithful High Priest he has been,
Pleading his blood to cleanse from sin.

His priesthood's almost o'er,
He soon will leave that place,
And then his blood no more
Can wash earth's guilty race.
O, let us now implore his grace,
Before he leaves the heavenly place!

He then will be a King,
And wear a golden crown;
A great white cloud shall bring
Creation's Monarch down;
The wicked then he will destroy,
And bear his saints to realms of joy.

RH Sept 16, 1852 Roswell F. Cottrell

THE SANCTUARY.

BY R. F. COTTRELL.

There is a house in heaven built,
The temple of the living God,
The tabernacle true, where guilt
Is washed away by precious blood.

Long since, our High Priest entered there,
Who knows the frailties of our frame;
Who loves to hear his people's prayer,
And offer to our God the same.

The daily ministry he bore,
Till ended the prophetic days;
He opened then the inner door,
To justify the sacred place.

Before the Ark of 'Ten Commandments',
On which the Mercy-seat is placed,
Presenting his own blood, he stands,
Till Israel's sins are all erased.

This work performed, the firm decree
Will pass on all the sons of men,
He that is filthy, let him be,
He that is holy, so remain.

To Christ let living faith ascend,
Keep God's Commandments, patient wait,
Till we shall see our Dearest Friend,
And pass, with him, the pearly gate.

THOUGHTS ON THE PAST WORK OF WILLIAM MILLER, AND HIS ADHERENTS, RESPECTING THE TRUE STARTING POINT OF DAN. viii, 14; ix, 24, 25.

BY JOSEPH BATES.

On a recent visit to Low Hampton, N. Y., I visited the grave of this venerable man. The white marble monument erected over his head, shows to the passing traveler, a book chiseled out on the front of the marble slab, representing a Bible. On the first page, in large black letters, are the following appropriate words:

"And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. viii, 14.

Here, thought I, lies the venerable man that so successfully repeated those words of holy writ. With this mighty weapon of the Lord of hosts, accompanied by his Spirit, in a few years did he wake up and move out a company of faithful believers who associated with him, and awakened and aroused "them that dwell upon the earth." Rev. xlv, 6, 7.

Where, thought I, is the advent believer that does not know that the world was aroused by a calculation on time, from the 2300 days of Dan. viii, 14, the vision of days that had been sealed up from the church of God for about 2400 years. [For sealing up, see Dan. viii, 17, 26; xii, 4, 9.] The opening of this book [Rev. x, 1] in "the time of the end," and the presentation of this mighty truth, was what aroused the people to prepare for the cleansing of the sanctuary, and the coming of the Lord Jesus. No advent believer can doubt but this was the man that God moved out to give the world the true starting point of the 2300 days. All that have read his works, or heard him preach, know that he commenced the days from the 7th year of the reign of Artaxerxes, a. c. 457, in harmony with Dan. ix, 24, 25. That he was right in starting the vision with this date, the numerous publications in past advent history show, where many in the churches and colleges, raised their objections, and were all silenced by the united efforts of himself and his associates, before the ending of the days in the Fall of 1844.

Then I thought of the strange scenes of distraction that followed his work; even by his associates and professed friends, since the passing of the time.

From the Albany, N. Y. Conference of April, 1846, to the Spring of 1850, the work of moving this starting point went forward. March 24, 1850, the Advent Herald sent forth an able article, showing most clearly that they had returned once more to the original starting point of Daniel's vision of the 2300 days. Following this, was a most valuable work of 232 pages, from the same press, by J. H. W. entitled, Analysis of Sacred Chronology, covering the whole ground by unanswerable arguments. The Herald speaks as follows:

"It is by the Canon of Ptolemy that the great prophetic period of seventy weeks is fixed. This Canon places the seventh year of Artaxerxes in the year a. c. 457; and the accuracy of the Canon is demonstrated by the concurrent agreement of more than twenty eclipses. The seventy weeks date from the going forth of a decree respecting the restoration of Jerusalem.

We must therefore look to the seventh of Artaxerxes. This date we cannot change from a. c. 457, without first demonstrating the inaccuracy of Ptolemy's Canon. To do this, it would be necessary to show that the large number of eclipses, by which its inaccuracy has been repeatedly demonstrated, have not been correctly computed; and such a result would unsettle every chronological date.

We will here give a few more extracts from the Herald.

"We have no now right respecting the connection between the 70 weeks and 2300 days. The only argument against their connection is the passing of the time. Why that has passed is a mystery to us, which we wait to have revealed."—Advent Herald, Sept. 7th, 1850.

"There has nothing transpired to weaken the force of those arguments, but the passing of the time we expected for their termination. We now have no other fact to advance against their connection; and therefore can only wait for the mystery of the passing of the time to be explained. But of the commencement and termination of the 70 weeks, we are satisfied that they cannot be removed from the position which Protestants have always assigned them."—Advent Herald, Feb. 22d, 1851.

A correspondent asks the following questions, and the Editor of the Herald gives the answers, which are enclosed in brackets.

"In your Chronology the cross is placed A. D. 31. What are the principal objections which bear against its being placed in A. D. 31? [Ans. 1. the absence of any evidence placing it there. 2. The contradiction of the wonderful astronomical, chronological, and historical coincidences which show beyond the shadow of controversy, that the seventh of Artaxerxes was in the year, a. c. 457—B"]

Then he asks again:

"If the seventy weeks of Dan. ix, do not commence in the twelfth of Artaxerxes, how can the 2300 days begin at the same time with them? [Ans. They cannot.]

Must we not henceforth consider that they have different starting points? [Ans. Yes.] Advent Herald, May 22d, 1852.

The reader will please notice, that in answer to this last question, the Herald has denied the connection between the 70 weeks and the 2300 days.

Probably no portion of prophecy has occupied the mind of the true believer, both in the past and present, as Dan. ix, 24-27 has. The true exposition, and proclamation of which was designed by God to arouse the world, and move the church through their purifying process, preparatory to immortality and eternal life.

Let us now hold their argument forth by the side of truth.

1. From 1841 to 1846, they were intimately associated with William Miller in proclaiming the 2300 days of Dan. viii, in connection with Dan. ix, showing their starting point to be in the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes a. c. 457.

2. From the Spring of 1846, they commenced the dissolution of the starting point, a. c. 457, and moved it onward to show that the 2300 days must end this side of the Fall of 1844. In the Spring of 1850, the Herald commenced advocating the starting point, a. c. 457, as it did in 1843.

3. From the Spring of 1850, to the Spring of 1852, it continued to publish, according to the foregoing statements, and thus to re-establish, according to their answer to a correspondent, the wonderful astronomical, chronological, and historical coincidences, which show beyond the shadow of controversy, that the seventh of Artaxerxes was in a. c. 457.

4. In the Spring of 1852, in answer to the question put them by a correspondent, "Must we not henceforth consider that they, referring to the 70 weeks and 2300 days, have different starting points?" The answer is "yes!"

Let us now take a retrospective view of the above four points.

1. For evidence on this point, their testimony went out and was received through preaching, and publications, too numerous to mention, which by the Fall of 1844, silenced all opposition with respect to the starting point, and clearly showed the ending of the 2300 days on the tenth day of the seventh month, 1844.

2. Their work, associated with others, in attempting, by books and tracts, &c., to dissolve the harmony of the prophetic periods, (therein mentioned,) which they, and the church of God had been laboring so long to sustain, caused distraction throughout the ranks of Advent believers.

3. They re-established the harmonious view of 1844, and show "beyond the shadow of controversy," that a. c. 457 is the true starting point. So that Jewish Lilliput, thence so ably defended and harmonized these points, at length says: "Chronologically, the period is at an end, according to the best light to be obtained on the subject; and where the discrepancy is, I am unable to determine." Advent Herald, Dec. 28, 1852.

4. That after all the foregoing testimony, and much more of the same tenor set forth in the Review for Dec. 23, 1852, and still more which might be presented, they have again changed their view, and declare the 70 weeks, and 2300 days have different starting points.

Let us see if Daniel so understood it. "Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision." Dan. viii, 16. What vision? Ans. The vision of the 2300 days. In the last verse he says, "none understood it." But in the first verse of Chap. x, he says, he had understanding of the vision, and the thing was true." Here is positive evidence that Daniel received from the angel Gabriel, all the evidence that ever was given him.

respecting the starting point of his vision, from Chap. ix.—Verse 25, above but one starting point, from one decree to restore and build Jerusalem. This decree was given to Ezra in the seventh year of Artaxerxes the king. Ezra vii, 9. See the decree in verses 11-18.

Nehemiah, nor any other person but Ezra, never received a decree to restore and build Jerusalem. Cyrus issued a proclamation, s. c. 536, to build the house of the Lord God of Israel in Jerusalem. Then Ezra, as above stated, followed in s. c. 457. Thirteen years afterward, Nehemiah received from Artaxerxes two letters, one to convey him to Judah; the other was to Asep, the keeper of the forest, for a grant of timber to make beams for the gates of the Palace, which appertained to the house, and for the walls of the city. Neh. ii, 7, 8. Therefore it was not the work of Nehemiah to commence to restore and build Jerusalem, from the captivity of Zedekiah where all was laid waste, [Jer. lii, 12-14,] but to build the walls and gates then broken down, which Ezra had been restoring. Neh. i, 1-3.

Now it is clearly settled, from the best authority, that Ezra's decree was given in s. c. 457. See Sacred Chronology by S. Hume, and Advent Herald, March 2, 1850; and Feb. 16th, 1851.

As it is an undisputed fact by all Israelites, that the word, determined, in Dan. ix, 24, signifies cut off, and as the 70 weeks seal the vision and prophecy, and as this decree went forth from Ezra in the Fall of s. c. 457, seventy weeks of years untraced, or cut off, from the 2300 years would carry the point to the Fall of A. D. 34, leaving just 1810 years of the 2300 which would end in the Fall of A. D. 1944. And "then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

Once more. Verse 25 shows the same starting point, to run 69 weeks of years to the coming of the Messiah. Turn to the first chapter of Mark, you will read that after the Messiah was baptized, he came into Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom, declaring "the time is fulfilled." [The 69 weeks of years.] Luke in giving the same account of his baptism, says, "he began to be about thirty years of age." Luke iii, 21-23. Here we understand was the completion to the 69 weeks or 483 years. Beginning these with the 7th year of Artaxerxes, s. c. 457, we find they extend to the Fall of A. D. 27. To this last date add 1817 years, and it brings us to the Fall of 1844, the whole length of the 2300 days.

Here we understand is the perfect harmony of the sealing of the vision and prophecy of Dan. viii and ix, proving most clearly that the 2300 days could not possibly extend beyond the Fall of 1844, where the loud cry of the first angel [Rev. xiv, 6, 7] ended.

According to the testimony of Luke, Jesus was about 30 years of age when he began his public ministry. See Matt. iii, 1; 1 Chron. xxiii, 3. Then we understand that Jesus was about 30 years of age when the 69 weeks, or 483 years, ended.

Then 1817 years more would complete the 2300 years in the Fall of 1844. Now if it be said that this vision could be extended to 1845, then 1818 years must be added to the 483. And if onward to another year, then 1819 must be added, and so on for every additional year. If prolonged to 1853, then 1826 years must be added to 483. In this case Dan. viii, 14 should read, Unto 2309 days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.

Again, every year that be added to 1817, beyond where Luke says he was about 30 years of age, the scripture must be altered from thence, and make Luke say, he was about 31 years of age, or if extended one year farther, then he must say he was about 32, and so on year after year, viz: 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, and if about 39 years of age, then the 2300 days would extend to 1833.

As God does not say yes and nay, to the same thing, the testimony of the Advent Herald, in making different starting points for the 70 weeks and the 2300 days, or in any way changing the 7th year of Artaxerxes from s. c. 457, falls, being weighed in the balance and found wanting.

This inexplicable position of the Herald, is, to some minds, most perplexing, and astonishing. If they should once publicly admit that the 2300 days were at an end, or could come to an end any how, or any where, by commencing them s. c. 457, and it was now 2308 years, 3 months, and 12 days since that date, (which by them has so often been declared to be the only true one, then they see, of course, that they would be in duty bound to show the Bible view of the sanctuary, and also its cleansing that follows the ending of the days. Not like the view which they gave in the Herald for April 27th, 1850.

These two points once explained, would of necessity involve them in the open and shut door view connected with the Philadelphia state of the church. Rev. iii, 7, 8; Isa. xlii, 22; Matt. xxv, 6-10. And still onward to the Bible view of the third angel's message, with the keeping of all the commandments of God, and the faith, or all of the testimony of Jesus Christ. Rev. xiv, 12; xli, 17.

For proof that they have lost their reckoning, and know not their whereabouts, please read their farther statements.—Shortly after the Herald of May 1852, stated that the 70 weeks and 2300 days had different starting points. J. Cummings of N. H., ventured out again on the forbidden work of "prolonging the days" and requested the Herald, or rather the Editor to publish his article, and make what remarks he pleased. Here follow their remarks.

"We know not what future light may be given on the termination of the prophetic periods, but we greatly deprecate this drawing conclusions with such positiveness, on a question of so much moment, on evidence which compared to that for 1843, is but as a rush light to the sun." Advent Herald, Nov. 6, 1852.

A few weeks after the above, D. I. Robinson comes out also against J. Cummings, and others to show them their error for setting new times. He closes by saying:

"We were on time. 1. That the time as first proposed, about 1843," was off the Lord.

2. That in so long a period as 2300 years, we are not out of the limits of that phraseology, nor are we likely to be till it comes.

3. That all other times have turned out mistakes in the past.

4. That those now put forth, lack the main rule of chronological time, the united strength of the 2300 days harmonized with the 70 weeks; and therefore must be from the nature of the case, soon unconvincing.

5. That as all "definite" ones failed with it, there is reason in doubt these." Advent Herald, Dec. 18, 1852.

Let us see how this looks. 1. He says the time as first proposed "about 1843" was off the Lord. Then the understanding is that the 2300 days ended there, for whatever is of the Lord will stand.

2. The definition of phraseology is "mode of speech"—Webster. Then we understand D. I. Robinson, that "we are not out of the limits of that mode of speech, nor are we likely to be, till it comes." Thus we can continue to say 2300 days, till it comes. It was of the Lord in 1843, but our position is 2300 days yet to come, no matter how long. This harmonizes with the Herald:

"We know not what future light may be given on the termination of the prophetic periods." The time that is now being given, "on evidence which compared to that for 1843, is but as a rush light to the sun."

"A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land; the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means; and my people love to have it so; and what will ye do in the end thereof?" Jer. v, 30, 31.

The white marble tomb-stone that marks the spot where the man that God honored lies, shows to the passing traveler, though dead he "yet speaketh." "And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." If the traveler asks, what is the meaning of those words, there is no response. He finished his work, and his Employer suffered him to be laid aside, until after the sanctuary should be cleansed.

Dear reader, if you are troubled to understand this very important text, I would advise you by all means to procure a pamphlet of 68 pages, entitled, "The Sanctuary and 2300 days," published at the Review Office. In this work you will find the subject of the Sanctuary very fully, and clearly explained.

The 70 weeks a part of the 2300 days.

[The evidence presented on this subject by Bro. Andrews is conclusive. We give the following extract from the exposition of Dan. viii, by Geo. Storrs, published in 1843. It shows the position then taken by the whole Advent body.]

"We will now give you the 13th and 14th verses of the eighth chapter of Daniel, leaving out what our translators have supplied:—'Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which awoke, How long the vision, the daily and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand three hundred days: then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.'

The inquiry, 'How long the vision,' clearly related to the 'Ram' and 'Goat,' as well as 'little horn'—and, the 2300 days are given in answer to this question,—'How long the vision?'

It was the meaning of the vision Daniel sought—verse 15: 'It came to pass, when I had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning,' &c.

It was to make Daniel understand the vision, Gabriel was sent—verse 16: 'I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which called and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision.'

It was to make Daniel understand the vision, Gabriel came—verse 17: 'So he came near where I stood, and said unto me, Understand, O son of man.'

The first thing Gabriel would have Daniel understand, was, that the vision was down to the end,—verse 17: 'At the time of the end shall be the vision.' He would have Daniel understand that the end intended was the last end of indignation,—verse 19: 'Behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation;' and he would have Daniel know that, 'at the time appointed, the end shall be.'

The 2300 days is the only time appointed. That time cannot be applied to a particular agent or event, without violence to the whole subject.

Now let us inquire what Daniel did understand, and what not. The angel explained every thing to him respecting the ram, he-goat, and little horn. But Daniel tells us in the last verse, 'I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it.' What did not Daniel understand? There were, evidently, three things he did not understand: 1st. What 'sanctuary' was intended in verse 13; 2d. He did not understand how to reckon the days; and 3d. Where to commence his reckoning. As Gabriel is not to be charged with disobedience to the command to make Daniel understand the vision, and as he has not fulfilled that command in this chapter, we must look elsewhere to see if he ever did what he was directed to do, and what he promised Daniel he would do.

Let us now look into the 9th chapter. Daniel there informs us that he found out 'by books, the number of years whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem.' We might here inquire, Why did not Daniel find that out before? It was written in the book, but he did not discover it till now. Our opponents seem to think it is a conclusive argument that we are wrong, because the time of the end of the world has not been found out before now. But is it any more marvelous than that Daniel did not learn that the captivity of the Jews in Babylon was to be seventy years, till those years were accomplished?

When Daniel discovered this fact, fifteen years had passed since the vision of the eighth chapter, and he had all that time been in uncertainty about the points that were not explained to him in that vision. He now seems to catch at the thought, that it must be the sanctuary at Jerusalem, to which the vision related, and he at once commences praying accordingly. He, at the 17th verse, prays especially about the sanctuary. 'Now, therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplications, and cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate, for the Lord's sake.' Daniel's mind is evidently on the vision, and he seems to suppose he has got the clue to the sanctuary that is to be cleansed; but Gabriel comes flying swiftly, to stop Daniel in the midst of his prayer. See verse 21: 'Yea, while I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation.'

Gabriel, why this haste? Why, I see Daniel is wrong—he don't understand the matter—he thinks the vision related to the sanctuary at Jerusalem, and I must stop him, for he is going astray.

'Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision,' says Daniel. What vision? Where had Daniel seen Gabriel in vision? Evidently nowhere but in the vision of the 2300 days. Well, says Gabriel, 'I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding—therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision.'

How is it possible that anything can be plainer than that both Daniel and Gabriel have the vision in mind, that 'none understood,' at the close of the eighth chapter? Now, says Gabriel, 'understand the matter, as by your prayer I see you did not, and consider the vision—direct your attention to what I have now to say of it. 'Seventy weeks are determined [cut off, so the word signifies] upon thy people.' Cut off from what? Surely not from the indefinite space; but from some time previously given. What time had Daniel given him before? None, except the 2300 days. The natural inference, then, is that the 70 weeks were cut off from those days: there is nothing else to cut them off from. For what are they cut off? Several objects are specified; but one especially, viz., to seal up [or as the word signifies, see Dan. vi, 17, make sure] the vision.'

Connection between the 70 weeks and 2300 days.
From the Memoirs of Wm. Miller, by Sylvester Bliss, and published by J. F. Himes, Boston, 1853. pp. 193—196.

"This was a vital point in the chronology of Mr. M. to bring the end in 1843. The Rev. William Innes, D. D., the most learned modern chronologer says:—
"This simple and ingenious adjustment of the chronology of the seventy weeks, considered as forming a branch of the 2300 days, was originally due to the sagacity of Hans Wood, Esq., of Rossmore, in the county of Westmeath, Ireland, and published by him in an anonymous commentary on the Revelation of St. John, Lon. 1787."—New Anal. Chro., Vol. 2, p. 564.
He elsewhere calls it 'the most ingenious of its class.'

"The argument which Mr. Miller used in support of this point was based upon the literal meaning of the Hebrew word, which, in our version of Dan. ix. 24, is rendered 'determined'—cut off, or cut out—and the circumstances in which Gabriel appeared to Daniel, as stated in the ninth chapter, with the instruction given.

"In the 8th chapter of Daniel, is recorded a vision which was to extend to the cleansing of the Sanctuary, and to continue 2300 days. Daniel had 'sought for the meaning' of that vision, and a voice said: 'Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision.' Gabriel said to Daniel, 'I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation; for, at the time appointed, the end shall be'; and then proceeded to explain the symbols, but said nothing of their duration. At the close of the explanation, Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days; and he says, he 'was astonished at the vision, but none understood it.'

"Three years subsequent to that vision, Daniel—understanding 'by books the number of the years whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolation of Jerusalem'—set his face unto the Lord to seek by prayer and supplications, with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes. He proceeded to confess his own sins and the sins of his people, and to supplicate the Lord's favor on the sanctuary that was desolate. While he was thus speaking, Daniel says: 'Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision, at the beginning, being cased to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation; and he informed me, and talked with me, and said: O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am now come to show thee; for thou art greatly beloved; therefore understand the matter and consider the vision. Seventy weeks are determined,' &c., 'from the going forth of the decree to restore and to build Jerusalem unto Messiah the Prince; after which Jerusalem was to be made desolate 'until the consummation.' Dan. ix. 20-27.

Dr. Gill, a distinguished divine and scholar, rendered the word, 'determined,' cut off, and is sustained by good scholars.

Hengstenberg, who enters into a critical examination of the original text, says: "But the very use of the word, which does not elsewhere occur while others, much more frequently used, were at hand, if Daniel had wished to express the idea of determination, and of which he has elsewhere, and even in this portion, availed himself, seems to argue that the word stands from regard to its original meaning and represents the seventy weeks, in contrast with a determination of time, (en platel) as a period cut off from subsequent duration, and accurately limited." Christology of the old Test., Vol. 2, p. 301. Washington, 1839.

"Gesenius in his Hebrew Lexicon, gives cut off as the definition of the word, and many others of the first standing as to learning and research, and several versions have thus rendered the word.

"Such being the meaning of the word, and such the circumstances under which the prophecy of the seventy weeks was given. Mr. Miller claimed that the vision which Daniel was called on to consider, and respecting which Gabriel was to give him skill and understanding, was the vision of the 8th chapter; of which Daniel sought the meaning, which Gabriel was commanded to make him understand, but which, after Gabriel's explanation, none understood; and that the seventy weeks of years—i. e., four hundred and ninety that were cut off were cut off from the 2300 days of that vision; and, consequently, that those two periods must be dated from the same epoch, and the longer extend 1810 years after the termination of the shorter.

"The same view was advocated by several English divines. Rev. M. Habershon says: 'In this conclusion I am happy in agreeing with Mr. Cunningham, who says, 'I am not aware of any more probable era which can be selected for the commencement of the 2300 years, than that which has been chosen by some recent writers, who supposed this period to have begun at the same time with the seventy weeks of Daniel, or in the year B. C. 457, and consequently that it will terminate in the year 1843.'—Hist. Dis., p. 307."

THE PARABLE---Matt. XXV.
BY WM. S. INGRAHAM.

In this chapter we have some historical facts in relation to an eastern marriage. Jesus here utters a parable to which the experience of his people is likened. I do not design to enter into all the particulars of this parable, but merely to glance at some of the important points. Perhaps there is not a portion of scripture in God's Word that has been misapplied and mangled more than the one under consideration. In bringing out some important points connected with this parable, it will be necessary to find the chronology of the event, or the time when the experience of the church is to be compared with the parable of the ten virgins.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins which took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom." No one can for a moment suppose that the kingdom, after all its component parts are brought together, is here represented as going forth to meet the Lord. But the church is represented as going forth. Then shall the true church be likened, here a definite period of time is marked. Then signifies, at that time. It may be best, in order to make this point plain, to introduce some scripture testimony. Matt. xxv, 16, 24, 34, 37, 41, 44, 45; Dan. vii, 14. We can but see from the texts referred to, that the turn, then, marks a definite period of time. If this part of the subject is made clear, we will, as we have already remarked, point out that period of time in which the comparison is to be made.

In Matt. xxiv, we have a connected chain of events, beginning with the apostolic age, and terminating with the coming of the Son of man. From verse 5th down to the 14th, we have a prophetic history of the trials of God's people beginning at, or near the time of Jerusalem's destruction and reaching down to the end of the world. Verse 15, shows when a prophecy spoken by the prophet Daniel in reference to the desolation of Jerusalem would have its fulfillment. The 21st verse begins the great tribulation, which passes through the ten persecutions, and is continued by the Roman Catholic church, nearly twelve hundred and sixty years. The tribulation brings us down to about 1776, closing a short time before the days themselves terminate. Mark xiii, 24. After this, we have the signs of the coming of our Saviour—the darkening of the sun and moon, 1780, and the falling of the stars, 1833. When these things begin to come to pass, we are told by the blessed Jesus, to look up and lift up our heads; for our redemption draweth nigh. We see clearly from what we have already said, that we have come down the track of prophecy to that period when God's dear people may rejoice in expectation of the glory that is soon to be revealed. In the closing up of this chapter, we have a description of two classes of servants, one is giving meat in due season, the other is joining heart and hand with the wicked, in smiting his fellow servant. And, with a hypocritical heart, is saying, my Lord delays his coming.

If this class of servants are sincere, why is their portion given with hypocrites, spoken of in the last verse.

An effort has been made to throw this back upon the churches for a fulfillment. But after a more mature investigation, we see it comes nearer home. In order to have a complete fulfillment of this scripture, we must have a definite point of time to which we are looking for the coming of Christ. The churches have never been believers in definite time; therefore this scripture cannot be applied to them. There could be no propriety in saying, the Lord delays his coming, unless a definite point had been looked to for his coming. If I am right in the position I have taken, we are driven to the conclusion that these two classes of servants are found within the Advent body. At any rate, we find a class there, that bear all the characteristics here mentioned. Look at the lukewarm state of the church, once looking with longing hearts and with glorious expectations for the revelation of the Son of God. Look at the worldly-mindedness, yea, wickedness, of that people who profess to be looking for the speedy conclusion of all earthly scenes, and by their works deny their profession. Look at the once beautiful church, closed out of the world, rejoicing with songs of gladness, walking by the same rule, minding the same thing, and with one mouth glorifying God. Let the contrast be drawn; compare their condition now, with their standing in 1844, when unitedly they were crying with a loud voice, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him."

Like the sow that was washed, they have returned to wallowing in the mire. And notwithstanding they have declared their freedom before the face of all people, a Babel must be built, a fabric reared like those of the nations around. And instead of the glorious proclamation of the speedy coming of our King, another message is given, and that which is holy must be given to dogs. The three angels of Rev. xiv, commissioned by the great Jehovah to warn the world of the approaching storm of wrath, must stand rebuked as being out of their place, and take their position in the Age to come. And this is not all. It is said by some, that, "Adventism is but in its infancy." If these things are so, this generation to which Jesus says, "look up," may expect to go to their long home, and their bodies be mingled with the dust. We see from the above that we are brought down this side of 1844, for the smiting time, mentioned in Matt. xxiv, 48, 49.

Once more, in remarking on this subject, we would say, in order to compare the experience of God's people with the parable of the ten virgins, both histories must be complete. All the points necessary to explain the Advent movement, down to the tenth day of the seventh month, 1844, are clearly brought to view in the parable. The proclamation of the coming of the Lord, has had the effect to start out a people to meet the bridegroom. Their expectations are not realized, and they are brought into a position described in verse 5th.

"While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept." Have we seen any thing in the Advent movement that may be compared with this part of the parable? If we have not, we never shall. These footsteps are too plain to be doubted or denied. After passing 1843, it was proclaimed by the Advent host that we were in the tarrying time spoken of by the Prophet. Hab. ii. 1-4. "Though the vision tarry, wait for it." The Lord save us from denying that truth that was begotten in our hearts by the Holy Spirit, and shone so clearly from his Word. The virgins during the tarry, were to slumber and sleep. Look at our condition after definite time apparently failed. On time we went out to meet the Lord. Our disappointment came, and we went to sleep; not literally, but so far as time was concerned, we were slumbering and sleeping; for we had none.

At midnight there was a cry made, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him." Here is another item to which the cry in 1844 may be compared. At midnight there was a cry made. This part of the subject is perfectly clear. When this cry began to be made, the mistake we made with relation to the ending of the 2300 days was clearly seen. In commencing the days in the beginning of the year 457 a. c., we made a mistake of about half a year, as the decree did not go into effect until about the middle of the year. This is clear when we take into consideration the time consumed in going up to Jerusalem, and the preparation necessary to begin the restoration. This being the case, we were carried down to the Autumn of 1844, and instead of the 2300 days ending in the Spring of the year, as we supposed, we were obliged to look to the Fall of the year for their termination. About mid-way of this tarry, the cry began. Here is a nail driven in a sure place. And those who have proclaimed the coming of Christ every year since 1844 have not been able to remove it.

What I have stated brings us to an investigation of other points in the parable. Verses 7, and 8. "Then all those virgins arose and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out." No distinction is seen between the virgins until they all begin to feel the searching power of this mighty cry. The foolish being aroused, and seeing the condition of their lamps, and their lack of oil, immediately make a demand on the wise for help. But by them are pointed to another source. When the cry was made, it seems there was help for the foolish. But instead of making speedy application to the great fountain of life, they remained careless and indifferent. Too much like the class spoken of in Prov. xiv. 22: "Though thou shouldst buy a fool in a market, among wheat with a sheaf, yet will his foolishness not depart from him." Thus it was with the foolish virgins. Instead of heeding the counsels of the wise, and going to them that sold, they went where they could not obtain help.

"While they went to buy, the bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut." In the last quoted text, we have a number of important facts stated, by our Saviour, to which other points, connected with the church, are to be compared. We did suppose the coming of the bridegroom, in verse 10, to the marriage, represented the coming of Jesus Christ to this earth in all the glory of his Father. Here is an important point to be settled, in order for a further investigation of this subject.

We would ask the question, what does the marriage represent? Surely no one can deny that it represents a union consummated between Jesus Christ, the bridegroom, and his bride. But what is the bride? Not the church. If the church is the bride, who are represented as going in with Christ to the marriage? But it may be permitted, that the church is the bride. But stop a moment, and settle a few questions if you please. If the church is the bride, who are the guests? Matt. xxii. 10. Once more: If the church is the bride, who are those seen by John, and called to the marriage supper of the Lamb? Rev. xix. 9. (The supper must be after the wedding.) Let the word of the Lord settle this question. Rev. xxi. 9, 10.— "And there came unto me, one of the seven angels which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me, saying, come hither and I will shew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife. And he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God."

Did the angel fulfill his promise? If he did, when he showed the great city to John, he showed him the bride. It is written that "they which be of faith, the same are blessed with faithful Abraham." What did Abraham look for? Did he look for a church?—Jeh. xi. 10. "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." Gal. iv. 26. "But Jerusalem which is above is free which is the mother of us all." If the Jerusalem above is our mother, it must be the Lamb's wife. If we take the view that the church is the bride, we find ourselves in difficulties which cannot be surmounted.—But take the Bible view of the subject, and all is harmonious and plain.

When we look at other scripture testimony we see at once the marriage here spoken of cannot represent an event to take place after the second Advent of our Lord. Read Luke xii. 35-36. "Let your loins be girded about and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord when he will return from the wedding, that when he cometh and knocketh they may open unto him immediately. It is perfectly evident that if we are to wait for our Lord's return from the wedding, the marriage must take place before he comes.

If the marriage is to take place after God's people pass through the gates into the city, when shall we witness the fulfillment of scripture as represented by the parable of the marriage of the king's son?—Matt. xxii. 11-13. If the above scene is to be witnessed after the saints are caught up into the heavenly city, some of the wicked must be caught up with them. If this is a correct view of the subject, what can we do with the testimony of John Rev. xxi. 27. "And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." But this is not all. We not only contradict the testimony of John, but we labor under other difficulties. Matt. xxii. 11, "And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding garment. And he said unto him, friend, how comest thou in hither not having a wedding garment? and he was speechless. Then said the king to the servants, bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." If all this is to be accomplished after the saints enter the city, surely there will be war in heaven!

A man, not belonging to the flock, in his flight for refuge, mistakes his own company, and finds himself speechless in the midst of an immortal band in the golden city! No wonder he is speechless; for he has not kept the commandments and has no right there. And he is taken by the saints and hurled down to earth again! But when we compare scripture with scripture, it is manifest that the marriage takes place before Christ comes to earth. If this point is admitted, on the same ground we must admit the shut door before he comes. But says the objector, I cannot agree with you in relation to the shut door. If you cannot agree with us can you with the Bible? Will you take the position that the door will not be shut (or the event represented by the shut door in the parable) is not to take place until after the Lord comes. If so, when do the foolish knock for admittance? Surely, not after the Lord comes; for then they will cry for rocks and mountains to fall on them. Rev. vi, 16. But says one, I believe the door will not be shut until after the marriage, and the Son of man takes his position on the white cloud. But wait a moment, my Bible does not read so. It reads, "They that were ready went in with him to the marriage and the door was shut."—When? At the time he went to the marriage. But I hear many saying, "Away with your shut-door theory, and no-mercy doctrine. But not quite so hasty! If you should move under the influence of a wrong spirit in opposing the shut-door, if our merciful High Priest should open another, in your haste you would not be likely to discover it. Perhaps no point has been more bitterly opposed than what some call the shut-door, and no-mercy doctrine. If we believed in the no-mercy system, our opponents would have some cause to reproach us. That we do believe in a change in the priestly office of our great High Priest, Jesus Christ, as represented in the parable, we do not deny. That our High Priest at the termination of the 2300 days in 1844, did end his daily ministration in the first apartment of the heavenly Sanctuary, and remove to the most Holy Place to complete his priestly work, we do fully believe. And that the saints that were interested in the Advent movement, and had their sympathies and feelings all absorbed in this solemn move, did, by faith, follow Jesus beyond the second veil we cannot for a moment doubt.

It is believed by some that we hold to a shut door that does really and forever deliver the sinner from coming to Christ. Let me ask such a question:—

What does this parable have to do with those who were not brought under the influence of the Advent movement? It is true that the class represented by the foolish virgins have something to do with it: this is manifest from the fact that they were participators in the work. I have yet to learn that the relation those sustained to Christ who were not tested by the preaching of the speedy coming of Christ was in the least effected when Jesus closed his daily ministration in the heavenly Sanctuary.

That there is an open door for such as did not reject the glorious news of our soon coming Lord as proclaimed in 1843 and 1844, is evident from God's word. (And it is just as evident to my mind that a certain class have been rejected. Compare Matt. xxv, 10 with Luke xiv, 17-24.)

In Isa. xxii, 22, we have presented to our view an open door and also a shut door. In Rev. iii, 7, we have a parallel. Let these texts of scripture be compared one with the other. According to our faith in 1844, which I believe to be correct, the church of Philadelphia, or brotherly love, was in its glory; about the tenth day of the seventh month, after we had left the nominal churches, and had become united under the influence of truth. "I know thy works, behold I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." We can fix the chronology of the open and shut door here brought to view by John, no where but in 1844. We present an open door to all that have ears to hear. But those that have closed their ears to the proclamation of the last message of mercy, must answer for it in the day of accounts.

Again, in the language of holy Inspiration, as found in Rev. iii, 13, we would say, "He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches."—For further light on this subject, I would recommend to you an article written by Bro. J. N. Andrews for the Review on the Sanctuary and 2300 days.

Much more might be said on this subject; but I have written more than I anticipated when I commenced. When I review the past my heart is full, and swells with gratitude to God for all the way he has led us.

Dear brethren and sisters, we can raise our minds to heaven and thank God for the light that shines. Let confusion trample on the heels of confusion; blessed is the name of the Lord, all is well with those who have followed down the track of prophecy, and have walked in the truth as it has continued to shine from the Word. All who give up their past experience in the Advent movement, ought to expect nothing but perdition, according to the apostle Paul. Heb. x, 39.—By reviewing our past experience, we see that we have been brought down step by step, until we find ourselves in the patient waiting time, waiting for the Son of God from heaven. The Lord is soon coming. Quickly he will send his angels after his people.—Are you all ready? And your robes spotless and pure? Can you stand in the day of battle? O get ready, for Jesus will soon come. Let every stroke tell for heaven. Rise and shake yourselves from the blood of souls, that in the final winding up of all earthly scenes, you may be free. I hope to meet all in the kingdom.

Removing the Land-marks.

Some who have acted a conspicuous part in giving the judgment-hour cry, when remarking on the prophetic periods, and chronological dates, which have been looked to with such intense interest in times past, have confessed to the world, that they had been mistaken in looking for the Lord; for, say they, if we had seen the end of those periods, we should have realized our hope.

It will be seen by this statement that they, with all the experience of the past, are not satisfied with the lapse of ten years since the termination of the periods on which they would base the evidence of the coming of the Lord, and are among the number of those who are still removing the land marks. But as this class, although they preach some great truths, encouraging and interesting to the Christian, have not followed down the track of prophecy, so as to have the true light on our present position, they cannot be considered to be giving meat in due season, or present truth.

If I am not mistaken, the language of Ezekiel xii. 22, and onward is very applicable to this time. "What is that proverb that ye have in the land of Israel, saying, The days are prolonged and every vision faileth?" How many times this rebellious house has fixed for the termination of the days, I know not; but they have all failed, and all will fail. And this unfollowed work, if I understand the text, will continue until God speaks the time himself. The 26th verse affirms it. And the remaining portion of the chapter shows the position of those who are vainly looking for definite time, or for many days or years to come, when the judgments of God are just impending. The 5th verse of the xiii chapter plainly teaches what ought to be done, in view of these things, in this time of peril. Please compare this with Isa. viii. 16. The law of Jehovah is to be bound up and sealed among the disciples, that they may be able to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord. Surely, this dabbling with untempered mortar shall not stand. Great hail-stones shall fall, and a stormy wind shall rend it, and the wall shall be no more, nor they that daubed it.—The God that made the heavens and the earth, that spoke the holy law, in thunder tones, from Sinai's Mount, will speak the time. Amen. The little remnant, on whom the dragon's wrath is poured will understand it.

I would ask, if the 70 weeks are a part of the 2300 days, as we have always supposed, and if this period has not run out, how shall we prove that Christ was the true Messiah, and that he came at the time appointed? I know of no discrepancy in chronology of more than four years, in fixing the birth of Christ, with chronologers of any note. Then, certainly, this stretching time out of joint, leaves our dates and periods to the mercy of every dreamer. And no marvel that the infidel and scoffer say, where is thy God?

But I am thankful that there is now a company coming up on the breadth of the land, who can see the providence of God in calling them out to serve him, and can follow by faith their Great High Priest, whose position, being changed, is now made manifest in the Heavenly Sanctuary, and patiently wait his return from the wedding. For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come and will not tarry. And while some may regard it as dishonesty or willfulness in not confessing the past Advent movement all a mistake, or a failure, I can say with a clear conscience, before God, that it is a very small matter with me to be judged with man's judgment. True; I did expect my Lord in 1843 and '44, and did not see him. But the prophetic fulfillment and experience in Advent history, when compared with the teachings of our Saviour, make the past all plain, and lighten up the glorious future.

And, now, when I hear winners exhorted to come to the mercy-seat, how my soul is pained, when I think of that despised and broken precept, the fourth commandment, that lies just beneath it; the mercy-seat being the cover of the Ark. So that while the law of God cries for vengeance, the blood of Christ is sprinkled on the mercy-seat, to appease its severity. Thus "mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." Ps. lxxxv. 10. So we see that Jesus' blood does not abolish that holy law, but satisfies justice. Let us remember this, when we come to the mercy-seat, and keep all his commandments, that we may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.

"There is a place where Jesus sheds
The oil of gladness on our heads;
A place than all besides more sweet,
It is the blood-bought Mercy-seat."

Review of the New Time Theory.
 BY S. EVERTS.

It seems necessary, in this time of strong delusion, that we should examine ourselves, to see if we are in the faith. We need line upon line, line upon line, daily.

I am reminded, by the many positions of the opposers of the present truth, that while the true church has but "one head, [Christ,] and speak the same things, and glorify God with one mouth," the harlot church is aided by the dragon of many heads, whose name is legion.

Truth affirms that "the vision for an appointed time," after the "worry" of 1844, "spoke," on the tenth of the 7th month, had its end, and did not live.

It was so plain that he who ran could read it. Yes, the preaching of time which was accompanied by God's providence, by a corresponding work, ended short, precisely at the time appointed: A. D. 1844.

Light on the Sanctuary shows that the judgment commenced on the tenth of the 7th month, at the end of the 2300 days, and our High Priest commenced cleansing the Sanctuary and true Tabernacle which is in heaven, because of the iniquities of the people of God in all their uncleanness, A. D. 1844. Lev. xvi; 1 Pet. iv, 17.

But infidelity towards that work, has led to a multitude of erroneous views. For a while, some advocated that the end of the 2300 days must be in the future, but presumed not to disconnect from them the 70 weeks. This showed the necessity of commencing the 70 weeks at another period, than A. C. 457. To this the Advent Herald, March 2d, 1850, objected; maintaining that it is demonstrated by more than twenty concurrent eclipses, that the prophetic period of the 70 weeks commenced A. C. 457. This sustained the view that the 2300 days ended 1844. To escape this, came the denial of the connection of the 70 weeks and the 2300 days. This glaring error of disconnecting those periods, is now healed. But how! By acknowledging the true starting point, 457 A. C., the connection of the 70 weeks and the 2300 days, and consequently their end A. D. 1844! No! But after acknowledging their connection, then denying their commencement, and end, which have been so firmly established.

This strong delusion is going through Maine, N. H., Mass. and part of Conn., like fire in stubble, as one of its advocates told me; and now it is making progress here in Vt. Same coin comes from wrong authority; although it aims to imitate every feature of the true, to deceive; but he that is conversant with the genuine, by comparing them, can detect the counterfeit.

Let us examine this new doctrine in part, as far as I learned from a preacher of it. He said that he saw the connection of the 70 weeks and the 2300 days; then set about solving the mystery of their end. He said, that he first ascertained the end of the 70 weeks, by taking the account of Paul and Barnabas (Acts xii) to be the ending of the seventieth week, of confirming the covenant, which was A. D. 45. Then he sought for a corresponding event, to mark their commencement; this he found by taking the decree of Nehemiah, to be the twentieth year of Artaxerxes' reign, A. C. 445. This, said he, just admitted the required time of 490 years, ending A. D. 45; then he added the remaining 1810 of the 2300 years, which brings us to A. D. 1855. Then, whatever may be the Sanctuary, its cleansing will be ended, and it will be fitted for the saints' abode.

Now, said he, I set about settling the much disputed point, the cross; this he did by allowing all the confirmation week to the apostles; which places the cross seven years prior to A. D. 45, which is A. D. 38, and makes Christ's age 38. He said, that even the apostles doubted Christ's being the Messiah till after the resurrection; which took place at the end of the sixty-ninth week, A. D. 38. How calculated this sort of reasoning is to deceive them whose lamps are gone out. Once, Adventists were proverbial for having for their companion the Bible; but with many now, how and the reverse.

Why all this liberal theory, that can bend to events or dates, applicable, or foreign to the fundamental basis of the question at issue? It appears to be this: because the event expected in 1844, was not realized. Feeling keenly this disappointment, many doubted the genuineness of this work; called it mesmerism; some doubted the correctness of the calculation of the time; but whose the defect was, neither they nor any of our opposers could tell. Unwilling to yield the position that the earth is the Sanctuary; unwilling to allow what we and they once challenged our opponents to disprove, that the 70 weeks and 2300 days are connected, and commenced in the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes, A. C. 457, and ended A. D. 1844; therefore comes this scattering and diversity of sentiment.

Now they are prepared to abandon plain fulfillment of prophecy, and assume that the decree in the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes, answers not the instruction mentioned to Daniel, "to restore and build Jerusalem;" because to it is added, "the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times." Therefore the decree of the seventh is rejected, and that of the twentieth year of Artaxerxes is taken; because it was under the superintendence of Nehemiah, that the street and the walls were built in troublous times.

Now, by reading the work under Nehemiah, it is plain that his work in building the street and wall, could not alone answer the instruction mentioned to Daniel; but it required the work of Ezra, commissioned to him by the decree of the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes, 457 A. C., "to restore and build Jerusalem;" which must commence the seven weeks, which end with the completion of the walls. Even it is evident that Ezra understood that his grant permitted the restoration of Jerusalem in all particulars; viz. repairing the altar; offering sacrifices; appointing judges and magistrates; and building the house or temple of God, and the wall. Ez. vii, 17, 28, 29; ix, 8, 9.

Here let us notice three points of the views of the new-timeists: 1. That the 69 weeks reach to the cross. 2. That Christ was not known to be the Messiah, till after the resurrection. 3. That all the "confirming of the covenant one week," was done by the apostles, and ended A. D. 45; which terminated the seventy weeks. Also they contend that Christ was crucified A. D. 38.

Now it appears only necessary to ascertain at what point we find the Messiah; for that point ends the 69 weeks; and 69 weeks prior to that point, must be the decree to restore and build Jerusalem; from which point it is seven weeks, and three score and two weeks, unto Messiah the Prince. Messiah, ac-rding to Bolla's lexicon, is the Anointed; the rist; the Saviour of the world; the Prince of ace. We will examine the assertion that Christ is not known to be the Messiah, during his min-ry, before the cross. "John seeth Jesus coming to him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, hich taketh away the sin of the world." Andrew id, "We have found the Messiah." Nathanael id unto Christ, "Rabbi, thou art the Son of God:

ou art the King of Israel." The woman at Jab's well said, "I know that Messiah cometh, hich is called Christ; when he is come, he will ll us all things. Jesus saith unto her, I that eak unto thee am he." And many of the Samarans said, we "know that this is indeed the Christ, a Saviour of the world." The devil said, "Let alone: what have we to do with thee, thou Jes of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us? I now thee who thou art: the Holy One of God."
And devils came out of many, crying out, and ying, Thou art Christ the Son of God." Peter id, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.
Jesus said, Flesh and blood, hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father which is in heaven." At Christ's baptism the Holy Ghost testified by descending in a bodily shape like a dove upon him; and a voice came from heaven, and testified, saying "Thou art my Beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased." All this, and much more might be dded to this clear testimony, that the Messiah was manifested at the commencement of his ministry.
his fact settled, it settles the termination of his 9 weeks. After Jesus was baptized, he preached, ying, "The time is fulfilled," (Accomplished mpbell.) Mark i, 15. What time? No time an be found to be fulfilled, but the 89 weeks, hich are accomplished at "the Messiah the Prince," hen he was baptized. This, according to Usher, as A. D. 26. Here is fixed the termination of the 9 weeks.

"And after three score and two weeks (from the end of 7 weeks, allowed to build Jerusalem), all Messiah be cut off, but not for himself."
an. ix, 26. How long after 69 weeks of Christ's apism, before Messiah was cut off, or crucified?
his may easily be ascertained, by ascertaining the length of Christ's ministry, from his baptism to the cross where he was cut off. This may be determined by the number of yearly passovers he attended. We find that but four passovers occurred uring his ministry, which he attended; (John ii, 8; v, 1; vi, 4; xiii, 1;) and at the fourth he was crucified. These four passovers could not cover more than three and a half years. These three ad a half years added to Usher's chronology of Christ's baptism, A. D. 26-7, could not extend be-ond A. D. 31; where must stand the cross. Clearly, that as at his baptism, the 69 weeks ended, so at the cross, the end of three and a half years must must be the midst of the week, where Christ caused the sacrifice and oblation to cease, by becoming our passover, sacrificed for us. Christ said, "Sacrifice and offering and burnt-offerings and offering for sin thou wouldst not, neither hadst pleasure therein; which are offered by the law;
hen said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God.
He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second." "By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." Heb. x, 8-10.

Does any one doubt that Christ's being offered on the cross, "caused the sacrifice and oblation virtually to cease," by the above commentary of Paul; and also, from the circumstance that "the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom," when Christ hung on the cross: [Matt.

xxvii, 51:] showing the rejection of that typical economy!

The cross plainly stands according to the Scriptures, in the midst [middle] of the one week, the seventieth, during which he was to confirm the covenant with many. Dan. ix, 27. This fact shows that the apostles had but half of one week, three and a half years left them in which to confirm the covenant. Now as the cross stood in the Spring,
A. D. 31, the middle of the seventieth week, three and a half more, the confirming, by them that heard him, [Heb. ii, 3,] must bring us to the Autumn of A. D. 34, where end the seventy weeks, or 490 years of the 2300, [Dan. viii, 14,] which leaves 1810 years to transpire after the Fall of A. D.
34, which end A. D. 1844, 10th of the 7th month, sacred time. Then the Sanctuary, according to time and type, law and prophesy, must be cleansed.

We ask where the Bible plainly calls the earth, or Palestine the Sanctuary? We unhesitatingly say, Nowhere! Out of the 146 texts, where the Sanctuary is expressed, two or three, only, are claimed [Ex. xv, 17; Ps. lxxvii, 54] as referring to the earth, or Palestine. But, on examination, it is clear that they refer to the true, Bible Sanctuary, which God commanded Moses to make, where the High Priest officiated between God and his people; which is brought to view under the Levit-ical dispensation, in Ex. xxv, 8, under the gospel,
Heb. viii, 9, and on the New Earth, Rev. xxi, 3;
Esa. lxxvii, 26, 26.

In regard to the apostles' confirming the cov-nant, alone, one week, it conflicts with the plain proof, that Christ's ministry extended to the middle of the confirmation week, and during that time, he confirmed that he was the "Saviour of the world."
As he declared—I have greater witness than that of John: for "the works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me. John v, 36.
These works of healing the sick, casting out devils, forgiving sins, and raising the dead, declared his salvation; "which," says Paul, "at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them, who heard him." These texts plainly show that Christ first began to confirm the cov-nant, and it was finished by the apostles.

Dear brethren, may the Lord impress us with a deep sense of these truths. May the Lord help us to walk in the light; lest it in us become darkness as it is in those whose lamps are gone out. O, for grace to walk softly; knowing that the last work in the heavenly Sanctuary is closing. How few the months or days may be, when in heaven, there will be no Intercessor, no Days-man for poor sinners; destinies of mortals will be sealed; the filthy will be so still, and the holy, ever holy be;
when the Son of man, with his sharp sickle, will harvest the earth; when the downfall of kingdoms will come; the land be soaked with blood; the alms be from one end of the earth to the other;
for they shall not be lamented, neither gathered nor buried. "In that day shall this song be sung:
We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks. Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in." "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." O, may this be our end. Amen.

The Hour of His Judgment Come.

BY J. P. ADVENTISTS.

[We shall be pardoned for inserting the following in the Review, though not written for publication, as it meets inquiries which have been presented to us.]

I shall dissent from the view taken by some, that the judgment referred to here, is the season of judgment on Papacy; and for so doing I will assign my reasons.

1. The three messages of Rev. xii, are warnings of great events. God's order is to give the warning before the event comes; if it is not so, in this instance then we have one inconsistent exception to the great general rule, and that exception one of the most important warnings this world was ever to hear, inasmuch as it heralded the great event which was to seal the destiny of thousands: "The hour of judgment come." If the judgment referred to, is the deadly wounding of the Papacy, then that message was necessarily given prior to 1798; for that is the point where the deadly wound was given. But we find upon close investigation, that the first angel's message could not go while the book was sealed, which that message was founded on, which was to be sealed until the time of the end. 1798. See Dan. xi; xii.

Again: If we should take the position that the first angel's message was to be given prior to 1798, when we look for its fulfillment we find no such message given there. Some of the Advent people have tried to claim that the reformers gave that message; but they gave no such message. The first angel's message is a definite one. Take the definiteness from it, and it would herald no new idea, but would only be "Fear God, for the judgment is coming." Neither Luther, Wesley, or any of the reformers gave a definite proclamation in regard to the judgment. Said Martin Luther, "The judgment is not far off, I am persuaded the Lord will not be absent above 800 years longer." Let us see if he gave it.—"Fear God," for the judgment is coming in 800 years. Is that the message? No. "The hour of his judgment is come." Wesley thought the Lord would come about 1836; not in his day. He did not give that message; neither did any one give it until the Advent proclamation of 1843-4 came out, claiming that the Lord was coming at the end of the 2300 days. Although they made a mistake in the event for which they looked, yet they gave that message. They supposed that judgment did not set until Jesus' second advent; and they preached that his second advent would take place in 1844. They gave a definite message. Not long since I was talking with an Adventist who said that the first angel's message was only the revelation of the judgment of the judgment, by the reformers. I asked, was not that to be a definite message? He said, no, it was not that point.

According to Paul, [1 Thessa. ii, 3,] Christ's coming could not be until the man of sin had performed his work; and they were charged to let no man deceive them. Then if any man should come while Papacy was working and say, "The hour of God's judgment (or Jesus' coming) had come," it would be a deception, for Papacy was performing its work. But these are only incidental arguments. I will now let God come to the point.

What is meant by the hour of God's judgment? (first angel's message). In order to ascertain this point, I shall claim that the Advent proclamation was the true first angel's message, and inquired, "What great event was truly heralded by that proclamation?"

The foundation stone which gave definiteness to that message was the 2300 days, the great prophetic period of Dan. viii, which period ended 1844, as all just and true reckoning will show; and the event which took place at the end of that period was the cleansing of the Sanctuary, which was to be cleansed at the end of 2300 days from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, 457 A. D. the seventh of Artaxerxes. The Sanctuary to be cleansed we at once see is not the earth, but the one that our great High Priest ministers in. In the type the priest did not work 364 days in the first apartment of the Sanctuary, and then go off 1000 miles and clear the rubbish off of some patch of ground, (which would have been a type, we should think of cleansing the earth, if anything,) but he goes into the same building he has performed his 364 days' service in, and performs the work called cleansing. But our Advent brethren all admit that our great High Priest has been performing his ministerial office since he entered heaven; but when the time comes to cleanse the Sanctuary, he must leave heaven and come to this dark, subliminary globe, to cleanse the earth. Nay, verily, he will cleanse the Sanctuary he ministers in, if he carries out the type. O well, says the brother, it needs no cleansing. Strange wisdom, whence is it. Paul says, [Heb. ix, 23,] "It was necessary that the patterns of things in heaven should be purified" or cleansed. It is strange that the patterns need cleansing, if the original does not. Yes; but Paul says they were to be cleansed with better sacrifices. Then it is necessary that the heavenly Sanctuary should be cleansed; and we proceed to inquire.

What was that work of cleansing? Is the work of cleansing the Sanctuary fitly heralded by the first angel's message? In other words, is it a work of judgment? For light on this subject, we shall be obliged to go to the type. Let us look at the type. See the high priest preparing himself to cleanse the Sanctuary; almost the first thing he did was to gird upon him the breast plate of judgment. For what does he put that on? It certainly looks as though he was going to do a judgment work.

Again: his work was an atonement for the blotting out of sins. I often use the expression, "It is not common to blot out accounts until they are settled;" so our sins are not blotted out until the time of refreshing comes, which is when Jesus leaves the Sanctuary, and lays the blotted-out sins on the head of the scape-goat.

Again: it was a day of decision. On the morning of the day of atonement the trumpet was sounded which called the attention of the people to the sanctuary. They were required to gather around the sanc-guary and afflict their souls; every one that afflicted his soul received the blessing of the high priest when he came out: and them who did not afflict themselves, were to be put to death. The antitypical day of atonement has come. The third angel is commissioned to perform his work of measuring the temple of God and them that worship in it. His golden reed is the commandments of God, "better than gold, yea, more to be desired than moon, fine gold." As it was in the type, so now. Every one that did not heed the call on the day of atonement must die. So it is now: every one that hears distinctly the call and does not obey, there is no more mercy for them. In the type, they were condemned because they were not within the sanctuary on the sixth or eighth days of the seventh month, because the time had not come. So in the antitypical work, we are not condemned for not having the light of the third angel's message, before that message comes; but when it comes, if we do not heed it, we must suffer the consequences.

Again, it was said to Daniel that he should "rest and stand in his lot at the end of the days," or prophetic periods. "I can find none that extend beyond 1844." The periods of 1290 and 1335 days commence at the downfall of Paganism, 508: adding the 1290 years, they carry us to 1798, and 1335 full years would carry us to 1844, the last period. I know of no period that can be so reckoned as to come this side of 1844; so that the time Daniel was to stand in his lot at the end of the days was 1844. The word which is rendered lot, does not signify his redeemed state, but, chance. Daniel should stand his chance. Why? Because his sins had been confessed, and on the day of atonement those sins which have been confessed are opened before-hand to judgment. Now read 1 Pet. iv. Verse 5 declares that Christ is ready to judge the quick and the dead. Verse 7. "But the end of all things is at hand." Verse 11. "If any man speak let him speak as the oracles of God." (Oracles--ten commandments. See Acts vii, 38.) Why speak as the oracles of God? Because the oracles are the duty brought out by the third angel's message. Verse 17. "The time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God." Verse 19. Commit the keeping of your souls to God. 1 Tim. v, 24. "Some men's sins are open before-hand going before to judgment." We see by this what the judgment is that the first angel of Rev. xiv, refers to.

Too Literal

I have just been told, by a friend, that we adhere too strictly to the literal interpretation of the Scriptures. Said he, You have seen the error of the old fashioned way of spiritualizing every thing, and you have gone into the opposite extreme, and have got off the track on the other side.

The subject upon which we were conversing was the heavenly Sanctuary and the services of our great High Priest in its two apartments. My friend thought it not necessary to understand this subject so literally, as if there was in reality a Sanctuary in the heavens. Perhaps he may discover, upon examination, that Paul ran as deep into this error as any one at the present time. "We have such an high priest," says he. What! a literal high priest? Yea, the man Christ Jesus, who ascended to heaven bodily in the sight of his disciples.

Well, of course we admit that we have a literal High Priest, but we are not to understand that he ministers in a literal Sanctuary.

What kind of a Sanctuary, then?

O, it is a figurative or spiritual Sanctuary.

What is that? If I have the right idea of such a Sanctuary it is composed of nothing.

That is it; and any one can see that it is impossible for nothing to have two apartments.

We will try to understand it so. On earth there was a real, literal sanctuary pitched by man, where the priests performed their services. But Christ is "a minister of the Sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." This Sanctuary is composed of nothing, and of course its locality is nowhere. But the Lord pitched it, and has provided a literal High Priest, having flesh and bones, to minister in it. The priests on earth served "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." That is, they shadowed forth, by their services in the two apartments of the "worldly sanctuary," what Christ would do for his people in the heavenly, which has no existence. This is shadowy enough! A shadow of something that is less than a shadow. Then, Moses was shown nothing, or the figure of nothing, while he was on the holy mount, and was strictly charged to make every thing pertaining to the tabernacle just like it.

But enough of this. Enough has been said to show the folly of spiritualizing into nothing the things in the heavens. Paul says, It was therefore necessary that the patterns of the things in the heavens should be purified by these; (the blood of animals;) but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. Was the Apostle too literal?

But my friend is watching the Advent movement with interest, and thinks that there will be, eventually, a people sifted out of the Advent ranks that will be right. In this I agree with him, and believe it will be the hundred and forty-four thousand which will stand with the Lamb upon Mount Zion. Here again, perhaps I am too literal; but I cannot attempt to improve the words of the Holy Spirit.

The Parable of Matthew xxv.

Much has been said and written relative to this parable since the commencement of the Advent move; and still there are views that widely differ one from another. We wish now to reason a few moments on this parable. Our Saviour says, Then shall the kingdom of heaven (or the church of God) be likened to ten virgins that took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom. We must here recollect that our Saviour is giving a history of an eastern wedding of which there must be a likeness in the experience of the church. Now if this language was addressed to the church, the church must have both the history of that which our Saviour relates, and also its likeness.

Now the time for us to make an application of this parable is when the two classes of servants should be manifest: the one saying, My Lord delayeth his coming, while the other would be giving meat in due season. Matt. xxiv, 45-50. Those servants in the first place are brought out by the signs that are found in this chapter (in connexion with the prophetic periods) to look for the personal and immediate coming of Christ.

The prophetic periods were then understood to reach no farther than March 21st, 1844. The Church then were all united in looking to this point of time as the extent of those periods. This move was then considered as the going forth of the virgins, and also the midnight cry, until the time had all run out. A few months after it was discovered that there must be a midnight cry, and also there must be a delay of the Bridegroom, in order for the fulfillment of the parable as well as some other portions of revelation; such as, Heb. ii, 3: "Though it tarry wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry;" and many other portions of Scripture, that could not have had a fulfillment unless there had been a delay of the coming of the Lord.

It was also discovered that if the command to build Jerusalem went forth the first day of 457, v. c., the 2300 days would run out the last day of 1843; for it would take all of 457 and 1843 to make the full number, 2300; but that decree did not take effect until after five months; because Ezra was five months in going up to Jerusalem, and it was some days after that, before he gave orders for the restoration of the city and its true worship; which worship seemed to be the first in order, to be done, and also of the most importance.

And while the light was in this way shining out, it was seen that it would correspond with the typical service of the Jewish high priest on the tenth day of the seventh month, which type could be fulfilled in no way only in Christ in the antitypical Sanctuary in heaven. Thus we looked on the tenth day of the seventh month for Christ to come out of the Most Holy Place and bless his people.

Here the midnight cry was raised, Behold the Bridegroom cometh, on the tenth day of the seventh month. This cry came up in different parts of the field; almost at the same point of time. Then according to the history all the virgins are to be aroused; which did take place in the Autumn of 1844. While this cry was being given that class of individuals engaged in "the going forth" of the parable, rose and with redoubled efforts went forth filled with zeal and with the Holy Spirit to give the cry. Their faith and works corresponding, gave an edge to their testimony. While they proceeded from house to house of the Lord, their unharvested fields, at home, as loudly preached the same sentiment. Men were stirred under this cry as they never had been before. This we understand to be what answers to the midnight cry in the parable.

Then the objector asks, Why did not the Lord come? Because this parable is not to illustrate the coming of Christ; but it is to be a likeness to a certain wedding of which our Saviour had been giving a history. Now it could not have been all fulfilled had the Lord come at that point of time; because, if the Lord had come on the tenth day of the seventh month, where would have been the time for those who came afterwards: this could not be the case. The midnight cry of the parable does not carry us to the coming of the Son of man; for we are exhorted to watch, Luke xii 27-38. Here we are to be found like men waiting for their Lord when he shall return from the wedding.

We wish now to speak more particularly of those virgins that came afterward. "Afterwards came also the other virgins." This is also to be a likeness to those virgins in the history of the wedding. They took a literal lamp and really went forth to meet the bridegroom; but this we shall not expect; but we shall expect they will take something that will answer to the lamp, something also that will answer to the oil. For the lamp we shall take the Bible, and for the oil, faith in the same. Thus the Christian is prepared to discover the waymarks on his way to mount Zion. So while the people of God took the Bible as a lamp, they showed their faith in the same by their works; this being really done in the Advent move of 1843-4. Now there is a class in the wedding that seemed to lack oil; so there will be in its likeness. They lack faith in God's word; do not understand its fulfillment; look for another ending of the prophetic periods; which brings them to the wedding afterward.

We should expect their appearance would be similar to those who came first: not differing materially only in time. How strikingly this has been fulfilled in the move of a part of the virgins, crying, Behold, the Bridegroom cometh on the tenth day of the seventh month, 1854; thus answering to the proclamation behold he cometh, in 1844. In addition to this they have a shut door as the true church previously had; and in like manner they hold that the Sanctuary, which they believe to be the people of God, is now being cleansed. The true church also believes the Sanctuary is now being cleansed, but understand better what it is by the instructions of Heb. viii, and ix.

We wish now to look at the character of these classes of virgins, denominated wise and foolish. Many take the position that there are none of the foolish who will ever get into the kingdom. Now if we take the position that all of the foolish are to be lost, we must also admit that all of the wise will be saved. This will never answer; but that the greater part of the virgins that are finally saved will be among those that maintain the first move of the Advent in the main—the midnight cry and the ending of the prophetic periods. The foolishness of those who came after was manifest in their going forth with so little evidence as to that being the true cry: claiming that the Lord was in the going forth as in 1843-4 but at the same time changing the starting point of every prophetic period, embraced at that time to make them harmonize with the coming of the Lord in 1855; and then assuming the cry of 1844 to be a false alarm. Now we shall take the position that we have had the midnight cry, and that it was given in the Autumn of 1844, when all those virgins, who had light on the Advent and did not reject it, arose and trimmed their lamps, and not a part as in the last move. Whatever may have been given as the midnight cry since 1844 must be a counterfeit.

Perhaps our time brethren may think us severe; but we think them foolish in claiming that the counterfeit existed before the true coin. May God help us so far to keep up with the light of prophecy as not to look for a second fulfillment, but call to mind God's dealings with us in the past and hold on by faith in his word, and look to the Third Angel's Message [Rev. xiv.] and the Sanctuary for an explanation of God's dealings with us in the past.

THE SANCTUARY.

"Thus shall the Sanctuary be cleansed." The time for the fulfillment of this work is clear. For it is evident that the time to precede this is measured by days. And if the work was not to commence within the next day, (or year,) the angel would have added more days to the 2300. To confirm this we refer to the 62 weeks of Dan. ix, 26. "After threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off." Here time was measured by weeks instead of days, clearly showing that another week would not pass before the event would take place. "In the midst of the next week," &c. So another day (or year) would not pass before the work specified would commence.

"The Hebrew words rendered 'then shall be cleansed' is (tsah-dak) and occurs in forty other places in the Old Testament. In the margin it is rendered justified, which is the general signification of the word. It thus refers not to a physical cleansing, or purification, but to moral rectitude. That to which it is applied is therefore to be held innocent. It is no longer to be held guilty or abominable. Its uprightness is vindicated. Its past guilt is all cancelled. Its sentence is then to be revoked, and its punishment is remitted. That period, therefore, extends not to the termination of the physical restoration of the sanctuary, but to the commencement of that process."—Advent Herald, April 13, 1886.

And while we are pointed back to the typical sanctuary and services in the law, for instructions of the heavenly, yet the type cannot be carried out in every particular. There was an earthly sanctuary, and there is an heavenly; there were two apartments in the earthly, and two in the heavenly; an earthly priest, and also an heavenly one; a sacrifice for the earthly, and also for the heavenly; a time for the earthly sanctuary to be cleansed, and a time for the heavenly to be cleansed; the earthly was cleansed with blood, so is the heavenly.

But "the law was a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image." Heb. x, 1. The sacrifice for the earthly was of beasts, but not of the heavenly. The typical sacrifice was daily, but not so with the heavenly. The earthly sanctuary was cleansed yearly, but not so with the heavenly. The earthly priest had to make an atonement for himself, [Lev. xvi, 11-14.] but not so with the heavenly. An additional sacrifice had to be made on the day of atonement in the type, but not so in the antitype.

Some say that because there was a preparatory work on the day of atonement (which was their offerings) that there must be in the antitype; but where are the offerings, or the work that should answer to the type. Let those who thus think, show in what that work consists. Again we are accused of sin because of bringing our sacrifice to some other place than the door of the tabernacle of the congregation; but man's accusation and our doing this are two things. The sin of Israel was in sacrificing to other gods, and not because their faith carried them into both apartments. Their sacrifice was made at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation; so was ours. That blood availed for them in the Most Holy, so does Christ's for us. Their offering answered for the entire day, so does ours; for they had to afflict their souls or they would be cut off. Lev. xxiii, 29. Their faith in that blood shed at the door had to reach into the second apartment, and so does our faith in that blood shed without the gate reach into the Most Holy place. Probation continued until the work was completed in the sanctuary; so in the antitype. Israel were not justified until their sins were borne from the Sanctuary, which was when the priest came out, and not when he went in, so in the antitype. The mandate cannot go forth, "He that is holy let him be, and he that is filthy so remain," so long as the sins of Israel are in the Sanctuary, which cannot be justified while the sins of the people are in it. Mercy does not cease until God says so; and he does not say so until the work is completed.

If there was no mercy in the time of cleansing the Sanctuary, then when the Priest went in it would have been said, "He that is holy let him be," &c.; but this was not so; for except they continued during the day they were cut off. The filthy are not left filthy until the holy remain holy. And while the holy may be cut off, the filthy may find pardon.

Now if we admit that the 2300 days have ended, we must admit that the work of cleansing the Sanctuary is going on, or he at war with the angel. Parallel with this is the patience of the saints, the commandments of God, and the opening of the temple in heaven in which was seen the ark of the testament, as seen by John. Rev. xi, 19.

Here is the last work of that lovely Jesus who has been pleading so many hundred years. While he is cleansing the Sanctuary we must live without sin or he must still intercede for us; and while he intercedes for sin he does for sinners. We should not have known the extent of sin without God's law which was placed in the Most Holy Place. How solemn is this last work for fallen man. O may we continue in the patience of the saints, and soon all our guilt will be canceled, or sins blotted out and we receive the promised blessing and all Israel will be free for ever and ever. C. W. SPERRY.

Consecration from Mrs. Evans.

Dear Brethren: I am passing through a solemn train of thought. The question with me is, Where are we? I answer, More than twelve years past the proclamation "The hour of his Judgment is come." Rev. xiv, 6, 7. We have been the same length of time in the atoning of the Sanctuary. Dan. viii, 14. I inquire, What was the cleansing of the Sanctuary under the first covenant? It was a day of judgment. What did it typify? The work in the antitypical Sanctuary, which has been going on since A. D. 1844; since the announcement, "The hour of his Judgment is come." O how much weight and solemnity is the word, Judgment! It should cause every one to ask, When does it take place? "To the law and the testimony," is our motto. It was future from Paul's day; for he "reminded of a Judgment to come." Acts xxi, 25. Our Saviour declared that his words would judge men in the last days.

I understand that judgment must be rendered before Christ comes; for when he comes it will be to raise the righteous dead, and change the living saints, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: [1 Cor. xv, 52;] which, being an instantaneous work, would allow of no time at that moment for judgment. Judgment must be passed upon all who share in eternal life at the coming of Christ, before he comes, and during the existence of the last generation on earth. As proof of this, we quote the words of the Apostle, which show that the dead are judged while some are alive: "Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick [living] and the dead. For for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to [in the manner] to men in the flesh, [living men] but live according to God, in the Spirit." 1 Pet. iv, 5, 6.

When this judgment is rendered, I understand that the solemn declaration will be announced, "So that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still." Then Christ will say, "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me." Rev. xxi, 11, 12.

Therefore, my dear brethren, believing that Christ will soon come, I inquire again, Where are we? I answer, In the judgment of the saints; for Peter says that judgment first begins at the house of God. Chap. iv, 17. It appears that the order is, that the righteous dead have been under investigative judgment since 1844. And now the message that we passed from the sixth phase of the gospel church, which was the Philadelphia, or brotherly-love state, in 1844; and that we are in the Landowen or judging-of-the-people condition, and are lukewarm. The appeal of the Faithful and True Witness is a perfect antitypical parallel to that which decided in solemn judgment the fate of the Hebrew church on the tenth day of the seventh month, near the close of all their sanctuary scenes, which shadowed the great decisive judgment in the end of the world. What are they? "For whatsoever thou shalt be that shall not be officiated in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people." Lev. xxiii, 29. Be zealous and repent, [afflicted,] or I will speak thee out of my mouth: [cut thee off from among the people of God.] Rev. iii, 14, 15.

My dear Brethren, from the scripture referred to I solemnly believe that the judgment has been going on in the Heavenly Sanctuary since 1844, and that upon the righteous dead, from "righteous Abel" down through patriarchs, prophets, martyrs, and all the saints who have fallen asleep in Jesus, judgment has been passing. How solemn the thought, that perhaps, our companions, our children, brother or sister, has been passing the great momentous review that will entitle them to a glorious immortal body at the coming of Christ.

The solemn declaration that the Landowen Law is not that they are stretched, and miserable, and poor, and killed, and naked, and that they are exterminated, you, commanded, to be zealous and repent, under the awful penalty of being spewed out of the True Witness' mouth, has thrilled my whole being.

I tell to myself, What have I been about! I find by serious reflection that my poverty comes upon me like an armed man. I look back to the Philadelphia ground on which I stood in 1844, my heart filled with brotherly love, the full hope of salvation like a powerful anchor or a dazzling helmet, on my head, walking softly before the Lord, dead to the world, looking only for a heavenly inheritance and with deep shame and regret. I see that I have taken a journey into a foreign land, and wasted all that blessed portion that my heavenly Father bestowed on me. I confess with shame and regret, that my worldly-mindedness and conduct has made me a citizen of this world, and I have filled myself with nothing better than books, till I am perishing with starvation.

My dear brethren, I humbly confess that I have ensnared and loaded down myself and others around me with cares to a degree unbefitting and unfitting to one who professes to be living and hoping for a better inheritance. I confess that I have sinned before my dear brethren and heaven, and I remain by the grace of the Lord awaiting me, to be zealous and repent by turning about immediately.

I have placed my lands, my entire earthly substance, on the altar anew, (if I am not unworthy,) and throw myself on to the consecrated altar, and pray that the Lord will direct me by his unerring and heavenly wisdom and lead me by his opening providence until the sacrifice is entirely used up in the house of God. I know that there is bread enough and to spare in my heavenly Father's house.

E. Evans.

Rosed Grove, Ill., Dec. 17th, 1856.

A few Thoughts on the Cleansing of the Sanctuary.

Dan. viii, 14. "And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed." What Sanctuary? Not the earthly typical one, where the Aaronic priests officiated between God and his people anciently through the patriarchal and prophetic age down to the cross, where was offered the great sacrifice that cast the shadows by which they offered their services. No. For that sanctuary was destroyed according to the predictions of Dan ix, 20. "And the people of the prince that shall come, shall destroy the city, and the sanctuary." Matt. xxiv, 2; Luke xix, 43, 44, which was fulfilled by the Roman army A. D. 70. And the sanctuary services virtually ceased, as types and as prophecy declared A. D. 31. Dan. ix, 27. "And in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease." Ex. xii, 3, 6. "Fourteenth day of the first month: and the whole congregation of Israel shall kill it in the evening." [Margin, between the two evenings.] Rom. v, 6. "In due time [according to the time, margin] Christ died." Luke xxiv, 45. "And the veil of the temple [which divided between the holies of the sanctuary in the temple] was rent in the midst."

By what shall it be cleansed? By blood, according to the type. Lev. xvi, 15, 16. "Then shall he kill the goat of the sin-offering, that is for the people, and bring his blood within the veil, and do with the blood as he did with the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it upon the mercy-seat: and he shall make an atonement for the holy place." Why is the sanctuary cleansed? "Because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins." Lev. xvi, 16.

What did the cleansing of the typical sanctuary amount to? A typical, or temporary judgment for the people. "For in that day shall the priests make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that you may be clean from all your sins before the Lord." Lev. xvi, 30. "For whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people." Lev. xxiii, 29.

What sanctuary is there to be cleansed after the ending of the twenty-three hundred days, [years,] which commenced B. C. 457, and ended A. D. 1844, if the typical one was set aside A. D. 31, and destroyed A. D. 70? The heavenly, where Christ is "a minister of the Sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man." Heb. viii, 2. How do you know that there is a necessity for cleansing the heavenly Sanctuary? Because "they (the priests,) served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." "We have such an High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens." "For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices, wherefore, it is of necessity that this man have also somewhat to offer." Heb. viii, 1, 3, 5.

When in the type, as to event, was the sanctuary cleansed? The last thing except the dwelling in booths, that commemorated their dwelling in booths, when God brought them out of the land of Egypt, to be observed from the fifteenth to the twenty-second of the seventh month, after the gathering of the fruit of the land. Lev. xxiii, 33-43. When will the heavenly Sanctuary be cleansed? "In the end of the world, hath he (our High Priest) appeared (within the inner veil) to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." Heb. ix, 26. Is there in heaven anything unclean? Physically, there is not. Neither was there in the most holy on the earth; but as the cleansing of the earthly was "because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of all their transgressions in all their sins." So there is no physical uncleanness in heaven to be cleansed; but the great and solemn work of judgment in blotting out the sins of the people of God of all ages.

When does the judgment commence? Not at death. Judgment had not come in Paul's day. Paul points to the future for judgment, and urges repentance. "Because he (God) hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world by that man (Christ) whom he hath ordained." Felix trembled when Paul reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. Acts xvi, 30, 31; xxiv, 25.

Peter locates the time for the judgment of the saints, both the living and the dead. In 1 Pet. iv, 3, 5, 6, he says that, "the time past of our life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles," &c. "Who (we saints,) shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick (living) and dead."

"For, for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, (or like the living,) but live according to God in the Spirit." Peter being a prophet indeed, places the judgment at the point of the history of the church, when it must be no other point of time, but when the last generation is on the earth that will live prior to the second coming of Christ. And he adds, "But the end of all things is at hand." Verse 7.

There is no time for judgment of the saints after the second appearing of Christ; for he comes to reward his saints with eternal life at the sounding of the last trumpet. "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (the living) shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv, 52. When the judgment is past, we must hear the solemn, unchangeable declaration. "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is righteous, let him be righteous still. And then exclaims the Revelator, "Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Rev. xxii, 11, 12.

"For the time is come (A. D. 1844) that judgment must begin at the house of God; (whose house are we;) and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?" 1 Pet. iv, 17.

The message of the First Angel, (Rev. xiv, 6-8,) that pointed out the ending of the twenty-three hundred days of Dan. viii, 14, on the tenth day of the seventh month, sacred time, 1844, declared, that the hour of God's judgment is come. Since then we have no evidence but that judgment, as solemn as it is, has been going on in the heavenly Sanctuary—which is the cleansing of the same from the uncleanness of the sins of the people of God, from Abel to the sealing of the last saint on the earth.

Soon the investigative judgment will be over, the saints of all ages each other will greet in the first resurrection; and John says in Rev. xx, 4, "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them, . . . and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." Verse 5. "But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection." Verse 6. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection." "Do you not know that the saints shall judge the world?" "Judgment was given to the saints of the Most High." 1 Cor. vi, 2; Dan. vii, 22.

The charge of Paul in 2 Tim, iv, 1, I do not view to be the investigative judgment of the righteous saints after they are rewarded with eternal life, but the judgment while some are alive and some are dead, agreeing with Peter, which must be before Christ, the Nobleman, returns from the far country, where at his appearing before the Father for his kingdom, he judges whom he accounts worthy to be immortalized at his return, to sit on thrones with him in his kingdom. Luke xix, 12; Rev. iii, 21.

Lord help to overcome, is my prayer.

E. Events.

DANIEL STANDING IN HIS LOT.

According to Webster, "to stand," signifies "Not to fail or become void; to succeed; to maintain one's ground; not to fail; to be acquitted; to be safe; to appear prominent; to have relief; to stand trial is to sustain the trial or examination of a cause, rank, position," &c.

"Lot" signifies, that which in human speech is called chance, hazard, fortune, but in strictness of language is the determination of providence; as the land shall be divided by lot. Num. xxvi. 21. That by which the fate or portion is determined, that by which an event is committed to chance, that is to the determination of providence as to cast lots, to draw lots. The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord. Prov. xvi. 33. The part, division or fate which falls to one by chance, that is by divine determination. Josh. xix. Lot. v. 4. To allot, to assign, to distribute, to sort, to catalogue, to portion. &c.

Daniel's Lot, and the lot of the whole human family, is cast into, or in other words, is referred to the judgment. In other words, the determination of divine providence relative to the fate or future eternal destiny of Daniel and the whole human family is cast into or referred to the period of the judgment when and where the fate or eternal destiny of all is determined by divine providence.

The human family are all destined to stand before God in the judgment, [see Rom. xiv. 10; 2 Cor. v. 10; Rev. xx. 12.] at which time divine providence will determine the fate or future eternal destiny of all mankind. It is written, [Ps. i. 5.] "Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment." That is, to say, the ungodly shall not stand or endure the judgment trial, they shall not be safe nor be acquitted in the judgment trial when divine providence shall determine their fate, or future eternal destiny.

But in contradistinction from this declaration to the ungodly, the blessed promise and assurance was given to Daniel, the man greatly beloved, that he should stand in his lot; that is to say, he should stand or endure the judgment trial, he should be acquitted and be safe in the judgment trial when divine providence should determine his fate or future eternal destiny. This promise or assurance to Daniel that he should stand in his lot at the end of the 2300 and 1335 days was a promise that he should stand or endure the judgment trial and be acquitted and be safe. It amounted to a blessed promise and an assurance to Daniel, the man greatly beloved, that he should have eternal life awarded to him in the judgment when divine providence should determine his fate or future eternal destiny.

Daniel understood the vision [see chap. x, 1.] hence he understood that the cleansing of the Sanctuary at the end of the 2300 and 1335 days would be the canceling and atoning for and blotting out and putting away the errors and sins of the whole Israel of God, and that this would be the judging or judgment of the house of God; or in other words, it would be the time when all Israel would stand in their lot, when all Israel should be judged and acquitted and divine providence would determine and award to them eternal life. This important fact of the judgment upon the Israel of God at the end of the 2300 and 1335 days being brought before the mind of Daniel it could but be a matter of deep anxiety to Daniel to know whether he should stand or endure the judgment trial and be acquitted and be safe. How blessed then was the promise to Daniel that he should stand in his lot at the end of the days and be acquitted in the judgment trial and be safe and have eternal life.

H. Edson.

THE JUDGMENT.

BY F. N. LOUGHBOROUGH.

The subject we have in contemplation for this article is a solemn, important, and soul-stirring subject, if we let it have its proper bearing on our minds. When Paul presented before the mind of Felix, that there was a time coming in which God would judge the "secrets of men's hearts," Felix trembled. May the Lord help us, that our souls be suitably affected by this solemn subject.

If this judgment was simply to affect our present life, and we were only under liabilities of losing our present life by the decision of it, we should be considered very unwise in the eyes of the world, if we manifested no concern as to how the case might be decided. But that of which we are about to speak is the judgment of heaven, from which there is no appeal, and the decision of which will either grant to us the felicity of endless life, or cast us into outer darkness where we shall be forever separated from God and his people, and have our portion with those "to whom the blackness of darkness is reserved forever." How unwise must all heaven look on that soul to be, who neglects his case in the court of heaven, simply to amuse himself with the toys of earth, till, alas! he finds like Esau, he has sold his birthright for a mess of pottage. It will be the case of thousands of careless souls who are flattering themselves with the hope of enjoying everlasting life, and are striving to enjoy the present life too. They will find themselves engulfed in ruin, with no more chance of repentance than Esau had. We ought to learn from the lesson of Esau. He did not seemingly want to lose all in the future, but in his trait, the present outweighed the future. Perhaps he thought he might in some other way than through the birthright, get into the future good. But no; Esau might weep then, but then it was too late. Souls here may flatter themselves that God does not require them to give up this or that comfort, or to make any great sacrifice; but they will find at last when God calls for his people to assemble, it will be "those who have made a covenant with him by sacrifice."

The importance of the subject before us, but few feel so as to sense the bearing it should have on our daily course here. Says the Saviour, "For every idle word men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof in the day of judgment."

"How careful then ought I to live,
With what religious fear,
Who such a strict account must give
For my behaviour here."

We find a difference of opinion on the subject of the judgment as well as the subject of the Sabbath, and many other Bible truths; yet we cannot forbear the statement that the Bible teaches but one way, on any of those subjects. As we are aware that the medium through which a man looks will have a great bearing on his view of the object he is looking at, we are willing to treat with candor the different views that are held of the subject before us; although we are satisfied some of those views arise from looking at scripture testimony through early teaching, instead of what is directly revealed in the Bible.

The commonly adopted opinion has been, among those who have spoken on the subject of the judgment in the past, that all, both righteous and wicked were to be raised in one general resurrection at the second appearing of Christ; that they were then to stand in one confused mass before the Judge, and there, in the presence of the holy angels, the decision of the case was to be made, and the righteous separated from the wicked.

There are certain texts which have been supposed by some to teach that doctrine, which we wish now to examine. The first we shall notice is 2 Cor. v. 10. "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." On this text we remark: Instead of its proving that they all stand before the throne to be judged, it conveys the idea to our mind that they have been judged before they thus appear; for they appear there to receive that of which they have been judged worthy.

Matt xxv. 31, 32, is a text which has been supposed to teach a general judgment of all after the resurrection. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats." This text does not say that Christ will judge all nations when they are gathered before him at his coming. Neither does it prove that the wicked dead will have been raised at that time. It cannot be claimed that they are then raised; for Rev. xx. clearly shows that the resurrection of the wicked is a thousand years after Christ's second coming. Neither does the above text state that all the wicked are then before him. It says "before him shall be gathered all nations," which we understand as referring to the nations that are among the living at his coming. This text teaches the final separation of the righteous and wicked, but says nothing about their judgment. The judgment of one party we conclude, (from that consequent on the separation,) must be a work that takes place prior to the time of their being thus separated; for when the separation takes place, one class are immediately ushered into their reward.

Again, the separation is to be, like that of the shepherd in taking the sheep from among the goats. A shepherd, we conclude, knows the sheep from the goats before he enters upon the work of separating them. So, we should conclude, that before this separation spoken of in Matt. xxv. takes place, it has been decided who are sheep. It is not necessary to claim from the above text, that when the separation takes place between the righteous and wicked, all of both classes are living. Other portions of the New Testament show that the dead saints are called forth while the wicked dead are left. Rev. xx. 4, 5. 1 Cor. xv. 22, 23. 1 Thess. iv. 16. But this text does teach that at the time of Christ's coming the righteous and wicked are forever separated; the living saints from the living wicked, and the dead saints from the wicked dead.

The view some have of the judgment is doubtless unharmonious with itself, but is also fraught with many difficulties. They not only claim that men are to be judged after the second advent of Christ, but that they are judged at death. There is no text that has been supposed to teach that men are judged at death, that is Heb. ix, 27: "As it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment." &c. This text does not say they are judged as soon as they die; but after the judgment." Now the question is, how long after death the judgment? That must be settled by other testimony. If we suppose mankind are judged once at death, and again at or near the second coming of Christ, it involves us in the difficulty of making two judgments pass on the same individual. A second judgment would imply the possibility of some error in the first decision, and thus charge God with folly. The very fact that there is a judgment near the coming of Christ, should satisfy us that the cases which are then judged, have never been judged before.

If, as some claim, the judgment is after Christ's coming and the resurrection, other difficulties present themselves. The saints are represented as receiving the great reward for which they have sought at the resurrection. "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Luke xiv, 14. The reward then bestowed is eternal life, which God will render to those who seek for it "by patient continuance in well doing."

That this change from mortal to immortal life is at the instant of the resurrection we may learn from 1 Cor. xv, 51-52. "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." To talk of the saints, being judged after immortality is bestowed upon them, would imply that there was a possibility of their losing eternal life after they have laid hold upon it. But Christ says, "My sheep hear my voice, and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand." John x, 27-28. He shows by this testimony, that when eternal life is given, there is to be no change in their condition. They will then remain in his hand. Then there can be no judgment on a person who has received eternal life. Those who locate a judgment on the saints after the resurrection have but a small space allotted for it, if it must be before immortality is bestowed. After the last trump sounds, and wakes the dead, "in the twinkling of an eye," this change is made. No chance to locate a judgment there.

There is one testimony [Rev. xi, 6.] which goes strongly against the view that the saints are judged after the resurrection, and seems to show that the judgment is prior to that event. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power." The reverse of this would be, cursed and unholy is he that hath not a part in the first resurrection. How does it happen that every one who comes up in the first resurrection is blessed and holy, if there has been no judgment prior to that time. To be consistent we must conclude, that there has been a judgment, and that the saints are called forth to receive that of which they have been judged worthy, everlasting life.

We freely admit, that there is a judgment that is after the second advent of Christ, but it is not the judgment of the saints, as we have already shown. Rev. xi, brings to view a judgment after the appearance of one on the great white throne. This we should understand from the connection was the judgment of the wicked. But even they are judged while dead, and raised at the end of the thousand years to have that judgment executed upon them. The judgment of the wicked seems to be a work accomplished between Christ and the saints. We see in this chapter, the saints are to be made kings and priests, and reign with Christ a thousand years. The question has often been asked, who will they reign over? Some, to answer the question have run off with all their inconsistent and vain speculations about the saints' reigning over mortal nations on earth for one thousand years. They have said, "If the saints are going to reign a thousand years they must have somebody to reign over." We say in reply to this, the saints are to "reign for ever and ever." Rev. xxii, 5. If it is necessary to have mortal nations among them, for them to reign a thousand years, then how can they reign eternally without mortal nations? But, as it is admitted that the saints can reign in the immortal kingdom without mortal nations to reign over, it is no more than just to admit that they could thus reign for a thousand years before the eternal age begin. On the question of the reign of the saints for a thousand years, we should rather inquire into the nature of that reign, than to claim that because "they reign," there must be living nations of wicked over whom they reign. Christ, in reply to Peter's question, "What shall we have," sheds some light on the point before us. He says [Matt. xix, 28.] "Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory; ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." This we do not understand to refer to the saved of Israel, but to the wicked den of the tribes of Israel whose enmities till then are undecided. This work of judging the wicked dead is not confined to the twelve apostles. Paul says, 1 Cor. vi, 2, 3, "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more, things that pertain to this life?" Here Paul represents that the saints shall judge angels; (this we suppose refers to fallen angels.) It must be those who are reserved to the judgment, that they shall judge. The judgment of the world he refers to, is not in respect to present affairs of the world, because he contrasts it with the judgment of "things that pertain to this life." If in the future the judgment of the world and fallen angels, is to be given into the hands of the saints, there is something for them to do during their reign of a thousand years although there may be no mortal nations living during that reign. We now conclude that the thousand years reign is a judgment work of the saints in connection with Christ. The wicked are raised and judgment is executed upon them at the end of that thousand years' reign. But as we have before claimed, the judgment of the saints is before all this, and must be prior to the time when their reward is bestowed upon them.

The question now before us is, when are the saints to be judged? We have produced some argument to show that it is prior to the coming of Christ, but additional proof is at hand. A definite message is found in Rev. xiv, 8-9, declaring "Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come." A proper understanding of that message and the time for its fulfillment must shed light on the question, when the judgment sits, for it seems to be a definite announcement to the nations of the earth, that the time has come for judgment to sit. Perhaps dear reader you are ready to say, if such a message is to be given before the judgment sits, it cannot be in season yet; for I have seen no angel; I have heard no angel proclaim such a testimony. This leads us to inquire into the nature of this message before we can answer the question whether or not it has been given.

As to the nature of the message, but two positions can be taken: either it is a testimony to be proclaimed by literal angels, or else this angel represented as giving a message is a symbol. Let us look at the message. "I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people." This angel does not have a gospel to preach, but the gospel. Now the question is, To whom is the commission given to preach the gospel? To angels? No. If it was given to literal angels, we should find no fault with the position that the proclamation of "judgment come" is made by literal angels; but if we find on a mature investigation that the preaching of the gospel was not given literally into the hands of the angels, then we shall be led to look on that angel as a symbol. As recorded in Mark xvi, 15, Christ said to his disciples, as he was about to ascend up into heaven, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." And then he adds, [Matt. xxviii, 20,] "Lo I am with you always, even to the end of the world." We see then that Christ has chosen man as an instrument to preach the gospel, and that instrumentality will not fail; for he says, "Lo I am with you always, even to the end of the world." Well, say you, this first angel's message of Rev. xiv, may be another gospel. It may be necessary if another gospel was to be sent, to send literal angels with it.

So it might. But what has the Lord told us to do if angels come with another gospel? Has he said, receive it? No. Paul says, [Gal. i, 8,] "Though we, or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." We see then that this first angel "having the everlasting gospel," must be a symbol of a work to be accomplished by man in preaching some testimony of the gospel to his fellow men. Oh, says one, then judgment sits all through this dispensation on the saints; for the gospel has been preached in some form ever since the day of Pentecost. But stop! although we claim that the gospel given in the first message [Rev. xiv] is the same gospel that Paul preached, yet we do not believe that Paul gave that message. That message is a definite announcement concerning the judgment; and such an one Paul never gave. This message proclaims the everlasting gospel, but what does it say next? "For the hour of his judgment is come." Paul never said the judgment had come; but when he reasoned with Felix, "he reasoned of righteousness, temperance and a judgment to come." But we never find him saying that the judgment had come. Here we wish to make a distinction, between the common preaching of the gospel through this dispensation, and the First Angel's Message. The gospel may be preached at one time and an inducement held out before the people, to cause them to repent; and at another time it may be preached with altogether a different inducement to move the people. We have already seen that Paul preached the gospel, and when reasoning before Felix, the argument used to move him was that there was a judgment coming. It had an effect. "Felix trembled." The gospel has been preached for centuries, and the same motive used with similar effect; and yet the sinner has trifled with it. Yes, (says the sinner,) I believe there is a judgment coming, and I mean to prepare for it; but there is time enough yet. A second reason has been urged therefore in connection with the first. The uncertainty of life has been held up before them to induce them to speedily prepare for the judgment. As death meets them, so they will be found in the judgment, and they have been exhorted with this two-fold argument. It has had its effect to move thousands to obey the claims of the gospel. Neither of the above considerations are the one connected with the First Angel's Message, "The hour of his judgment is come." This is a message of a stirring nature, and one that can be given at no other time than when judgment is actually to sit. We do not say but men may trifle with this also; but a stirring testimony is brought out by it, and one calculated to move men. We trust it is clear to the mind of the reader that there is a difference between the gospel standing alone as a text, and the First Angel's Message.

But when, you ask, is this message to be given? We reply, it can only be given when judgment is actually to sit. But, say you, you have shown that man is to give this message. He must give it from the Bible or else his fellow men will be under no obligation to receive it. Does the Bible reveal the definite time for the session of judgment? We think it does. If it did not, we should be at a loss to tell how man could give this message. How could man proclaim, "The hour of his judgment is come," if testimony concerning that event, and even the time for its commencement were not revealed in the Bible? The very fact that such a message is left for man to proclaim, shows that there is a basis for it in the word of the Lord.

We now come to the question, what do the Scriptures reveal about the judgment of God's saints? We read, [1 Pet. iv, 4-7,] "Wherein they think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you; who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick (living) and the dead." Christ is here represented as being ready to judge the living, while they are alive, we conclude; for they are among men that think them strange. He is then also ready to judge the dead saints, and will, we conclude, judge them while dead; for he says, [verse 6,] "For, for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the Spirit." But when was this to take place? Does Peter mean to be understood that the judgment was going on in his time? We think not. Verse 7 locates it; "But the end of all things is at hand." The end of all things was not at hand in the days of Peter, [2 Thess. ii.] but when judgment sits "the end of all things is at hand;" not is already come, but is "at hand," that is, the next great event impending over the people. Then we see the judgment here introduced as sitting on the saints, is just before the end of all things. That this judgment which is then to sit is the judgment of the saints, is further confirmed by verse 17. "For the time is come, that judgment must begin at the house of God, and if it first begin at us what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God."

What do the Scriptures mark out to transpire in that time, just before the end of all things, that may be called a judgment. We understand it is the blotting out of the sins of God's people which then takes place, and decides their cases. Says Peter [Acts iii, 19,] "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ." &c. We see from this that the last work which is accomplished by Jesus for his people before he is sent, is the blotting out of sins. There can be no condemning a man after his sins are blotted out; or in other words, there cannot, and need not be any further judgment on his case; for his sins are to be remembered no more. Heb. viii, 12. Therefore we conclude that the blotting out of the sins of God's people, must be the decision of their cases, in other words, must be their judgment. This being the case, if we can find the definite time for this blotting out work to be accomplished, we shall then have found the definite time for this judgment to sit. Perhaps our readers are all aware that the sacrifices of the ceremonial law, and the yearly service of the Priests of that time, are an example of the work of Christ in making intercession for man through the offering of his own precious blood. Heb. viii, and ix. There was a blotting out time in that typical system, which shadowed forth a similar work to be accomplished by Christ. That blotting out was the last work in the yearly service of the priest, (and the service of every year was the same: three hundred and sixty-four days in the first service, and a day of atonement or cleansing the Sanctuary.) The blotting out time was when the Sanctuary was to be cleansed from the "uncleanliness of the children of Israel, because of their transgressions in all their sins." Lev. xvi. It was by this blotting out that the sins were to be transferred from the Sanctuary, to the scape-goat; and he then was sent away; showing that God's people were free from their sins. So in this dispensation, of which that was typical; when Christ finishes his work as priest, he blots out sins. Acts iii, 19. Paul shows, [Heb. ix, 23,] that it is necessary to have a cleansing work accomplished by Christ. "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; (blood of beasts, &c., verse 12;) but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these." We see then that it is plainly stated that Christ is to accomplish a blotting out work. If we find the definite time for this blotting out to take place, we shall have then found a definite time for the session of judgment, and a locality for the First Angel's Message, which was to announce that judgment.

The definite time for the cleansing of the Sanctuary is revealed in Dan. viii, 14. "And he said unto me, unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed." Here we at once see is a definite time marked out for some event. Not the coming of the Lord, as some have supposed; but, "then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed." The cleansing of the Sanctuary, when this testimony was given to Daniel, was the last work of the priest's yearly service, as we have already seen. That day was a solemn and decisive day. Then every one who would come around the Sanctuary and afflict his soul might find mercy when the priest left the Sanctuary; while those who would not, were cut off from Israel. Thus we see that those were decisive moments, and that the work of that day prepared Israel for the blessing of their high priest. So also the atonement work of the New Testament is a decisive work, and will prepare spiritual Israel for the blessing of Jesus, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom."

Time and space will not permit us to speak at length here, on the subject of the Sanctuary. We wish however to notice at this point the time introduced in Dan. viii. We see by the closing testimony of the chapter that Daniel did not understand the vision. We see no point which he could properly state that he did not understand, except the time; (two thousand three hundred days;) for the beasts had been explained to him. The Lord sends an angel to instruct Daniel. If we admit this angel to have been divinely commissioned and receive his testimony, we must admit that chap. ix gives light on chap. viii. In chap. ix, the angel shows that only 400 days of this period belong to Daniel's people; and he shows Daniel, withal, where those 400 days commence; thus virtually showing him where to commence the 2300 days. "Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem," &c. Now we find two decrees respecting the building of Jerusalem, but we have selected the first, (457 n. c.) because reckoning the 69 and 70 weeks from that date, it will place the events that were to transpire at the end of 69 weeks &c., where they are recorded as having actually occurred. With the date for the commencement of the 2300 days before us, we may easily ascertain the time for their termination. If we take 457 n. c., from the 2300, it will leave us 1843 full years after Christ, to complete the 2300 days. But from the first of 457 n. c., 2300 years would not be complete till the commencement of 1844. It is further evident that the decree did not take effect till about the seventh month of 457 n. c., so the 2300 days would terminate the seventh month of A. D. 1844.

We hence find that the period that marks the time for the commencement of the cleansing of the Sanctuary in which our High Priest ministers, has terminated; and as that cleansing is a judgment work, the time has come for judgment to sit. At the time is in the past when the proclamation of the "hour of judgment come" might be truthfully given, we inquire, Has it been given? Such a message has been given. Says J. V. Himes (in 1844), speaking of the work in which he with Bro. Miller had been engaged, "We told the ministers and churches that it was no part of our business to break them up, or to divide and distract them. We had one distinct object: that was to give the cry, the warning of 'the judgment at the door.'" Again we read in the Advent Shield, Vol. 1, No. 1, p. 86, "We look upon the proclamation which has been made, (this was just after the time expired,) as being the cry of the angel who proclaimed, 'The hour of his judgment is come.'" Rev. xiv, 8, 7.

A class of messengers have been forth, that too in the right time, and proclaimed in a manner that stirred the world, "The hour of God's judgment is come." It is true, time has proved that Adventists were mistaken in looking for the Lord to come in 1844; but who can successfully prove that the 2300 day which gave definiteness to the message did not end in 1844? It is evident that those who have attempted to take a later starting point for the commencement of the 2300 days have not been able to reconcile their calculations with the events, of the seventieth week; for the events marked, that were to transpire at the commencement, middle and end of the seventieth week, did not occur in such time as would harmonize with their reckoning.

The point is clear to our mind that the 2300 day period has ended. The time has come for the last work of our great High Priest to be accomplished. That work is decisive in its nature. It prepares all God's people for their reward; for it bids out all their sins, and leaves them "without guile in their mouths," and "without fault before the throne of God." It is now a solemn truth that "The hour of God's judgment is come." "We are dwelling in a grand and awful time." As in Israel's atonement, none could find mercy except those who afflicted their souls; so now, no one can hope for mercy, or to be judged worthy of everlasting life, except they make a thorough confession to God of all their sins.

As Christ has died for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant, he must have to do with those confessions that were made under that covenant. Where would be a more proper place to locate this work than in the time of judging the righteous dead? Several years of this judgment have already rolled away. The judgment of the dead saints is fast being brought to a close. How soon will the judgment commence on the living? How soon will the scrutinizing look of the Judge pierce us through and through, and disclose the secrets of our souls? These are solemn questions that we should each carry home to our own hearts. The scenes of the great drama of earth are fast winding up. The court of heaven is already in session. Brethren and sisters, we each have a case to look to. Our suit is pending. We know not how soon it may be investigated. Who is your counsel? Have you applied for the best one? It is Jesus. Are you all ready? If you have any wrongs about you, the Counsellor will not hide them. We cannot bribe him. If we are conscious of guilt in our own hearts, "God is greater than our hearts." (Gen. 38:24)

Our counsellor has notified us that we are in danger. He will speak us out of his mouth, (drop our cases) if we do not manifest more interest. Be zealous, therefore and repent," is still a solemn admonition to us. How many of us have heeded it? How many of us have opened wide our hearts, and felt truly that we were supping with Jesus? If we have felt it, is it our position now? We are nearer the day of decision on our cases than when we first heard this counsel. Are we better prepared than then for the event? Time is fast rolling on. With the speed of a solar ray we are borne on to the point where our judgment will be passed. Are we fitting ourselves with fastings, weeping over sin, and heartfelt confession to God, for that hour? The world is running mad with its busy cares. With them it is one constant scene of hurry! hurry!! as they are borne giddily on. The time was a few years past, when men had time to read and meditate, between the hurrying seasons, as they were called; but where is that time now? I have not time, is the reply often made to us when we ask people to read on these solemn truths in which alone is salvation now. The last opportunity is now offered for them to secure a passport to endless bliss. The time is short. A little longer delay to see if some of them will not repent; but they have not time to think of heaven, to repent and prepare to meet God. They will have plenty of time soon, but alas! it will be too late.

But brother, how is it with you? You are living among this class of people. Are you drinking into their spirit of hurry? Are you so hurried that you have not time to spend a few moments every day, and several times in the day in the closet? Are you in such a hurry that you can rush on and drown yourself in care, and not take time to read, to meditate, and struggle before the Lord for mercy? Do you presume to rush into the perplexing affairs of this world without the testimony that the Lord by his Spirit is with you? If so, then you have not heeded the testimony of the Counsellor; you are not zealous in the cause of the Lord. As we are being borne swiftly down the stream of time; does eternity actually seem nearer? or does the coming of Jesus seem far away? Do you feel in your soul that God has placed great responsibility upon you, that he has permitted you to see the last saving truth for the people, and that you are one through whom the light must shine to the world? You are accountable to God whoever you are, for your time, your means, your talent; and if you do not realize it, get the eye-salve, that you may see your duty and be zealous in the cause of the Lord.

You say, perhaps, I have tried to arise. Be not discouraged. The Lord has never said, Seek my face in vain; but he has said, in the very day we seek him with all the heart he will be found of us. The Lord help us to arise and arm ourselves for the coming conflict.

Washington, Iowa, Oct. 24th, 1857.

BIBLE CLASS AT PORTLAND, MAINE.

[Bro. Loughborough sends us the following report of a Bible Class held in Portland, Me., accompanied with the following note: "The day after I had completed this report, I received the Review, containing Bro. White's report. I read it along however; do with it as you think proper." We give it that our readers may have the benefit of both. Ed.]

While giving lectures on the Sanctuary and its cleansing, in the hall occupied by the Adventists associated with the Crisis, a request was made of us to meet with them in Bible Class. The subject they wished to investigate, was the Sanctuary and its cleansing. To their proposition we readily assented.

When the class assembled, the writer of this was chosen to lead the class. I supposed from previous experience in Bible Classes, that it would be the business of the leader to ask questions, and thus draw out the opinion of each member of the class. But I soon became convinced that I was to be the class, and the congregation were to question me.

Our great desire being to get light before the people, we did not object to this arrangement, although it appeared to me, somewhat awkward.

The form which the subject of the class assumed, was, "Are there two apartments in the heavenly Sanctuary, and are there two kinds of service performed in that Sanctuary?" I will refer in this report to some of the principal texts and arguments which came before the class.

It was first suggested that Heb. ix, 23, 24, proved the existence of more than one holy place in heaven: "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us."

On this text it was claimed that as the statement is made that "Christ is not entered into the holy places," (plural,) it must be that "the true" is also plural, and refers to more than one holy place, as Macknight's translation clearly states: "Christ hath not entered into the holy places made with hands, the images of the true holy places; but into heaven itself," &c.

Our Crisis friends claimed that this text simply taught that the earthly tabernacle was a figure of heaven itself, and that "the true" refers to one holy place in the heavens, in which Christ ministers accomplishing but one kind of service. We then asked if they wished to be understood that the two apartments on earth both met their antitype in the one apartment in heaven? This position they would not take; but in some remarks left us to infer (which we learn is their true position,) that the anti-type of the first apartment is not in heaven but on earth, and that Christ is only fulfilling the typical high priest's work. It was claimed that the high priest never ministered in the first apartment of the sanctuary, but only in the most holy place.

Our claim was that all the service which was accomplished in either apartment of the sanctuary was either directly the service of the high priest, or else accomplished under his superintendence. The service of the sanctuary was all the service of the high priest, although the work in the first apartment might in reality have been accomplished by those priests under him, who served in the order of their course.

To sustain the position that Christ performed but one kind of service, and that in the holiest, and that that service commenced when Christ ascended, Heb. ix, 19, was quoted. "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus." From this text it was claimed that Christ must have been performing his service in the anti-typical most holy place when Paul wrote to the Hebrews, or else he could not say "we have boldness to enter the holiest." At this point Bro. White introduced some criticisms on the term "holiest," showing that in the original Greek, the word rendered holiest, was in the plural, and should be rendered holies. He also introduced Macknight's translation of this text: "Well then, brethren, having boldness in the entrance of the holy places by the blood of Jesus." "Well," said one, "I don't know whether it is so or not; men have disputed our translation to sustain a great many notions." Said another, "I am not going to give up my Bible."

At this point we proposed the following question: If only the high priest's work in the most holy prefigures the work of Christ, what is represented by the service in the first apartment? "Well," says one, "the service in the first apartment was only a work preparatory to an atonement being made." Those priests, it was claimed, were not mediators, only the high priest was mediator. Thus they presented us with the idea that the people wore three hundred and sixty-four days without a mediation. Another referred to 1 Pet. ii, 5, as an answer to the question, what is the antitype of the work in the first apartment?

"Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." Our reply to this text was, that in the work of the first apartment of the sanctuary, blood was offered; but this text says nothing about offering blood. The text quoted, speaks of offering sacrifices. This we showed was not the service of the first apartment; but the sacrifices were offered on the altar of sacrifices which was placed in the court just before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. See Ex, xl, 8. Again the demand was made for evidence to prove that a work is performed by the church on earth according with that accomplished by the priest in the first apartment of the earthly sanctuary. That work we showed was an offering of blood, and called for evidence to prove that the church thus made an offering of blood. No such testimony was presented. The reason is, no such testimony exists.

At this point, Heb. vi, 19, 20, was quoted to show that Christ was performing his work in the holiest apartment of the new covenant Sanctuary, when Paul wrote to the Hebrews. "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil: whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." The argument based on this text was, that there was but one veil to the typical sanctuary, and that was between the first and second apartments. And as Christ was said to be within the veil, it must be that he was in the most holy of the antitypical Sanctuary. We objected to this, that Paul taught, [Heb. ix, 2, 3.] that there were two veils in the typical sanctuary. "For there was a tabernacle made; the first, wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the shewbread; which is called the sanctuary. (Margin, holy.) And after the second veil, the tabernacle, which is called the holiest of all." It is apparent to every candid reader, that there could not be a second without a first. So we claimed if the sanctuary had a second veil, it must have had two veils. So the fact that Christ was within the veil in the days of Paul would not prove that he was within the second apartment.

Our friends who were contending that Christ was in the holiest when Paul wrote, thought this statement of Paul's concerning the second veil, must be a wrong translation, or a misprint. We asked their authority for claiming that it was a wrong translation; but no such evidence was presented, save their statement that the earthly sanctuary had but one veil. These proved to be the same individuals who a few moments before had declared their intention to stick to their Bibles.

An effort was made to draw out the true position of these persons on the Sanctuary question; but the questions proposed for this purpose they carefully evaded. Their true position we have since learned to be, that the new-covenant Sanctuary is both heaven and earth; that while the service of the first apartment is being carried out by men on earth, Christ is fulfilling the service of the most holy in heaven; and that the blue sky is the veil between the two apartments.

By them it was claimed, that when we read "Unto two thousand three hundred days: then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed," it means that at the termination of that period Christ's work will be completed, and the atonement for sinners be ended. This conclusion might perhaps be drawn, if the text said, "Then the Sanctuary shall have been cleansed;" but I cannot see how such a conclusion can be drawn from our present version of the text.

When we admit the view noticed above, that Christ performs the work of the holiest in heaven; while men on earth are fulfilling the service of the first apartment, then we could no longer claim that there was analogy between the work in the typical and that accomplished in the antitypical Sanctuary; for there was to be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation while the high priest went into the second apartment to fulfill his work there, and make an atonement. See Lev. xvi, 17. So if the position were true that the service of the second apartment commenced when Christ ascended, then no first apartment service has yet been accomplished; for there was (in the type) no service in the first apartment while the high priest was accomplishing his service in the most holy place. But the service in the most holy place cleanses the Sanctuary, (which is the high priest's service) and carries us to the end of probation for sinners. The above positions being admitted, there never would be a first apartment service. But we learn that the priests on earth "served as an example of heavenly things." Heb. viii, 6. Then the service of both apartments was an example, and there must be a service in heaven, answering to the first apartment service on earth.

As the Sanctuary is not said to be a pattern of things in earth and heaven, but "patterns of things in heaven," [Heb. ix, 23,] both apartments of the antitypical Sanctuary must be in heaven. If the blue sky which surrounds the earth is the veil of the Sanctuary, of course heaven must be the outer apartment, and the earth being entirely surrounded by the veil, (blue sky) would be more properly called that within the veil. J. N. LOUNSBOROUGH.

Monterey, Mich., Jan. 12th, 1859.

The Atonement—Part II.

(Continued.)

JUSTIFICATION, FAITH AND OBEEDIENCE.

There is a peculiar expression in Isa. li, 6. The Lord says: "My salvation shall be forever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished." That this refers to his attributes or personal character would appear improbable, even in the absence of any testimony on the subject; for the idea of the abolition of his attributes or of his personal righteousness is too absurd to ever receive a notice. But if it refers to his law which is the foundation of his righteous government, the expression is reasonable and also necessary as a revelation. And there is proof that it has this application. In Psa. cxix, 172, it is said, "All thy commandments are righteousness." Now as the character of the divine Lawgiver is best revealed to us through the revelation of his will, and as his attributes must of necessity show forth in his government, the stability of his character is determined or shown by the stability of his law; for it would be of little account to declare in words that he was unchangeable, while he showed in action that he was not. Again this application is confirmed by the connection; "Hearken unto me, ye that know righteousness, the people in whose heart is my law." Verse 7. I have quoted the scriptures showing that God's law of Ten Commandments is a rule of holiness, of justification, condition of life, perfect, the whole duty of man, &c., which identify it as the same law referred to in Isa. li, 6, 7, and Psa. cxix, 172, which is the embodiment of righteousness. Hence, they who say that God's law of Ten Commandments is abolished, directly contradict this scripture, and are vainly contending with God. This view may be strengthened by an examination of the Saviour's words in Matt. v, 17-20; but I only invite investigation of that text, and pass to the apostle's argument on justification.

Some have found a difficulty with this view in considering Paul's words in Rom. ii, 21. "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets." There are but three senses, as I conceive, in which this phrase, "the righteousness of God," may be used. It must refer primarily to his own attributes; secondly, to the revelation of his will, which is the unfolding of his attributes; and thirdly, to the righteousness of his saints, whose characters are made conformable to his will. In this latter sense it is used in 2 Cor. v, 21. "That we might be made the righteousness of God in him." And the righteousness of God, without the works of the law, manifested through the faith of Christ, can simply have respect to Jesus Christ's removing our sin, and thus placing us before the throne of justice as free, as sinless, as though we had never broken the law. But the law being the measure of holiness, of perfection, the rule of judgment, is of course a witness of the righteousness so effected; for as condemnation is by law, so must justification be according to law, or else justice will be disregarded. So there can be no determination of character, either good or bad, without the law. But this text says the law is a witness of the righteousness of God; and this only confirms the view I have taken, that it is a revelation of the divine perfections. No language could more clearly show it.

It is necessary here to notice the fact that there is a wide distinction in the Scriptures between justification and salvation. If we only had regard to original justice, there could be no difference; i. e., if man had never sinned he would have been justified, and of course saved, by his obedience. But this original or personal justice no one now possesses. Hence, while the principles cannot change, and the rule of justification is ever the same, the means are entirely different from what they would be if man had never sinned. Here is where many err. They suppose, or seem to suppose, that if the law ceases to be the means of justification, it ceases also to be the rule. They do not judge of the law by its nature or original object, but by the position of its transgressor. The law as a rule of right will form a perfect character, but cannot reform an imperfect one. The rule of the mechanic will determine or point out a right angle on the end of a board he is framing; and if the board is square—if the angle is right, it is justified or proved right by the rule. But if the angle is not right, the rule will point out the inaccuracy, but will not make it right. That must be effected by another tool. But if the saw is the means of making the proper angle on the board, does the saw therefore become the rule of determining angles or measurements? By no means. And there is precisely this difference between the law and the gospel. "By the law is the knowledge of sin;" but the gospel is the remedy. The law points out the errors of character, the gospel reforms them. The law being the only rule of right, "the doers of the law shall be justified." Rom. ii, 13. This is but plain justice; for no one can suppose that the man who did the law—who obeyed God in all his life, would be condemned. But Paul also says that there are no doers of the law—that all have sinned; and from this he draws the very evident conclusion, "therefore, by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified." Rom. iii, 21. So we are justified now "freely by his grace;" entirely by faith; works do not enter into our justification. And why not? Because, as the apostle shows, this justification by faith has respect to "the remission of sins that are past." Rom. iii, 25. Over these our future acts of obedience can have no influence or control. It has been thence inferred that the sinner justified is under no further obligation to keep that law by which he cannot be justified. But I am slow to believe that they who teach thus, realize how destructive is that view of every principle of right and justice; how it dishonors the gospel of Christ; how it tends to pervert a holy gospel of love to a mere system of license. Of all the abuse the gospel has ever received at the hands of its professed friends, this is the deepest. It is contrary to scripture, and to all just reasoning. Ask the advocates of that theory, if the law of his State will justify the thief in stealing, or the murderer in killing. He will answer, No; the law condemns such actions. Ask him how the criminal can escape the due desert of his crimes, and he will reply, Only by the governor's pardon. Ask again, if the law condemns the transgressor, and he can be justified only by pardon, does that pardon release him from obedience to the law, so that he may thereafter disregard its claims? Will he affirm this? Will he tell you that that pardon thereafter becomes the rule of life to such a man? And if the pardoned one should again be committed for crime, will the jury try him, and the judge condemn him, by the governor's pardon, or by the statute of the State? Could we get any to take the same unreasonable position in regard to the law of the State that many take in regard to the law of God? Not one. If angels ever weep at the blind folly of mortals, it seems to me that such teachings furnish an occasion. To see men of talent, of learning, of apparent piety, strip the plan of salvation of every principle of justice, pervert it to a system of license, draw conclusions directly contrary to reason and common sense, and argue on the divine government as they would be ashamed to argue in respect to the government of the State;—surely this is enough to fill the heavens with astonishment.*

* This fault does not lie alone with those called Antinomians. All those who teach that Christ did not suffer the penalty of the law, and that his death did not meet the precise demands of justice, but was substituted for that demand, really subvert the law and justice of God, perhaps unconscious of the tendency of their views. See remarks on this heresy.

Some have doubted whether these acknowledged principles of right and justice, which are incorporated in human governments, will be exacted in the divine government; whether the gospel does not supersede them to some extent. To this I would answer in the words of scripture: "Shall mortal man be more just than God? Shall a man be more pure than his Maker?" God himself has planted this regard for justice in our hearts, and shall not he regard it? There is truly a vast difference between God and us in this respect, but it is all in favor of strict justice on his part. His justice is infinite. There is no reason, there is not one passage of scripture, to lead us to suppose that God will ever commute justice in any degree, nor for any reason whatever. The following facts show that we are warranted in claiming for God's law what we claim for human laws in case of pardon:

Solomon refers the judgment to the commandments of God. Eccl. xii, 18, 14.

Paul says, that though Christ is constituted Judge, he will judge by the law. Rom. ii, 12-28. Also that the knowledge of sin is now by the law; that is, that the law is now the rule of action, though man cannot be justified by it, for reasons given. Rom. iii, 9-28.

Let it be distinctly noted that a moral duty, whether it be called law or gospel, cannot justify a sinner. That law which points out sin, which is therefore the rule of right, will not justify. This is the teaching of Rom. iii, 20, 21. It is singular indeed, that those who teach the abrogation of the original law, and its insufficiency to justify, and who hold that all that is binding in the law is incorporated in the gospel, really teach justification by law—by the same system that points out sin, which Paul calls "the law." This is contrary to reason, and to the apostle's words in Rom. iii, 20. The truth is evidently this: the gospel upholds the law, and enforces it upon the conscience, and incorporates it into the life of the believer. But it does not abrogate law, nor release the believer from obedience to it; nor does it incorporate law into itself so as to have a blinding of the two in one. The difference between the law and the gospel is as distinct now as it was in the day when the gospel was preached to the sinners in the wilderness. Heb. ix, 1. The law is moral; sin is immorality; the gospel is the remedy. Medicine may restore health, but health is not medicine. This matter may be tested by the following plain statement. The blood of Christ, the blood of the covenant, is that whereby we have remission of sin. See Heb. ix, 22; Rom. iii, 25. And this is freely and exclusively by faith or grace. Hence, baptism may be a perpetual condition of justification, because it is not any part of original obligation or moral duty. If it was moral duty it could not be performed for remission of sin, simply because as such it would be required on its own account. So the commandment which says "Thou shalt not steal," cannot be incorporated into the same system and take part in the work of remission, being itself a moral duty. How reasonable is the conditional plan which says, "Repent, and be baptised for the remission of sin." And how absurd it would be to read, "Thou shalt not kill, for the remission of sin; or Honour thy father and mother for the remission of sin. It appears absurd, as I have stated, whether these be called law or gospel, to claim justification or remission through them. But they who teach the abrogation of the law, and the incorporation of these commandments into the gospel, are responsible for this absurdity. It belongs to their system.

In speaking of justification by faith, or of the exercise of grace through the blood of Christ for the remission of sin past, the apostle clearly divides between faith and works, and excludes works entirely. It is faith only—works not at all. But when he speaks of the future life of the justified he speaks in a different manner. Then he teaches to "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." Phil. ii, 12. This is evangelical truth as well as the other; but it is an order which could not be given or obeyed relative to justification for past offenses, of which he is speaking in Rom. iii; for no one could work out a justification for a past offense. There is, then, this distinction to be regarded: the gospel is a remedy for sin; obedience is a preventative of sin.

Now I cannot believe that God regards future sin with any more favor than he does past sin. And if he does not, it would be reasonable to expect that his plan of salvation contemplated prevention as well as cure; and so we find it. Jesus saves from sin; puts away sin by the sacrifice of himself; says to the justified one, Go, sin no more; he is not a minister of sin, but of righteousness; therefore we shall not continue in sin that grace may abound. But, I say, are in the gospel plan. Thus, man is under condemnation for sin; he also has a carnal mind, which is enmity against God, and not subject to the law of God; Rom. viii, 7; by position, a sinner—in disposition, sinful. It would not be sufficient to forgive past transgression and leave the sinful disposition, as we should become involved again in sin and condemnation. Nor would it be sufficient to remove the sinful disposition and leave the burden of past sin upon us, for that would condemn us in the judgment. Therefore Christ becomes a Saviour to us in both respects. He freely forgives our past sin, so that we stand free and justified; and he takes away the carnal mind, which is enmity against God, and not subject to his law, and makes us at peace with God—subject to his law; he writes it in our hearts so that we may delight in it. Then "the righteousness of the law" is "fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh," the carnal mind, "but after the Spirit." Rom. viii, 4.

They who object to this as tending to salvation by works, cannot have looked deeply into the divine word. If Jesus takes away the sinful disposition, renews us or gives us a new heart, and brings us in subjection to the law of God, all our obedience to that law is by virtue of that change of heart effected by him; therefore, while he grants to us all the virtue of his blood for the remission of past sin, he is entitled to all the glory of our obedience in the future. So it is all of grace, and we have nothing to boast of in any respect, nor anything to claim on our own account, for all that we do is by strength imparted by him. Here we have a system which is all grace, and no license to sin; a gospel worthy of heaven—imparting mercy freely, and maintaining law and justice strictly. Here we see that without him we can do nothing; though we shall work out our salvation with fear and trembling, it is God that worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure. We are justified by faith, yet so that we must add to our faith virtue; patiently continue in well-doing; keep the commandments of God; fulfill the righteousness of the law, &c.

Some have been troubled to harmonize Paul with James on justification; but I apprehend the difficulty grows out of a disregard of the distinction I have noticed. Paul in Rom. iii, is treating on justification by faith for past offenses only; while James is speaking of the obedience of faith. "By faith Abraham obeyed." Paul also speaks of faith which works by love. Gal. v, 6. But neither Paul nor James says that works will procure the remission of past offenses, or that faith will save without works. There is no difference in this respect in their teachings.

"Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law." Rom. iii, 31. And as we do not make void the law through faith, so we do not supersede faith by obedience to the law; for that is through faith. The blood of Christ is our only refuge—his death opens to us the way of life. What that death is we have already noticed; its object we have now seen; its nature and relation we now consider.

The Atonement—Part II.

(Continued.)

WHAT THE ATONEMENT IS.

I HAVE NOW examined the principles of God's government upon which, of necessity, the atonement must be based; and I have examined the nature of the offering made for man's redemption. That "Christ died," there can be no doubt, except with those who prefer their own theories to the plain testimony of the word of God. That in his death he suffered the penalty of the law, I see no chance for dispute, except with those who would deny that "the wages of sin is death." That he died for "the world,"—"for all," is expressly declared; and of the sufficiency of the offering there can be no doubt, admitting the scriptural declarations concerning the death of him who was the Word, who "was in the beginning," "with the Father." According to the most commonly received views these points about exhaust the subject; it being taken for granted that the death of Christ and the atonement are the same thing.

While I firmly hold to the vicariousness of the death of Christ, I have avoided the term "vicarious atonement." True, that which is done for another is considered as vicarious; and as Christ makes the atonement for others, not for himself, it may be called vicarious. But the word vicarious is mostly used in a stricter sense, as of substitution; as that Christ does for us precisely what the law requires of us. The law requires the life of the transgressor, and Christ died for us; therefore his death was strictly vicarious. But the atonement is the work of a priest, and is not embraced within the requirement of the sinner; for it is something entirely beyond the limit of the sinner's action. A sinner may die for his own sins, and thereby meet the demand of justice; but he is then lost, and we cannot say any atonement is made for him. The action of the priest is not in the sinner's stead, for it is beyond that which the sinner was required or expected to do; and in this restricted sense it is not vicarious, as was the death of Christ. By this it is seen that there is a clear distinction between the death of Christ and the atonement, and as long as this distinction is lost sight of, so long will the term "vicarious atonement" convey a wrong impression to the mind. Many diverse views of the atonement exist; and there are many whose views are vague and undefined; and I think both confusion and error grew out of a disregard of this distinction more than of any other cause.

We have seen that when a man brought an offering, he was required to lay his hand upon its head; if the people had sinned, the elders of the congregation were required to lay their hands upon the head of the offering; but in every case the priest made an atonement. See Lev. iv, 20, 24, 31, 35; v, 6, 10, 18, 19; vi, 7; xvi, 20, 22, and others. "When a ruler hath sinned . . . he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a male without blemish; and he shall lay his hand upon the head of the goat, and kill it in the place where they kill the burnt offering before the Lord; it is a sin offering. . . . And the priest shall make an atonement for him." Lev. iv, 22-26. Three things in this work we notice in their order: 1. He shall lay his hand upon the head of the offering. 2. He shall kill it. 3. The priest shall make an atonement. Here it is plainly seen that the killing of the offering and making the atonement are distinct and separate acts; and we shall find that in every case where a sin offering was brought to the priest he took the blood to make an atonement, according to the word of the Lord: "For the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul." Lev. xvii, 11.

Passing over many instances of the use of the word, I turn to Lev. xvi, to the prescribed order on the day of atonement, which specially typified the work of our High Priest and Saviour. On the tenth day of the seventh month the high priest made an atonement for all the people. The Lord fixed it as a statute "to make an atonement for the children of Israel, for all their sins once a year." Verses 20, 34. First, he made an atonement for himself and for his house, that he might appear sinless before God when he stood for the people. But this first act did not typify anything in the work of Christ, for Paul says he was separate from sinners, and therefore need not offer for himself. Heb. vii, 26, 27. As the high priest entered the most holy place on the day of atonement, it will be necessary to take a brief view of the sanctuary to understand this work.

The book of Exodus, commencing with chapter xiv, contains an order from the Lord to make him a sanctuary, with a full description thereof, together with the formula for anointing the priests and inducting them into their office. The sanctuary was an oblong building, divided into two parts; the first room was called the holy, which was entered by a door or veil on the east side. The second part was called the most holy, which had no outside entrance, but was entered by a door or veil at the back or west end of the holy, called "the second veil." The articles made and placed in the sanctuary were an ark of wood overlaid with gold, a mercy-seat, which was the cover of the ark. On the mercy-seat were made two cherubim of gold, their wings shadowing the mercy-seat. In the ark were placed the testimony, or tables of stone, containing the ten commandments. See Ex. xxv, 10-21; xxxi, 18; 1 Kings viii, 9. The ark was put in the most holy place of the sanctuary, and was the only article put therein. In the holy place, or first room, were the table of show-bread, the golden candlesticks, and the altar of incense.

When the command was given to make the sanctuary, the object was stated by the Lord, that he might dwell among them. A holy dwelling-place, or dwelling-place of the Lord, is given as the signification of the word sanctuary. In accordance with this design, the Lord said he would meet with the high priest above the mercy-seat, between the wings of the cherubim, there to commune with him of all things that he would give him in commandment unto the children of Israel. Ex. xxv, 22. But by other scriptures we learn that he would meet with them in the most holy place only once a year; to wit, on the tenth day of the seventh month, which was the day of atonement. He promised also to meet with them at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, or holy place, where there was a continual or daily offering. Ex. xxix, 42, 43; Heb. ix, 6, 7. Let it be borne in mind that although the glory of God was to abide in the sanctuary, it was manifested only in two places, as specified, at the door of the holy, where the table and candlesticks were set; and in the most holy, above the ark, over the wings of the cherubim. Sometimes the glory of God filled the whole sanctuary; but when that was the case, the priests could not go in to minister. See Ex. xl, 34, 35; 1 Kings viii, 10, 11; 2 Chron. v, 18, 14; vii, 1, 2. These few facts are sufficient to guide us in our examination of the atonement; and I would request the reader to examine them with care, and get them all well fixed in the mind.

J. H. W.

WHAT THE ATONEMENT IS.

(Continued.)

Having made an atonement for himself, as before noticed, the high priest next took two goats from the people, and cast lots upon them, one to be chosen for a sin offering, the other for a scape goat. The goat upon which the Lord's lot fell was then slain, and the priest took its blood and went into the sanctuary and sprinkled it upon the mercy-seat and before the mercy-seat, in that manner making an atonement for the children of Israel, by blotting out their sins and removing them from the presence of God. That this was the true idea and intent of that work we learn from verses 16-19, wherein it is not only said that the priest made atonement for the children of Israel, but that he also made atonement for the holy places, cleansing them and hallowing them from the uncleanness of the children of Israel. The uncleanness or sins of the children of Israel could never come directly in contact with the holies of the sanctuary, but only by proxy; for they (the people) were never permitted to enter there. The priest was the representative of the people; he bore their judgment. Ex. xxviii, 30. In this manner the sanctuary of God was defiled; and as the blood was given to make atonement, the priest cleansed the sanctuary from their sins by sprinkling the blood upon and before the mercy-seat in the divine presence. It has been seen that the sinner brought his offering; that it was slain; and that the priest took the blood and made the atonement; and here it is further established that the atonement was made in the sanctuary. This most clearly proves that the killing of the offering did not make the atonement, but was preparatory to it; for the atonement was made in the sanctuary, but the offering was not slain in the sanctuary.

These things, of course, were typical, and have their fulfillment in the work of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God. That he is a High Priest, and the only mediator in the gospel will be readily admitted; but the order and manner of his service must be determined by the scriptures. The apostle states that he is a priest after the order of Melchisedec; i. e., a kingly priest; on the throne of the majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary and true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man. Heb. viii, 1. Of course this is the antitype of the earthly sanctuary, of the tabernacle pitched or made by man. He also affirms that if he were on earth he would not be a priest for the evident reason that the priests of the earthly sanctuary were of the tribe of Levi, while our Lord sprang out of Judah of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood, and of which no man gave attendance at the altar. Heb. vii, 13, 14; viii, 4. This will correct a mistake very often made, that the priesthood of our Lord commenced on earth. If he had entered on the work of his priesthood at his baptism, as has been said, he would have acted with those who were types of himself; and if as a priest he had officiated in the temple, it would have been to make offerings typical of his own.* Having shown the distinction between the earthly and the heavenly sanctuaries, Paul proceeds to set forth the relation which the ministrations in each sustained to the other, saying of the priests on earth: "Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Heb. viii, 6. As the earthly is the shadow and example, we may compare it with the heavenly, the substance, by which we may gain a more clear idea of the latter than is afforded us by any other means. Indeed, the comparison is made to our hand by the Apostle. Note the following text, in which the distinction I claim between the death of Christ and his work as priest to make atonement, is clearly recognized. "For the bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate." Heb. xiii, 11, 12. Thus we learn definitely that, as priest he makes atonement; but his priesthood is not on earth, but in the sanctuary in heaven; and that he did not suffer in the sanctuary where atonement is made. It was not necessary, in the type, for the priest to slay

* That Christ was a "prophet, priest and king," many of us have learned from our early childhood; but comparatively few ever learn the true relation these offices sustain to each other. He was "that prophet" while on earth; and Paul's testimony given above shows that he filled no other office. Many suppose that his priesthood is connected with that kingdom which is given to him as the Son of David. But this is utterly forbidden by plain scripture declarations. Aaron had no kingship, and David had no priesthood; and Christ is not a priest after the order of Aaron, (Heb. vii, 11,) so in he not a king on the throne of David; (i. e., during his priesthood). It is "after the order of Melchisedec," who was both king and priest, that Christ is a priest on his father's throne. At different times he occupies two different thrones, see Rev. iii, 21; and the throne of his Father in heaven which he now occupies as priest "he shall have delivered up" at his coming. 1 Cor. xv, 23-25. Then, in subjection to his Father, he will take his own throne, called also the throne of David, on which he will reign forever—without end. Luke i, 32, 33. But then he will no more be a priest, his priesthood being altogether on the throne he now occupies. The reader is requested to examine these passages carefully, as a misinterpretation of them has given rise to much confusion in the "theological world."

the offering; see Lev. i, 4, 5: but it was necessary for the priest to take the blood and with it enter the sanctuary of the Lord to make an atonement. Jesus did not shed his blood as priest;—it was shed by sinners; but he did by "his own blood" enter "into the holy places" not made with hands, of which the earthly were figures, "to appear in the presence of God for us." Heb. ix, 12, 24.

By confounding the death of Christ with the atonement, the latter has been supposed to be a general work, made for all mankind.* With this I cannot agree. That Christ died for all, is distinctly stated; but we have seen that that was only preparatory to the atonement, and it is in the atonement that application is made of the blood to the full removal of sin. This is shown also in the type. The goat of the sin offering was slain for the people, and of course was offerred to meet the wants of all; but while the priest made the atonement they were required to "afflict their souls," or come as humble penitents before the Lord, and whosoever did not should be cut off from among the people. Lev. xvi, 29; xxiii, 27-29. This then was required of them individually, in that day, in order that their sins might be atoned for by the priest; for we cannot suppose that they would be cut off whose sins were actually blotted out, or removed from the presence of the Judge, by the blood of the offering with which the sanctuary was cleansed from sin. The same is also taught by Peter, who says that God exalted Jesus, who was slain, to be a prince and Saviour, to give repentance and forgiveness of sins. Acts v, 30, 31. Now that "he died for all" there can be no question; and his death is absolute and without condition. But not so the atonement; for Peter says again, "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord;" &c. Acts iii. 19. We have found that, when the priest made the atonement, he took the blood and cleansed the sanctuary of God from the sins wherewith it had been defiled; and this is the only act which will answer to the expression of blotting out the sins, for blood was the only thing that would remove them. Hence, while the blood of Christ was shed for all, the efficiency of that blood in atoning for, or blotting out, sin, is contingent, it availing only for those who will repent and be converted. He died for the world—he died for all; and he is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him. Heb. vii, 25.

Another cause of confusion is, that reconciliation and atonement are often supposed to be the same;† and where the distinction is recognised their relation is not always observed, a disregard of which tends to about the same result. Thus it has been said: "The atonement may exist without reconciliation on the part of man; but reconciliation cannot exist without the atonement."‡ This is the exact reverse of the truth; and is a mistake growing out of the great error before mentioned, of confounding the death of Christ with the atonement. This point needs to be carefully examined.

J. M. W.

(To be Continued.)

* Stephen took this view, page 186. In this he followed the majority of writers, who argue mainly on the death of Christ, whom he ever referring to his priesthood, which is really the central point of this subject. Thus the Manual of the Atonement, p. 76, says "When he had completed his mediatorial work, he meekly yielded himself up into the hands of his Heavenly Father, saying, Into thy hands I commit my spirit." So far from his "mediatorial work" being completed at his death, it was not yet commenced. How can they know the truth on this all-important doctrine, who trust such teachers?

† Many have been led into this error by a misinterpretation of Rom. v, 11, whose Antitheses should have been rendered reconciliation instead of atonement. It is so rendered in every other place where it occurs. See Rom. xl, 15; 2 Cor. v, 18, 19, (katallaxeo) Rom. v, 10; 1 Cor. vi, 11; 2 Cor. v, 20.

‡ J. M. Stephen, Atonement, p. 7.

The Atonement—Part II.

(Continued.)

A few remarks may be necessary on the subject of

RECONCILIATION.

There is no intimation in the Scriptures that reconciliation is mutual between God and man: though many writers affirm this, and large denominations endorse it. God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself; but who reconciles him to us? No one; for no such work is done or required. It is supposed that God must also be reconciled, because he is offended; he is angry with the sinner. This, of course, is because of his justice, which can never be reconciled to sin. When the sinner is reconciled to God he is no longer regarded as a sinner; justice being satisfied by the substitute, is turned away from him, and therefore no further reconciliation can be necessary. The difference of position between God and man in this respect is so marked that it need not be mistaken. "The carnal mind is enmity against God." "God so loved the world," &c. "God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us." "We love God because he first loved us." Christ is not only a voluntary Saviour, but he is the gift of the Father's love. He did not die to cause the Father to love man; but he died because the Father did love us; and to make it possible to manifest his mercy to the transgressor consistent with his infinite justice. I cannot understand how it would be necessary, or even possible, to reconcile one to us, who already loves us so deeply, and is willing to do so much for us. Reconcile, says Webster, is "to call back into union and friendship the affections which have been alienated."

"Reconciled, brought into friendship from a state of disagreement and enmity." All the enmity is on the part of man; of course, all the reconciliation must be effected for him. The following statement from Dr. Barnes I can only read with astonishment:

"Reconciliation is in fact produced between God and man by the atonement. God becomes the friend of the pardoned sinner." Atonement, p. 268.

This is equivalent to saying that God is not the friend, but the enemy, of the sinner, before he is pardoned. But how, then, is his pardon effected? According to that view, God as our enemy loved us; as our enemy gave his Son to die for us; as our enemy was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself; as our enemy pardons us for Christ's sake; and only becomes our friend after he has pardoned us! Surely there is neither Scripture nor reason in this; and yet, as I conceive, it is the necessary conclusion of that view which supposes that God is reconciled to man in the gospel.

Our Saviour's words in Matt. v, 28, 29, show that the offender, and not the offended, is the party to be reconciled. "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee, . . . first be reconciled to thy brother." The same is shown again in 1 Cor. vii, 11. "Let not the wife depart from her husband; but and if she depart, let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband." In both these cases the wrong-doer is instructed to be reconciled. And this is doubtless the idea conveyed by the term in its general use in the Scriptures.

RECONCILIATION PRECEDES THE ATONEMENT.

Several words in the Hebrew are rendered atonement in the English; principally kippoorah, in the Septuagint kathartemos and hilasmos. In Lev. xvi, the Hebrew has kaphar, in the Septuagint exilasmos, denoting expiation; to appease, or win over.*

*It is not to be understood by this that God is changed in temper or disposition; the sinner only is changed. It is also obviously erroneous to ascribe a difference of feeling to the Father and Son, in the work of human redemption.

When we consider that the sacrifice is the means whereby the atonement is made, we can readily understand how hilasmos is used in 1 John ii, 2, defined by Liddell and Scott, a means of appeasing. Jesus Christ is the propitiation—the means of appeasing divine justice, for all. It is by means of his intercession, his pleading his blood, that probation is given and mercy offered to the whole world.

As to the meaning of the term, we are not entirely confined to Lexicons where the work is so minutely described as is that of the atonement in Lev. xvi. Says David, "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity." Ps. xxxii, 1, 2. This blessing does not come upon all, but it is placed within the reach of all by the death of Christ. And whose sins will be covered? Evidently those who have confessed and forsaken their sins, or who have been reconciled to God. This is exactly the order of the work described by Peter in Acts iii, 19. "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." This blotting out is by the blood which the High Priest brings into the sanctuary to cleanse it from sin. We cannot for a moment suppose that the sin of any will be blotted out or covered, who still maintains his opposition and enmity to God; but he who confesses and forsakes shall find mercy; that is, he who is reconciled shall have his sins forgiven and blotted out. It may be said in truth that reconciliation supposes an atonement to be made; for we are reconciled by the blood of the cross, which was shed for the express purpose of making atonement in the heavenly sanctuary. But when we learn, as we do from the Scriptures, that the atonement is a distinct, specific work of the High Priest, and the last work in his priesthood, both the distinction and order here claimed are obvious.

I say the atonement is the last work of our High Priest, accomplished just before his second coming. If this be made to appear from the Scriptures, it will be still more evident that reconciliation must precede it. In Dan. viii, 14, a question is asked concerning the time of the vision recorded in that chapter; the answer is, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." We have seen by Lev. xvi, that the cleansing of the sanctuary, and making the atonement, mean precisely the same thing; for the atonement was made by the High Priest sprinkling the blood upon the mercy-seat and altar, and cleansing them from the sins of the people. Hence this expression of Dan. viii, 14, is equivalent to saying, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the atonement be made." Thus we see there was an appointed time for making the atonement. This is in conformity to the type, where the tenth day of the seventh month was set apart to that work. While this text stands as a part of that "scripture" which is "profitable for instruction," it is both interesting and profitable to inquire where those two thousand and three hundred days terminate; but to understand this we must trace the connection between chapters viii and ix of Daniel; for chapter ix is in part explanatory of chapter viii, the explanation of the time (2300 days) being given in the latter, not in the former. Note the following points: 1. Gabriel was commanded to make Daniel understand the vision. 2. He explained in chap. viii the symbols of the kingdoms represented therein. 3. He did not explain the time of verse 14. 4. Daniel said he did not understand the vision, which of course refers to that part not explained—the time. 5. In chap. ix Gabriel said he had come to give him understanding, and commanded him to "consider the vision." 6. No vision had been mentioned since chap. viii, which shows that Gabriel had reference to the same vision which he was commanded to make him understand in that chapter. 7. In chap. ix he commenced instructing Daniel on time, the only thing in "the vision" not hitherto explained. 8. He said, Seventy weeks are determined (Heb. literally, cut off) upon thy people. 9. The 70 weeks commence with the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, v. v. 457. See Ezra vii. 10. The 70 weeks are evidently "cut off" from the 2300 days; the only period given in the vision. Therefore the time of the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem must be the commencement of the 2300 days. And if the 70 weeks are not cut off from the 2300 days, that is, if the 70 weeks do not mark the commencement of those days, then no explanation of the days was given, and Gabriel never did what he was commanded to do. But such a supposition will not be urged. Therefore we must admit that in Dan. ix we have a clue to the 2300 days of Dan. viii, and to understand the 70 weeks of Dan. ix, is also to understand the 2300 days of Dan. viii, the two periods commencing together. As the Messiah was to be cut off, and cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease in the midst of the last week of the 70, which was in A. D. 81, and the time that the apostles turned to the Gentiles marks the close of that period, which was in A. D. 34, it is easy to see that the 2300 days would extend 1810 years beyond that time, or to A. D. 1844. And as the angel said the sanctuary should be cleansed at the end of that period, this must refer, not to the typical sanctuary which was destroyed by the Romans in A. D. 70, but to the antitypical "sanctuary and true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. viii, 1, 2.

Some are ready to object to this view, that the heavenly sanctuary where our High Priest officiates cannot need cleansing—that there is nothing impure in Heaven. The seal of such to vindicate the honor of heavenly things is parallel with that of Peter, who rebuked the Lord for speaking of his ignominious death; he thought a victor's crown only was becoming his Master. But God has a plan appointed, and the death of his Son was in that plan; and the mistaken zeal of his servants must not be suffered to interfere with it. Is that plan is also the atonement which God's now exalted Son as Priest makes in the sanctuary in Heaven; and it has been sufficiently shown that the atonement is made by cleansing the sanctuary. That this expression of the angel refers to the heavenly, and not to the earthly, sanctuary, may be proved by several considerations.

1. The sanctuary was not cleansed from any impurity of its own, nor from any defilement from use, as ordinary habitations are cleansed, but from sin. Therefore it was cleansed by blood. By referring further to Lev. xvi, it will be seen, and will be noticed hereafter, that the design was to take away the sins from the presence of God, and remove them from the throne of judgment. But Paul declares in Heb. x, 4, that "it is not possible for the blood of bulls and of goats to take away sin;" but that was all the blood the priests had to offer in the worldly sanctuary; therefore, as that blood would not remove sin, it follows that the earthly sanctuary was never cleansed at all, and never could have been had it remained and the priests still officiated therein till the end of the 2300 days. Nevertheless the necessity existed; for the people were actual sinners, and needed to have their sins remitted or blotted out.

2. The sanctuary, as before noticed, was defiled by the sins of the people, though the people never came in contact with it. The high priest stood as their representative; he bore their judgment. Ex. xxviii, 30. And as he alone went into the most holy place, it follows that it was defiled by his bearing their sins. Now it is plainly stated that Christ bears our sins—they were laid upon him—he is our representative before his Father. And it seems evident that one of the following positions is true: That Christ has taken the sins of his people, or, his people have their sins yet upon them. I think it will be admitted that the former is true; that as the representative and substitute of his saints he takes their sins. But if he takes them, where does he take them? Certainly where he is. Now it is by virtue of his priesthood that he bears the judgment of the people; but his priesthood is in the heavenly sanctuary. There, according to the type, is where our sins are taken.

3. That the heavenly sanctuary is cleansed, is proved by direct declarations of the New Testament. Paul, in writing to the Hebrews respecting the types and their fulfillment in the priesthood of the Son of God, says, "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these [i. e., with the blood of oxen and goats]; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these." Heb. ix, 23. Accordingly he says that Christ entered into the holy place, into Heaven itself, "by his own blood." Verse 12. This is the better sacrifice or blood by which the heavenly things are purified or cleansed.

The Atonement.

BY ELD. J. H. WAGGONER.

(Continued from No. 1, Vol. xxi.)

This point being settled another question arises: Are there two holy places in the heavenly sanctuary? and if so, did not Christ enter the most holy when he ascended on high? In answer to this I notice,

1. When Moses was about to make the tabernacle he was admonished to make all things according to the pattern showed him in the mount. Heb. viii, 6; Ex. xxv, 40.

2. This tabernacle and its officers served "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Heb. viii, 6.

3. The two holy places in the earthly sanctuary are termed "figures of the true" [holy places]; and patterns of things in the Heavens. And they could not be patterns of the heavenly, and be made in "all things according to the pattern" showed to Moses, unless the heavenly had also two holy places.

4. That there are two holy places in the heavenly temple is shown by the book of Revelation, in which prophecy has unfolded various events in this dispensation immediately concerning the position and work of our High Priest. Jesus said to his servant John, to whom he gave the Revelation, that he was in the midst of the "seven golden candlesticks;" and John says he saw seven golden candlesticks, and in their midst the Son of man, when he had a vision of his glory. Rev. i, 12, 13; ii, 1. And when the living creature (one of the cherubim) called him up in the Spirit to Heaven, he said he saw a throne set, and described its appearance, and him that sat thereon; and said there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne. Rev. iv, 2-6. The order given to Moses, in erecting the earthly sanctuary, was to set the candlesticks on the south side of the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, which was the holy place. Ex. xxix, 30-36; xl, 24. As this was a shadow and example of heavenly things, we learn by these texts in the book of Revelation, that John's vision of the throne of God was in the holy place of the heavenly temple, where were the seven lamps of fire or golden candlesticks. Therefore the Lord said he would manifest his presence; Ex. xxix, 42, 43; and there was our Saviour at the time of John's vision, officiating as priest. In this, a continual or daily offering was made, that judgment might be stayed, and the sinner spared, until the time of the cleansing of the sanctuary or making atonement, which was the blotting out and entire removal of sin from the sanctuary of God. According to the type this work of propitiation or intercession the Saviour had first to fulfill, in order to give men an opportunity to be reconciled to God, or converted, that his sins might be blotted out in the appointed time.

But we look down the stream of time still further; when the dispensation is drawing to a close, and the seventh trumpet is sounded.* The third voice comes upon the earth, and great voices are heard saying the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ; the elders before the throne of God announce that "the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the deed that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and them that fear thy name small and great." Rev. xi, 15-17. Here is a series of events, the connection and location of which cannot be mistaken, showing that this trumpet closes up this dispensation.† Our Saviour says, "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Rev. xxii, 12. Paul says the saints shall have rest when the Lord Jesus is revealed taking vengeance on the wicked. 2 Thess. i, 8-10. And Jesus told his disciples they should be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. Luke xiv, 14. Thus it is shown that the judgment of the dead, the coming of the Lord, and the resurrection of the just, are events transpiring under this trumpet.

* Keith on the prophecies quoted largely from Olsson, to show that the first four trumpets noted events connected with the Jewish dispensation. Mr. J. Elrich, present editor of the Advent Herald, Boston, Mass., following Keith, traced the history of the next two, showing their connection with Eastern Rome. In this he gave conclusive evidence that the sixth trumpet ceased to sound in 1640. We think the seventh or third was commenced in 1844, at the termination of the 2300 days. On this subject I invite attention to a tract published at the Review and Herald office, entitled, Sounding of the Seven Trumpets.

The prevailing ideas of the judgment are vague and indefinite. Probably a majority, certainly many, look upon it in this light: that the Lord shall appear in the clouds of heaven; that all the dead will be raised, and the judgment will then sit upon the whole human race. Another view is that each one is judged immediately after death. Both these views are forbidden by the scripture which says the saints shall judge the world. 1 Cor. vi, 2. It is not reasonable to suppose that the saints will judge the world in their present state, or previous to the time when themselves are judged. The following from Olsson's review of Prof. Bush on the Resurrection is more reasonable and scriptural than the views generally entertained:

"We are inclined to the opinion that the judgment is after death, and before the resurrection; and that before that event the acts of all men will be adjudicated; so that the resurrection of the righteous is their full acquittal and redemption—their sins being blotted out when the times of refreshing shall have come; Acts iii, 19; while the fact that the wicked are not raised proves that they were previously condemned."

This, however, does not give any chance for the fulfillment of the Apostle's words;—"The saints shall judge the world," and must be, so far, incorrect. That the judgment of the saints is fully accomplished while the Saviour is in the sanctuary in Heaven, before his coming, and therefore before the resurrection, is evident; for (1.) their judgment must be closed while Jesus is their advocate that he may procure their acquittal. And (2.) they are raised immortal, which is the evidence of their acquittal. The judgment of the wicked must be subsequent to the redemption of the righteous (for they will take part in that transaction), and yet previous to the second resurrection. It is quite reasonable to consider that the wicked are merely rejected while Christ is a priest, their cases being passed over for future consideration; indeed, this is the only view that will harmonize all scripture; and as the resurrection of the righteous to immortality and eternal life is the announcement of the decision of the judgment to them, so the wicked are raised to condemnation and the second death, which is the execution of the judgment before determined in regard to them.

I think no doubt can remain that the judgment of the saints, the blotting out of sin, the making of the atonement, and the cleansing of the sanctuary, are identical; and we have seen that in the type the atonement was made—the sanctuary cleansed, when the priest went into the most holy place before the ark; and the most holy was opened only on the day of atonement. This fact is also referred to in the scripture under consideration.—Rev. xi. Under the sounding of the seventh trumpet it is said, "The temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament."

† By this I do not affirm that this trumpet ceases with or at the coming of the Lord; but only that it covers the close of this dispensation.

I have before noticed that John was shown a door opened in Heaven; a throne set; and seven lamps of fire before the throne. Rev. iv. But it was not till the seventh trumpet sounded that the temple of God in Heaven was opened where the ark of his testament is seen. By reference to "the example" of the heavenly things—to "the figures of the true"—we learn that the seven lamps or candlesticks were in the holy, and the ark of the testament in the most holy place of the sanctuary. And further, that the work of intercession was continued in the holy place, but the most holy was not opened except on the day of atonement.

From this we learn that the work of intercession of our High Priest is in the holy place in the heavenly sanctuary extended from the commencement of his ministry in A. D. 81, to the sounding of the seventh trumpet (1844), when the antitypical day of atonement commenced, in which the sanctuary is cleansed. There are differences in the work of the priest in the two places which need to be noticed.

The intercession, or work of the Priest in the holy, is general, for the whole world; and herein is shown the benefit that the whole world receives from the death of Christ. Every sin deserves its punishment, which is death; and without a mediator this would be the unavoidable and universal consequence. But through the pleading of the Saviour, sentence against the evil work is not speedily executed; Eccl. viii, 11: the sinner is granted an opportunity to repent; a time of probation is given in which he may return to God through Christ. In this sense Jesus is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world. He has prepared a covering beneath which all may find refuge. By virtue of his death for sin, wherein mercy is exalted and justice honored, the transgressor is spared and invited to accept the blood of Jesus as his substitute, and be reconciled to God. The benefits of probation which all enjoy, are by his blood and intercession. And surely these are no slight benefits. Though the sinner may pass them by unheeding; may scorn the warning voice, and despise the precious blood; the countless multitude of the redeemed who are all reconciled by these very means, forever attest the value and fullness of those means so blindly disregarded by the impenitent.

On the other hand, the atonement, the work of the Priest in the most holy place, is specific and limited. By this it is not to be understood that repentance and reconciliation are not given in the day of atonement, as some have inferred. To sustain such a view it would be necessary to show that the penitent would not have been received, according to the type, on the day in which Aaron or his son made atonement; but that cannot be shown. All received the benefit of that atonement who "afflicted their souls," as the Lord commanded. But this we learn that such as did not "afflict their souls"—who did not repent, and were not reconciled to God, were "cut off from among the people;" their sins were not blotted out; no atonement was made for them. This work extends only to those who are reconciled to God; who, by confessing and forsaking their sins are entitled to mercy in the judgment; or in other words, to those who are convicted, whose sins "may be" blotted out. Acts iii, 19. It is very evident that Peter did not think their sins would be blotted out when they were converted, but at some future time; and the scriptures clearly show that that time is when the sanctuary is cleansed and the atonement made.

DIFFICULTIES OF THE COMMON VIEW.

Though a doctrine should be maintained or admitted on the strength or correctness of its principles, yet in the mind of the inquirer its strength is more readily appreciated by a discovery of the weakness of, or defects in, an opposite view. The common view, that the death of Christ is equivalent to the atonement, is attended with difficulties which, to my mind, are insurmountable. Losing sight of the truth, men have rushed to the extremes of error in opposite directions, and spent their time in useless labor to maintain a fruitless warfare.

We read that Christ died for all. Some who take the view that the death of Christ is the atonement, readily conclude that the sins of all have been atoned for, and argue thence that no condemnation can remain to any. The argument is reasonable but the premise is defective. A regard for the distinction I have noticed would remove this prop of Universalism.

Others, assured from the Scriptures that all will not be saved, that some do now and will finally rest under condemnation, are shut up to the conclusion that the atonement is not made for all. They also regard the death of Christ and the atonement as the same thing, and therefore are necessarily precipitated to the opposite extreme, that Christ did not die for all, but only for a chosen part of mankind. Here again, the difficulties of ultra-Calvinism lie in the assumption on which their argument is based. The dislocation herein advocated and sustained by plain scripture facts and declarations, would remove the errors of "Universalists" and "Partialists," and bring all together on the harmonious testimony of the word of God.

And I would urge upon the consideration of the reader that, assuming that the atonement was made on Calvary, one of the above positions must necessarily be admitted. Either the death of Christ was for a limited number, (as the atonement is), or else the sins of all have been atoned for, and all must be saved. If the atonement be already made, if the sanctuary be already cleansed, and sin blotted out by an act long past, I am unable to see how the destiny of man is to be affected by the proclamation and belief of the truth. It will be said that our faith lays hold of that which has been done for us; and if the declaration referred merely to what the Scriptures say has been done, it would be correct. But if our sin was removed or blotted out long before we were born, it is hard to see how the fact could be more a fact or made more certain by our belief of it: or if our sins were not so blotted out, our unbelief could not affect the omission. But "Christ died for all;" and the impenitent will be "punished with everlasting destruction." It is a matter of wonder that Bible readers have ever for a moment recognized as true the idea that death makes an atonement, when the atonement is always represented as the work of the priest, performed in the sanctuary, with the blood of the offering.

The Atonement.

BY ELD. J. H. WAGGONER.

(Continued.)

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH: ITS RELATION TO THE ATONEMENT.

A question naturally arises here in regard to the present justification of the believer. If the blotting out of sin, it may be said, is the work of the judgment in the cleansing of the sanctuary, which is certainly the last work of the Priest, then the sins of the saints stand on record till that time; how, or in what sense, then, are they justified? I answer, by faith; this faith necessarily looks to a future fact. I have before shown that justification and salvation are not identical. But here it will be necessary to examine the relation that the duties of the gospel sustain to the work of the atonement. "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins," is the commandment of inspiration. From this it has been inferred that sin is remitted in the act of baptism, for which I can see no warrant; certainly no such thing is there expressed. That the terms signify in order to the remission of sin, I need not stop to argue; and it is too much to claim that in laboring in order to gain a certain object, that object must be obtained in the very act of laboring. God told his people that they should have life—eternal life—if they kept his commandments, which, to the faithful, will be fulfilled "when Christ who is our life shall appear," and not till then. I understand that the declaration above quoted from the apostle Peter in Act. ii. 38, points to the same fact as that in chap. iii. 19. The remission of sin, is the work of the judgment; and the believer must stand justified by faith, looking to the Priest for the accomplishment of his hope. But that the sin is not really blotted out, or atonement made at baptism, or at any other period in probation is proved by the word of the Lord to Ezekiel, xviii, 26: "When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them; for his iniquity that he hath done shall he die." Again in chap. xxxiii, 13: "All his righteousness shall not be remembered." That is, he shall be treated as though he had never been righteous. Now the righteousness of the righteous is by faith; therefore if he turn and commit iniquity he shall be treated as if he never had faith; his justification is annulled—he falls from grace.

For a demonstration of the truthfulness of this view, we look to the cases of the faithful who lived before the time of Christ. Were it admitted that the atonement was made at the death of Christ, it would still remain a fact in the cases of the patriarchs and prophets that their sins were not atoned for, not actually blotted out till the blood was shed by which they are blotted out. But they were justified by faith, and died in that justified state, looking forward to the work of Christ when the object of their faith should be realized; when his blood should take away the sins of which they had already repented; or in other words, when the atonement should be made.

The position of an individual justified by faith may be illustrated thus: A owes B. a sum which he is not able to pay, and C. engages to take the responsibility of the debt on certain conditions: and in order to make it sure, C. deposits with B. sufficient to cover the amount. Now it is stipulated that if A. fulfills the conditions, B. shall cancel the debt from the deposit made by C. And as long as A. is faithfully fulfilling the conditions, so long is B. satisfied in regard to the debt; and of course he will not trouble A. for it, knowing it is secure. Thus A. is accounted just, in the sight of B., though not really just in himself because he fails to pay a just debt. He is considered as just, or justified through obedience to the conditions of C. who is his surety. But if A. refuses or neglects to fulfill all the conditions, the deposit of C. no longer avails for him; he falls from the favor of B. which he had enjoyed through this arrangement, and the debt stands against him as fully as though C. had never engaged to pay it on any condition.

That this is a true representation of the position of the penitent, is evident from the declarations that "he that endureth unto the end"—he that is "faithful unto death," shall be saved: while he that is justified by faith, may, by disobedience lose that justification, and his righteousness will not be remembered. The blood of Jesus is the bounteous supply—the rich deposit where all may find a covering for their sins; but whether their sins are actually atoned for and removed by that blood, depends upon their acceptance of it and their faithfulness to the conditions of acceptance.*

Justification by faith and reconciliation are very closely allied, but the atonement is subsequent to both. If we are justified or reconciled, and so continue to the end, we may hope that our sins will be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; this work is effected in the most holy place, where the ark of the testament is; this place is opened in Heaven under the sounding of the seventh trumpet; and this trumpet ushers in the judgment of the dead, the coming of Christ without sin unto salvation to them that look for him; the giving reward to all his servants, and the destruction of them that corrupt the earth. These events pass beyond the bounds of human probation, and close up the dispensation of the gospel.

Having traced this subject thus far; having found what the atonement is; by whom and where it is made; and also for whom, we may turn back to "first principles" and again consider the law of God, and the position it occupies under the gospel. In the type, the testimony—the law—was put into the ark, in the most holy place; and it was over the law that the blood of the covenant was sprinkled by the high priest on the day of the atonement. The glory of God was above the cherubim; these were upon the mercy-seat, and this was upon the ark in which was the law.

* An objection to the above illustration will be noticed hereafter.

As God looked down upon his law, the very basis of his government, his justice was aroused, for his law was violated. But mercy interposed; the high priest entered with the blood that brings remission, that had been offered to vindicate the majesty of the law. The blood was sprinkled "upon the mercy seat and before the mercy seat." Again the Lord looks down upon his law, but between him and the law is the mercy was sprinkled with the blood of the victim; the law is honored; its penalty has been enforced; a substitute has been accepted: and the penitent sinner is pardoned. We notice that here was a real law, taking hold of the moral relations of God's creatures; that here was actual transgression, on the part of the creature a disregard of moral obligations. But under the Aaronic priesthood there was no actual taking away of that sin; it remained to be taken away by the blood of Christ. Therefore Christ officiates in behalf of that same law, as Paul shows in Heb. ix, 15; and therefore the ark of his testament in Heaven contains that same law, where Jesus offers his own blood. Our High Priest has declared that he delighted to do the will of God, yea, the law was in his heart: he magnified the law and made it honorable; he upheld it in his life; he honored it in his death by suffering its penalty to indicate its justice; he pleads his blood in Heaven in behalf of those who have broken it. You who claim that God's law is abolished—look to his heavenly temple where Jesus our great High Priest is, and behold it there safely lodged in the ark. You who say that the law is changed—behold the original in Heaven, of which a copy only was given to Israel. Did not God speak it with his own voice? Did he not write it with his own finger? Did he not give it as a rule of holiness, of life? Was it not perfect? Did it not contain the whole duty of man? Yes: and by it God will bring every work into judgment. Here is that justice and judgment which are the habitation of his throne. Ps. lxxix, 14. What evidence have you that the heavenly record of God's immutable will has been changed? You may mutilate the copy he has given you, you may strike out the name of the Holy One, and insert a term of reproach in its stead, but with him is neither variableness nor shadow of turning.*

THE SCAP-GOAT.

I have said, in remarking on Dr. Barnes' view of the death of Christ, that pardon is not absolute, but relative. By this I mean that God never will disregard the claims of his law and of justice; that in forgiving the sinner so that he may escape the penalty, it is by transferring the sin to another who bears it in his stead, and suffers for him. This is still further shown by the action of the priest on the day of atonement. His service did not end with cleansing the sanctuary, or in blotting out the sins of the people from the book of judgment. The sin still existed, though they were cleansed; and it was removed from the presence of God to another object.

Two goats were presented before the Lord, and lots were cast for them; one to be a sin offering, to be slain, the blood of which was sprinkled in the sanctuary; the other for a scape-goat, which was not slain, and concerning which the priest took no action till after the atonement was made. It has been supposed that this goat was also a type of Christ; a supposition for which I see no foundation in the Scriptures.

*God said "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God;" man say "The seventh day is the old Jewish Sabbath." Which do you think will best compare with that in the ark in the temple in Heaven? My which will God judge the world? It is a fearful thing to despise the word of Jehovah.

Some authors consider that, as the sin offering typified the crucified Saviour, so the scape-goat presented alive before the Lord typified the Lord as risen for the justification of his people. But this view is inadmissible from the order of the service. We notice that, 1. The goat was slain as a sin offering; this typified the death of Christ on Calvary. 2. The priest took the blood and went into the sanctuary for the people; this typified the risen Saviour going into "heaven itself, by his own blood, to appear in the presence of God for us." 3. After he had made an end of reconciling the holies, that is, after the atonement was fully made in the sanctuary, then the priest brought the live goat and laid both his hands upon the head of the goat, and confessed over him the sins of the children of Israel, putting them upon the head of the goat; this must certainly typify something in the future to be performed after the Sanctuary in Heaven is cleansed. But the sins placed on the scape-goat can be only of those who have "afflicted their souls," and are accepted of God, for those who are impenitent and continue to transgress the law of God bear their own sins—their sins are on their own heads. And when the sins of God's people have been transferred through the priest to the sanctuary of God, and from thence removed to the head of the scape-goat, the goat is then sent away to "a land not inhabited," and there "let go," or caused to remain. And by this it is clearly seen that the pardon of sin is relative; that the sin is removed from the penitent believer only by transfer, and the being to whom they are so removed is not pardoned, but sent away with the sins upon him.

There is something analogous to this in the New Testament, and it accords with the meaning of Lev. xvi, 8, as given by reputable authorities. "The Hebrew word for scape-goat as given in the margin of Lev. xvi, 8, is azazel. On this verse, Jenks in his Comprehensive Commentary remarks, "Scape-goat. See different opinions in Bochart. Spenser, after the oldest opinion of the Hebrews and Christians, thinks azazel is the name of the Devil; and so Rosenmüller, whom see. The Syriac has Asail, the angel (strong one) who revolted." The Devil is evidently here pointed out. Thus we have the definition of the Scripture term in two ancient languages, with the oldest opinion of the Christians in favor of the view that the scape-goat is a type of Satan.

"In the common conception of the word, the term scape-goat is applied to any miserable vagabond who has become obnoxious to the claims of justice; and while it is revolting to all our conceptions of the character and glory of Christ, to apply this term to him, it must strike every one as a very appropriate designation of the Devil, who is styled in the Scriptures, the accuser, adversary, angel of the bottomless pit, Beelzebub, Belial, dragon, enemy, evil spirit, father of lies, murderer, prince of devils, serpent, tempter, &c., &c."

In Rev. xx, there is something that bears a striking analogy to the action of the High Priest in regard to the scape-goat, and is, doubtless, a fulfillment of that type. This scripture, ushering in the first resurrection—the resurrection of the just, who are raised at the coming of Christ certainly refers to a period beyond human probation, and therefore after the sanctuary is cleansed. An angel is seen to come down from Heaven, and bind the dragon, which is the Devil, and cast him into the bottomless pit, where he is shut up a thousand years. By reference to the scripture use of this term abyss, (rendered bottomless pit), we find the very idea of Lev. xvi, 21, 22, carried out, for it is literally a desert waste, void, or land not inhabited. In every place where the term is used in such a manner as to determine a locality, it is connected with the earth, or a part of the earth. In Rev. ix, at the sounding of the fifth trumpet, the abyss was opened and locusts came out, &c. This describes the action of the Mahometan power. In chap. xi, the beast that ascends out of the abyss is said to make war against the two witnesses and to kill them. By careful expositors of prophecy this is referred to the French revolution. In chap. xvii, the seven-headed and ten-horned beast is said to ascend out of the abyss. Chap. xlii, 1-10, refers to the same beast in another phase of its existence, and these chapters clearly point out European powers. Thus far we find it confined to the earth. Paul in Rom. x, 7, uses this term in the same manner. "Who shall ascend into the deep? that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead." The abyss, here rendered deep, in other places rendered bottomless pit, refers to the grave, or at least to the state of death. In Gen. i, 2, "and darkness was upon the face of the deep," the abyss points out a void, waste, or uninhabitable state of the earth; and in no case, where it is possible to trace its connection, has it any other location but the earth.

Two facts only need noticing to show the perfect fulfillment of the types in the scripture under consideration. (1.) Satan is called the prince of the air. By his creation as an exalted angel he has the power of traversing the air as well as the earth. To deprive him of that power and confine him to the earth would fulfill Rev. xx. (2.) When Satan is bound, at the coming of Christ, the earth will be desolated and left without an inhabitant. As a very brief summary of the proof on this point, I offer the following facts and scriptures:

At the coming of Christ the saints will ascend to meet the Lord in the air, and be taken to those mansions which he has gone to prepare for them. 1 Thess. iv, 16, 17; John xlii, 83-86; xiv, 1-8.

The wicked will all be destroyed from the face of the earth at that time. 2 Thess. i, 6-8; Rev. xix, 11-21; compare, Heb. xii, 25, 26; Rev. xvi, 17; Joel, iii, 9-18, with Jer. xiv, 16-23. Note: Paul says the voice of the Lord will be heard but once from Heaven. John says this is just before Christ comes as a thief. Joel says it is in the day of the great battle, and the treading of the winepress of the wrath of God. See also Rev. xiv, 14-20. Jeremiah says all the nations shall drink of the wine cup of God's fury, and "all the wicked" be given to the sword. Now when the righteous are taken away from the earth, and all the wicked slain, the earth will be left empty, and without inhabitants. Therefore the following scriptures refer to that time. Jer. iv, 19-20: verse 23 says the earth was without form and void; in the same chaotic state in which it was when first created, before the Spirit of God, in formative power, moved up on the face of the deep—the abyss. Isa. xlii, 1, 17-21; Zeph. i, 2, 14-18. Thus the facts of scripture clearly show that the binding of the Devil and his confinement in the abyss, "a land not inhabited," exactly answers to the type of the scape-goat.

"But if Satan is the antitypical scape-goat, it may be objected that he shares with Christ the honor of making the atonement. Not at all. The atonement is all made, the servants of God are pardoned and their sins all removed from them, and from the sanctuary, before the Devil is brought to take any part in the transaction. And what is the part he then performs? Simply of receiving upon himself the infinite weight of sins which he has instigated, and being sent away under their intolerable load.

"And here we would ask, What could be more fitting than that the author and instigator of all sin should receive the guilt of those transgressions which he has incited mortals to commit, but of which they have repented, back upon his own head? And what could be a more striking antitype of the ancient ceremony of sending away the scape-goat into the wilderness, than the act of the mighty angel in binding Satan and casting him into the bottomless pit at the commencement of the thousand years?

"This is a point of transcendent interest to every believer. Then the sins of God's people will be borne away to be remembered no more forever. Then he who instigated them, will have received them back again. Then the serpent's head will have been bruised by the seed of the woman. Then the "strong man armed," (Satan,) will have been bound by a stronger than he, (Christ,) and the house of the strong man, (the grave,) spoiled of its goods, the saints. Matt. xli, 20; Heb. ii, 14. Then will the work of the enemy in sowing tares among the wheat, [Matt. xiii, 24-46.] be forever remedied, the tares will have been gathered into bundles to burn, and the wheat gathered into the garner. Then our great High Priest will have come forth from the sanctuary to pronounce the everlasting blessing upon his waiting people. Then shall we have come unto mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels. Then will the redeemed, placing the feet of triumph upon the world, the flesh, and the Devil, raise their glad voices in the song of Moses and the Lamb. Oh, glorious day! May the Lord hasten it in his good time. Who would not, in view of this, take up the petition of the beloved John. "Even so, come Lord Jesus!"

The Atonement.

BY ELD. J. H. WAGGONER.

(Continued.)

REDEMPTION.

Redemption is like salvation, used in more than one sense. We are said to be saved from sin, and to be redeemed from our vain conversation. Salvation is properly saving, or keeping from: and redemption bringing back from. The great salvation through Christ is from death—the second death. The great redemption is also from mortality and death—the first death. Hence Paul says we are gleaning for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body. This is accomplished in the resurrection. This restores to us what we lost in Adam. In consequence of sin he died, having conferred his own mortal, perishable nature on his posterity. The penalty of transgression was death. "Thou shalt surely die," were the words of the great Lawgiver. And thus it is still. "The wages of sin is death." The loss of life is the extreme of all loss; for when a man loses life he has no more to lose. And therefore the gift of life is the greatest of all gifts, as all others are dependent on this. Hence this is ever considered the great boon of the gospel; the gift of the second Adam. He has "brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." "That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord."

In the course of this argument I have considered the principle on which Christ brings life to the believer, and also the means by which it is effected, to wit, his own death. I have also noticed the unscriptural view in which the penalty of the law is made to consist of three-fold death—temporal, spiritual, and eternal. The penalty was death; the sentence pronounced upon Adam illustrates the meaning of the term. As man was made of the dust of the ground, so he was, for his sin, to return to the ground out of which he was taken; for, said the Lord, dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. This was the sentence; and thus we find the penalty of the law executed by the carrying out of this sentence upon the man who was made of the dust of the ground, and upon no other. We search the record carefully and we find no intimation of any man enlivened or conscious being, except that one formed of the dust, to whom life was imparted. We find no other man, or entity, or conscious being, engaged in the transgression, and surely no other was referred to in the sentence. Again this is illustrated by the death of Christ; he died upon the cross; he laid down his life; he poured out his soul unto death; his soul was made an offering for sin. And that identical Christ which died, was buried, was laid in the tomb, and was raised from the dead and left the tomb the third day. This makes the subject of death a plain one, easy to be understood by man to whom it is threatened. It needs no theological glosses—no scholastic mysticisms to present the truth to the common reader; indeed, by these glosses and mysticisms the truth has too long been obscured. So also we may say of eternal life; it is given at the resurrection when the man is brought from the grave. "When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." "The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." Then the last enemy of the people of God, death, will be destroyed. Thus, in life through Christ, we get the victory; and eternal life is the hope of the gospel. "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began." "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." And as death is swallowed up in victory in the resurrection of the just, so this is called "the resurrection of life."

Some of the prerogatives of this resurrection are pointed out by Paul in 1 Cor. xv, 42-57. "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: it is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body." "As we have borne the image of the earthy, so we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Then shall the saints triumph over death and the grave. Then shall they shout, "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." And then "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away." There is blessedness, there is joy, there is glory, far beyond our conception; as it is written, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him."

"No more fatigue, no more distress,
No sin nor death can reach that place;
To tears shall mingle with the songs,
That warble from immortal tongues."

Reader, is there not infinite value in the atonement? Is not the blood of Christ precious? Does not the eternal inheritance, the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, present attractions to your heart beyond all else of which your heart has conceived? Does not eternal life in the kingdom of God appear a boon most precious? Then join with all the saints in blessing God for the rich provision through his Son, and for the Word, the Holy Book, wherein alone such matchless grace, and such endless joys are revealed. Without the revelation of God's will, how uncertain, how dark would all appear? Without this, who should teach us the knowledge of God? who should acquaint us with the principles of morality and truth, by which we may honor and please our Creator? who should lead the fallen, erring one to a remedy for sin, wherein justice and mercy should harmonize? Only eternity Jesus reveal, and only immortalized beings will realize, how great is our indebtedness to God for his word. Happy the man who can say,

"Holy Bible, book divine, Precious treasure, thou art mine."

But to them who despise the riches of his grace, and scorn his counsel and will none of his reproof, there is another revelation in the word of God. He has not only sent redemption to his people, but prepared for his enemies a doom commensurate with their crime. Briefly then I notice the subject of

RESURRECTION.

Having shown that obedience to the law, and acceptance of the gospel, are necessary to salvation; that salvation on any other terms would be derogatory to the character and government of God, it follows necessarily that those who reject these terms cannot be saved. The penalty of their sins hangs over them, soon to descend upon their guilty heads; for in strict justice God reserves the wicked to the day of judgment to be punished. 2 Pet. ii, 9. And as eternal life is the gift of God, so they who do not seek it through the Son, must of necessity receive the wages of their sin, which is death. "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him."

There are however, two resurrections in the Bible; for what the impatient lose involuntarily by the sin of Adam, will be restored to them without regard to their will and action. Besides the resurrection of life, already noticed, is "the resurrection of damnation." They who have part in the first resurrection are blessed and holy; on them the second death shall not have power. They are raised in power, in glory, in incorruption, while they that sow to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." Gal. vi, 8. They will be subject to the second death. Once they die on account of Adam's sin; from this state they are raised by Christ. But the second time they die on account of their own sin; and from this death there is no redemption. No hope is held out for those who fall under its power. No resurrection morning dawns upon the darkness and gloom of the second death.

In examining the type of the scape-goat, we found the Devil confined in the abyss for one thousand years. At the end of that period, all the inhabitants of the grave are called forth, the wicked of all ages stand up in life, and the great enemy of God and man is once more among the victims of his deceptions. He has borne the heavy burden of many sins placed upon his head, but his punishment yet awaits him. The judgment has been sitting, and its decisions remain to be executed. But with the certainty of destruction before him, his malignity is not abated. His hatred to the ever-glorious Son of God and to the saints, who, through the blood of their Master have overcome his deceptions and his power, leads him to instigate the risen nations to raise their arms once more against their Maker. Vain effort! Those who now think they can oppose his power with success, find then how fatally they have been mistaken. "And fire came down from God out of heaven and devoured them." As once this earth was overflowed with water, then it will be overspread with fire. This is that "day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men," to which this sin-cursed earth is "kept in store." This is that terrible day "that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." High ascends "the smoke of their torment" who have often mocked at the judgments of God; for "the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs, they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away." Ps. cxxvii, 20. And as it is written that the Lord "smote Egypt in their first-born and overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea: for his mercy endureth forever;" Ps. cxxxvi, 10, 16, so in the terrors of that great, that burning day, we behold the power of Jesus' blood; for he suffered "that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Devil." Heb. ii, 14. And with him all his works are destroyed. 1 Jno. iii, 8. Thus ends the world's great controversy.

CONCLUSION.

The Bible is eminently a practical book: its object is to make the man of God perfect, and so thoroughly furnish him unto all good works. When "everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power" is visited upon the wicked: when the righteous are introduced "to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled and that fadeth not away," the record of the great future is briefly given. No elaborate description of that eternity of joy is offered; for words cannot describe all its glories; nor could our minds, always having associated with lesser things, appreciate the description. But we are permitted by faith in the sacred revelation, to look beyond the scene of terror, which we have been considering. The fury of the crackling flames exhausts itself; where the seething fires burned deep and fierce they languish for want of prey. As the smoke rolls up from the earth, there is revealed to view a scene both grand and lovely; its surpassing beauty words cannot express; but above it all a voice is heard, "Behold I make all things new!" And now awakes the universal chorus: "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." The universe again is free from sin. Redemption's work is done. Beyond lies the vast ocean of eternity, all radiant with glory.

Here the mind gladly rests in contemplation of the heavenly scene. And now, while yet the seer, who has never had a thought of the eternal and infinite justice of God, declares that the atonement is unnecessary, what fitting words of wisdom shall I choose to persuade him of its truth, and check his irreverent railing? How weak the effort a mortal puts forth to frame an argument worthy of the theme. From that dying agony; from that precious flowing blood; from that interceding grace; from that bright resurrection morn; from the earth made new; from that far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, I turn and look at my own heart; and looking there, O man, your scoffing is vain. That glory I long to possess; that blood, that grace, that love I need to fit me for the presence of my God. And shall I, a worthless worm of earth, dulled by sin, behold that glory and enjoy it forever? Then truly God is love. Nothing but love divine can perfect a work so great. And to him alone, the God of grace, I look for "victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Reader, may you and I find it there.

The Sanctuary.

The sanctuary was the center of the typical system. It was the place where God's name was recorded, and his glory dwelt. It was the place where Israel should meet with God and inquire at his oracle, and toward which they should look when they prayed, even if they were in a foreign land, led captive by their enemies.

Since the typical system was abolished, at the death of the great and only true sacrifice for sin, the apostle Paul has clearly taught us, in his letter to the Hebrews, that the true tabernacle and priesthood are in heaven. "We have such an high priest," "who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Thus our minds are transferred from the earthly to the heavenly—from the typical to the true.

How strange it is that Christians should lose sight of the true sanctuary, the place to which all their worship should be directed, as they have at the present day! But that power has been manifested, spoken of in Rev. xiii, who "opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven;" and, as a consequence, men are looking on earth for the sanctuary, either to Rome or to Jerusalem, or some other place, where they have no warrant from scripture to look for it.

But since knowledge has increased in these last days, in fulfillment of the prophecy of Dan. xii, 4, light has broken upon this subject, as well as many others, and we find, not only that the sanctuary in heaven is the grand center of the Christian system, as the earthly was of the typical, but that this subject is the center and citadel of present truth. And since our temple is in heaven, and in that temple, "the ark of his testament," containing "the commandments of God," and in the very midst of these commandments, the Sabbath of the Lord, fenced around by nine moral precepts, that cannot be overthrown, it is no wonder that the enemies of the Sabbath should, not only strive to abolish the ten commandments, but to demolish the true sanctuary in which they are deposited beneath the mercy-seat—the throne of God in heaven.

It is no wonder that Eld. R. V. Lyon should despair of overthrowing the Sabbath, unless he could overthrow this tower of our strength—the sanctuary. If the sanctuary cannot be demolished, the Sabbath cannot be reached. Hence the necessity of the effort. And nothing but the most absolute and desperate necessity could induce a man of sense and of a sound mind to proclaim a theory so utterly and admirably weak, in the face of the fullness of the beaming light that now shines upon the subject.

It is truly lamentable that men professing loyalty to the King of heaven, should fight against his holy law. But, if they will do it, let them direct their efforts against the true sanctuary, and strive to pluck down the pillars of God's throne; for the law is safely housed in heaven. "The temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. xi. 19.

Oh, for a perfect conformity to that law! that law which is perfect, converting the soul.

R. F. CORTRELL.

Sanctuary and Synagogues.

When sweeping the Wesleyan chapel in Okech, after our last monthly meeting, I was thinking of the idea that seems to be in the minds of the people, when we speak of the cleansing of the Sanctuary, as the work of our High Priest in Heaven. The first thought, almost invariably, is, There is nothing in Heaven that needs cleansing. In modern, popular pulpit language, a sanctuary is a meeting-house; and hence, being altogether unacquainted in respect to the important and deeply interesting subject of the Sanctuary of the Christian dispensation, the scriptural idea of cleansing the Sanctuary suggests nothing to their minds but washing and scrubbing, sweeping and dusting.

All ought to know that there was but one Sanctuary in the Jewish age, and that the Christian has one, and only one, answering to the former as the antitype to the type. The tabernacle, and afterward the temple, —the place where God recorded his name, and where he dwelt among men by his visible glory—was the Sanctuary of that age; and whoever will read Heb. viii and ix with care, will find that that was a type or shadow of the Sanctuary of this dispensation, and that the latter is in Heaven, where our merciful High Priest, Jesus Christ, now intercedes for those who come to God through him.

Everything connected with the intercessions of Christ in behalf of his people should be of deep and thrilling interest to Christians. Yet the mass of Christians of the present day have no interest in the subject of the Christian Sanctuary; because they are wholly ignorant of its existence. How can this ignorance be accounted for? Perhaps no better answer can be given than this: The beast of Rev. xiii, opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme "his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in Heaven." The name of God has been applied to the pope; the Tabernacle or Sanctuary of God, the only place from which pardon can come, has been supplanted by sanctuaries on earth, where the pope, the bishops and the priests, professedly absolve from sin; and the dead/saints have been considered ministering spirits to the living, instead of the angels, who "dwell in Heaven," and do always behold the face of the Father. And so it has come to this, that the heavenly Sanctuary has been lost sight of, and every meeting-house is called a sanctuary.

I have said that there was but one sanctuary for God's people of the former dispensation; but there were many synagogues, which were places of religious instruction and exhortation. Our places of worship may be considered as answering to these. In the German Bible, for synagogue we have schule, which in English is school. These were built by the people, as conveniences might dictate, and sometimes by wealthy individuals. Of a friendly Gentile, it was said, "He loveth our nation, and hath built us a synagogue." Luke vii, 5. There was a vast difference between the Sanctuary and the synagogues; yet these doubtless were esteemed sacred to divine service. In Ps. lxxiv, they are called "synagogues of God." Verses 7, 8. They have cast fire into thy sanctuary, they have defiled by sitting down the dwelling place of thy name to the ground. They said in their hearts, Let us destroy them together; they have burned all the synagogues of God in the land."

From the fact that the synagogue was esteemed the Lord's, I infer that it is perfectly right to build houses for public worship and religious instruction, and dedicate them to the service of God; and consider them too sacred for festivals, parties of pleasure, and places of amusement. But let us never forget the difference between the synagogue and the Sanctuary. And while we worship in the place which we have chosen, let our worship be directed to the place that God has chosen as his dwelling place, to the Sanctuary where Jesus our High Priest pleads before his Father's throne.

Some have attempted to justify the practice of highly ornamenting church buildings, by referring to the temple of Solomon, beautified and adorned by God's direction. Such do not seem to know that the temple was the "pattern of the things in the Heavens," (Heb. ix, 23, and was intended to give a faint representation of the "glorious Sanctuary" in Heaven, which is called, "The beauty of holiness." Ps. xvi, 6, "Strength and beauty are in his Sanctuary." Verse 9. "O, worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness." Marginal reading, "O, worship the Lord in the glorious Sanctuary." See also Ps. xxix, 2. If you wish to build something to represent God's dwelling place—"the temple of God in Heaven"—make it beautiful, splendid, glorious, as possible; but do not undertake it without special direction from Heaven, lest you aid in the work of blaspheming his tabernacle.

The cleansing of the Sanctuary is the work of a priest, in blotting out the sins of the people. It was performed in figure once a year under the law. It is done once for all, by our great High Priest in Heaven. The solemn moments for the performance of this work are now passing; and when it is finished, be that is filthy must remain filthy still. Oh, that all were interested in the subject of the Sanctuary!

But though the cleansing of a synagogue is not the cleansing of the Sanctuary, the place where God's people meet to worship him, should be an orderly, a neat and cleanly place. And, to the honor of the usual occupants of the house first above mentioned, and those who attended our monthly meeting, I found no pomace of tobacco, or pools of the juice in any part of the house; a thing, which though common in some places, never ought to be once named as becoming the saints of God.

R. F. CORRELL.

Thoughts on the Day of Atonement.

BY ELD. J. M. LOUGHBOROUGH.

It is supposed by some, that when we come up to the great day of atonement, and Christ, our high priest, enters upon the work of blotting out sins, there can be no longer mercy for the unconverted. This conclusion is drawn from the supposition, that in the typical day of atonement there was no other work accomplished on that day, only the work of blotting out sins. If the work of that day was only to blot out sins, it is said, of course no sins could be blotted out but those which had been conveyed into the sanctuary in the blood of the offerings of the daily ministration. But facts are against the above position, for there were other offerings for sin upon that day besides those made to cleanse the sanctuary. An enumeration of the different offerings made on the day of atonement, is given in Num. xxix. We there read, verse 11, "One kid of the goats for a sin offering, besides the sin offering of atonement." This shows that at least one offering was made for other sins upon that day besides those previously borne into the sanctuary.

It is further claimed, by those who argue for the position of no mercy for sinners in the blotting-out time, that the high priest on that day, wore the breastplate of judgment, and that upon it were only the names of those who had, previous to that day confessed their sins. But it appears from the record, that this breastplate of judgment was worn only by the high priest, and was worn by him every day in the year. We read in Ex. xxviii, 28-30, "And they shall bind the breastplate by the rings thereof unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue, that it may be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breastplate be not loosed from the ephod. And Aaron shall bear the names of the children of Israel in the breastplate of judgment upon his heart, when he goeth in unto the holy place, for a memorial before the Lord continually. And thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urim and the Thummim, and they shall be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the Lord, and Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually." It seems that Aaron was the first high priest, and what was done by Aaron, was the work afterward to be done by the high priests. Aaron was to go into the most holy place. "Speak unto Aaron thy brother, that he come not at all times into the holy place within the veil before the mercy seat, which is upon the ark, that he die not. For I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy seat. Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place," &c. Lev. xvi, 2, 8. By looking at Paul's testimony, we learn that none went into this second apartment, but the high priest: "But into the second went the high priest alone once every year." Heb. ix, 7. This is proof then that Aaron's work was that of an high priest. So, what is said in the arrangement of the service of the sanctuary, should be done by Aaron, is that afterward to be done by the high priests, while that done by Aaron's sons is the work of the other priests. In Ex. xxviii, 29, we learned that Aaron was to wear the breastplate of judgment continually. This was a portion of the holy garment of the high priest, and must ever be worn by him while engaged in his service. Looking at the service to be performed by Aaron and his sons, we learn that the high priest had to do with the offerings of every day, and must have superintended the daily service in the holy place, and before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, as well as to go in once a year into the most holy. By looking at Lev. xi, 18-19, in the case of the failure to eat the goat of the sin-offering, answer is made by Aaron, which shows that the service of the day was under his superintendence.

By reading Lev. ix, 8-18, it will be readily seen that Aaron had a part to act in the daily offerings: "Aaron therefore went unto the altar, and slew the calf of the sin-offering, which was for himself. And the sons of Aaron brought the blood unto him, and he dipped his finger in the blood, and put it upon the horns of the altar, and poured out the blood at the bottom of the altar. But the fat, and the kidneys, and the caul above the liver, of the sin-offering, he burnt upon the altar, as the Lord commanded Moses. And the flesh and the hide he burnt with fire without the camp. And he slew the burnt offering, and Aaron's sons presented unto him the blood, which he sprinkled round about upon the altar. And they presented the burnt offering unto him, with the pieces thereof, and the head, and he burnt them upon the altar. And he did wash the inwards and the legs, and burnt them upon the burnt offering on the altar. And he brought the people's offering, and took the goat, which was the sin-offering for the people, and slew it, and offered it for sin as the first. And he brought the burnt offering, and offered it according to the manner (ordinance, margin). And he brought the meat offering and took an handful thereof, and burnt it upon the altar, beside the burnt sacrifice of the morning. He slew also the bullock and the ram for a sacrifice of peace offerings, which was for the people; and Aaron's sons presented unto him the blood which he sprinkled upon the altar round about." &c. This testimony shows that Aaron as high priest, had a part to act in offering the burnt offering, &c.

If we are correct in the positions above, that the breastplate of judgment was worn by the high priest daily as a portion of his priestly attire, no special argument could be based on the fact that he wore it on the day of atonement. It had no more names on it on the day of atonement than it had during the other days of the year. Speaking of this breastplate and its twelve precious stones, the Lord says to Moses: "And the stones shall be with the names of the children of Israel, twelve, according to their names, like the engravings of a signet, every one with his name shall they be according to the twelve tribes." Ex. xxviii, 21. It was worn as a representation or memorial of Israel "continually," and it represented no more on the day of atonement than on other days.

But, it is claimed by those who contend for no mercy for sinners in the day of atonement, that, there could be no offerings made upon that day only those made by the high priest, because it says, Lev. xvi, 17: "And there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation, when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place." It does not follow from this, that there was no man before the door, by the altar of burnt sacrifices, nor that offerings were not being made upon that altar for the sins of the people. But we think we shall be able to show that sacrifices were burning there while the high priest was in the second apartment of the sanctuary.

We, as Seventh-day Adventists, believe that since the great Advent proclamation in 1848 and '4, and the close of the 2800 days, we have been in the period called in Dan. viii, 14 the cleansing of the sanctuary, but we do not believe that the time has yet come when he that is filthy is to "be filthy still." To understand the nature of events in this great antitypical day of atonement, it is necessary for us to look at the order of events in the type. Paul says: "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the Heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the truth; but into Heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." Heb. ix, 23, 24. How was the work accomplished in the cleansing of the pattern? Or what was the order of events on the tenth day of the seventh month, the great day of atonement?

Let it be borne in mind that the day of atonement extended over a space of twenty-four hours. "It shall be unto you a Sabbath of rest, and ye shall afflict your souls; in the ninth day of the month at even, from even unto even, shall ye celebrate your Sabbath." Lev. xxi, 82. From this, we learn that the services of that day were to commence with the setting of the sun on the ninth day of that month. By looking at Num. xix, 7-11, we learn that there were many offerings made on the day of atonement, besides the blood of the goat offered for the blotting out of sins: "And ye shall have on the tenth day of this seventh month, an holy convocation, and ye shall afflict your souls; ye shall not do any work therein. But ye shall offer a burnt-offering unto the Lord for a sweet savor; one young bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year; they shall be unto you without blemish. And their meat-offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals to a bullock, and two tenth deals to one ram, a several tenth deal for one lamb, throughout the seven lambs. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering, besides the sin-offering of atonement, and the continual burnt offering, and the meat offering of it, and their drink offerings."

It is very evident from the above scriptures, that there were many offerings on the day of atonement besides the offering of the blood of the kid to cleanse the sanctuary. The "continual burnt offering" of other days was also continued upon this day. This continual burnt offering required them to offer a lamb in the evening at the commencement of the day of atonement, and another in the morning of the day. The order of this continual burnt offering is stated as follows: "Now this is that which thou shalt offer upon the altar; two lambs of the first year, day by day continually. The one lamb thou shalt offer at even, and with the one lamb a tenth-deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oil; and the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink-offering. And the other lamb thou shalt offer at even, and shalt do thereto according to the meat offering of the morning, and according to the drink offering thereof, for a sweet savor, an offering made by fire unto the Lord. This shall be a continual burnt offering throughout your generations at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord." Ex. xxix, 38-42. By looking at Lev. vi, 12, 13, it will be seen that the law of the continual burnt offering required the fire to be kept constantly burning. "And the fire upon the altar shall be burning in it, it shall not be put out. And the priest shall burn wood on it every morning, and lay the burnt offering in order upon it; and he shall burn thereon the fat of the peace offerings. The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out." We should understand from this, that a lamb was offered in the evening of the day that burned all night, and another was offered in the morning that burned during the entire day, and this was called a continual burnt offering. This offering was continued on the day of atonement. Besides these two lambs, seven other lambs were offered during the day of atonement. At just what time they were offered we are not informed, but the probabilities are that they were offered at different intervals during the whole day.

A bullock and two rams were offered for a burnt offering. Lev. xvi, 8, 9; Num. xxix, 7-11. One of these rams was burning while the high priest went into the most holy with the blood of the bullock to make an atonement for himself and his house, before he went in with the blood of the kid to make an atonement for the people. "Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place; with a young bullock for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt offering. And Aaron shall bring the bullock of the sin-offering, which is for himself, and shall make atonement for himself, and for his house, and shall kill the bullock of the sin-offering which is for himself, and he shall take a censer, full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small, and bring it within the veil, and he shall put the incense upon the fire before the Lord, that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy seat that is upon the testimony, that he die not. And he shall take of the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it with his finger upon the mercy seat eastward, and before the mercy seat shall he sprinkle of the blood with his fingers seven times." Lev. xvi, 11-14.

The high priest went into the most holy a second time with the blood of the goat which was offered for the sins of the people. This does not prove that Christ in fulfilling this work, must go into the most holy on high twice. There is no necessity, as in the case of the high priests, for Christ to make atonement for his own sins, for he "knew no sin." The language of the apostle, Heb. x, 1, should be borne in mind in applying these types: "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect." The law shadows forth the blotting out of the people's sins, but in the priest's offerings they must offer for their own sins. In this particular it was not the very image. Christ makes no offering for himself, but fills all that part of this shadow that had reference to the people's sins.

The claim is made by some, that although sacrifices were offered upon the day of atonement, they were all offered before the high priest went in with the blood of the goat, so they still contend for no mercy while the blotting out of sins is going on. But from the texts already presented it will be seen that facts are against them. The lamb of the continual burnt-offering was to burn all day, and so would be burning during the time of the offering of the blood of the goat. The ram was also burning at the same time. Offerings were also made after the high priest came out from offering the blood of the goat. "And Aaron shall come into the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall put off the linen garments, which he put on when he went into the holy place, and shall leave them there; and he shall wash his flesh with water in the holy place, and put on his garments, and come forth, and offer his burnt-offering, and the burnt-offering of the people, and make an atonement for himself, and for the people." Lev. xvi, 28, 24. We would not understand from the fact that an offering was made after the work of blotting out sins in the type, that there is to be mercy after Christ has completed the work of blotting out sins, but this shows in the clearest manner that the entire day of atonement in the type was a day in which pardon for sins might be found. We suppose when Christ has completed his work of blotting out sins we shall come to the solemn decree, "He which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Rev. xxii, 11.

That there was still mercy for sinners during the entire day of atonement, we think is further evident from the fact that in the work of that day, not only were other offerings made for sin besides the sin-offering of atonement, but the services performed required the lower priests to officiate as well as the high priest. In the regulations made concerning sin-offerings, burnt-offerings, meat-offerings, &c., Aaron's sons—or the lower priests—were required to officiate. These offerings were made on the day of atonement, and, as we have before shown, even more of these offerings were made on that day than upon ordinary days. It follows then that these priests had more labor to accomplish on that day than upon ordinary days, unless it can be shown that some exception is made whereby they were exempt from acting their part in those services upon that day. No such exception is to be found, hence we conclude they did their part in those offerings. If it be objected that they sprinkled no blood upon that day, we reply, that they performed a similar service to that they accomplished on other days in order that the blood sprinkled might avail in behalf of the penitent ones. We suppose that their attending these offerings on that day placed those for whom these offerings were made, in a position where the blood of the goat sprinkled by the high priest to blot out sins would also avail to cancel their transgressions. The scriptures, Lev. ix, 8-18, that set forth the part which Aaron's sons acted in these different offerings, we have already quoted, and will not repeat them here.

All the blood offered in the type, we understand typified the blood of Christ. There was other blood offered on the day of atonement besides that offered to cleanse the sanctuary. The blood of the sacrifices was sprinkled about the altar. Lev. ix, 8-18. That blood, we understand, shadows forth the blood of Christ which is sprinkled to cleanse our hearts, while the sacrifices themselves represent the work which is accomplished by us in endeavoring to place ourselves in such a position that the blood of Christ will avail for us. Says Peter, "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." 1 Pet. ii, 5. What these sacrifices are that place us in such a position that we may be accepted through the blood of Christ, Paul will tell us: "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." Rom. xii, 1, 2. In writing to the Philippians concerning their supplying his temporal wants, he calls it "an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God." Phil. iv, 18. In writing to the Hebrews he says: "For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore, Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate. Let us go forth, therefore, unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach. For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. By him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name. But to do good, and to communicate, forget not, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased." Heb. xiii, 11-18. These sacrifices, then, made on the day of atonement, meet their antitype in that consecration to God, and devotion to his cause, which must now be manifest on the part of those seeking an interest in the atonement of Christ our High Priest.

Again, that the atonement availed for those who would seek an interest in it upon that day, is evident from the fact that conditions of mercy are expressed, while the atonement itself is made for the entire congregation. "For whatever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people." Lev. xxiii, 29. Then it was the duty of all who would be benefited by the work of the high priest, to afflict their souls. But of the atonement, it is said: "And he shall make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, and he shall make an atonement for the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar, and he shall make an atonement for the priest, and for all the people of the congregation." Lev. xvi, 33. An atonement, then, was made for the entire congregation which availed in the case of every individual who afflicted his soul. From this we understand, when this work is fulfilled by Christ, his atoning blood avails for all those who afflict their souls. Those who make the sacrifice God requires, and earnestly seek an interest in that blood, will find salvation.

Some contend that the high priest only made atonement on the great day of atonement for those sins that had previous to that day been carried into the sanctuary; but, if we read concerning the closing up of that cleansing work, we shall find him out by the altar of sacrifice cleansing that: "And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat." Lev. xvi, 20. "And he shall make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, and he shall make an atonement for the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar, and he shall make an atonement for the priests, and for all the people of the congregation." Verse 33. From these scriptures, we learn that an atonement is made for the altar on that day. That altar of sacrifice, as already shown, typifies the work to be accomplished by the people. We understand the cleansing of that altar is virtually a recognition of the offerings for sins that have been made upon it. The people's offering for sins besides the sin offering of atonement have been made upon it on that day, and now a work is accomplished to blot out those as well as other sins confessed and conveyed to it by the blood of sprinkling. Lev. ix, 8-18. While the work of the priest in the sanctuary upon that day had, as its greatest object, the blotting out of past sins, the cleansing of the altar must take away the sins placed upon it during that day.

As before stated, we understand we are already in the time when Christ has entered upon the work of cleansing the sanctuary, or blotting out of sins. Paul says: "And for this cause, he is the mediator of the new testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance," Heb. ix, 15. As Christ is accomplishing a work to blot out the sins of those, who, in past ages, confessed them through faith in a Saviour to come; now, in the antitype of the national atonement, must be the time for this work to be accomplished. This work, then, has commenced with the faithful dead, whose cases one after another are brought in review for examination. Christ's blood blots out their sins, and thus they are judged. At the same time, as in the type, confessions are being made, and the requisite sacrifices on the part of the living being offered, and when the work of Christ as high priest is drawn to a close, these sins will be blotted out, and the cases of the living decided. And when Christ comes, at the blast of the last trumpet, the righteous, both dead and living, will be changed in the twinkling of an eye, and go up to meet their Lord.

We have increasing evidence that we are rapidly approaching the time when Christ will cease to mediate for men, and come out to bless his people. Let us, then, be active and thorough in the work of making confession of all our wrongs, and render to God those sacrifices which are meet, that the atoning blood of Christ may avail for us, our sins all be blotted out, and we with joy go up to meet our coming King.

Asazel or Satan.

The evidence is accumulating to confirm the view that the Scape Goat, (called in the margin, Azazel), which was sent away with the sins of the people at the close of the day of atonement, was a type of the Devil. And as we are now in the antitypical day of atonement, and near its close, the question is one of vital interest to the people of God, at the present time. The following testimony on this subject, I find in a work by Charles Beecher, entitled "Redeemer and Redeemed," pp. 461-462. This same Mr. Beecher is the author of the best thoughts on Satanism and Creeds, we have seen. He is one of the most independent thinkers and writers of the age, and having both the means and ability for collecting evidence on such a subject, his thoughts will be appreciated by our people.

M. E. CORNELL.

"Placing these goats before him, the High Priest put both hands into an urn containing two golden lots, and drew them out, one in each hand. On the one was engraved LA-YEHOVAH (for Jehovah), on the other, LA-AZAZEL (for Azazel.) * * * The same preposition is used on both lots, La-Yehovah, and La-Azazel, and if the one indicates a person, it seems natural the other should. Especially, considering the act of casting lots. If one is for Jehovah, the other would seem for some other person or being; not one for Jehovah, and the other for the goat itself.

"What goes to confirm this is, that the most ancient paraphrases and translations, treat Azazel as a proper name. The Chaldee paraphrase, and the targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, would certainly have translated it if it was not a proper name, but they do not. The Septuagint, or oldest Greek version, renders it by ἀνομιμαίος (anomiaios), a word applied by the Greeks to a malignant deity, sometimes appeased by sacrifices. Another confirmation is found in the book of Enoch where the name Azazel, evidently a corruption of Azazel, is given to one of the fallen angels, thus plainly showing what was the prevalent understanding of the Jews at that day.

"Still another evidence is found in the Arabic, where Azazel is employed as the name of the Evil Spirit. In addition to these, we have the evidence of the Jewish work Zohar, and of the Cabalistic and Rabbinical writers. They tell us that the following proverb was current among the Jews: 'On the day of atonement, a gift to Sammael.' Hence, Moses Cornhillensis feels called to say that it is not a sacrifice, but only done because commanded by God.

"Another step in the evidence is, when we find this same opinion passing from the Jewish to the early Christian church. Origen was the most learned of the Fathers, and on such a point as this, the meaning of a Hebrew word, his testimony is reliable. Says Origen: 'He who is called in the Septuagint ἀνομιμαίος, and in the Hebrew Azazel, is no other than the Devil.

"Lastly, a circumstance is mentioned of the Emperor Julian, the apostate, that confirms the argument. He brought, as an objection against the Bible, that Moses commanded a sacrifice to the evil spirit. An objection he never could have thought of, had not Azazel been generally regarded as a proper name.

"In view, then, of the difficulties attending any other meaning, and the accumulated evidence in favor of this, Hengstenberg affirms with great confidence, that Azazel cannot be anything else but another name for Satan.

"If it should be objected that God would not sanction a sacrifice to Satan, even in appearance, and that therefore this view cannot be true, we reply, that it is not necessary to regard the goat as a sacrifice to Azazel; and there is not even an appearance of it, but a studied prohibition.

"A sacrifice, as has been well shown by the English author Outram, implies the taking of life. His words are: 'Offerings which were put to death, divided, consumed, were sacrifices in the vocabulary of the Jews. . . . This would exclude certain things sometimes called sacrifices; for example, the bird used in cleansing the leper, the scape-goat, &c.'

"Hence, not only was there no sacrifice, but there was a studied negation of the idea. It is known that the Egyptians offered such sacrifices to the evil one, under the name Typhon; and that the practice was almost universal. Now, by sacrificing the first goat to Jehovah, and letting the second go alive, and both by casting lots, i. e., by an appeal to God, there was a direct contradiction of the heathen practice. It said, virtually, this sacrifice is to God alone, and not at all to Satan. There is a relation to Satan, but not a sacrificial one. Hence, in the next chapter, it says, 'And they shall no more offer their sacrifices unto demons.'

"To this rite, then, we may attribute the disappearance of all sacrifices to evil deities, no such forever after in Israel. They, indeed, worshiped idols, but always under the theory of their representing the good, not the evil power. * * * * *

"Do any object at finding the idea of Satan so prominent in the focal center of all sacrificial analysis?

"Why should it not be prominent, if to destroy him was the very object of Christ's death? He was God's chosen champion; ordained to avenge the cause of God, on man's behalf, against the enemy of God and the seducer of man. . . . Would it not be strange, if in all the symbols of the sacrificial system, there were not a single intimation of the serpent's existence and where should we expect to see his baleful shadow, if not here, on the great day of atonement."

RH Dec 18, 1866

The 2300 Days.

In Review, Vol. xviii, No. 25, is an allusion to the "Septuagint Translation and the 2300 days." The objectors to this numeral can only allege in defense of 2400 and 2200, the reading of a few manuscripts found by Wolf the missionary among the Jews of Ispahan and Bokhara, reading 2400 (without doubt copyists errors), and the reputed reading of the Vatican manuscript which in reality reads 2800, but by a typographical error in the Vatican edition, taken from the manuscript is made to read 2400. This the Christian edition of Daniel proves, and the most competent judges assert that there is not a manuscript extant in Hebrew or Greek which sanctions the reading of 2400 or 2200.

Geo. C. COCHRAN.

Chicago, Ill.

THE TIME MESSAGE.

BY ELD. E. F. COTTELL.

"And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth lifted up his hand to heaven, and swore by him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven, and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer; but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God shall be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." Rev. x, 5-7.

The prophecy contained in the tenth chapter of Revelation is evidently of great importance to the inhabitants of the earth; and its fulfillment was doubtless intended greatly to benefit those who should live in the time of its accomplishment. If this is correct, it must be understood by believers in the word of God.

The mighty and glorious angel of this chapter is not to be taken in a literal sense; but it is doubtless a symbol of a proclamation of truth, to be made to the inhabitants of the earth; and as this representation seems to make a break in the account of the sounding of the seven trumpets, being thrown in between the sixth and the seventh, if we can ascertain the time of the close of the sixth trumpet, we can point to the very time when this proclamation, that time shall be no longer, will meet its fulfillment.

In the declaration that there should be time no longer, what time is meant? It is not the end of earthly or probationary time, as some have thought, which the angel affirms with the solemnity of an oath is come to an end; for the seventh angel has not yet begun to sound, when this declaration is made, but is about to sound; and the mystery of God—the gospel, which is "God in Christ reconciling the world to himself"—has not yet accomplished its work of reconciling and saving men, but is to be finished "IN THE DAYS OF THE VOICE OF THE SEVENTH ANGEL, WHEN HE SHALL BEGIN TO SOUND." This proves that time as distinguished from eternity does not end here, but that days continue, under the sounding of the seventh angel, and days, too, in which the work of the gospel is being completed. We therefore conclude, with many commentators that have spoken on this point, that the angel testifies to the end of some particular period of time appointed before of God, which was to close before the end of probationary time. But it clearly indicates that the work of human salvation is about to close. A careful study of the prophetic periods, with the appointed events to transpire at their terminations, will convince any one that the great period of 2300 days is the one, the ending of which is the subject of this solemn and thrilling announcement.

It would seem that the solemn announcement of the angel, concerning the time, is made on the strength or by the authority of something contained in the little book that is open in his hand. And the express statement that the book is open naturally suggests to the reflective mind that before the time of this sudden announcement the book had been closed, so that the opening of the book brought to light the important fact that the time had come for this announcement to be made. What book is intended?

The definite periods of prophetic time relating to the last days, and written before the book of Revelation, are found in the book of Daniel's prophecy. And this book of prophetic times was to be sealed up and not opened till the time of the end. Said the communicating angel to Daniel, "But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end: many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." Dan. xii, 4. "And he said, Go thy way, Daniel, for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end. Many shall be purified, and made white and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly: and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand." Verses 9, 10.

The end here spoken of is what is called in the New Testament "the end of the world." It is the close of probationary time. The time of the end is a short period beginning a little before, and reaching to, the end. The book was to be sealed till this time should commence. Then it is a fair inference that in that little period, called "the time of the end," the sealed book should be unsealed and opened. And to confirm this inference and remove all doubt, it is immediately added, "Knowledge shall be increased;" and "The wise shall understand." This knowledge and understanding is evidently concerning that which was to be bidden in the sealed book until the time of the end, and then unsealed or brought to light. And this is the prophecy that contains, as we said, the definite periods which were before appointed, and which only could serve as the basis of the proclamation of the angel from the open book.

This angel has a message of time, the fulfillment of a period which will bring us to the sounding of the seventh and last trumpet, and the closing work of the mystery of God, the gospel. The idea is, that the specified time has expired, and there shall be no longer delay; the seventh angel is about to sound, and the closing work of the gospel dispensation will immediately follow, and that work will be completed in a few days or years, when he shall begin to sound.

We inquire now, Are the prophetic periods unsealed and understood? or, have we reached the period called the time of the end? If we answer one of these questions affirmatively, the other must be answered so for if we have reached the time of the end, the seal is no longer upon the prophetic periods; and if these are unsealed so as to be understood, we are certainly in the time of the end.

It is evident that the "time, times and a half," allotted to the reign of the Papacy, must reach to the time of the end. For we are taught in Dan. xii, 8, 9, that "some of them of understanding"—the people of God—should fall by this persecuting power, "even to the time of the end." The period of the reign of the Papacy is so well defined and understood that it is unnecessary to say much upon it here. The position that it began in A. D. 538, and ended in 1798, is susceptible of the clearest proof. But waiving that, it is still clear that the persecution of Christians to death by that power ended before the close of the eighteenth century, that is, before A. D. 1800. Now as some were to fall by that power till the time of the end, and as they have permanently ceased thus to fall, we conclude that we are now in the period called the time of the end, and consequently should have an understanding of prophetic time.

On the other hand, if it can be proved that the prophetic periods are already understood, the time of the end has arrived; for if they were sealed up till the time of the end, they could not be understood before that time. We proceed then to prove that an accurate understanding of the prophetic periods has been given; hence the sealed book is opened; and hence it is already time for the thrilling announcement that time should be no longer.

As we have before observed, the time message is thrown into the account of the sounding of the seven trumpets, as it were parenthetically, between the sixth and seventh trumpets. From this it is evident that this message is to be given at the close of the sounding of the sixth trumpet; and this view is confirmed by the fact that the angel delivering the time message speaks of the beginning of the sounding of the seventh trumpet as about to ensue. "That time should be no longer;

but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished."

The sounding of the fifth and sixth trumpets is bounded each by a definite period of time. Rev. ix. To the fifth trumpet are given "five months." reckoning thirty days to the month, it amounts to one hundred and fifty days; which is literally one hundred and fifty years. The sixth trumpet sounds for "an hour and a day and a month and a year." This reduced to literal time, taking each day for a year, is three hundred and sixty-one years and fifteen days. Thus a year is 360 years, a month, 30, a day, 1 year, and an hour—one twenty-fourth of a year—15 days; amounting to 361 years and 15 days. Add to this the 260 years of the fifth trumpet, and we have 621 years and fifteen days, the whole time of the sounding of the fifth and sixth trumpets.

Commentators are well agreed that the locusts from the smoke of the pit, under the sounding of the fifth trumpet, represent the hosts of rapacious, funtikal warriors proceeding from the darkening doctrines of the pit of Mohammedan errors. Their tormenting men five months without killing them represents their long continued wars against the Eastern, Roman, or Greek, empire without subduing it, or destroying its political life. History has preserved to us the exact date of their first invasion of this empire, July 27, 1299. The infidel Gibbon particularly notices this date, because that but few exact dates of that period of the world's history have been preserved. God's providence preserved it as the date of a prophetic period. From this date to the submission of the empire, in 1443, to the Mohammedan, Turkish, power, there were just one hundred and fifty years. Here a new emperor coming to the throne dared not assume the government till he had sent ambassadors to the Turkish Sultan and asked his permission. Taking these facts for data, and calculating the hour, day, month, and year of the sixth trumpet, Eld. Josiah Litch predicted that the Turkish power would in like manner pass away at the close of this period, which would terminate in August 1840. Taking the first date July 27, 1299, and adding to it the sum of the two periods connected with the fifth and sixth trumpets, which is 621 years and 15 days, and it brings us to Aug. 11, 1840. This calculation was published in 1838, two years before the termination of the latter period. Those who read this calculation, were ready to admit that if it proved true, they would acknowledge that the Adventists had the key to the prophetic periods, and consequently were right in proclaiming the definite time of the ending of the 2300 days.

Time proved this calculation correct. The independence of the Turkish empire came to its end in the following manner: Mehemet Ali, Pacha of Egypt, had rebelled against his master, the Turkish Sultan, had defeated his army and captured his fleet; and the empire was in imminent danger, inasmuch that the great powers of Europe felt called upon to offer their intervention for the settling of the difficulty and the preservation of the tranquillity of Europe, which was endangered by the ambitious spirit of the Pacha. Accordingly England, France, Austria and Prussia held a conference at London, by their representatives, to agree upon the measures to be taken for the settlement of this difficulty. The terms of settlement that were to be dictated to the Pacha were agreed upon, and it was left with the Sultan to transmit them to the Pacha. Now, when these terms were transmitted, it was out of the Sultan's power to recall his acceptance of the intervention of the Christian powers to settle his difficulty for him, so that, the Pacha refusing submission, they were bound to compel him; and in this event the Sultan's independence is gone, and the Christian powers control the destinies of the old Mohammedan empire. The terms of the Christian powers were transmitted and placed in the power of the Pacha on the eleventh of August, 1840; and thus the independence of the Turkish empire came to an end. (For particulars, see "The Sounding of the Seven Trumpets," published at the Review office, and "The Restoration," by J. Litch.)

Thus it was demonstrated that the prophetic numbers were understood and could be correctly computed.

This gave a new impetus to the preaching of time. It was justly concluded that if one of those periods could be so exactly computed, and that one as difficult and obscure as any other, by the same rule the others might be. And, as a consequence, confidence increased in the teaching that the 2300 days would end in 1848. This demonstration made it certain that "the time of the end," to which the prophetic numbers were closed up and sealed, had come, and that "knowledge" on this subject was "increased," and that "the wise" were beginning to "understand." It was seen that the sixth trumpet had sounded its full time and ceased, and consequently the seventh trumpet was about to "begin to sound." Here, then, was the very point of time for the fulfillment of the message of Rev. x, announcing the termination of the great period of 2300 days, which would bring us to the cleansing of the sanctuary, or, in other words, to the "days of the voice of the seventh angel," in the beginning of which "the mystery of God should be finished."

This brings us to consider the fulfillment of the time message. The mighty angel of chapter x, doubtless symbolizes a new development of divine truth to be manifested at this very time, that is, between the close of the sixth and the beginning of the seventh trumpets. The proclamation of the ending of the last and longest prophetic period, the 2300 days, by the people called Adventists, we consider an evident fulfillment of this message, since it answers precisely the specifications of the prophecy, and occurred at the right time. Light had been gradually arising on the subject of the prophetic periods for some years previous to 1840. But at this date these calculations were demonstrated, as we have shown, by the fall of the Turkish power, which had maintained its independence from the time of the subjugation of the Greeks, in 119, until now, a period of 2381 years. Here this time message, which synchronizes with that of Rev. xiv, 6, 7, began to be proclaimed with "a loud voice," or, as expressed in this chapter, "as when a lion roareth." And as the earth trembled and the beasts of the forest quake at the roaring of the "king of beasts," so the people were moved by this solemn proclamation of the close proximity of the judgment. At first the proclamation was not so distinct and definite. It was thought that the 2300 days would end sometime during the year 1813. But when this year had ended, it was discovered that a mistake had been made in the computation, purely arithmetical, which had been equally hidden from both the friends and foes of the Advent doctrine. From the same date of commencement, by making allowance for that part of the year n. o. 1817 which was already past when the commandment went forth from which the time should be reckoned, it was now clear that the period would terminate in the fall of 1844. The clear and definite light that now shone upon the subject gave a confidence to believers most fully symbolized by the solemn oath of the angel that "there should be time no longer," and enabled them distinctly to enunciate, in fulfillment of a corresponding portion of this prophecy, "The hour of his judgment is come." It was most assuredly the right time for this announcement to be made, as we have shown, and here was a most accurate and vivid fulfillment of it. The word of God was thus verified, and the world will never hear the like again.

That which follows in the chapter is a lucid description of our great disappointment at the close of the 2300 days, and the revelation of the fact that we have still a work to do, namely, to proclaim the last message—that of the "third angel." Rev. xiv, 9-12. John, the receiver of the Revelation from Jesus Christ, is a representative of the church or people of God to whom the Revelation is made; and in this chapter he must, of course, represent that portion of them who should hear and believe this special proclamation. The eating of the little book, which was so sweet to his taste, represents the relief with which believers fared on the contents of that book of prophetic numbers, which had been sealed up, but now was opened. The preaching of definite time gave the greatest offense to unbelievers; but it was our food and drink. The expectation of the Lord's coming at the end of the period made it most sweet to our taste. But the period closed and brought a bitter disappointment—as soon as we had eaten it all up, our stomach was bitter. That which was our sweetest morsel before, "sweeter than honey or the honeycomb," now was the cause of our greatest bitterness. Oh! had we not been so positive on definite time! But we had; and God's word was verified by it, though it made us sad. Many sported whose hearts were not deep enough in the work, and our sadness increased. It seemed for a while that there was nothing more that we could do, only to wait for the coming of the Lord; but soon a faithful few began to hear a voice saying, "Then must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings."

What means this? Your work is not done. The 2300 days do not reach to the coming of the Lord, but to the commencement of the work of cleansing the sanctuary by the heavenly High Priest, a work to be done prior to his leaving his mediatorial office before the throne, and coming to earth to reward his people.

The hour of his judgment is indeed come; and this judgment is the solemn and important work of blotting out the sins of the people of God, which is their acquittal, a work which must be consummated between the Father and the Son in the most holy place of the "temple of God in Heaven"—"the true sanctuary"—before the latter lays aside his priestly attire, clothes himself with the "garments of vengeance," and is "revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God."

The cleansing of the sanctuary in the blotting out of sins—bearing them out of the sanctuary—as is evident from the type in the former dispensation. Lev. xvi. This is the work of a priest; and the priesthood of Jesus is wholly fulfilled in Heaven. Heb. viii, 1. What is sin? The transgression of the law. What law? That law which is beneath the mercy-seat in the ark of the covenant or testament, in the most holy place of the sanctuary—the ten commandments. "The temple of God in Heaven" now began to be opened to our faith, "and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. xvi, 19.

The ten commandments as written by the finger of God, are beneath the throne of his glory in Heaven; and his people are not keeping them! The Sabbath of that law is trodden under foot from week to week! Here is the rule of judgment; and what will be the decision of our cases in the hour of judgment? Will our sins be blotted out while we knowingly retain them? What is to be done? "Prophecy again." Here is the third angel's message, relating to those very "commandments of God." The papal beast has thought to change them, Dan. vii, 25, and the people professing godliness are not keeping them, but are following the tradition of the papal apostasy. Now is the time for this message; for it must be given after the time message, and before the coming of the Lord; or the word of God would fail. It has not failed in respect to the giving of the time message and the proclamation of the fall of Babylon; it will not fail in this. Prophecy again, that is, once more. Here is one and only one more message to be given. Prophecy again, and at the end of this prophesying the Lord will surely come; this message will not end in disappointment and bitterness. There will be bitterness in the fiery trial, the persecution against the commandment-keepers in the time of trouble; but it will not come unexpectedly, and it will end in glory.

Prophetic time has run out, and the days of the voice of the seventh angel are here. How is the mystery of God to be finished?

1. Jesus, our great High Priest, the Mediator of the new and everlasting covenant, is to close his intercessions in the presence of God, in the most holy place within the "second veil," where he entered on the tenth day of the seventh month, Bible time, in 1844. The word of God which said, "Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed," did not fail; but the work commenced at the appointed time. When he ceases to plead before the mercy-seat covering the ark of the ten commandments, the mystery of God will be finished. Then no more rebels will be pardoned; but he that is filthy will remain filthy still, and the Saviour will come quickly with his rewards. Rev. xxii, 11, 12.

2. A corresponding work will, at the same time, be going forward upon the earth. While Jesus is before the ark and mercy-seat in Heaven, pleading his blood for the remission of the sins of his people, which are neither more nor less than their violations of that law contained within the ark, a proclamation, calling the attention of all to those "commandments of God and the faith of Jesus," who still pleads, will go forth and gather out the loyal people of God from all their human creeds and doctrines of men, and prepare them for the close of probation. When the work of this last merciful warning is completed, Jesus will cease to plead, having blotted out the sins of his servants and sealed them in their foreheads with "the seal of the living God"—"his Father's name"—then will the work of pardon and reconciliation be ended—the mystery of God be finished! The preparations all being completed, and the time having fully expired, the car of salvation will not wait for another passenger. Oh, sinner, secure a passage now!

A few reflections and we close.

How beautifully harmonious and definitely exact is the prophetic word of God! How strange it is that with such evidences as prophecy and history afford, men should be infidels! men too of giant mind—of towering intellect! The fault is not in the word nor faithfulness of God, but in themselves, and in the false, perverse and inconsistent creeds—the doctrines of men and devils—that have been heaped upon the word of God and obscured its light.

Nothing is more certain to the consistent believer of prophecy, than the solemn truth that the time is come and God is now sending forth the last warning to mankind, and is thus preparing his people for the glorious appearing of the Son of God, which is near, even at the doors. This is the most overwhelmingly-solenn, and transcendently-important truth conceivable. It is time it were received and acted upon by all who hope to be found of Him in peace.

Brethren, if we believe these things, it is of the utmost importance that we live and act accordingly. Our influence is telling for or against the truth. How solemn the thought! The salvation of our friends and neighbors is depending upon their reception or rejection of the truth; and our influence is to tell one way or the other in respect to them. The truth will prove our condemnation, unless we live it out in our daily life.

Are we, brethren and sisters, ready for the mystery of God to be finished? Are we ready for our Jesus to cease his pleading before the throne of mercy? Oh! let us earnestly implore the refreshing from the presence of the Lord, while we have an Advocate in the temple of God in Heaven.

"Now in Heaven he's interceding
For dying men;
Soon he'll finish all his pleading,
And come again."

How much hangs upon a short and swiftly fleeting period of time! If overcomers, eternal life and blessedness will be our everlasting reward; if not, all is lost forever; and our time, in which we might have secured the priceless gift of eternal life, has been thrown away. Oh! let us strive to overcome; and may God accept our efforts through Jesus Christ, and grant us the aid of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

OUR PRESENT POSITION, In the Waiting, Tarrying Time.

BY ELD. A. C. BOWDLER.

TEXT. "For yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry." Heb. x, 37.

This is one of many passages of scripture which contain a promise relative to Christ's second coming. It can refer to no other advent but to that of Christ. And though there are many scoffers in this age of the world, who are often heard, saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?" etc., yet we are assured that the Sacred Scriptures abound with plain and decisive testimonies upon this glorious subject, that are yes and amen to the believers of Bible truth.

If we examine a few of these testimonies, we shall clearly see, 1. That when Christ ascended up on high, he went to the Father's house, or New Jerusalem, which has many mansions, to prepare a place for his people, and gave us the assurance that he will come again the second time, personally and visibly, in like manner as he was seen going into heaven, yea, as visibly as the lightning that cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west, so that every eye shall see him. Acts i, 9-11; John xiv, 2, 8; Rev. i, 7. 2. He will come on the world in general; even on professors of religion who are not found watching and getting ready, "as a thief in the night." But God's people, who are an exception to the general rule in this case, he will not overtake as a thief. They have the more sure word of prophecy, which is as a light that shines in a dark place; and while the signs of the times show that they are living in the peril of the last days, and that solemn scenes are impending, they are exhorted to not sleep as do others; but to watch and be sober. They watch and labor soberly and diligently that they may be found of him without spot, and blameless; and thus, at his appearing, they are enabled to say, Lo, this is our God: we have waited for him, and he will save us; . . . we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation. 1 Thess. v, 2-8; Rev. iii, 3; 2 Pet. i, 10; Matt. xxiv, 33; Isa. xlv, 5. 3. Then it is that, at the voice of the archangel and the sound of the trumpet, the dead in Christ shall be raised incorruptible, the living saints be changed, and they together shall ascend to Heaven with their Redeemer, to inhabit those blessed mansions prepared for the pure and holy; that the wicked shall be destroyed with the brightness of his (the Lord's) coming; and that the earth will be desolated, turned upside down, utterly emptied, and utterly spoiled. "Nevertheless, we, according to his promise," says Peter, "look for new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." Or, "wherein will dwell the righteous." Greek. From the second advent, when the wicked are all destroyed, and the saints caught up in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, a period of one thousand years is measured off before the resurrection of the wicked, which is the period that the saints remain in the city above, until the time of the renewing of the earth for their eternal abode, which cannot take place until after the second resurrection. 1 Cor. xv, 51, 52; John xiv, 3; 1 Thess. iv, 13-18; 2 Thess. ii, 7, 8; 1, 7, 10; Isa. xlii, 9; xlv, 1-8; 2 Pet. iii, 18.

These testimonies are an utter refutation of the idea that the second advent of Christ took place at the destruction of Jerusalem; or in Modern Spiritualism; or that it takes place every time that a person dies.

But our text not only contains a promise concerning the coming of Christ; but it also brings to view a "little while" or waiting time, during which, the Lord is tarrying, but at the end of which, it is affirmed, he will come and will not tarry. A scripture of similar import is found in Hab. ii, 8: "For the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak and not lie: though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry."

The vision here which is commanded to be written and made plain on tables that he may run that readeth it, is personified. It relates to prophecies which bring to view the coming of Christ and certain events that transpire previous to, and at his coming. It also refers to prophetic periods, some of which reach down to the time of the end. And after the leading prophecies and signs which show that Christ is near are fulfilled, and all the prophetic periods have ended, then, though it tarry, though the second advent which is a point mentioned in the vision, does not take place, God's people are told to wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry.

The tarrying, or waiting mentioned here and in our text, certainly conveys the idea that God's people who live at that time have previously dwelt upon the subject of the second advent and looked to an appointed time for it to take place, but have been disappointed. For, supposing that a man is returning from a journey, it cannot emphatically be said that he is tarrying, or that his friends are waiting for him, unless they have looked for him to come at a certain time and he has passed that time.

The two verses that precede, and those that follow our text, show that during the waiting time the church are required to exercise faith and patience, and to get a preparation to receive the promise; and that except they do this, they are in danger of drawing back, and of falling away into perdition. "Cast not away, therefore, your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry. Now the just shall live by faith; but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him. But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul." Heb. x, 35-39.

Having made these introductory remarks, I will now try to show where this scripture has its application, or fulfillment; or, when the waiting time commences.

In our investigation thus far, we have seen that whenever this scripture begins to be fulfilled, or the waiting time commences, the Lord's coming is very near; therefore we cannot look back in past centuries for its application. Hence Paul said to his Thessalonian brethren, "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, nor be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means; for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that Man of sin be revealed, the Son of perdition;" etc. 2 Thess. ii, 1-8.

This text plainly shows that the day of the Lord, or the coming of Christ, could not be expected to take place in the days of Paul. A falling away had to come first. The mystery of iniquity, said Paul, doth already work. When Christianity was preached to the Gentiles, as the people of different nations embraced the Christian religion, they brought with them more or less of their traditions and idolatrous notions.

These were gradually mixed with Christianity, and thus the standard of true religion was lowered, and a falling away took place which ended in the papacy, represented by Paul's Man of sin, Daniel's little horn, and John's blasphemous beast, which are clearly identical. This power commenced in A. D. 606, and was to continue a time, times, and the dividing of time; or, forty and two months, or 1260 prophetic days or years; bringing us down to A. D. 1798, until which time the coming of the Lord was not to take place.

Besides this, there are other prophetic periods which extend further down the stream of time. But I will here notice only one of these periods, at the termination of which, we understand the "little while" or waiting time, mentioned in our text commenced.

In Dan. viii, 13, 14, there is a definite period of time brought to view which is to the point. In verse 13, it is recorded that Daniel heard one saint asking another the question, "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily (sacrifice) and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" Then the angel said unto Daniel, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

In symbolic time, a day signifies a year. Num. xiv, 34; Eccl. i, 6. It is not necessary for me to say much here to show that the 2300 days in this text are symbolic. The nature of the subject with which they are connected, and the fact that the rest of the vision which contains them is composed of acknowledged symbols, prove this beyond the shadow of a doubt. The 2300 days denote 2300 years.

With a proper understanding of the subject, we clearly see that the seventy weeks in chapter ix, 20-27 are the first 490 years of this period; that they were determined, or literally cut off upon Daniel's people, and therefore belonged to the Jews; that they commenced in a little past the middle of the year, A. C. 457, and reached to the autumn of A. D. 584, where the work of the gospel among the Jews as a nation closed, and the way was more fully opened for it to be extended to the Gentiles; and that this left 1810 years of this period of time for the Gentiles, which brings the termination of the 2300 days in the autumn of A. D. 1844. Then, said the angel, shall the sanctuary be cleansed.

The subject of the sanctuary is clearly delineated in the word of God, and the work connected with it is represented as filling an important place among the means that have been provided for the salvation of mankind.

Under the old dispensation, in the days of types and shadows, a worldly sanctuary was built by the children of Israel, which had two apartments; the first, wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the show bread, which is called the manna (or holy, margin). And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the Holiest of all; which had the golden altar, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant; and over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat. . . . Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always (or daily, see Heb. x, 11,) into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God. But into the second went the high priest alone once every year. Heb. ix, 1-7.

This sanctuary was not an original building. A pattern of the original sanctuary in Heaven had been shown to Moses, and he was commanded to make all things according to this pattern. And the sanctuary of the old covenant, the priests, the ministration of the priests, and the gifts and sacrifices that were offered, were all types and shadows: "who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle; for, see, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed thee in the mount." Heb. viii, 5; Ex. xxv, 40. "Now of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: We have such a high priest, who is set on the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Verses 1, 2. "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into Heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." Chap. ix, 24. "Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." Verse 12.

The fact of the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary is plainly taught by the apostle Paul in the following scripture: "And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission. It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these (or there was a necessity, therefore, that the representations indeed of the holy places in the heavens, should be cleansed by these sacrifices, Man's blood); but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these." Heb. ix, 22, 23.

The cleansing of the sanctuary mentioned in Dan. viii, 14, cannot refer to the earthly sanctuary which was destroyed 1774 years before the 2300 terminated. It must, therefore, refer to the heavenly.

In the type, the most holy place was entered only on the day of atonement, on the 10th day of the seventh month, when the sanctuary was cleansed from the sins of the people which had been transferred from themselves to the beasts that were offered up, and through the blood of the sacrifices to the sanctuary itself. Then, not only the sanctuary was cleansed, but the people were also cleansed from their sins.

In Lev. xvi, it is clearly described how this work was accomplished; and it is shown that cleansing the sanctuary, and making the atonement, are identical, and that when the high priest had by blood removed the sins of the people from the sanctuary, he transferred them to the scapegoat who was sent away, with all the iniquities of the children of Israel, into a land not inhabited.

In the antitype, after Christ had ministered from the time of his ascension as a priest in the holy place of the heavenly sanctuary, he, as our High Priest, changed his position in Heaven and entered the Most Holy place on the great day of atonement which commenced in 1844, on the tenth day of the seventh month, Bible time.

Here the cleansing of the sanctuary commenced, which does not refer to physical impurities or uncleanness, for nothing of this kind exists in Heaven; but it refers to the sins of God's people, which, having been confessed by them to God, and transferred through Christ, our great sacrifice, to the heavenly sanctuary, are to be entirely removed from it. This cleansing is accomplished by blood, as we have already seen. And we understand that it can emphatically be called that work of the judgment which was to begin at the house of God. When the end of all things is at hand, Inspiration says, "For the time has come that judgment must begin at the house of God; and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?" 1 Pet. iv, 7, 17.

Then this work consists, 1. In investigating or reviewing the cases of, first, the dead in Christ, and then the living saints. 2. In blotting out their sins, which Peter said was to take place when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, etc. Acts iii, 19, 20. 3. In transferring those sins that are blotted out or canceled by the efficacy of the blood of Christ to the antitypical scapegoat, the great author of sin—the Devil—who, in addition to his own sins, must finally bear all the sins of God's people; but the wicked will bear their own sins.

When the glory of the Lord fills the tabernacle or temple in Heaven, as it was in the type (Ex. xi, 84, 85; 1 Kings viii, 10, 11), there is no ministration. Rev. xv, 8. Probation then ceases forever. God's people, the host, will then be free forever from their iniquity. The sentence passes, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Rev. xxi, 11. This takes place before Christ's coming, for he continues, "And behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Verse 12.

As soon as the ministration of the Lord Jesus in the holiest of all is closed, God then commences to pour out the wine of his wrath without mixture upon the earth, in the manner described in Rev. xvi, where we see that when the seven last plagues are falling, the first plague falls, then the second is to be an addition to the first, and then the third an addition to these two, and so on, till finally the seven are all falling together upon the wicked. They continue to fall till God speaks from Heaven, saying, "It is done;" the earth reels to and fro like a drunkard, and is utterly broken down (Isa. xxiv, 19, 20); and the Lord comes to redeem the dead and living saints, and gathers them to himself in glory.

Then Satan is bound a thousand years, and cast into the bottomless pit, or confined to the earth which is in a state of desolation without an inhabitant. But during the thousand years, the redeemed saints reign as kings and priests with Christ in Heaven, and are seated upon thrones, and judgment is given unto them. Rev. xx, 4, 6; v, 10; John xiv, 8; Matt. xix, 28. They are engaged in judging the wicked. Says Paul, Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? . . . Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" 1 Cor. vi, 2, 3. At that time the saints shall judge even fallen angels, who, in the great burning day, will, with Satan and the wicked, be burned up root and branch. Mal. iv, 1; Jude 6. This is the closing up scene of the great day of judgment which commenced in 1844. Then the earth will be renewed, and the immortal saints will enter upon their everlasting inheritance.

But time and space will not allow me to dwell any longer upon this point. And besides this, I have been digressing from my subject, though my object in doing this was to show the consistency of our position relative to the scenes of the judgment, and to confirm the reader in the view that the great prophetic period of Dan. viii, 14, ended in 1844, and that ever since then we have been living in the hour or time of God's judgment, which I trust I have not failed to accomplish.

Now it is a well known fact that for a few years previous to, and at the termination of, the twenty-three hundred days, a great movement was made among the religious bodies in nearly the entire civilized world, relative to the second advent of Christ; that the Adventists rightly understood that prophetic time would end in 1844, as it is clearly demonstrated in the tenth chapter of Revelation, where the time there mentioned must refer to the prophetic periods contained in the little book open in the angel's hand, in regard to which Daniel had been told, "But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end;" when, as he was informed, "many shall run to and fro and knowledge shall be increased," (Dan. xii, 4, 9.) and that, owing to a mistaken view which they entertained purporting that the earth was the sanctuary, and that it would be cleansed by fire, they looked for the Lord to come when the twenty-three hundred days expired; but as he did not come then, they were bitterly disappointed.

With these facts before us, I think we have a clue to where the waiting or tarrying time commenced. It certainly commenced at the time that we were disappointed in 1844. It is true that since that time, some have been setting time repeatedly, for the Lord's coming; but their work in this direction is plainly represented by the course pursued by the foolish virgins, as brought to view in Matt. xxv, 11-13. "Afterward came also other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh."

OUR PRESENT POSITION, In the Waiting, Tarrying Time.

BY ELD. A. O. BOWDLER.

TRUTH. "For yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry." Heb. x, 37.

(Concluded.)

WHILE the Lord Jesus is engaged in the closing up work of probation, he is brought near before the Anointed of days, and is represented as being wedded to the New Jerusalem, the city of God in Heaven, which is to be the metropolis of the kingdom under the whole heaven; and thus the Son of man is entitled to reign over all people, nations, and languages, and to have a kingdom which shall not be destroyed. Dan. vii, 13, 14; Rev. xxi, 2, 3. We look back to 1844 for the time when those that were ready went in by faith with Christ to the marriage, and thus we go in by faith with them. And since then, even those that are setting new times, and are thus saying, "Lord, open unto us," are exhorted to watch. The coming of Christ is not brought to view as taking place when he goes in to the marriage; but when he will return from the wedding. Till he comes we are exhorted to be ready, and to be in a waiting position. Luke xii, 35-40. "And ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he shall return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately. Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching. Verily I say unto you, that he shall find himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them. . . . He ye therefore ready also; for the Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not."

This scripture shows that, when he comes, those who are found ready and watching, are accounted blessed. They shall be made to sit down to meat, and the Lord will come forth and serve them. Doubtless this has reference to the marriage-supper of the Lamb, as brought to view in Rev. xix, 9. "And he saith unto me, Write, Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage-supper of the Lamb. And he saith unto me, These are the true sayings of God." We understand that the call in this text is made before the Lord comes, and that in heeding this call God's people will be found ready and watching, and be fully prepared to meet the Lord with joy at his appearing. It implies,

1. That God's professed people will be called to examine the word of prophecy, which presents to our view fulfilling prophecies and fulfilling signs which denote that the end is near, and that Jesus will soon appear.

2. That the honest ones will be led to see the corrupting influences which exist among professors of Christianity generally, and be called to separate or disconnect themselves from the associations with which they are connected, and place themselves where they will not be bound, or be hindered from walking in the light that shines on their path, or from availing themselves of those means that are afforded them, to fit and prepare them for the glorious appearing of the Redeemer.

3. That truths will be developed that will have a bearing upon our thoughts, words, and actions; by which we will be called upon to reform, and to lay aside our errors, and overcome our wrongs. And in practicing the truth faithfully, God's children will be found putting on the wedding garments, and developing characters which will make them proper subjects to attend the marriage-supper, and to find a home in the kingdom of God.

Now it is evident that the three great proclamations of the fourteenth chapter of Revelation are just calculated to accomplish this great work; and that some of this work has been fulfilled already. The first angel's message, which gives warning of coming judgment, and sets God's people upon their watch-tower, commenced to be proclaimed by William Miller and others in about A. D. 1837. The second message, which gathers into one body the scattered saints, commenced to be proclaimed soon after the close of the year 1843, as the Jews reckoned time. And the third message, which restores the ten commandments to God's people, and prepares them for the time of trouble, and for translation, commenced to be proclaimed soon after the time when the great prophetic period expired in 1844. Since then these three messages have been proclaimed together, and will continue thus to be till mercy closes, and the mystery of God shall be finished. The work accomplished by them cannot be separated, or disconnected.

To illustrate this work I will suppose a case: A man has been called to absent himself from his family for quite a long time. The time comes for him to think of returning home, and he writes to his family about it. As they read the letter and ascertain that he is returning, they are overwhelmed with joy. The wife says, "Husband is coming!" The children cry out, "Father is coming!" And several voices are heard saying, "I am glad! I am glad! I am glad!" They are not satisfied to tell it to each other; but as they go out after those members of the family who are scattered in the different parts of the country, they noise it all around, and say to their friends, "Rejoice with us, husband—father is coming home. Hurry and come with us, for he will certainly come, and may get there before we are gathered together."

But while the good man of the house is tarrying and their professed friends are reviling and beating them because they have been disappointed, they exercise patience, and have no disposition to cast away their confidence in his testimony relative to his coming. As they look around they perceive that much needs to be done before they can be prepared for his return. They need better clothing, and must have new suits throughout. The mother tells her daughters, "We must set the house in order." The sons say, "We must repair the buildings, fences, carriage, and harnesses; feed more grain to the horses and cattle; and have every thing in its place." They go to work with all their energies, and manifest a great deal of earnestness and sobriety in getting ready. Yet they have joy and gladness expressed in their countenances.

This may well represent the position that we, as a people, occupy in the waiting, or tarrying time, which can truly be called the time of preparation. It is with as in many respects as it was with the children of Israel while they were in the wilderness. "Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come." 1 Cor. x, 11. We read in Exe. xx, 28-29, "As I live, saith the Lord God, surely with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over you; and I will bring you out from the people, and will gather you out of the countries whereto ye are scattered, with a mighty hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out. And I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you face to face. Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord God. And I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the land of the covenant; and I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me: I will bring them forth out of the country where they sojourn, and they shall not enter into the land of Israel: and ye shall know that I am the Lord."

This prophecy was given several centuries subsequent to the time that the Hebrews were brought out of Egypt, and, therefore, cannot apply to them; but it evidently applies to those whom they represent; viz., to us, "upon whom the ends of the world are come."

Let us here notice a few points in their experience which are in some degree similar to, and may be said to represent, our experience under the proclamation of the three angels' messages:

1. There they could not get a preparation to enter the promised land while they were in bondage among an idolatrous nation; and hence the Lord brought them out of Egypt, with a mighty hand, etc. Here God's honest people cannot get a preparation to enter the antitypical land of Canaan while they are bound by popular orthodoxy, or connected with fallen professors of Christianity; and hence in portraying before us the dreadful judgments that await the ungodly, the awful scenes that are impending, and the perils with which we are surrounded, the Lord brings us out from the people, and gathers us out of the countries wherein we are scattered, or he calls upon us to disconnect ourselves from those associations where erroneous doctrines and human traditions are taught, and to gather together on the truth. "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unboly, without natural affection, truth-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof; from such turn away." 2 Tim. iii, 1-5. "Come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." Rev. xviii, 4. "Gather yourselves together, ye, gather together, O nation not desired; before the decree bring forth, before the day pass as the chaff, before the fierce anger of the Lord come upon you. . . . Seek ye the Lord, all ye meek of the earth, which have wrought his judgment; seek righteousness, seek meekness; it may be ye shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger." Zeph. ii, 1-3.

2. There when they started to go out of Egypt had they known what was before them, that they would be proved and tried for forty years, and that a large number of them would fall in the wilderness, they doubtless would not have moved out with a mighty rush as they did. God hid the future from them, and they thought that in a few weeks, at the longest, they would reach the land flowing with milk and honey. But they were disappointed. Here when God's people embraced the first and second angel's messages, had they known what was before them, that they would be proved for several years, "be purified, and made white, and tried" (Dan. xii, 10), and that several of them would fall by the way in the wilderness of the people, we have reason to believe that they would not have proclaimed the doctrines of the second advent with the spirit and power that they did. God did not then permit them to see the work which had to be accomplished under the proclamation of the third angel's message, relative to keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus (Rev. xiv, 8-12), and to the coming storm; and they believed that the Lord would come in 1843-1844. But they were disappointed.

3. There when the Hebrews crossed the Red Sea on dry ground, Pharaoh and his army attempted to do the same, and perished in the sea. But they were not the only ones that fell; for hundreds and thousands of those that sang the song of Moses fell in the wilderness on account of their murmurings and unbelief. Here after the Adventists had been disappointed at the close of the year 1843 (and yet could account for their mistake concerning the time when the twenty-three hundred days commenced), the first message became unpopular, and was, as we might say, crucified in the estimation of the people generally, and the mass of professors of Christianity rejected the truth relative to Christ's coming and fell spiritually. But they were not the only ones that fell; for hundreds and thousands of those that were in the great Advent movement in 1841, have since then rejected the truth and sinned against light through unbelief, and thus they, and others who draw back in like manner, are falling by the way.

4. There the Lord led his people in the day time with a cloud, and in the night with a pillar of fire. Ex. xlii, 21; Ps. lxxviii, 14; or, 35. And they moved only as the cloud and pillar moved. Here the Lord leads his people by his Spirit; and causes light to shine on their path just as they can bear it, and leads them in the truth, step by step, as fast as they are prepared to practice it. In the fourth chapter of Isaiah we have a scripture which is to the point. We read that in the day of the Lord of hosts (please read chapters ii and iii), "the Lord will create upon every dwelling place of Mount Zion, and upon her assemblies, a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night: for upon all the glory shall be a defence." Verse 5.

5. There after God had delivered the Hebrews from the abject bondage of Egypt, where they were a nation of slaves, he first proved them respecting his law by calling their attention to the Sabbath as an existing institution, and imposing the strongest obligations upon them to keep it. Ex. xvi. In doing this he designed to have them recognize him as being the only living and true God. "Wherefore I caused them to go forth out of the land of Egypt, and brought them into the wilderness. And I gave them my statutes, and showed them my judgments, which if a man do, he shall even live in them. Moreover also I gave them my Sabbath, to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them." Ezek. xx, 10-12; Ex. xxxi, 13-18. Here after the first and second messages were proclaimed with a loud voice from the spring to the fall of 1844, and thousands had left the different denominations and come out upon the truths which pertain to the soon appearing of Christ, God, by the proclamation of the third angel's message, which is based upon the closing sanctuary work upon which our High Priest entered at the close of the twenty three hundred days in 1844, called the attention of his people to the ark of the testament, which contains the law of God in Heaven, and first proved them by the Sabbath commandment, whether they would walk in his law or no. We see that while the last warning message brings to view the fact that "If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation," etc., it also brings to view a people of whom it is said, "Here is the patience of the saints, here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." In this text a reference is made to God's moral law of ten commandments, and to every thing contained in the New Testament. This is the great sanctifying truth by which the remnant church will be prepared for translation at Christ's appearing. Now the Sabbath of the fourth commandment designates the Author of the moral law as being the Creator of the heavens, the earth, and the sea, and all the things that are in them; and thus distinguishes him from all false gods that are worshiped, and even from the beast and his image. It is the opposite of the mark of the beast, and is the sign or seal of the living God, or "the Father's name," which the one hundred and forty-four thousand, who, in Rev. vii, are represented as being sealed "in their foreheads," and who shall be redeemed alive from the earth at the second advent, will have "written in their foreheads." Rev. xiv, 1-6. It is a golden link uniting God and his worshipers, or the "bond of the covenant," which unites the duties that we owe to God, as designated in the first four commandments, with the duties that we owe to our fellow-men, as pointed out in the last six commandments.

For many generations a warfare has been going on between God and the beast, and soon the wrath of the dragon, or of the beast and his worshipers, will be kindled against the remnant church, and they will go to make war with God's people, "which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ (Rev. xii, 17); but God and his people will come off conquerors in the end. The beast and those who worship him will be cast into the "lake of fire burning with brimstone;" while the overcomers will enter the New Jerusalem, and follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth on Mount Zion.

6. That God required the children of Israel to lay aside their idols, that they might thus be distinguished from the idolatrous nations around them, as being God's holy and peculiar people. Ezek. xx, 18, 19; Deut. xiv, 1, 2. Furthermore God promised that if they would keep his commandments he would heal them of their diseases, which clearly shows that the laws of health are based upon the observance of the law of God. "If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in his sight, and wilt give ear to his commandments, and keep all his statutes, I will put none of those diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians: for I am the Lord that healeth thee." Ex. xv, 26. Diseases had been brought upon the Egyptians in consequence of their having violated the fixed laws of health; but this scripture shows that the Lord was going to heal the Hebrews in teaching them how to live out the laws of health, and in leading them in the ways of his commandments. In Ex. xxiii, 24, 25 we read as follows: Thou shalt not bow down to their gods, nor serve them, nor do after their works. . . . And ye shall serve the Lord your God, and he shall bless thy bread, and thy water: and I will take sickness away from the midst of thee." This text clearly proves that in order for them to be healthy much consisted in what they ate and in what they drank. Hence we see that when they were brought into the wilderness, God did not, at first, give them flesh meats for food. Neither did he give them a large variety of food. But God rained down manna upon them to eat, and gave them of the corn of heaven, "he brought streams also out of the rock, and caused waters to run down like rivers." And thus even in the wilderness he "gave them drink as out of the great depths." It is very evident that God did not purpose to give them flesh meats for food, at least while they were being tried and proved in the wilderness, as may be seen from the fact that when they tempted God in their heart by asking meat for their lust, he was wroth; and when he had in wrath given them flesh to eat, while the meat was in their mouth he slew the fattest of them, and smote down the chosen men of Israel.

Here while God is purifying unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works, the great work of reform which has been going on among those who are trying to keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus Christ, did not close with their turning away their feet from the Sabbath, from calling it a delight, etc.; but since the Sabbath question commenced to be agitated, other points of importance have come up, one by one, for our consideration. The next question was concerning our idols. As light shone upon this subject, we were led to entirely lay aside the habitual use of tobacco, tea and coffee, and all superfluities in dress and other extravagances which would have the tendency of undermining our spirituality, and using up our vitality, both of body and mind.

And of late the question of health has been agitated to a great extent; and truly we feel that the light which shines upon Health Reform cannot be too highly estimated by the lovers of right principles, and by those who are seeking to purify themselves by obeying the truth, through the Spirit; that they may be wholly sanctified, spirit, soul and body, and be preserved blameless through the time of trouble that is just before us, unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Health Reform covers a great deal of ground, and in fully living it out, God's people will be prepared for the latter rain,—the refreshing which will come from the presence of the Lord; at which time all the gifts will be in exercise in the church, and the finishing touch will be given toward freeing them from all diseases. And thus the saints will be fully prepared to escape the seven last plagues, and for translation.

As God's remnant people are advancing, step by step, in the way of holiness, some think that the sacrifices which we have to make are too great; that it is hard for us to overcome our habits, to lay aside flesh meats, peppers, spices, etc., and to be strictly temperate in all things. But such should realise the great sacrifice that our Saviour made for us; and that Inspiration informs us that we should present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable service. That we should not be conformed to this world; but be transformed by the renewing of our mind, that we may prove what is that good and acceptable will of God. Thus in adhering to these principles, our minds are benefited as well as our bodies. If we fail in living them out on any point, just so far as we do this we draw back, and lose confidence in the cause of present truth. "But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul."

RH Jan 19, 1869

Copyright

THE TWO ABSURDITIES.

All believers in the mortality of man and the sleep of the dead, agree that it is a great absurdity to teach that the righteous are taken to Heaven at death, and the wicked sent to hell, and then after hundreds of years are called back, the saints from Heaven, and the wicked from hell, to be judged! What can be the use of such a judgment? Is there danger that God has made a mistake in taking some to Heaven who ought not to have gone there, and has sent others to hell who ought to have been in Heaven? Such a judgment must be only a mockery. Hence we say, that theory must be false. God will not reward men till he has judged them to ascertain what each should have.

But there is another theory equally absurd and false, which is held by some Adventists. Paul teaches, and they believe, that the dead saints will be "raised incorruptible" and immortal. But the wicked will be raised as mortal and as corruptible as they went into the grave. Gal. vi, 8. Then they tell us that the Judgment will not be after that. But here again comes up the very objection which they urge against others, viz.: What is the use of a judgment now? Has God made a mistake and raised some immortal who are not worthy of it? Have some been left to come up in corruption who ought to have been raised incorruptible? My friends, something is out of joint in this theory. God does not work that way. The fact that the saints are raised incorruptible, shows that the judgment upon them is passed before they are raised.

Again, as soon as Christ appears in the clouds, the living saints are "changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," 1 Cor. xv, 51, 52, and "caught up to meet the Lord in the air." 1 Thess. iv, 17. At the same time the wicked are consumed by the brightness of his coming. 2 Thess. i, 7-8; ii, 8. Where is the propriety of having a general Judgment after that? The idea is both absurd and contrary to the teaching of the Bible.

D. M. CARSON.

Richmond, Mo.

SINNERS MAY YET OBTAIN MERCY.

It is often remarked by those who seem disposed to oppose almost every position taken by Seventh day Adventists, that if it is a fact, that Christ changed his place of ministration in 1844, from the holy to the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary, sinners cannot obtain mercy since that time.

That such a conclusion should be drawn by them from such premises, seems very inconsistent; for they contend that Christ, as High Priest, entered eighteen hundred years ago into that part of the New-Testament sanctuary, which they themselves regard as the most holy place, and that salvation has been free to all since the time of his entrance there. How then can they contend, that if Christ entered the most holy place in 1844, salvation is not free to anybody since the time of his entrance there.

The particular point of difference about which they contend so much, is not the place of his present ministration, but the point of time at which he commenced upon that work.

Now, if it was a fact that he entered the most holy place at the time of his ascension to Heaven, and therefore sinners can be saved in 1869, we fail to see why sinners cannot be saved in 1869 if he entered there in 1844.

They believe Christ is now in the most holy place. We believe he is now in the most holy place. And how they can think that our position shuts the door of mercy to every one, and that their position leaves the door of mercy open to every one, is indeed strange.

When we succeed in showing them the inconsistency of their conclusion, and that our position gives the same chance for salvation since 1844, that theirs would if it was true, their next conclusion is, that if Christ changed his place of ministration in 1844 from the holy to the most holy place, and if sinners can be saved since he entered the most holy place, they could not have been saved during his ministration in the holy place, before his entrance into the most holy.

In reply to this, we would ask them if their position be true that Jesus entered the most holy place at the time of his ascension to Heaven, which was more than four thousand years after the creation of man, how can any body be saved who lived during that long period of time before Christ entered upon the office of priest in any respect, and before he was raised from the dead for our justification, and before he had even shed his blood for the remission of sins? Their argument on this point would prove that not one person who died before Christ's ascension can be saved.

If they would only admit the true position, that our salvation depends not so much on the particular point of time at which Christ entered upon the office of high priest, as upon our faith in the work which he performs while occupying that position, their absurdities would be many less, and their understanding of the truth much better than at the present time.

W. H. BLAISDELL.

THE DIFFERENT OFFICES AND POSITIONS OF JESUS CHRIST.

God created the world and all things by Jesus Christ. Heb. i, 1, 2; John i, 3, 10; Col. i, 16.

Christ was in Heaven with the Father before the world was. John xvii, 5; i, 1-3; Prov. viii, 22-30.

He consulted with the Father and made man. Gen. i, 26; Col. i, 16. Man, being placed on probation, soon fell and lost his life. Gen. ii, 16, 17; iii, 1-6, 17-19. God loved the world, and so gave his Son to save man. John iii, 16. Jesus came down from Heaven to seek and to save that which was lost. John vi, 50, 51; Luke xix, 10. When he was about thirty years of age he was baptized and began his work. Luke iii, 21-23.

Christ was not a priest nor a king while on earth as some teach; but he was a prophet, or teacher. Speaking of Christ, Moses said, "A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me." Acts iii, 22. See also John vi, 14. Luke records that he "was a prophet mighty in deed and word before God and all the people." Chap. xxiv, 19. He could not be a priest while on earth, from the fact that he was of the tribe of Judah, while all the priests had to be of the tribe of Levi. This fact is clearly stated by Paul thus: "For he [Christ], of whom these things are spoken, pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar. For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah, of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood." Heb. vii, 13, 14. Hence, of course, he could not be a priest in the service of the sanctuary on earth; for those who served in the temple on earth had to be of the tribe of Judah. Says Paul, "For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law, who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Heb. viii, 4, 6.

When Christ had finished his work as a prophet, he was crucified, he died, was buried, and on the third day he rose from the dead. 1 Cor. xv, 3, 4. Then he ascended into the Heavens, and sat down on the right hand of God, his Father. Heb. viii, 1; xii, 2; Eph. i, 20, 21. But what did he sit down upon? Ans. Upon the throne of his Father. After his ascension into Heaven Jesus said, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Rev. iii, 21. This is decisive, showing that Jesus not only sits at the right hand of God, but sits in his Father's throne with him. Paul states the same fact: for he says that Jesus "is set down at the right hand of the throne of God." Heb. xii, 2. The Greek preposition (en) here rendered "at," is the same that is rendered "in." In Rev. iii, 21, and in many other places. Greenfield gives in as the first definition of en. So Paul agrees with Jesus that Christ "is set down in the right hand of the throne of God." So to Rev. xii, 5, it is said of the man-child (Jesus) which was born to the woman, that it was caught up unto God, and sat to his throne. And when John had a view of the throne of God in Heaven, he said, "And I beheld, and, lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain," &c. Rev. v, 8. David intimates the same when he says of Christ, "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thee on my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool." Acts ii, 34, 35. These scriptures prove beyond dispute that Jesus, when he ascended to Heaven, sat down in the throne of his Father.

We will now inquire where that throne was located. In order to do this, we must look a moment at the types. I must take for granted that my readers have studied the subject of the sanctuary. Moses built a sanctuary for God to dwell in. Ex. xxv, 8. This was divided into two apartments. The first was called the holy place. It contained the golden candlestick, the table of shew bread, and the altar of incense. The second contained the ark in which were the ten commandments. Over it was the mercy-seat and the cherubim. Heb. ix, 1-5; Ex. xxv. The priests began their ministry every year in the first or holy place, and continued to minister there every day till the day of atonement. Heb. ix, 6. While they thus ministered in the first apartment, the glory of God was manifested there continually, and there God met with his people and spoke with them. Ex. xxix, 42-44. On the tenth day of the seventh month, the day of atonement, the ministration of the priests in the sanctuary was changed from the holy to the most holy place. Heb. ix, 7; Lev. xvi. Here the glory of God was manifested above the ark, between the cherubim. Lev. xvi, 2, 13; Ex. xxv, 22. Was, then, the glory of God in two different places at the same time? No; for when the ministration of the priests was changed from the holy to the most holy, the cloud of glory which represented the presence of God, also removed from the holy to the most holy. Then the high priest went in there and made an atonement for the sins of the people during the past year. Lev. xvi.

Now all these things were only types of the true sanctuary, and of the priestly work of Christ in Heaven. Heb. viii, 1-6; ix, 1-26; x, 1-9. This being true, when Christ ascended to Heaven he must have begun his ministry in the first apartment, or holy place of the heavenly sanctuary. Says Paul, "We have such an High Priest, who is set down on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the Heavens, a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man." Heb. viii, 1, 2. If Christ began his ministry in the holy place and at the same time sat down on the throne of God, then the throne of God must have been located in the holy place while Christ ministered there. Several reasons show that this was the case. 1. In the type, the glory of God was in the holy place while the priests ministered there. Ex. xxix, 42-44. So it must be in the anti-type. 2. Christ could not minister in the holy place, and at the same time sit on the Father's throne, unless that throne was in the holy place. 3. If Christ ministered in the holy place, and the Father's throne was in the most holy place, then the Father and Son would be separated. 4. John, in his vision on Patmos, saw the throne of God in the holy place. "And immediately I was in the Spirit; and, behold, a throne was set in Heaven, and one sat upon the throne. . . . And out of the throne proceeded lightnings, and thunderings, and voices; and there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God." Rev. iv, 2-5. These seven lamps of fire were the antitypes of the seven golden candlesticks which were in the holy place. Heb. ix, 1-5. 5. John saw Jesus clothed in his priestly garments, standing in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks. Rev. i, 12, 18. These golden candlesticks were always in the holy place; hence Christ was ministering there. In Rev. v, 6, John saw Christ, the Lamb, in the midst of the throne; hence the throne was where Christ was ministering, i. e., in the holy place. These facts show that the ministry of Christ, and the throne of God, were in the holy place at the beginning of the gospel dispensation.

Jesus Christ was a priest after the order of Melchisedec. Heb. vi, 20; Ps. cx, 4. Now Melchisedec was "king of Salem, priest of the most high God." Heb. vii, 1. He was king and priest at the same time. So Christ is both king and priest. Thus Zechariah says of him, "Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is THE BRANCH; and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord; even he shall build the temple of the Lord; and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and he shall be a priest upon his throne; and the counsel of peace shall be between them both." Zach. vi, 12, 13. This is the position which Christ occupies before his Father's throne.

He is our great High Priest, Heb. viii, 1, the "mediator between God and man," 1 Tim. ii, 5, "our advocate with the Father." 1 John ii, 1.

At the end of the 2800 days, Dan. viii, 14, in 1844, the ministration in the heavenly sanctuary was changed from the holy to the most holy, according to the type in Lev. xvi, 8. On the day of atonement the holy of holies was opened, the high priest went in and the Lord appeared in a cloud upon the mercy-seat in the most holy place. Lev. xvi, 2. So when the seventh angel sounded, and the time had come to judge the dead, "the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament."

Rev. xi, 15-19. Then the temple of God is not opened till the time comes to judge the dead; but it is opened then. Then was fulfilled the majestic vision of Daniel. Chap. vii, 9-14. "And I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of Days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels like the burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; the Judgment was set, and the books were opened. . . . I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of Heaven, and came to the Ancient of Days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him."

1. Here is an unmistakable description of the setting of the great day of Judgment. 2. There is a manifest reference to the change of the presence of God from the holy place to the most holy of the temple. 3. The Son of Man then goes in before his Father. Mark, he does not come to the earth, but to the Ancient of Days. 4. Then there was given to the Son a kingdom. Malachi evidently refers to the same in chap. iii, 1-5. "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me; and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in; behold, he shall come, saith the Lord of hosts. But who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap; and he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness. Then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord, as in the days of old, and as in former years. And I will come near to you to judgment."

Here we have, 1. The coming of the Lord to judgment. 2. His sudden coming to his temple. 3. The inquiry, "Who may abide the day of his coming?" showing that it will be a fearful day. In Rev. iii, Christ says to the Philadelphia church, "Behold, I come quickly." Verse 11. This shows where the prophecy applies. To the same church he says, "These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth; I know thy works; behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." Verses 7, 8.

1. This applies at a time when Christ is about to come. Verse 11. 2. It is at the time when Christ receives the key of David, i. e., the throne or kingdom of David. Compare Isa. xlii, 22, with Luke i, 32, 33. This is the time referred to in Dan. vii, 13, 14, when the Son of Man goes in before the Ancient of Days and there was given him a kingdom, &c. This we have seen was at the Judgment. Christ sits on his Father's throne till that time, then the Father gives him David's throne. 3. At this time Jesus says to his people, I am he that openeth, and I am he that shutteth, and I have set before thee an open door. This describes the change of Christ's ministry in 1844, from the holy to the most holy place. He opened the one and shut the other. Here was an open door set before the people of God.

When Christ went into the temple of God it was that he might receive a kingdom. This is shown by Dan. vii, 9-14; Rev. iii, 7, 8. Christ did not receive the kingdom when he came to earth the first time; but he went away to Heaven to receive it, and will not return to earth till he has received it. This is clearly shown by the parable which he spoke in Luke xix, 11-27: "And as they heard these things, he added and spake a parable, because he was nigh to Jerusalem, and because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear. He said, therefore, A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return. . . . And it came to pass, that when he was returned, having received the kingdom," &c. This can not be mistaken. He spoke it to show them that the kingdom of God was not then immediately to come. He must first go into a far country and receive the kingdom. Then he would return and slay his enemies. Who is to give Christ the kingdom? Ans. The Father. Ps. ii, 8. This earth is to be the kingdom. Rev. xi, 14, 15; Ps. ii, 8. But God would not give Christ a kingdom that was in rebellion and unsubdued; hence when Christ ascended to Heaven, the Father gave him a seat on his own throne and bade him sit there until his foes were made his footstool. Acts II, 24, 25. Hence Paul says, "But this man [Christ], after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, forever sat down on the right hand of God; from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool." Heb. x, 12, 13. What is he thus waiting for and expecting? Ans. The kingdom. This is confirmed by the fact that the kingdoms of this world do not become the kingdoms of Christ till the sounding of the seventh trumpet. Rev. x, 15.

May 11, 1869

-3-

D M Canright

This also is when the time has come to judge the dead and destroy the wicked. Verse 18. Here also at the same time takes place another event called the marriage of the Lamb. 1. Christ is the Lamb. Rev. v. 2. The New Jerusalem which will be the capital of Christ's kingdom, is the bride, the Lamb's wife. Rev. xxi, 9, 10. "And there came unto me one of the seven angels, which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me, saying, Come hither, I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife. And he carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of Heaven from God." This language is decisive; the New Jerusalem is the Lamb's wife. Isaiah says of this holy city, "Thy Maker is thine husband." Compare chap. liv, 1-5 with Gal. iv, 26, 27. 2. This marriage takes place before the second coming of Christ. It is described at length in Matt. xxv, 1-13. In Luke xii, 35, 37, Jesus says, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open unto him immediately. Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching." Thus we see that when the Lord comes it is his return from the wedding. He does not come to the wedding; but that wedding is already in the past. So of his receiving the kingdom; he went into a far country, and having received the kingdom he returned. 3. The New Jerusalem, the Lamb's wife, is the mother of all the saints. Gal. iv, 26: "But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all." No Yea. liv 5. Jesus is the father of all who are saved. This, of course, would be true if Jerusalem is their mother, and he is her husband. Heb. ii, 13, 14: Jesus says, "Behold I and the children which God hath given me. Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same." This is good reasoning. The father must, of course, be of the same nature as the children. The children—the saints—are flesh and blood: therefore he also must take the same nature in order to become their father. By what act does Christ become the father of the saints? Ans. By raising them from the dead. By this act he gives them a birth into eternal life. Probably Isaiah refers to this when he says, "Who hath heard such a thing? Who hath seen such things? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? or shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children." Chap. lxi, 8. These are the ones who are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb. Rev. xix, 9.

May the Lord grant us to be of that number, is my earnest prayer.

D. M. CANRIGHT.

782

THE JUDGMENT IS PAST BEFORE THE LORD COMES.

That the Judgment is past before the Lord comes, that every man's case is decided either for life or death, and that no judgment in the sense of determining character, takes place at the coming of Jesus to the earth, is clearly shown by several facts:

1. The wicked are destroyed by the brightness of Christ's coming. "And then shall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming." 2 Thess. ii, 8. The Lord does not come and judge them, and then destroy them, but they are destroyed by the brightness of his coming. So we read again, chap. i, 7, 8: "And to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from Heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." This leaves no place for a Judgment after his coming. In perfect harmony with this we are told that all the tribes of the earth will mourn when they see the Lord coming in the clouds of heaven, Matt. xxiv, 30; and that the wicked will call for rocks and mountains to cover them. Rev. vi, 16.

2. But the righteous at the same time are caught up to meet the Lord in the air. "For the Lord himself shall descend from Heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv, 16, 17. When the trumpet sounds the dead are raised, the living changed in a moment, and all are caught up to meet the Lord in the air. Here again there is no place for a Judgment after his coming. The fact that the saints are caught up to meet the Lord at his coming, and that the living wicked are consumed at the same time, shows that it has been previously ascertained and decided who are saints, and who are sinners. But this is the work of the Judgment; therefore the investigative Judgment must precede the coming of the Lord.

3. The righteous are raised with incorruptible and spiritual bodies. Says Paul: "Behold, I show you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv, 51, 52. Again: "He also is the resurrection of the dead. It [the body] is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor; it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body." Verses 42-44. This is too plain to be misunderstood. The righteous will come out of their graves all glorious and ready for the kingdom. But how will it be with the wicked? They will never have immortal bodies; hence they will come up as they went down, with mortal bodies. Hence, before God raises either of them from the dead, every man's case has been investigated and decided either for immortality, or for death. The fact that God raises one mortal and the other immortal, shows that there has been a judgment on their cases before they were raised. Then why judge them after that? Is there danger that there has been a mistake made, and one raised immortal who ought not to have been? The idea is absurd.

4. There are a thousand years between the resurrection of the saints and that of the wicked. This is distinctly stated in Rev. xx. Of the righteous it says: "They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection." "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection." Verses 4-6. This, again, shows the same idea, viz., that the Judgment sits before any are raised from the dead, in order that it may be ascertained whom to raise in the first resurrection, and whom to leave for the second.

5. The order of events given in Rev. xiv, shows that the Judgment sits before the coming of Christ. Three messages are there given, verses 6-12, and then the Son of Man comes to reap the harvest of the world, verses 14-16. The first message announces the fact to all nations that the hour of God's Judgment has come, verse 7. He states a fact. He does not lie. It did come when he declared it. But after the angel thus announces the hour of Judgment come, two other angels follow him each with a warning message. These two messages are given after the hour of Judgment has actually come, and hence, of course, while the Judgment is going on. There is no avoiding this conclusion. So we find that when Christ comes, it is not to the Judgment, but to carry out the decisions of a Judgment already past. Hence, he brings his reward with him to give unto every man according to his work. Rev. xiii, 12.

6. The typical service of the priests in the earthly sanctuary shows the same fact. All the service of the priests had to be done in the sanctuary. There the priests ministered during the year, and there the high priest made the atonement on the last day of the year. When he came out of the sanctuary, the work for Israel was done. There was no Judgment after that. Lev. xvi.

But this was a type of the work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. Heb. viii, 9. Just so then must all the work of Christ's ministry for the people be done in the heavenly sanctuary. It cannot part be done there, and a part be done on earth away from the sanctuary. As the high priest made the atonement, which was a type of the Judgment, in the earthly sanctuary, so Christ must make the great atonement, which is the real Judgment, in the real sanctuary in Heaven.

7. We need an advocate when our cases come into Judgment. If ever a man needs an advocate to plead his case it is when his case comes into court for judgment. Now Christ is our advocate with the Father, 1 John ii, 1, our High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary, Heb. viii, 1, 2. He pleads our cases at the mercy-seat with the Father. But when he leaves the sanctuary he is no longer High Priest, but comes to this earth clothed in garments of vengeance with the title of King of kings, Rev. xix, 11-16. If our cases come into Judgment after that, we must stand before our Judge without an advocate. In that case no mortal man could stand. Hence, this also shows that the Judgment takes place before the second coming of Christ.

Against this position, however, it is objected that when Christ comes, all nations will be gathered before him, and he will divide the sheep from the goats, &c. Matt. xxv, 31. But I notice that there is nothing said about a Judgment at that time. He immediately proceeds to separate them, and state the reasons for it. It is simply a separation, not a judgment scene.

These facts incline me to think that the Judgment is in the past at the second coming of Christ, and that we are now living in the judgment hour.

THE JUDGMENT.

BY HED. J. H. LOUGHBOROUGH.

Text.—"And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the Judgment; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." Heb. ix. 27, 28.

It is one of the most plainly-stated facts of Scripture, that there is to be a future Judgment, in which the cases of all men shall be brought in review before God, and be carefully examined, and then all are to receive according to their works. It is this great and solemn day that Solomon had in mind, when, in concluding his sermon, in which, as one said, "he took the whole world for his text," he said: "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into Judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil." Eccl. xii, 13, 14. Paul, in his plea in the court of the Areopagus, in the midst of the Athenians, who were in the depths of idolatry, says: "Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device. And the times of this ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent; because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead." Acts xvii, 20-31.

When Paul would convince the wicked Romans of the necessity of forsaking their secret crimes, he says to them, "We are sure that the Judgment of God is according to truth against them which commit such things." He tells them the result of pursuing such a course of wickedness: "After thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous Judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his deeds." And lest they should think that ignorance would be an excuse for them, he says: "For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law; and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law, in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ." Rom. ii, 2, 5, 6, 12, 13. In his solemn exhortation to faithfulness, which he gave to Timothy, he does it in view of the Judgment. "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom." 2 Tim. iv, 1. These, with multitudes of scriptures of a similar import, bring to view the solemn Judgment scenes. When Paul reasoned with Felix of this "Judgment to come, Felix trembled." Acts xxiv, 25.

Well, indeed, is it for us to realize, not only while we are investigating this subject, but in all our walks in life, that we are doing work for the Judgment. And may we ever not be admonished by Peter: "But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation, because it is written, Be ye holy; for I am holy. And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear." 1 Pet. i, 15-17.

My design in this discourse is especially to call attention to the time of the Judgment. Different views are held in relation to this subject, which we shall try to notice briefly, together with the evidences on which such theories are based.

The first position I will notice on the subject of the Judgment is that most commonly entertained, that all men are judged at death. If people are requested to produce evidence of this, it is generally said that man are rewarded or punished at death, and, this being the case, of course they must be judged at death. But where is the proof that men are rewarded at death? We read of David, that he, "After he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption." Acts xiii, 36. And of all the ancient worthies, who were "so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the seashore innumerable," we read: "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth." Heb. xi, 12, 13. In Solomon's testimony concerning the condition of all mankind in death, we read: "The dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten." Eccl. ix, 5. Waiving the testimony drawn, by inference, from texts which do not state the doctrine, I ask, Where is the proof that men are rewarded at death? I never heard but one text quoted as positive to prove that men are rewarded at death. That is the testimony addressed to the Smyrna church: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Rev. ii, 10. This text does not state that they shall be rewarded as soon as they die, but is evidence that if they will be faithful, even though that faithfulness may cost them their lives, they shall have a reward. This text does not tell them that they shall immediately have a reward.

The time when they shall have their reward must be decided by other scriptures. We read: "Behold I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Rev. xxi, 12. According to this testimony, the reward is to be given at the appearing of our Lord. With this, also, agrees the expectation of Paul: "For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." 2 Tim. iv, 6-8. Taking this testimony in connection with that to the Smyrna church, it would signify: Be faithful unto death, and when Christ appears, you shall have a crown of righteousness.

Then it cannot be claimed that men are judged at death, because they are rewarded at death. The only text quoted as direct evidence that men are judged immediately at death, is the text used as the introduction of this discourse: "As it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the Judgment." Could it be shown that this text referred to all mankind, it would not prove that they were judged as soon as they die, but at some period after death.

If it should be shown that the judgment of each company takes place just prior to their resurrection, it would not disagree with the idea that "after death" was the judgment of each case.

The second position we wish to examine upon this subject, is, that all men, both righteous and wicked, are raised at once, at the coming of Christ, and that, after being thus raised, they stand before God and are judged, and separated; the righteous entering upon their reward, and the wicked into their punishment. We understand the Scriptures to speak of the Judgment in connection with the coming of Christ, but do not understand that the Judgment of either class, more than the execution of the Judgment on their cases, is spoken of as taking place after their resurrection. There seems, also, to be some difficulty in the view of those who hold that men are judged as soon as they die; that they then enter immediately upon their reward, and are judged again after their spirits are united with their bodies at their resurrection. Have they been judged twice? Is there any possibility of a mistake in the first decision? Will this second Judgment reverse in any case the decision of the first Judgment? Will any of those who have been in their reward or punishment for hundreds of years, exchange places as the result of this Judgment? Are questions often asked upon this topic. If it can be shown, as we think it can, that there is a Judgment in connection with the coming of Christ, we think it will be of itself proof that there has not been a Judgment previous to that, and especially as the Scriptures are silent on the subject of a Judgment at death.

This Judgment is not spoken of as a plurality of Judgments that are to sit, but "The ungodly shall not stand in the Judgment." Pa. I, 5, see also Pa. vii, 6; Acts. xiv, 25; Heb. x, 27; 1 Pet. iv, 17; 2 Pet. ii, 4; Jude 6; Rev. xiv, 7; Rev. xx, 12, 13.

With the Scriptural view of man's unconsciousness in death, all is plain. The dead are without reward until the resurrection, and so no Judgment is executed, or set upon their cases until about the time they are to be called forth to be rewarded or punished.

Many of those even who hold to the natural immortality of the soul, have seen the difficulty of establishing the doctrine of Judgment and rewards at death, and so have taken the position of no reward till the resurrection, and that the dead are in a kind of semi-consciousness, neither rewarded nor punished, but like a prisoner awaiting his trial. Says John Wesley, in his discourse on Dives and Lazarus: "It is, indeed, very generally supposed that the souls of good men, as soon as they are discharged from the body, go directly to Heaven; but this is contrary to Scripture, for Christ said to Mary, three days after his death, 'Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to my Father.'"

But, we ask, where is the evidence to prove that the dead are all raised at once, and then judged and rewarded or punished? Paul's testimony is adduced as proof of this, but, we think, does not teach it: "For we must all appear before the Judgment-seat of Christ: that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." 2 Cor. v, 10. That this text teaches the certainty that all men will appear before Christ's Judgment-seat, is plain. But that they will all appear there at once, it does not state. Neither does it state that they appear there for the examination of their cases, but, "to receive according to that they have done." So far as this text is concerned, the righteous might be judged, raised from the dead, and appear to receive their reward. At some subsequent period, the wicked might be judged, raised, and appear there to receive according to their evil deeds.

Christ's testimony is quoted to prove that all stand in a confused mass, and are then judged and separated: "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats: and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left." Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. . . . Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his angels." Matt. xxv, 31-46, 41. This text, which is supposed by some to teach the doctrine of a Judgment after all have been raised from the dead, says nothing concerning the Judgment. Its testimony is concerning the final separation which is to take place between the righteous and the wicked. How is that separation to be accomplished? Are all to be raised from the dead, and then separated after they are thus raised? The Scriptures place the resurrection of the righteous and of the wicked at two different times; a thousand years intervening between them. How, then, can it be claimed that they are all raised at once, at Christ's coming?

We read in Paul's testimony to his Thessalonian brethren: "For the Lord himself shall descend from Heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv, 16, 17. In Revelation this same event is called "the first resurrection:" "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshiped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power." Rev. xx, 4-6. It is this resurrection to which Paul refers when he represents himself as laboring that he might, by any means, attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Phil. iii, 11. He wished a resurrection, "exanimatus, from among the dead," (Emphatic Diaglott), or, a part in the first resurrection.

As there is a thousand years placed between the resurrection of the righteous and the wicked, of course we should not understand our Saviour as teaching that all are raised at once, and then separated. All the righteous dead are separated from the wicked dead, and the righteous living are separated from the wicked living. This, we understand, is illustrated by our Saviour by the shepherd dividing his sheep from the goats. If we give force to the illustration, it is not a decision as to which are sheep and which goats, but, it is known who are saved before they are raised, or the living changed to immortality. Probably, in these words of Christ is comprehended the whole scene of the execution of the Judgment, both the reward of the righteous at Christ's coming, and the driving of the wicked to their doom, at the end of the thousand years.

The third position I will notice on the Judgment is that held by those who admit that only the righteous are raised at the coming of Christ, and the wicked one thousand years from that time. They claim that the righteous are judged after they are raised from the dead. The very fact that every one who is raised at the coming of Christ is righteous, and that none of the wicked are raised in that resurrection, is of itself evidence that there has been a decision as to who are righteous, and entitled to eternal life before the "blessed and holy" are brought from the grave. But, to examine the position that the righteous are judged after they are raised, we would inquire, in what condition are the righteous raised? The order of events given by Paul is: The Lord descends, the trumpet sounds, and the dead in Christ arise. But in what condition are they raised? "For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." 1 Cor. xv, 52. Then, in the very act of being raised from the dead, the righteous are made immortal: "Behold, I show you a mystery: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." 1 Cor. xv, 51, 52. Immortality is a part of the reward of the saints; see Rom II, 0, 7; and this is bestowed upon the saints in the twinkling of an eye, after the trumpet sounds. This bestowal of immortality upon the saints prepares them to inherit the kingdom of God, 1 Cor. xv, 50-54. Does a Judgment sit upon the cases of the saints after they are made immortal, and have entered upon their reward? This would certainly be inconsistent. And to try to locate the Judgment after the resurrection, before immortality is given, would be to crowd the great and solemn event into the twinkling of an eye, which would be almost equivalent to no Judgment at all.

The only view which seems to produce a harmony with all the scriptures on this subject, is that which I believe to be the truth in this matter; that the Judgment of the saints is before the coming of Christ and the resurrection. Before we pass to present direct evidence upon this point, I would examine some of those texts which speak of a Judgment in which the saints are to eat a part. Paul says: "For I know nothing by myself; yet am I not hereby justified; but he that judgeth me is the Lord. Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts; and then shall every man have praise of God." 1 Cor. iv, 4, 5. This text teaches that, although our ignorance of the purposes which actuate men, and our lack of knowledge of their deeds of darkness, may unfit us for justly condemning or acquitting them here, yet when the Lord comes, all these things shall be brought to light, and then the people of God will have some part to act in this work.

Christ's testimony speaks of a similar work: "Then answered Peter and said unto Him, Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed thee; what shall we have, therefore? And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Matt. xix, 27, 28. Again he says: "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me: that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Luke xxii, 28-30. And Paul says to the Corinthians: "Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints? Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life?" 1 Cor. vi, 1-3.

Albert Barnes, in his notes on this text, says: "The common interpretation, that of Grotius, Beza, Calvin, Doddridge, &c., is that it refers to the future Judgment, and, that Christ (and will, in that day, be employed in some manner in judging the world. That this is the true interpretation is apparent for the following reasons: 1st. It is the obvious interpretation—that which will strike the great mass of men, and is likely, therefore, to be the true one. 2d. It accords with the account in Matt. xix, 28 ["In the regeneration, ye shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel,"] and Luke xxii, 30 ["I appoint unto you a kingdom as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel,"]. 3d. It is the only one which gives a fair interpretation to the declaration that the saints shall judge angels, in verse 3."

That this refers to the future Judgment is evident, from the fact that it is contrasted with "things that pertain to this life." The Judgment of angels we do not suppose refers to the holy angels, but to those which have fallen, which are reserved unto the Judgment, as spoken of by Jude and Peter. Jude says: "And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness unto the Judgment of the great day." Jude 6. Peter says: "For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto Judgment;" 2 Pet. II, 4.

As the saints have endured three temptations from these fallen angels, how consistent that they, in the Judgment, should have the privilege of bearing testimony concerning the assaults of Satan upon them. Again, as the people of God in all ages have endured trial and persecution, and even death, from the hand of the wicked, how reasonable, that they, with the records kept by angels in the books open before them, with the hidden things of darkness brought to light, should have opportunity to bear testimony themselves upon these cases. How interesting to the people of God to hear from the lips of those who have endured trials from the wicked in other ages, a rehearsal of those things. In this, there would not only be evidence against the wicked, but, when all have thus borne their testimony, the story of redemption will have been told once.

It is probably this same scene of Judgment which David has in mind, when he says: "Let the saints be joyful in glory; let them sing aloud upon their beds. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand; to execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishment upon the people; to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron; to execute upon them the judgments written; this honor have all his saints. Praise ye the Lord." Pa. cxlix, 6-9. This evidently does not refer to affairs in this life, for the saints are represented as being "joyful in glory" when this takes place. The "two-edged sword" in their hands, is probably the word of God. See Eph. vi, 17; Rev. i, 16; xix, 15. The time when they engage in the work, when they are reigning "with Christ." Rev. xi, 4. Then they sit upon thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. Then they judge the world. Then they "judge angels." This reign of Judgment, which covers the whole period of one thousand years, closes with the resurrection of the wicked; Rev. xx, 6; and their destruction around the camp of the saints. Rev. xx, 7-9. This same fire that burns up the wicked purifies the earth; 2 Pet. iii, 7; and fits it for the eternal abode of the saints. Then comes the time that the saints "shall reign on the earth." Rev. v, 10.

It must be evident to all, that before the saints enter upon this reign of Judgment "with Christ," judgment must be passed upon their own cases. So we now raise the inquiry: When are the saints judged? In Rev. xiv, 6, 7, is a definite message concerning the timing of Judgment: "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his Judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters." Here is a proclamation of the definite time for Judgment to sit. It is the first of a series of three messages which carry us down to the coming of Christ. These messages follow each other in quick succession, and the third is followed by the coming of the Lord. After the message of the third angel, John says: "And I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the Son of Man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle. And another angel came out of the temple, crying with a loud voice to him that sat on the cloud, Thrust in thy sickle, and reap; for the time is come for thee to reap; for the harvest of the earth is ripe." Rev. xiv, 14, 15. According to Christ's testimony, in Matt. xiii, 39, "The harvest is the end of the world," these messages carry us down to the end. The first of these proclaims the definite time for the session of Judgment. To claim that the time of this message is the actual time for Christ to come, is virtually to blot out the second and third messages, for they are placed between the first angel's message and the actual coming of Christ. Then this first angel's message is sounded before the coming of Christ, and that long enough for two other messages to accomplish their work, and long enough for the Judgment work herein predicted, to be accomplished before Christ comes. These angels are symbols representing messages of truth to be proclaimed by men in the closing period of the gospel age; proclaimed in the period of time when the harvest of the earth is being ripened off.

In Revelation, chap. 2, is symbolized an angel with a definite message, which we think agrees with this first angel's message, and is, indeed, that identical message. Please read the entire chapter, and notice the points of identity.

In the symbols here introduced, we understand the angel represents a class of messengers who give, from the prophetic portion of the book of God, and from the prophetic times, the announcement of their termination. John, receiving and sealing that book, represents those who will hear and receive the message, which spiritual food will be a matter of rejoicing to their hearts, represented by the book's being sweet as honey to the taste. The bitterness of the book represents the bitter scene of disappointment they meet after the time proclaimed expires, or, after they have eaten the book. The angel's having his feet on sea and land, shows the world-wide extent of the message. The message is proclaimed from a book open, which implies that it has once been closed. By comparing this with Dan. xii, 4, 6, we find that the book containing prophetic times has been closed, and was so to be till "the time of the end." By looking carefully, you will see that this message of Rev. x is placed between the sounding of the sixth and seventh trumpets. That inspiration placed this chapter there to give us the time when its events are to be fulfilled, is evident from the fact that the angel of this tenth chapter points to the sounding of the seventh trumpet as an event about to take place. See verses 6, 7.

Among the events enumerated under the sounding of the seventh trumpet, we read: "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged." Rev. xi, 18. This also serves to identify the message of Rev. x, with that of Rev. xiv, 6, 7, as both messages have reference to the definite time of the session of the Judgment. According to the events of the sixth trumpet, it ceased to sound Aug. 11, 1840. (See "Seven Trumpets," published at the Review Office). At that time a message, based on the prophetic periods, was being proclaimed. It was proclaimed to all civilized portions of the earth. It was a time of great rejoicing among those who heard and believed the Advent doctrine, but a bitter disappointment when the time passed. According to Rev. x, that message was to be proclaimed from an open book. The message, and especially the time, of 1844, was given from the book of Daniel, which Daniel was commanded to close up till the "time of the end." Some may object to that work's being regarded as the fulfillment of this message, because the Advent people met with a disappointment; but a disappointment is in the message of Rev. x. When the message of Rev. x, is given, that people suppose that their work for the world is done; else why are they told, "Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings."

The Advent people rejoiced, like the disciples before Christ, when he rode into Jerusalem, yet, like them, were filled with sadness and gloom when disappointed in their expectations. The disciples, with wrong ideas in their minds as to the nature of the event coming, fulfilled scripture, and so did the Advent people. The Advent people proclaimed the termination of prophetic times. In this, as can be shown, and as even their opponents admitted, they were not mistaken. They proclaimed the "hour of God's Judgment come," but, having the common view of the Judgment, and supposing that Christ was coming at the termination of those periods, they met with a disappointment in the manner of the fulfillment of the message they proclaimed. As before shown, this Advent proclamation was made in the very time marked in Rev. ix, x, xi, for such a message to be given. As it would be folly to admit of a false fulfillment of prophecy, in the very time of a true fulfillment, we claim that the message given was right in its fundamental features, and that it was the message bringing the people of God up to the time of the session of Judgment on the righteous dead, which, as we have before shown, is to take place before the actual coming of Christ.

As to the time the Adventists proclaimed, even Prof. Bush, who never believed the Advent doctrine, wrote to William Miller as follows: "I do not conceive your errors on the subject of chronology to be at all of a serious nature, nor, in fact, to be very wide of the truth. In taking a day as the prophetic time for a year, I believe you are sustained by the soundest exegesis, as well as fortified by the high names of Mede, Sir Isaac Newton, Bishop Newton, Faber, Scott, Keith, and a host of others, who have long since come to, substantially, your conclusions on this head." The great point in the theory of the Adventists in 1844 was that those prophetic days of Daniel were a day for a year, and that the longest of those times would come to a termination in 1844. That those times did thus terminate can be clearly established. The period of twenty-three hundred days of Dan. viii, which is explained to Daniel in chap. ix, by the angel, is shown to apply partly to his people, the Jews, and partly to some other people, the Gentiles. Part of it covers the time of the destruction of his city and sanctuary, Jerusalem, and the remainder must apply to the sanctuary of the gospel dispensation. This time, commencing with the decree respecting Jerusalem, which went forth, 407 B. C., would end A. D. 1844, to complete twenty-three hundred full years. The event to transpire is connected with the sanctuary in which our high priest, Christ, ministers.

Again, taking the times of Dan. xii: Two powers are presented which are to war upon God's people; one is to be taken away to set up the other; meeting its fulfillment in the Pagan and Papal Roman persecutions. From the point where the first of these powers is taken away to set up the other one, thirteen hundred and thirty-five days carry us to an important event, or to a time when those who come to it will be blessed. The Pagan religion of the Roman empire was abolished by law in A. D. 508. Thirty years saw a transfer of power to Papacy, which held the dominion for twelve hundred and sixty years, making the twelve hundred and sixty. Thirteen hundred and thirty-five from the first year of the taking away of the daily, Paganism, carry us to 1844, the very time when God pronounced a blessing upon those who come to that time. He then declares that at the end of the days; that is, all the days, or times, of Daniel,—and the twenty-three hundred come down the farthest of any—Daniel shall stand in his lot. The nature of the work in the service of our high priest, where Christ ministers, we think will show that in the nature of the event to take place at the end of the twenty-three hundred days, as well as reveal the fact as to how the Judgment of God's people is accomplished. As the angel in Revelation commands John to measure the temple of God after the disappointment there presented, so the explanation of the sanctuary, or temple in which Christ ministers, will shed light on this all-important matter.

It is said that Daniel shall stand in his lot at the end of the days. Some suppose this to mean that he should enter his reward; but when we look at the words rendered lot, we find that there are two Hebrew words which are rendered lot in the Old Testament. One is goh-rah, the other is goh-el. The latter is the term used when speaking of the lot of an inheritance, or a region of country. The former occurs, as may be ascertained from the Englishman's Hebrew Concordance, seventy-six times in the Old Testament. It is the word used in Dan. xii, 13. From its use in all the other cases in the Old Testament, we see it has the one signification of "The determination of Providence," or "The decision of man's case." With this view of the matter, then, the angel tells Daniel that his case shall be decided, or judged, at the end of the days.

In looking at the work of the priesthood in the last dispensation, we see that the time Israel stood in their lot, was on the last day of the yearly service, on the tenth day of the seventh month, when the lots were cast upon the two goats, one to be the Lord's, and the other to be the scapegoat, and when the high priest, with the blood of the Lord's goat, performed a service to cleanse the sanctuary. This work typified that of Christ, and points us to the time when not "the patterns of things in the Heaven" are cleansed by the blood of beasts, but when the heavenly things themselves are cleansed "with better sacrifices than these;" viz., the blood of Christ. Heb. ix, 23.

But the time when Christ cleanses the gospel sanctuary is at the end of the 2300 days, which, as we have before shown, was in 1844, where the Judgment proclamation was given. As in the typical sanctuary the second apartment was opened only once, and that for the purpose of the high priest's going in to cleanse it, so the temple in Heaven is not opened for Christ to enter it and accomplish his work of cleansing it until the seventh angel sounds. But when the seventh angel sounds it is after the time of its sounding has been proclaimed by the angel of Rev. x, 8, 7. When the time comes for the apartment of the temple in Heaven to be opened, which has the ark of the testament in it, there are voices in Heaven saying the time is come for the dead to be judged; Rev. xi, 18; thus showing that the work of Christ in that temple is a work of Judgment. But when the seventh angel sounds, and this Judgment work is going on, there is still probation, and the gospel, or "mystery of God," is being finished.

The cleansing of the sanctuary is the blotting out of sins. These are not blotted out as soon as the sinner is converted, but just before Christ comes. Peter says: "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted; that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you." Acts iii, 19, 20. When this real work of blotting out sins is accomplished, by Christ, it does not leave those sins where, as in the type, they are remembered again "every year," Heb. x, 8; but they are remembered "no more." Heb. x, 17. The placing of the sins of the righteous where they are remembered against them no more, must be the decision, or Judgment of their cases. That their sins are not thus blotted out at conversion, but at some period subsequent to the close of their probation, is further evident by Ezekiel's testimony: "When the righteous turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and doeth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doeth, shall he live? All his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned: in his trespass that he hath trespassed, and in his sin that he hath sinned, in them shall he die." Eze. xviii, 24. It seems from this that sins which have been repented of, roll back upon the sinner when turning from his righteousness. How consistent and plain when we admit Peter's testimony, and locate the blotting out of sins in the time Christ is finishing his work as a priest, judging his people, just before coming to reward them.

Peter, in his epistle, locates the decisive Judgment of God's people at that time: "They think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you; who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead. For, for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit. But the end of all things is at hand." I Pet. iv, 4-7. That this Judgment just before the end is upon the salute, and a work deciding who shall be saved, is further apparent from the 17th and 18th verses of the above chapter: "For the time is come that Judgment must begin at the house of God; and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God? And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?"

From the comparison of these facts, it appears that we are in the period of the Judgment—a work that first commences with the dead of past ages, and is to close with the cases of the living. For upward of twenty-five years, since the expiration of the 2300 days of Daniel viii, we have been in the Judgment period. Rapidly are the moments rolling round which shall bring in review before God the cases of the living salute. As in the type it was necessary for those living in that great day of atonement to make thorough examination of their own selves, and confess all their sins, so here. The law of God was brought to bear upon them to show them all their sins; so the third angel's message bears the commandments of God to us. We want it applied, in its principles of love to God and our fellow-men, to our hearts. All our sins must be confessed if we would have them blotted out, and have our cases clear in the record of Heaven.

Oh! the solemn time in which we are living. May God impress it upon all our hearts.

"Pardon's last hour is expiring in Heaven."

A court is in session. If it were an earthly court, and in it our case was to be decided for life, what intense interest we would manifest. How much more interest and solemnity in this case! It is about to be decided whether you and I shall have eternal life, or whether we remain to have our lot in the second resurrection, and second death. At times I have some little sense of the solemnity of this hour. I want my sins all confessed, that Christ may plead his blood in my behalf. May God arouse us from slumber to a sense of this time. Shall we slumber and sleep in this eventful time? or shall we be active? My cry daily is, that God may, by his Spirit, arouse me, arouse us all. Let us keep awake and prepared for duty.

RH Sept 24, 1869

R F Cottrell

THE CLOSING MESSAGES.—NO. 5.

THE 2300 days do not reach to the advent of Christ. We think they ended in 1844. None can show that they reach to the present time. But the work of the cleansing of the sanctuary must commence at their termination. The sanctuary of God is not on the earth in this dispensation; it is where our High Priest is, at the "right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the Heavens." See Heb. viii, 1, 2. Its cleansing is to be accomplished with the atoning blood of Christ; it is the blotting out of the sins of his people. Consequently he should not come to earth to cleanse the sanctuary. He should do this work before he leaves his priesthood and comes a king. The blotting out of sins is a work of judgment for the people of God. It is their acquittal—a decision that they are to have part in the first resurrection, and are exempt from the second death. How fitting, then, that when this final work of the atonement is to commence, at the appointed time at the end of the days, it should be proclaimed in the earth, "Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his Judgment is come." But with the view that no judgment takes place before the second advent, such a proclamation must lead to a disappointment whenever it shall come. The sanctuary subject has led us to correct this error by the plain teaching of the word of the Lord, and the example of the types in the former dispensation—the sanctuary of the first covenant, and its cleansing once a year. See Heb. ix; Lev. xvi.

Besides this, the connection of the judgment-hour message in the prophecy proves that it is not the last message; for "there followed" the second and the third angels, with their messages of warning, and consequently of probation, after this message is given. The Advent people, believing as you do now, how natural for them to be disappointed then, as you would be now, should the hour of God's Judgment be heralded in the world, and you should believe it. We have, since our disappointment, corrected our false view of the Judgment hour; you may, if you will give us a hearing, correct yourself without such a disappointment. You may learn from the experience of others, and share in the happy result of increase of wisdom and understanding in the word of the Lord.

The disappointment, then, is nothing against the fulfillment of this message in 1844, but rather in its favor, since it shows the overruling hand of the Lord. He fulfilled his word in his own appointed time and way. We were disappointed, and knew not the cause until we had investigated the word anew and found it. The chosen apostles of Jesus would not believe when they heard that he was risen from the dead. But this, their unbelief, gives to the fact of his resurrection additional weight of proof. He was not stolen from the sepulcher by them, but rose, contrary to their expectation, and in spite of their unbelief. But the wound of their disappointment in his crucifixion was healed, and their unbelief in his resurrection was corrected when they were convinced of his resurrection, and they could say, in the language of Peter, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath begotten us again to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." We also can give thanks to God for the increasing light we have received since our disappointment, and which the study of the cause of that disappointment was a means of leading us into.

God has led in the Advent movement, notwithstanding our error, and we only believe it with greater assurance. The first angel's message has been fulfilled. The strongest evidence is, that it has been announced in the right time and manner.

R. F. COTTRELL

Review of Wellcome and Goud.

BY REV. J. H. WAGGONER.

The Plan of Redemption by our Lord Jesus Christ; carefully examined and argued, by inquiring into God's revealed purpose in the creation of man, the Adamic law, the old and new covenants, atonement by the death and blood of Christ, universal resurrection of the dead, the Judgment, the Israel of God, Millennium, etc., etc. By J. C. Wellcome and Clarkson Goud.

The above is the voluminous title of a book of 400 pages, published by the authors (Yarmouth and Topsam, Me.). It is divided into twenty-one chapters, the first nine of which treat of the creation, the fall, and the means of recovery; the last twelve, of the new birth, redemption of the earth, the Judgment, the kingdom of God, resurrection, millennium, &c. I make this division because this review will relate mostly to the subjects of the first nine chapters; the remaining chapters containing little that could be of special interest to the readers of the Review, the subjects of the resurrection, kingdom, millennium, &c., having been so frequently written upon by others who occupy the same ground.

Before reading this book, I had seen such strong commendations of it in the World's Crisis, that I expected to find a work of more than ordinary research and clearness of design and execution. But I must confess to a disappointment in the reading. The most unqualified recommendations were kept standing from week to week in the Crisis; the most persistent efforts have been made to circulate it; and considering the self-contradictory positions of the book, and that some of its main points are directly opposite to what the Crisis has uniformly taught, I could but think the old saying might be aptly corrected for that paper thus—“puffing goes by favor.”

THE OBJECT OF THE WORK.

The object of the writers of this book, in its preparation, was two-fold: first, to oppose the teaching of the perpetuity of the law of God and the Sabbath; secondly, to oppose the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked. For the doctrine of non-resurrection I have no sympathy; I am not a believer in it, having never seen any evidence at all conclusive to my mind of its correctness; and I believe it may be successfully met and refuted—but not by such means as are resorted to in this book. The word of inspiration says, “And if a man also strive for masteries, yet in he not crowned, except he strive lawfully,” 2 Tim. 2: 5; and it appears to me that Messrs. Wellcome and Goud might have profited by keeping this in view. Let the error be ever so great, or the truth ever so important, we are not permitted to oppose one, or advocate the other, except by lawful means. In this work the error of non-resurrectionism is opposed by making a distinction between redemption by the death of Christ, and by the blood of Christ; a distinction for which there is no warrant in the Scriptures. Not only so, but it strikes at the foundation of every principle the authors have advanced in regard to the nature of man, and the subject of life and death. The only reason why they did not strike a fatal blow at their own views on these subjects is found in the fact that they could not prove the existence of the distinction they claim.

OUR AGREEMENT WITH THE BOOK.

It is a pleasure to me to agree with others when it is possible to do so; I would that we could agree altogether; but my regard for the truth renders this impossible. In this case it is a pleasure to note the points wherein I agree with the book; points which are held to be material in the faith of Seventh-day Adventists. We are all happy to find these points so strongly endorsed in a work, the main object of which is to oppose our faith. And if it be found that the authors have failed to harmonize the other parts of their work with these admissions, it is a dilemma of their own choosing; we accept the admissions, so fatal to their theory, in good faith, and only regret that the authors and their endorsers, (the Crisis and its correspondents) will not receive the plain, inevitable conclusions drawn from premises which they have helped to establish. As before remarked, one prominent object of the book is to oppose the idea of the perpetuity of God's law of ten commandments. Now we have ever claimed that the argument for its perpetuity rests very much on the nature of the law as a perfect rule of right, and its sufficiency as a rule of justification; and as a means, also, had it not been transgressed. Especial attention is called to the words of the authors of the book on these points.

NATURE AND SUFFICIENCY OF THE LAW.

Their positions on these points are partly expressed by direct declarations, and partly by quotations from the Scriptures. After quoting largely from the first chapter to the Romans, they remark:

“This graphic description of man's moral condition, and the cause of it, should be well considered by us all. It is a true account of the heart of all the race although these fruits are not developed in all to the same extent. Some of our readers may wish to be excused from being identified in this class. Such should read, ‘As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one. . . . Now we know that what things cover the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God,’ Rom. 3: 10-10.” Pages 80, 81.

That the law here referred to is that of the ten commandments is admitted; for the authors elsewhere quote from this connection and apply it to that law. Hence it is taught by them that all the race are proved guilty by that law. So we think and teach; but for so teaching we have been opposed by the Crisis and its correspondents, and by Messrs. Wellcome and Goud themselves, as errorists. What will they do about it hereafter? Now all know that guilt duly results from transgression; and as all are guilty before that law, all have transgressed that law; and, of course, to continue to transgress is to be transgressors continually. And as Christ died “to put away sin,” which is “transgression of the law,” if we persist in transgressing the law we thereby refuse to have our sins put away, and his death avails nothing for us; sin remains with us, and “the wages of sin is death.” I hope the authors will ponder well this page of their book, and consider the relation they bear to the facts.

Again they say:

"In speaking of the fallen state of man under the law, he [Paul] declares that the Jew is no better than the Gentile in the eyes of the law." Page 55.

And then again follows a quotation from Rom. 8. And no "the eyes of the law" are upon all, both Jews and Gentiles.

On page 54, they remark that "the law reveals man's fallen, sinful, lost condition." But this, it could not do if we were not amenable to its requirements. Thus, living in the United States, we might violate every principle established by British law, and yet that law of England could never be brought to prove us guilty, because we are not under its jurisdiction. So of the law referred to above; if it reveals our sinful condition, (as the Scriptures prove, and Messrs. Welles and Good also affirm) then it necessarily follows that we are under its jurisdiction. And for them to make the above statement, and again affirm, as they elsewhere do, that we are under its jurisdiction, is only to contradict themselves. And if they deny a contradiction in their two assertions, it will then devolve on them to show that we may be proved guilty by a law which has no jurisdiction over us. Will they attempt this? I should be pleased to see them do so. Man is a subject of judgment: "God shall bring every work into judgment;" and they who are in a "sinful, lost condition" now, must have that condition changed, and their lives be brought into harmony with the law, or it will rise up in the judgment, and there reveal that same sinful condition. Here they may cloak their "unlawful deeds" under the profession of faith in Christ; but there they will realize the truth of that scripture which they here ignore, viz.: that which shows that faith does not make void the law, but establishes it.

On pages 54, 55 they quote Rom. 8: 20-25, to further show that "the law exposes our sinfulness by nature," and "affords no relief." &c. We readily admit that the law affords no relief to the sinner; and we claim that the gospel affords no relief to him who persists in sin. Jesus does not save in sin, but "from sin." He died "to put away sin;" not his own sin, for he had none. But he who continues in transgression does not have his sin "put away;" he retains it; and the law will expose his sinfulness in the judgment, as it does here. If faith in Christ would save any one in transgression, Christ would be the "minister of sin," which he is not. Neither law nor gospel will afford relief to the willful, persistent transgressor of the law.

The law affords no relief to the sinner, its object being, first, to prevent sin; and secondly, to condemn sin where it is found. But if it condemns sin and proves the sinner guilty, then of course sin and the law are direct opposites—they can never harmonise. Freedom from sin is harmony with the law. But what, then, shall be thought of those who deny and disregard the claims of the law, and yet claim to be free from sin? We can do no better than to quote to them Rom. 8: 7: "The carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." From this it is very easy to see what position we shall occupy when the carnal mind is taken away. Then the enmity to God, and opposition to his law, ceases.

While it is acknowledged that the sinner is entirely dependent on the Lord Jesus Christ for restoration to righteousness, attention is called to the words of Rom. 8: 3; 21; and this was my main object in introducing the quotation from page 55. "But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets." The righteousness of God would have been manifested by the law had the law never been transgressed: as no remedy can be needed where no difficulty exists. Although the law will not confer righteousness on the transgressor, that coming to him only through Christ, the text says this righteousness is witnessed by the law. And the question arises, Is the witness competent? It must be. Then the righteousness which is conferred on the believer by Jesus Christ is witnessed by the law. But it would not be possible for any law to witness to principles not contained in that law; it cannot testify of matters foreign to itself. Therefore the law contains the very principles that the gospel enforces, and he who rejects the law of the Father virtually rejects also the gospel of the Son. This harmony is again directly affirmed by the apostle in Rom. 8: 1-4: he says "the righteousness of the law" is "fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit," or, "in them which are in Christ Jesus." By sin, or transgression of the law, righteousness is lost; for sin is unrighteousness; 1 John 5: 17. Through Christ it is restored to us. And once more we ask, Can the righteousness of a law be fulfilled in any one who continues to transgress that law? Of course not; for transgression or sin is unrighteousness, and most certainly righteousness and unrighteousness cannot exist together. So, to have righteousness restored to us, we must be brought in harmony with the law. This is further shown in that the carnal mind is not subject to the law, because "the law is spiritual;" Rom. 7: 14; and they "who walk after the Spirit" are subject to, and in harmony with, the spiritual law of God. They who are not in harmony with the law which is spiritual, cannot themselves be spiritual, but are carnal.

"The law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient." 1 Tim. 1: 9. On this text Dr. Clarke says:

"He does not say that the law was not made for a righteous man, but otherwise, it does not lie against a righteous man; because he does not transgress it; but it lies against the wicked."

"The law doth not lie against a righteous man—doth not strike or condemn him." Wesley's Notes.

After enumerating many sins which the law is against, the apostle adds: "And if there is any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine; according to the glorious gospel of the blessed God."

Verbs 10, 11. This shows, again, the most perfect harmony between the law and the gospel. On this harmony alone we find that the law witnesses to the righteousness conferred in the gospel; thus, the law having condemned the sinner, the gospel grants forgiveness and takes away the carnal mind or opposition to the law: and then the law witnesses to the work; that is, it approves the character so formed. Thus the gospel enables the believer so to walk that the righteousness of the law is fulfilled in him; and the law is against every thing that is contrary to the gospel. And finally, men shall be judged by the law according to the gospel. Rom. 2: 12, 13.

Let us turn again to the testimony of the book. On page 60, speaking of the law of ten commandments, they say:

"It was given to rescue God's name and his law from forgetfulness among the children of men." And, "In the eyes of this law all men are sinners, condemned to die."

And on pages 140, 141, speaking of the ten commandments, they say,

"It was the code which in its germ was given to Adam, and, in an elementary sense may be called the Adamic covenant for the government of the Adamic race while multiplying, replenishing, and subduing the earth. . . . Had the rules of this covenant been kept, no sin or death would have entered our world, and no other covenant would have been required.

. . . The fathers of Israel being a representative people, this covenant is given to them for the benefit of the world, to give the knowledge of man's relations to God," &c.

This is very important testimony in regard to the law being given to Adam, and its being the original rule of moral obligation. Also, if it had been kept, no other covenant would have been required, as there would have been no sin nor death; of course the law was of that nature that it would have justified the obedient and insured them life—precisely what we now obtain in or by the gospel. And herein is again shown the complete harmony between the law and the gospel. Says Paul, "The law was ordained unto life." It was designed to restrain men from sin, and so insure life by preventing death. Say our authors, it was "given for the benefit of the world," and, "to give the knowledge of man's relations to God." Happy had it been for the world had these relations been honored and preserved by obedience to the law. But can it appear consistent to any that Jesus Christ, God's beloved Son, would abolish a law of such a nature? would destroy a rule given to define man's relations to God? would break down a code which reveals man's fallen, sinful, lost condition, and condemns iniquity? No. The Scriptures teach that he magnified the law and made it honorable; that he came to put away his transgression by the sacrifice of himself; that he leads the believer to fulfill the righteousness of the law; and that in the last day the secrets of men will be judged by it. Blessed is the man who follows the Saviour in his perfect obedience, and is brought through faith in Christ in harmony with this law, that he may be free from condemnation when brought into Judgment, for it remains a truth that "the wages of sin is death."

The testimony contained in the foregoing extracts is very important. No stronger endorsement of the law, or more explicit recognition of its claims, and of its completeness and universality, could we ask. We can only regret that the writers, who were led by the plain declarations of Scripture to make such important admission on this subject, have not preserved a consistency throughout their work by continuing to recognize the claims of the law. Their theories have evidently prevented them from appreciating the force of their own declarations.

RH July 5, 1870

J H Waggoner

Review of Wellcome and Good.

BY ELD. J. H. WAGGONER.

(Continued.)

There are many covenants of agreement or promise noticed in the Scriptures, we find only one "covenant commanded," and this even "to a thousand generations." 1 Chron. 16: 16. This period is surely not expired. And that this commanded covenant is the ten commandments, is proved by the fact that it was "confirmed to Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant." Verse 17.

I do not see how it is possible for any one to read the book of Messrs. Wellcome and Good without observing their contradiction, not only of the Scriptures, but of themselves, on the subject of the covenant, and I am forced to believe that many have recommended their book, not because they can reconcile its statements, nor because they can indorse all its assertions, but because they are anxious to have the conclusions at which it aims, sustained.

COVENANT OF PRIESTHOOD.

On this subject they say:

"But the above-named class of objectors claim that because the law of the Aaronic priesthood was given at Sinai, therefore it is the first covenant, and of which Paul treats in Heb. 8: 6, 8. We deny that any covenant was made with the Aaronic priesthood at Sinai. The above claim proceeds upon the principle that because a covenant is a law, therefore all laws are covenants. . . . In support of the above singular claim, a text is often quoted from Num. 26: 12, 13." Page 44.

And again on the same subject.

"Here we will digress from our point for a time, to meet an objection often raised against this position by the class of teachers above referred to: viz., that there were two covenants made on Mount Sinai; one of ten commandments, and another concerning the Levitical priesthood; that they are entirely separate; and that while the latter is disannulled, the former is yet in full force on believers. The strenuous efforts of seventh-day teachers to make this statement appear true have so confused the minds of many honest persons that they fail to see, or, if they see, do not appreciate, the true relation of the priesthood to the covenant. The above claim, if admitted, would prove fatal both to the law and priesthood, and to the hope of the people, so far as they (the people) are concerned. But Paul, in his epistle to the Hebrews and Galatians, places this subject in such a light that those teachers are fully aware that if the foregoing claim fails, their seventh-day theory falls to the ground. Hence they claim that the covenant of ten commandments says nothing about priesthood, ordinances, or sacrifices." Page 46.

There are some very singular statements in the above quotations, and when I read these pages I could but think they contained evidence of great blindness or great deception on the part of the writers.

1. They deny "that because a covenant is a law therefore all laws are covenants." All laws are, indeed, covenants, but all covenants are not laws. A covenant may be a promise, merely, as that to Noah.

But Greenfield says a covenant is "a body of laws or precepts;" though this is not its first or ordinary meaning. The assumption put forth in this book is the reverse of the truth, or the true distinction is inverted, and their conclusions are erroneous.

2. We do not, as a "class of objectors," hold that "the covenant of the priesthood" was the first covenant; nor is Num. 26: 12, 13 often quoted by us to sustain such a claim. This assertion of Messrs. Wellcome and Good is without foundation. In a tract on "The Two Laws and Two Covenants," by Moses Hull, this text is quoted and referred to in such a manner as to give the reader to understand that he held such a view; but beside this I know of no author among Seventh-day Adventists who ever put forth such a claim. On the contrary, I always objected to that, as well as to other positions taken by Mr. Hull, and I know of others among us who likewise objected to the same, in whose judgment I have more confidence than I have in my own. And my objections were frankly stated to Mr. Hull at the time his tract was published. If any have been so easily misled as to follow him in that position, it is a matter of regret. That its publication by any one gives our opponents an opportunity to make capital against us, must be admitted. But that we as a "class" ever placed any reliance on that position, is not true. They who are acquainted with our writings, know that I speak correctly on this subject.

3. It is not true that we as a people attach any importance to that idea, or that we "are fully aware" or believe, that if that position falls our theory falls to the ground. If they understand our "theory" as they pretend, they will know that "that position" has no particular relation to it.

4. I cannot imagine why it is that to admit that claim "would prove fatal both to the law and the priesthood, and to the hope of the people, so far as they (the people) are concerned." If the first covenant was the "covenant of the priesthood," it would still be true that that covenant could pass away without abolishing the law. And the assertion that it would "prove fatal to the hope of the people, so far as they (the people) are concerned," seems to prove conclusively that Messrs. Wellcome and Good wanted to say something on the subject without having any clear idea of what it should be!

5. We still affirm that the "ten commandments say nothing about priesthood, ordinances, or sacrifices."

And we have the Scriptures to sustain us in the affirmation. In Ex. 10: 5, the condition of obeying the voice of God has undoubted reference to obeying that which God speaks with his voice, viz.: the ten commandments. See Deut. 4: 12, 13. Also in Jer. 11: 1-4, the Lord refers to the words of the covenant which he commanded to their fathers, saying, "Obey my voice, and do them;" that is, the words which his voice proclaimed, and in Jer. 7: 22, he says: "For I spoke not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices; but this thing commanded I them, saying, Obey my voice." Therefore obeying God's voice, or doing what God's voice uttered—the ten commandments—was not necessarily connected with the system of offerings or sacrifices. And our authors themselves have acknowledged the same thing, by saying if that law had not been broken, there would have been no sin; and if no sin, of course, no priesthood nor sacrifices. The transgression of that law created the necessity for sacrifices, therefore that law must have existed before the sacrifices. And if it once existed without that system of sacrifices, why might it not again? They have offered no reason why it might not. But if they still wish to contest the point, we invite them to settle it by pointing to the place in the ten commandments where they do speak of priesthood or sacrifices.

PENALTY OF THE GOSPEL.

On this they remark:

"An agreement or covenant was made between the Father and Son from the foundation of the world, that Christ should come in the flesh (see 2 John 7), fulfill the law (Matt. 5:18), suffer, the just for the unjust (1 Pet. 3:18), and thereby redeem Adam, and in him, the race from death, and the earth from the curse, and place him on a second probation under a law (of faith in Christ), (Gal. 3:13; 1 Cor. 9:21), which when broken could only give life on repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ, and whose penalty is the second death. Rev. 21:8." Page 106.

Messrs. Wellcome and Gould have a most singular system of theology, if crude ideas thrown together without form or connection can be called a system.

1. What can be the difference between "faith in Christ," and "the law of faith in Christ?" Just what distinction the authors design to make is more than I can imagine. The law of faith, when broken, can only give life through faith! Would, is it not?

2. The opposers of the law of God have never failed to revile it, because it cursed the transgressor; for which we honor it, because it shows that the law is opposed to wrong. But on their own ground, what must they think of the gospel? The law, they say, inflicted only temporal death, while the penalty of the gospel is eternal death. Well, the law would not curse the obedient; will the gospel save the disobedient? There is room for some thought here on the part of the opposers of the law.

3. We have never learned from the Scriptures that sin is the transgression of the gospel! An inspired writer in the New Testament says "sin is the transgression of the law;" another says, "by the law is the knowledge of sin." These two texts contain the same idea and express the same fact; and that "the law" therein refers to the ten commandments, and not to the gospel, is proved in that it is a law which will not justify, but only condemns; and our authors have so applied it in another place, by referring Paul's expressions in Rom. 8 to the ten commandments. And again they said the same thing when they referred to that law and said, The law gives the knowledge of man's sinful, lost condition, and all the race are proved sinners by it. Why not be consistent with the Scriptures, and even with their own previous declaration? Because, as has been said, error cannot follow a straight line. Why not recognise the evident relation between the law and the gospel? the one condemning sin, the other saving from sin by taking away the carnal mind, and bringing back the rebel to subjection to the law. The gospel does not contain the penalty of death; it is good news; it will avert the penalty of the law if we faithfully embrace it. But if we reject the gospel (or pardon), the law is allowed to take its course and to enforce its penalty; for "the wages of sin is death," and "sin is the transgression of the law." They who are yet transgressing, if they do not wish to receive the wages, had better come from the service, and repent toward God by ceasing to transgress his law, and have faith toward the Lord Jesus Christ for the remission of past transgression.

OFFERINGS AND THE SANCTUARY.

On the relation of type and antitype they make the following remarks:

"To this view all the law types of the atonement agree: the body—the flesh—serves as food for the physical system, or is burned upon the altar; it was never carried into the holy of holies; they pointed only to the resurrection of the physical body, the resurrection of the race, and the lost inheritance. But not so with the blood, as we shall show in its proper place." Page 118.

And again they say:

"In all the above passages of Scripture, the Saviour is presented in his official character as high priest, in Heaven itself (the antitype of the holiest of all on earth), officiating with his own blood; for it is said, 'If he were on earth he should not be a priest;' and here we repeat that priests never carried the body of the victim sacrificed into the holy of holies; it was left in the outer court to be used as food, or burned on the altar, while the blood was offered by the high priest in the holiest of all, to obtain forgiveness. Page 126.

The assertion that the bodies, or flesh, of the offerings, were not carried into the holy of holies, or most holy place, is true, and would not require a notice were it not that the inference is designed to be conveyed that they were taken into the holy. But what is true of the most holy is also true of the holy in this respect. The body or flesh was never taken into the sanctuary at all, neither into the holy or most holy; while the blood was sprinkled in both, with this difference, that into the most holy it was only taken on the tenth day of the seventh month—the day of atonement. I notice this because an effort is made by that "class of teachers" to distinguish between "the sanctuary," and the "holy of holies." But they admit that the blood was taken by the high priest into the most holy place for sin; and Paul says in Heb. 10:11, that the "blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin." Where, then, do they obtain the distinction between the sanctuary and the most holy place?

Again, they assert that "Heaven itself" is the antitype of the "holiest of all" on earth. By this they would be understood that the antitype of the sanctuary, or holy, is not in Heaven. Notice a few facts on this subject:

1. As above shown, the blood was taken into the sanctuary, both into the holy and most holy; but the bodies were taken into neither.

2. Paul says our high priest, Jesus, is a minister of the sanctuary in Heaven, of which that made by Moses was a pattern. Heb. 9:23. The earthly sanctuary, and not the most holy place alone, was a shadow or example of the heavenly. Heb. 8:1-5.

3. Paul says the HOLY PLACES made with hands are the figures of the true where Christ is gone. This is clear and positive proof that both the holy and the most holy places are figures of the true sanctuary where Christ is gone. Heb. 9:23, 24.

4. The book of Revelation contains statements concerning the position of our high priest in Heaven, which confirm our view. When John was caught up in the Spirit into Heaven, there to receive a view or vision of the opening of the seals and sounding of the trumpets, he described the throne of God and its surroundings, saying, There were seven lamps of fire burning before it. In the pattern or figure of this, the seven lamps of fire (improperly translated candlesticks), were in the holy—not in the most holy. And in the holy, before the door, on the south side of which were set the lamp-stands, the Lord promised to meet the priests of Israel and his glory should be there manifested. See Ex. 20:42, 43. But when the trumpets were all sounded, and under the seventh, John saw the temple of God opened in Heaven where was the ark of his testament. Rev. 11:14-19. This was the most holy place, and only opened on the day of atonement.

5. Though much stress is laid by our opponents on Paul's words in Heb. 9:19, 20, we find this in perfect harmony with the view we here advocate. This text says that Jesus has entered "within the vail." On this they assert that the vail divided between the holy and the most holy, and that therefore Jesus entered the most holy, when he ascended to Heaven, and not, as we teach, under the sounding of the seventh trumpet. Their conclusion would be just were there but one veil. But Paul says, Heb. 9:8. "And after this second veil the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all." Now there cannot be a second without a first; and there cannot be a first and second unless there are two. So their conclusion is groundless, and must so appear unless they can prove that Paul refers to "the second veil" in Heb. 9:19, which they cannot.

A. D. 1844.

Around this date cluster many important events which are noted in prophecy; so much so, that it forms a new era in prophetic fulfillment. The believing student of prophecy and its fulfillment can see that a great change took place there, and that momentous predicted events hinge upon, and radiate from, this date.

Here terminated the great prophetic period of 2300 years. Of this there can be no doubt in the mind of any one who has thoroughly investigated the subject. "To seal up the vision and prophecy,"—to make it certain beyond the possibility of mistake—the gauge of seventy weeks or 490 years is given. This seventy weeks is cut off from the 2300 years, and consequently begins with, and gives date to, the whole. Examining this gauge or measuring rod, we find at its commencement the commandment to restore and rebuild Jerusalem. Passing along seven weeks, or forty nine years, we find a spur in the gauge indicating the end of the work of rebuilding. At the end of "threescore and two weeks" more, that is, sixty nine weeks or 483 years from the first date, another spur points out the commencement of the personal ministry of "Messiah the Prince;" three years and a half further on, in the midst of the seventieth and last week, another points to the crucifixion; and still three and a half years onward, at the end of the confirmation of the gospel covenant especially with the Jewish people and the turning to the Gentiles, we find the last spur of the gauge. Laying this gauge upon the period of 2300 years, supposing it to commence in the fall of the year, 457 before Christ, we find each spur pointing to the exact time of the several events indicated. Forty-nine years from this date the restoring and building of Jerusalem is complete; 484 years more, or 493 from the first date, and we find the Messiah proclaiming to Israel, "The time is fulfilled; repent and believe the gospel;" three and a half years more, in the spring of A. D. 31, Messiah is "cut off in the midst of the week;" and three and a half more, and the special work for the Jews is done, bringing us to the full of A. D. 34. Here is complete harmony throughout.

But supposing the 2300 years to commence at any other date besides 457 before Christ, and every spur or point in the measuring rod given by the angel will be out of place—they will not point the place of one of the events we have named—and hence we are shut up to the conclusion that the beginning date is A. D. 457, and hence the 2300 days end in A. D. 1844.

Besides the chronological and historical proof that the period begun in A. D. 457, we have several events confirmatory of the view that they did actually terminate in 1844.

1. As we draw near to that point of time the predicted proclamation of Rev. 14:6, 7, was raised. "Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come," was indeed proclaimed with a loud voice.

2. A general spirit of awakening and revival prevailed, and thousands sought the Lord, as the fruit of the advent proclamation.

3. But before reaching the fall of 1844, a general spirit of opposition to the Advent doctrine was manifest with the leading religionists of the time, so much so that earnest Christians were rejected from churches for no other reason than that they cherished and rejoined in the hope that Jesus was soon coming; and living and acting as though they believed it, and were anxious that themselves and others should be prepared to pass the searching test of the Judgment.

4. Here the cry was raised, as predicted in Rev. 14:8, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen;" and when the point of time was reached, the Adventists stood out by themselves, disappointed, and exposed to the scoffs and jeers of those who had rejected them and despised their hope.

5. Here a "dead calm" ensued, and Heaven no breezes gave. Those who loved the Lord were using the "oar of prayer," while their exulting foes were made to feel that they themselves had been forsaken by the Spirit of God, and that, instead of a spirit of revival, a "great spiritual dearth" was everywhere prevalent. During this calm, which lasted till about 1848 (a date remarkable for its startling events), the way was preparing for future action.

6. Here Spiritualism was let loose upon a spiritless church, and the scripture had a striking fulfillment which says, "They received not the love of the truth that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness." Truth had been rejected and despised, and Satan is permitted to come in with a flood of infidelity. Of the wonderful and unprecedented "progress" of this delusion I need not speak. This did not come without a cause. Satan was as ready to work before; but he was not permitted till a certain point in apostasy had been reached.

7. Here, too, that spirit of revival came into those meetings called "Union"—a mere conglomeration of heterogeneous and discordant materials—which would not tolerate a prayer for the oppressed and down-trodden slave. Since that a military conversion on this subject has been experienced.

8. Here too the anger of the nations begins which will not be appeased till it is crushed out in the "battle of the great day," when God shall make "war to cease unto the end of the earth," by breaking the bow, cutting the spear in sunder, and burning the chariots in the fire. Witness the revolutions in Europe of 1848, and the unceasing preparations for war throughout the world ever since.

9. And last, but, though apparently small, not the least, in my estimation, the light of the last message of mercy, Rev. 14:9-12, was seen arising like the dawn of the morning. Amid the noisy croakings of unclean spirits and the premonitory throbs of political, as well as physical, earthquakes, it is doing its solemn and fearful work. Other movements look great compared with this, but this is great, because it is of God. His right hand will get the victory.

Truly 1844 is a remarkable date.

R. F. COTTRELL.

Atonement.—No. 15.

Much controversy might have been avoided among writers on theology if the proper distinction had been regarded between the death of Christ and the atonement. In view of this distinction, which we propose to notice, we have avoided the expression, "vicarious atonement." We firmly hold that the death of Christ is vicarious. This the Scriptures abundantly teach. The word vicarious being generally used in the strict sense of substitution is properly applied to the death of Christ, as in his death he stood in the sinner's stead, and suffered just what the law demanded of the sinner, the loss of his life.

But the atonement is the work of a priest, and it is not anything which the law required of the sinner, because it is something which it is utterly impossible for the sinner to make. A sinner may die for his own sins and thereby meet the demands of justice, but he is then lost, and no atonement is made for him. The action of the priest is not strictly in the sinner's stead, for what he does is entirely outside of what the sinner was required to do or could do, and hence his action is not properly vicarious. As long as the distinction is lost sight of between the death of the offering and the work of the priest in making the atonement, so long must the expression "vicarious atonement" mislead the mind, and, to avoid erroneous impressions, it is well to discard it.

When any one brought an offering, he was required to lay his hand upon its head; if the people had sinned, the elders of the congregation were required to lay their hands upon the head of the offering; but in every case the priest made an atonement. See Lev. 4:20, 28, 31, 35; 5:6, 10, 14, 18; 6:7; 16:30, 32, and others. "When a ruler hath sinned . . . he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a male without blemish; and he shall lay his hand upon the head of the goat, and kill it in the place where they kill the burnt offering before the Lord; it is a sin offering. . . . And the priest shall make an atonement for him." Lev. 4:22-26. Three things in this work we notice in their order: 1. He shall lay his hand upon the head of the offering. 2. He shall kill it. 3. The priest shall make an atonement. Here it is plainly seen that the killing of the offering and making the atonement are distinct and separate acts; and we shall find that in every case where a sin offering was brought to the priest, he took the blood to make an atonement, according to the word of the Lord: "For the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul." Lev. 17:11.

Of the ceremony of laying hands upon the head of a sin offering, Rollin, in his remarks on the religion of the Egyptians, says:—

"But one common and general ceremony was observed in all sacrifices, viz., the laying of hands upon the head of the victim, loading it at the same time with imprecations, and praying the gods to divert upon that victim all the calamities which might threaten Egypt." Thus we see that the idea of substitutionary sacrifice, or vicarious death, was not confined to the Hebrews, but was recognized wherever the efficacy of sacrifices was acknowledged, which must have been revealed immediately after the fall of man.

In Lev. 16 is given the work of the high priest on the day of atonement, which typified the work of our High Priest and Saviour. On the tenth day of the seventh month, the high priest made an atonement for all the people. The Lord fixed it as a statute, "to make an atonement for the children of Israel, for all their sins once a year." Verses 29, 34. First, he made an atonement for himself and for his house, that he might appear sinless before God when he stood for the people. But this first act did not typify anything in the work of Christ, for Paul says he was separate from sinners, and therefore need not offer for himself. Heb. 7:26, 27. As the high priest entered the most holy place on the day of atonement, it will be necessary to take a brief view of the sanctuary to understand this work.

The book of Exodus, commencing with chapter 25, contains an order from the Lord to make him a sanctuary, with a full description thereof, together with the formula for anointing the priests and inducting them into their office. The sanctuary was an oblong building, divided into two parts; the first room was called the holy, which was entered by a door or veil on the east side. The second part was called the most holy, which had no outside entrance, but was entered by a door or veil at the back or west end of the holy, called "the second veil." The articles made and placed in the sanctuary were an ark of wood overlaid with gold, and a mercy-seat, which was the cover of the ark. On the mercy-seat were made two cherubim of gold, their wings shadowing the mercy-seat. In the ark were placed the testimony, or tables of stone, containing the ten commandments. See Ex. 25:18-21; 31:18; 1 Kings 8:9. The ark was put into the most holy place of the sanctuary, and was the only article put therein. In the holy place, or first room, were the table of show-bread, the golden candlestick, and the altar of incense.

When the commandment was given to make the sanctuary, the object was stated by the Lord, that he might dwell among them. A holy dwelling-place, or dwelling-place of the Lord, is given as the signification of the word sanctuary. In accordance with this design, the Lord said he would meet with the high priest above the mercy-seat, between the wings of the cherubim, there to commune with him of all things that he would give him in commandment unto the children of Israel. Ex. 25:22. But by other scriptures we learn that he would meet with them there, in the most holy place, only once a year, to wit, on the tenth day of the seventh month, which was the day of atonement. He promised also to meet with them at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, or holy place, where there was a continual or daily offering. Ex. 28:42, 43; Heb. 9:6, 7. Let it be borne in mind that although the glory of God was to abide in the sanctuary, it was manifested only in two places as specified: at the door of the holy where the table and candlestick were set; and in the most holy, above the ark, over the wings of the cherubim. Sometimes the glory of God filled the whole sanctuary; but when that was the case, the priests could not go in to minister. See Ex. 40:34, 35; 1 Kings 8:10, 11; 2 Chron. 5:13, 14; 7:1, 2. These few facts are sufficient to guide us in our examination of the atonement; and the reader is requested to examine them with care, and get them all well fixed in the mind.

Having made an atonement for himself, the high priest took two goats from the people, and cast lots upon them, one to be chosen for a sin offering, the other for a scape-goat. The goat upon which the Lord's lot fell was then slain, and the priest took its blood and went into the sanctuary and sprinkled it upon the mercy-seat and before the mercy-seat, in that manner making an atonement for the children of Israel, by blotting out their sins and removing them from the presence of God. That this was the true idea and intent of that work we learn from verses 15-19, wherein it is not only said that the priest made atonement for the children of Israel, but that he also made atonement for the holy places, cleansing them and hallowing them from the uncleanness of the children of Israel. The uncleanness or sins of the children of Israel could never come directly in contact with the holies of the sanctuary, but only by proxy; for they (the people) were never permitted to enter there. The priest was the representative of the people; he bore their judgment. Ex. 24:30. In this manner, the sanctuary of God was defiled; and as the blood was given to make atonement, the priest cleansed the sanctuary from their sins by sprinkling the blood upon and before the mercy-seat in the divine presence.

Thus it is seen that as the priest only made the atonement, so it was made in the sanctuary, and nowhere else. And in the sanctuary no one entered but the priest. This is further proof that the killing of the offering did not make the atonement, but was preparatory to it; for the atonement was made in the sanctuary, but the offering was not slain in the sanctuary.

These things, of course, were typical, and have their fulfillment in the work of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God. That he is a High Priest, and the only mediator in the gospel will be readily admitted; but the order and manner of his service must be determined by the Scriptures. The apostle states that he is a priest after the order of Melchisedec; i. e., a kingly priest on the throne of the Majesty in the Heavens, a minister of the sanctuary and true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man. Heb. 8:1. Of course this is the antitype of the earthly sanctuary, of the tabernacle pitched or made by man. He also affirms that if he were on earth, he would not be a priest for the evident reason that the priests of the earthly sanctuary were of the tribe of Levi, while our Lord sprang out of Judah of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood, and of which no man gave attendance at the altar. Heb. 7:13, 14; 8:4. This will correct a mistake very often made, that the priesthood of our Lord commenced on earth. If he had entered on the work of his priesthood at his baptism, as has been said, he would have acted with those who were types of himself; and if as a priest he had officiated in the temple, it would have been to make offerings typical of his own.* J. H. WAGGONER.

* That Christ was a "prophet, priest, and king," many of us have been taught from our early childhood; but comparatively few ever learn the true relation these offices sustain to each other. He was "that prophet" while on earth; and Paul's testimony given above shows that he filled no other office. Many suppose that his priesthood is connected with that kingdom which is given to him as the Son of David. But this is utterly forbidden by plain Scripture declarations. Aaron had no kingship, and David had no priesthood; and as Christ is not a priest after the order Aaron (Heb. 7:11), so is he not a king on the throne of David (i. e., during his priesthood). It is "after the order of Melchisedec," who was both king and priest that Christ is a priest on his Father's throne. At different times, he occupies two different thrones, see Rev. 8:11; and the throne of his Father in Heaven, which he now occupies as priest, "he shall have delivered up" at his coming. 1 Cor. 15:24-28. Then, in subjection to his Father, he will take his own throne, called also the throne of David, on which he will reign forever—without end. Luke 1:32, 33. But then he will no more be a priest, his priesthood being altogether on the throne he now occupies.

Atonement.—No. 16.

HAVING shown the distinction between the earthly and heavenly sanctuaries, Paul proceeds to set forth the relation which the ministrations in each sustain to the other, saying of the priests on earth: "Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Heb. 8: 5. As the earthly is the shadow and example, we may compare it with the heavenly, the substance, by which we may gain a clearer idea of the latter than is afforded us by any other means. Indeed, the comparison is made to our hand by the apostle. Note the following text, in which the distinction I claim between the death of Christ and his work as priest to make atonement, is clearly recognized. "For the bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate." Heb. 13: 11, 12. Thus we learn definitely that, as priest, he makes atonement; but his priesthood is not on earth, but in the sanctuary in Heaven; and that he did not suffer in the sanctuary where atonement is made. It was not necessary, in the type, for the priest to slay the offering; see Lev. 1: 4, 5; but it was necessary for the priest to take the blood and with it enter the sanctuary of the Lord to make an atonement. Jesus did not shed his blood as priest, it was shed by sinners; but he did by "his own blood" enter "into the holy places" not made with hands, of which the earthly were figures, "to appear in the presence of God for us." Heb. 9: 12, 24.

A work entitled, Manual of the Atonement, speaking of the death of Christ says:—"When he had completed his mediatorial work, he meekly yielded himself up into the hands of his Heavenly Father, saying, 'Into thy hands, I commit my spirit.'"

So far from his mediatorial work being completed at his death, it was not then commenced. This shows how men run into error by losing sight of the distinction between the death of Christ and the atonement. By confounding these, the atonement has been supposed to be general in its application made for all mankind. But this is not the scriptural view of the subject.

That Christ died for all, is distinctly stated, but we have seen that that was only preparatory to the atonement, and it is in the atonement that application is made of the blood to the full removal of sin. This is shown also in the type. The goat of the sin-offering was slain for the people, and, of course, was offered to meet the wants of all; but while the priest made the atonement, they were required to "afflict their souls," or come as humble penitents before the Lord, and whosoever did not should be cut off from among the people. Lev. 16: 29; 23: 27-29. This, then, was required of them individually, in that day, in order that their sins might be atoned for by the priest; for we cannot suppose that they would be cut off whose sins were actually blotted out, or removed from the presence of the judge, by the blood of the offering with which the sanctuary was cleansed from sin.

The same is also taught by Peter, who says that God exalted Jesus, who was slain, to be a prince and Saviour, to give repentance and forgiveness of sins. Acts 5: 30, 31. Now that "he died for all" there can be no question; and his death is absolute and without condition. But not so the atonement; for Peter says again, "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord," &c. Acts 3: 19. We have found that, when the priest made the atonement, he took the blood and cleansed the sanctuary of God from the sins wherewith it had been defiled; and this is the only act which will answer to the expression of blotting out the sins, for blood was the only thing that would remove them. Hence while the blood of Christ was shed for all, the actual benefit to be derived from that blood in atoning for, or blotting out, sin, is contingent, it availing only for those who will repent and be converted. He died for the world—he died for all; and he is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by him. Heb. 7: 25.

Another cause of confusion is this, that reconciliation and the atonement are often supposed to be the same; * and where the distinction is recognized their relation is not always observed, a disregard of which tends to about the same result as a denial of the distinction. Thus it has been said: "The atonement may exist without reconciliation, but reconciliation cannot exist without the atonement." This is exactly the reverse of the true order, and the error is the result of confounding the death of the offering with the atonement. It is quite true that reconciliation has the atonement in view, but it must precede the atonement. The death of Christ opens the way for the reconciliation of all who will accept it, but no one can have his sins actually atoned for or blotted out who rejects the offering of Christ, or who is not reconciled to God.

And yet, clear as is the distinction, there is a very close relation between them. Thus, the death of Christ, the offering of his blood, opens the way for reconciliation. Reconciliation secures an interest in the atonement; and this is made with the blood previously shed. The offering of Christ is the corner-stone of the whole work, for "without the shedding of blood there is no remission." It is for this reason we are so constantly directed to the cross of Christ. Without this, there could be neither reconciliation nor atonement. But that the relation and order of the work is as we here state, that his death, and reconciliation through his blood, look forward to his priestly work of atonement, is proved by the words of Paul in Rom. 5: 10. "For if when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life."

J. H. WAGGONER.

* Katalepsis, in Rom. 5: 11, rendered atonement, should be translated reconciliation.

Atonement.—No. 17.

Two views are held by different classes of theologians on the subject of reconciliation: One, that reconciliation is on the part of man only; the other, that reconciliation is mutual—that God is reconciled to man as well as man to God. It very frequently happens that controversy arises between men from a misapprehension of each other's meaning, and this is doubtless much the case on this subject. If it be shown that reconciliation must be on the part of an enemy or of the offending party only, then the first-named view is correct. But if by reconciliation is also meant that the justice of God must be appeased in behalf of the offender, the last view is the true one. Our inquiry must then be, Which is the scriptural view?

And first, it is necessary to notice the erroneous methods of expression which lead to misapprehension, whereby controversy on the subject is prolonged. Says Dr. Barnes:—

"Reconciliation is a fact produced between God and man by the atonement. God becomes the friend of the pardoned sinner."
—Atonement, p. 206.

This is equivalent to saying that God is not the friend, but the enemy, of the sinner before he is pardoned. But how, then, is pardon effected? The Saviour said that "God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son." Did he, as our enemy, love us? as our enemy, give his Son to die for us? was he, as our enemy, in Christ, reconciling us to himself? and does he, as our enemy, pardon us? and does he only become our friend after he has pardoned us? Now as Dr. Barnes was what is termed a "representative man," it would be natural for any one, on reading such remarks from him, to judge that the doctrine itself was absurd.

While it is true that God loved the world and gave his Son to die for the world, it is equally true, and very evident, that the death of Christ does not take anything from our actual guilt. We are as deserving of punishment as if he had never died. And, if we are not reconciled to God, if we do not so accept the offering of Christ as to appropriate it as our own, and to cease our violations of the divine law, that offering avails nothing for us. The justice of God stands arrayed against us as really as if his Son had never died. His death is an offering to the divine law—a vindication of the integrity and justice of the divine government, but not so as to make our pardon inconsistent with free grace. Says Andrew Fuller, the eminent Baptist author:—

"Free grace, according to Paul, requires a propitiation, even the shedding of the Saviour's blood, as a medium through which it may be honorably communicated."

And again, speaking of sacrifices for sin, he says:—

"All agree in the idea of the displeasure of the Deity being appeasable by an innocent victim being sacrificed in the place of the guilty."

This must be the correct idea. The justice or displeasure of the Deity is rendered appeasable by the sacrifice, but is really appeased by the mediation of our High Priest. And the Scriptures represent this as a reconciliation of God to man, as is said in Eze. 16: 62, 63: "And I will establish my covenant with thee; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord; that thou mayest remember, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame, when I am pacified toward thee for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord God."

The same word is here used in Eze. 16: 36, that is frequently rendered reconciliation, in the Old Testament. This seems to be decisive on this point.

That there is a difference of position of the parties must be admitted. Man is a rebel, an enemy; God, though he loves man in his ruined condition, is a just Governor. His love can certainly go no farther, and grant no more, than justice can permit. Justice must be appeased, or pacified; and while the offering makes it possible to pardon consistent with justice, it leaves us guilty, worthy of the condemnation under which we rest. So far as the law is concerned, a full vindication of its justice is found in the death of Christ; so far as the sinner is concerned, personally, he rests under condemnation still, until the mediation of Christ brings him into such harmonious relations with the divine government that it will not endanger its principles, nor reflect dishonor upon the Governor, to freely forgive him and take him back into his favor.

When we consider that the sacrifice is the means whereby the atonement is made, we can readily understand how hilosmos is used in 1 John 2: 2, defined by Liddell and Scott, a means of appeasing. Jesus Christ is the propitiation—the means of appeasing—divine justice, for all. It is by means of his intercession, his pleading his blood, that probation is given and mercy offered to the whole world.

As to the meaning of the term, we are not entirely confined to lexicons while the work is so minutely described as is that of the atonement in Lev. 16. Says David, "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity." Ps. 32: 1, 2. This blessing does not come upon all, but it is placed within the reach of all by the death of Christ. And whose sins will be covered? Evidently theirs who have confessed and forsaken their sins, or who have been reconciled to God. This is ex-ally the order of the work described by Peter in Acts 3:19. "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord." This blotting out is by the blood which the High Priest brings into the sanctuary to cleanse it from sin. We cannot, for a moment, suppose that the sin of any one will be blotted out or covered, who still maintains his opposition and enmity to God; but he who confesses and forsakes shall find mercy; that is, he who is reconciled shall have his sins forgiven and blotted out. It may be said in truth that reconciliation supposes an atonement to be made; for we are reconciled by the blood of the cross, which was shed for the express purpose of making atonement in the heavenly sanctuary. But when we learn, as we do from the Scriptures, that the atonement is a distinct, specific work of the High Priest, and the last work in his priesthood, both the distinction and order here claimed are obvious.

This idea that the atonement is the last work of the High Priest is an important one, and deserves a careful examination. And this is an additional proof that it is subsequent to reconciliation.

In Dan. 8:14, a question is asked concerning the time of the vision recorded in that chapter; the answer is, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." We have seen by Lev. 16, that the cleansing of the sanctuary and making the atonement mean precisely the same thing; for the atonement was made by the High Priest sprinkling the blood upon the mercy-seat and altar, and cleansing them from the sins of the people. Hence, this expression of Dan. 8:14, is equivalent to saying, "Unto two thousand three hundred days, then shall the atonement be made."

Thus we see there was an appointed time for making the atonement. This is in conformity to the type, where the tenth day of the seventh month was set apart to that work. While this text stands as a part of that "scripture" which is "profitable for instruction," it is both interesting and profitable to inquire where these two thousand and three hundred days terminate; but to understand this we must trace the connection between chapters 8 and 9 of Daniel; for chapter 9 is in part explanatory of chapter 8, the explanation of the time (2300 days) being given in the latter, not in the former. The following points, if examined with care, will make this clear to every one.

(1.) Gabriel was commanded to make Daniel understand the vision. (2.) He explained in chapter 8 the symbols of the kingdoms represented therein. (3.) He did not explain the time of verse 14. (4.) Daniel said he did not understand the vision, which, of course, refers to that part not explained—the time. (5.) In chapter 9, Gabriel said he had come to give him understanding, and commanded him to "consider the vision." (6.) No vision had been mentioned since chapter 8, which shows that Gabriel had reference to the same vision which he was commanded to make him understand in that chapter. (7.) In chapter 9, he commenced instructing Daniel on time, the only thing in the "vision" not hitherto explained. (8.) He said seventy weeks are determined (Heb., literally cut off) upon thy people. (9.) The seventy weeks commence with the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, A. C. 457. See Ezra 7. (10.) The seventy weeks are evidently "cut off" from the 2300 days; the only period given in the vision. Therefore the time of the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem must be the commencement of the 2300 days. And if the seventy weeks are not cut off from the 2300 days, that is, if the seventy weeks do not mark the commencement of those days, then no explanation of the days was given, and Gabriel never did what he was commanded to do.

But such a supposition will not be urged. Therefore, we must admit that in Dan. 9 we have a clue to the 2300 days of Dan. 8, and to understand the seventy weeks of Dan. 9, is also to understand the 2300 days of Dan. 8, the two periods commencing together. As the Messiah was to be cut off, and cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease in the midst of the last week of the seventy, which was in A. D. 31, and the time that the apostles turned to the Gentiles marks the close of that period, which was in A. D. 34, it is easy to see that the 2300 days would extend 1810 years beyond that time, or to A. D. 1844. And as the angel said the sanctuary should be cleansed at the end of that period, this must refer, not to the typical sanctuary which was destroyed by the Romans in A. D. 70, but to the antitypical "sanctuary and true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. 8:1, 2.

Some are ready to object to this view, that the heavenly sanctuary where our High Priest officiates cannot need cleansing—that there is nothing impure in Heaven. The zeal of such to vindicate the honor of heavenly things is parallel with that of Peter, who rebuked the Lord for speaking of his ignominious death: he thought a victor's crown only was becoming his Master. But God has a plan appointed, and the death of his Son was in that plan; and the mistaken zeal of his servants must not be suffered to interfere with it. In that plan is also the atonement which God's now exalted Son as priest makes in the sanctuary in Heaven; and it has been sufficiently shown that the atonement is made by cleansing the sanctuary. That this expression of the angel refers to the heavenly, and not to the earthly, sanctuary, may be proved by several considerations.

1. The sanctuary was not cleansed from any impurity of its own, nor from any defilement from use, as ordinary habitations are cleansed, but from sin. Therefore it was cleansed by blood. By referring further to Lev. 16, it will be seen, and will be noticed hereafter, that the design was to take away the sins from the presence of God, and remove them from the throne of judgment. But Paul declares in Heb. 10: 4, that "it is not possible for the blood of bulls and of goats to take away sin;" but that was all the blood the priests had to offer in the worldly sanctuary; therefore, as that blood would not remove sin, it follows that the earthly sanctuary was never cleansed at all, except in figure, and never could have been had it remained and the priests still officiated therein till the end of the 2300 days. Nevertheless, the necessity existed; for the people were actual sinners, and needed to have their sins remitted or blotted out.

2. The sanctuary, as before noticed, was defiled by the sins of the people, though the people never came in contact with it. The high priest stood as their representative; he bore their judgment. Ex. 28: 30. And as he alone went into the most holy place, it follows that it was defiled by his bearing their sins. Now it is plainly stated that Christ bears our sins—they were laid upon him—he is our representative before his Father. And it seems evident that one of the following positions is true: That Christ has taken the sins of his people, or his people have their sins yet upon them. I think it will be admitted that the former is true; that as the representative and substitute of his saints, he takes their sins. But if he takes them, where does he take them? Certainly where he is. Now it is by virtue of his priesthood that he bears the judgment of the people; but his priesthood is in the heavenly sanctuary. There, according to the type, is where our sins are taken. As a priest he could take them nowhere else.

3. That the heavenly sanctuary is cleansed, is proved by direct declarations of the New Testament. Paul, in writing to the Hebrews respecting the types and their fulfillment in the priesthood of the Son of God, says, "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the Heavens should be purified with these [i. e., with the blood of calves and goats]; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these." Heb. 9: 23. Accordingly he says that Christ entered into the holy places, into Heaven itself, "by his own blood." Verse 12. This is the better sacrifice, or blood, by which the heavenly things are purified or cleansed.

J. H. WAGGONER.

Atonement.—No. 18.

This point being settled, another question arises: Are there two holy places in the heavenly sanctuary? and if so, did not Christ enter the most holy when he ascended on high? The answer to this is as follows:—

1. When Moses was about to make the tabernacle, he was admonished to make all things according to the pattern shown him in the mount. Heb. 8:5; Ex. 25:40.

2. This tabernacle and its officers served "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Heb. 8:5.

3. The two holy places in the earthly sanctuary are termed "figures of the true" [holy places]; and patterns of things in the Heavens. And they could not be patterns of the heavenly, and be made in "all things according to the pattern" shown to Moses, unless the heavenly had also two holy places.

4. That there are two holy places in the heavenly temple is shown by the book of Revelation, in which prophecy has unfolded various events in this dispensation immediately concerning the position and work of our High Priest.

When the living creature (one of the cherubim) called him up in the Spirit to Heaven, he said he saw a throne set, and described its appearance, and Him that sat thereon; and said there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne. Rev. 4:2-5. The order given to Moses, in erecting the earthly sanctuary, was to set the candlestick with its seven lamps on the south side of the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, which was the holy place. Ex. 29:33-35; 40:24. As this was a shadow and example of heavenly things, we learn by this text in the book of Revelation that John's vision of the throne of God was in the holy place of the heavenly temple, where were the seven lamps of fire or golden candlestick. Therein the Lord said he would manifest his presence; Ex. 29:42, 43; and there was our Saviour at the time of John's vision, officiating as priest. In this, a continual or daily offering was made, that judgment might be stayed, and the sinner spared, until the time of the cleansing of the sanctuary, or making atonement, which was the blotting out and entire removal of sin from the sanctuary of God. According to the type, this work of propitiation or intercession the Saviour had first to fulfill, in order to give man an opportunity to be reconciled to God, or converted, that his sins might be blotted out in the appointed time.

But we look down the stream of time still further; when the dispensation is drawing to a close, and the seventh trumpet is sounded. Keith, on the prophecies, quoted largely from Gibbon, to show that the first four trumpets noted events connected with the downfall of Western Rome. Mr. J. Litch, late editor of the Advent Herald, Boston, Mass., following Keith, traced the history of the next two, showing their connection with Eastern Rome. In this he gave conclusive evidence that the sixth trumpet ceased to sound in 1840. We think the seventh trumpet or third woe commenced in 1844, at the termination of the 2300 days. A small work of great value is published at the Office of the REVIEW AND HERALD, entitled, Sounding of the Seven Trumpets.

The seventh trumpet announces the third woe upon the earth, and great voices are heard saying, the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ; the elders before the throne of God announce that "the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and them that fear thy name, small and great." Rev. 11:15-17.

Here is a series of events, the connection and location of which cannot be mistaken, showing that this dispensation closes up under this trumpet. Our Saviour says, "Behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his works shall be." Rev. 22:12. Paul says the saints shall have rest when the Lord Jesus is revealed, taking vengeance on the wicked. 2 Thess. 1:6-10. And Jesus told his disciples they should be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. Luke 14:14. Thus it is shown that the judgment of the dead, the coming of the Lord, and the resurrection of the just, are events transpiring under this trumpet.

The prevailing ideas of the Judgment are vague and indefinite. Probably a majority, certainly many, look upon it in this light: that the Lord shall appear in the clouds of heaven; that all the dead will be raised, and the judgment will then sit upon the whole human race. Another view is that each one is judged immediately after death. The first of the above views is contradicted by the scripture which says the saints shall judge the world; 1 Cor. 6:2; and the other by the declaration that God reserves the unjust to the day of Judgment to be punished, 2 Peter 2:9, and by many other texts which say that the judgment takes place at an appointed day.

It is not reasonable to suppose that the saints will judge the world in their present state, or previous to the time when themselves are judged. The following from Bliss' Review of Prof. Bush on the Resurrection is more reasonable and scriptural than the views generally entertained:—

"We are inclined to the opinion that the judgment is after death, and before the resurrection; and that before that event the acts of all men will be adjudicated; so that the resurrection of the righteous is their full acquittal and redemption—their sins being blotted out when the times of refreshing shall have come; Acts 3:19; while the fact that the wicked are not raised proves that they were previously condemned."

That the judgment of the saints is fully accomplished while the Saviour is in the sanctuary in Heaven, before his coming, and therefore before the resurrection, is evident; for (1.) their judgment must be closed while Jesus is their advocate, that he may procure their acquittal. And (2.) they are raised immortal, which is the evidence of their acquittal. The judgment of the world or of the unjust, in which the saints take part, must be subsequent to the resurrection or redemption of the just, but before the second resurrection. And thus it appears that the wicked are rejected in that judgment which takes place while Christ is a priest, while the degree of their guilt and their punishment is determined in that judgment in which the saints take part. This is the only view that will harmonize all the Scriptures. As the resurrection of the righteous to immortality and eternal life is the announcement of the decision of the judgment to them, so the wicked are raised to condemnation and the second death, which is the execution of the judgment before determined in regard to them.

It was on the day of atonement only that the High Priest went into the most holy place wherein was the ark; that place was opened only on that day. In the scripture which we have had under consideration—Rev. 11—and under the sounding of the seventh trumpet it is said, "The temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." This is conclusive proof that the atonement is made under the seventh trumpet, and that it is at the close of this dispensation.

It has already been noticed that in Rev. 4, before any of the trumpets sounded, John was shown a door opened in Heaven, a throne set, and seven lamps of fire burning before the throne. The seven lamps (seven golden candlesticks) were in the holy, and the ark of the testament in the most holy. From this we learn that our Saviour's work of intercession in the holy place in the heavenly sanctuary continued from the commencement of his ministry in A. D. 31 to the sounding of the seventh trumpet in A. D. 1844, when the antitypical day of atonement commenced.

The difference between the work in the holy, and that in the most holy, is clearly marked in the Scriptures. The intercession in the holy is general, for the whole world; and herein is shown the benefit that the whole world receives from the death of Christ. Every sin deserves its punishment, which is death; and without a mediator this would be the unavoidable and universal consequence. But through the pleading of the Saviour, sentence against the evil work is not speedily executed; Eccl. 8:11; the sinner is granted an opportunity to repent; a time of probation is given in which he may return to God through Christ. In this sense Jesus is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world. He has prepared a covering beneath which all may find refuge. By virtue of his death for sin, wherein mercy is exalted and justice honored, the transgressor is spared and invited to accept the blood of Jesus as his substitute, and be reconciled to God. The benefits of probation which all enjoy, are by his blood and intercession. And surely these are no slight benefits. Though the sinner may pass them by unheeding; may scorn the warning voice, and despise the precious blood; the countless multitude of the redeemed who are all reconciled by these very means, forever attest the value and fullness of those means so blindly disregarded by the impenitent.

On the other hand, the atonement is specific and limited. By this it is not to be understood that repentance and reconciliation are not given in the day of atonement, as some have inferred. To sustain such a view it would be necessary to show that the penitent would not have been received, according to the type, on the day in which Aaron or his son made atonement; but that cannot be shown. All received the benefit of that act who "afflicted their souls," as the Lord commanded. But this we learn, that such as did not "afflict their souls"—who did not repent, and were not reconciled to God, were "cut off from among the people;" their sins were not blotted out; no atonement was made for them. This work extends only to those who are reconciled to God; who, by confessing and forsaking their sins are entitled to mercy in the Judgment; or in other words, to those who are converted, whose sins "may be blotted out." Acts 3:19. It is very evident that Peter did not think their sins would be blotted out when they were converted, but at some future time; and the Scriptures clearly show that that time is when the sanctuary is cleansed and the atonement made.

Though a doctrine should be maintained or admitted on the strength or correctness of its principles, yet in the mind of the inquirer its strength is more readily appreciated by a discovery of the weakness of, or defects in, an opposite view. The common view, that the death of Christ is equivalent to the atonement, is attended with difficulties which are insurmountable. Losing sight of the truth, men have rushed to the extremes of error in opposite directions, and spent their time in useless labor to maintain a fruitless warfare.

We read that Christ died for all. Some who take the view that the death of Christ is the atonement, readily conclude that the sins of all have been atoned for, and argue thence that no condemnation can remain to any. The argument is reasonable, but the premise is defective. A regard for the distinction I have noticed, would remove this prop of Universalism.

* Others, assured from the Scriptures that all will not be saved, that some do now and will finally rest under condemnation, are shut up to the conclusion that the atonement is not made for all. They also regard the death of Christ and the atonement as the same thing, and therefore are necessarily precipitated to the opposite extreme, that Christ did not die for all, but only for a chosen part of mankind. Did they regard the distinction here noticed, they might accept the plain declaration of Scripture that Christ died for all, and yet find abundant proof that there will be some who will have no forgiveness because they will not come to Christ that they might have life. The whole truth embraced would unite these parties and end their controversy. But, assuming that the atonement was made on Calvary, one of the above positions must necessarily be admitted. Either the death of Christ was for a limited number (as the atonement is), or else the sins of all have been atoned for, and all must be saved. If the atonement is already made, if the sanctuary is already cleansed, and sins blotted out by an act long passed, it is not possible that the destiny of man can be affected by the proclamation and belief of the truth. For if our sin was removed or blotted out long before we were born, it is hard to see how the fact could be more a fact, or made more certain by our belief of it; or if our sins were not so blotted out, our unbelief could not affect the omission. But "Christ died for all;" and the impenitent will be "punished with everlasting destruction." It is a matter of wonder that Bible readers have ever for a moment recognized as true the idea that death makes an atonement, when the atonement is always represented as the work of the priest, performed in the sanctuary, with the blood of the offering.

J. H. WAGGONER.

The Atonement.—No. 10.

Hence a question naturally arises in regard to the present justification of the believer. If the blotting out of sin is the work of the Judgment in the cleansing of the sanctuary, which is certainly the last work of the priest, then the sins of the saints must stand on record until that time. And then it may be asked, In what sense are believers now justified? And the answer is, By faith, and this faith necessarily looks to a future fact.

It has been shown that justification and salvation are not identical. And here it will be necessary to examine the relation that the duties of the gospel sustain to the work of the atonement. "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins," is the commandment of inspiration. From this it has been inferred that sin is remitted in the act of baptism, for which I can see no warrant; certainly no such thing is there expressed. That the terms signify in order to the remission of sin, we admit; but it is too much to claim that in laboring in order to gain a certain object, that object must be obtained in the very act of laboring.

God told his people that they should have life—eternal life—if they kept his commandments, which, to the faithful, will be fulfilled "when Christ who is our life shall appear," and not till then, for we are yet in hope of it. Titus 1:2. While it is said that he that is baptized shall be saved, it is on a further condition that he endures unto the end. Matt. 24:13; Rom. 2:7; Heb. 3:6.

The declaration above quoted from the apostle Peter, in Acts 2:38, points to the same fact as that in chapter 3:19. The remission of sin is the work of the Judgment; and the believer must stand justified by faith, looking to the priest for the accomplishment of his hope. But that the sin is not really blotted out, or atonement made at baptism, or at any other period in probation, is proved by the word of the Lord to Ezekiel, 18:26: "When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them; for his iniquity that he hath done he shall die." Again, in chapter 32:18: "All his righteousness shall not be remembered." That is, he shall be treated as though he had never been righteous. Now the righteousness of the righteous is by faith; therefore if he turn and commit iniquity he shall be treated as if he never had faith; his justification is annulled—he falls from grace.

For a demonstration of the truthfulness of this view, we look to the cases of the faithful who lived before the time of Christ. Were it admitted that the atonement was made at the death of Christ, it would still remain a fact in the cases of the patriarchs and prophets that their sins were not atoned for, not actually blotted out till the blood was shed by which they are blotted out. But they were justified by faith, and died in that justified state, looking forward to the work of Christ when the object of their faith should be realized; when his blood should take away the sins of which they had already repented; or, in other words, when the atonement should be made. And his blood may be said to be a deposit in our behalf from which we may draw if we fulfill certain conditions. But if we refuse or fail to fulfill those conditions, we cannot draw from the deposit, and have no more benefit from it in the Judgment than though it had never been made.

That justification by faith, or the pardon we receive while on probation, is a conditional pardon, is not a matter of mere inference, but it is most clearly proved by our Saviour's words in Matt. 18:23-35. Here is presented the case of a servant who owed his lord ten thousand talents; but having nothing to pay, and manifesting honesty of intention, "the lord of that servant was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt." But this servant met his fellow-servant, who owed him the trifling sum of two hundred pence, and who pleaded for mercy in the same terms in which the first had so successfully pleaded before his lord. But this servant would not show mercy; he thrust his fellow-servant into prison till he should pay the debt. Hearing of this, his lord called him, and said unto him, "O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me. Shouldest not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee? And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him." This we say is the Bible view of forgiveness in the gospel, or justification by faith, while we are waiting for the decisions of the Judgment. And on this plain case we are not left to merely draw a conclusion; the Saviour has made the application for us, and from this application there can be no appeal. He says: "So likewise shall my Heavenly Father do unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses."

Having traced this subject thus far; having found what the atonement is; by whom and where it is made; and also for whom; we may turn back to "first principles" and again consider the law of God, and the position it occupies under the gospel. In the type, the testimony—the law—was put into the ark, in the most holy place; and it was over the law that the blood of the covenant was sprinkled by the high priest on the day of atonement. The glory of God was above the cherubim; these were upon the mercy-seat, and this was upon the ark in which was the law. As God looked down upon his law, the very basis of his government, his justice was aroused, for his law was violated. But mercy interposed; the high priest entered with the blood that brings remission, that had been offered to vindicate the majesty of the law. The blood was sprinkled "upon the mercy-seat and before the mercy-seat." Again the Lord looks down upon his law, but between him and the law is the mercy-seat sprinkled with the blood of the victim; the law is honored; its penalty has been enforced; a substitute has been accepted; and the penitent sinner is pardoned.

We notice that here was a real law, taking hold of the moral relations of God's creatures; that here was actual transgression on the part of the creatures, a disregard of moral obligations. But under the Aaronic priesthood there was no actual taking away of that sin; it remained to be taken away by the blood of Christ. Therefore Christ officiates in behalf of that same law, as Paul shows in Heb. 9: 15; and therefore the ark of his testament in Heaven contains that same law, where Jesus offers his own blood. Our High Priest has declared that he delighted to do the will of God, yea, the law was in his heart; he magnified the law and made it honorable; he upheld it in his life; he honored it in his death by suffering its penalty to vindicate its justice; he pleads his blood in Heaven in behalf of those who have broken it.

You who claim that God's law is abolished, look to his heavenly temple where Jesus our great High Priest is, and behold it there safely lodged in the ark. You who say that the law is changed, behold the original in Heaven, of which a copy only was given to Israel. Did not God speak it with his own voice? Did he not write it with his own finger? Did he not give it as a rule of holiness of life? Was it not perfect? Did it not contain the whole duty of man? Yes; and by it God will bring every work into judgment. Here is that justice and judgment which are the habitation of his throne. Ps. 89: 14.

There is the same evidence in the Scriptures of the immutability of God's law that there is of its perpetuity. The moral law of God as has been observed, must be a revelation of his own character as it is a transcript of his divine mind. But in him is neither variableness nor shadow of turning. And what is true of the law as a whole must be true of all its parts. In that law which he spake with his own voice, and wrote with his own finger, he said, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." This institution is based upon his own work of creation. Its obligation is found in his own act of blessing, and commanding its observance. Man may mutilate or change the copy which God has put into his hands; but the original in the ark of his testament in Heaven is the copy by which we shall be judged, and before which Jesus, our High Priest, pleads for us.

J. H. WAGGONER.

Sin is odious in the sight of God; it is that which God hates, and with reason, too, for it is hateful in its nature. We who have always been associated with it, and connected with it during the whole of our lives, cannot realize how sin appears to sinless beings, and more especially to God, who is infinite in perfection.

Sin is terrible in its results, in regard both to the government and to its subjects. It has dishonored God, as by it millions have denied his being, or despised his authority and reviled his name. God is love; the earth was founded, and man was created and placed upon it, as the work of a benevolent Creator and a loving Father, who, by this work, designed an increase of joy in his universe. But sin has marred its beauty, and that lovely world at whose making the sons of God shouted for joy, has been turned into a pandemonium of curses against its Maker. The revealings of the Judgment day alone will cause men to realize to what extent sin has dishonored the Supreme Governor.

It is terrible beyond expression, and even conception, in its consequences to man. Where God designed that all should be love, and peace, and joy, there millions upon millions have suffered untold sorrows all their lives, and died in agony, as the unavoidable consequences of sin, either their own or others', while many of them are yet reserved to the Judgment to receive the penalty of their sins in the horrors of the second death. Every tear, every pain, every sorrow, every circumstance of discomfort, is a fruit of sin. Fraud, licentiousness, bloodshed, and these in every form, and almost everywhere prevailing, tell us how terrible is sin.

We are all accustomed, more or less, to consider sin in the light of these facts. But we seldom consider it, as we should, as a thing difficult to exterminate. He who has made an effort to reform his life, who has met temptations from without, and battled with passions and propensities within, to some extent has realized that sin is an intruder, hard to be ejected from the human heart.

But this is not all. When we carefully study the divine plan of salvation as revealed in the atonement wrought in the priesthood of God's dear Son, we find that sin is of that nature and character that it is hard to dispose of in the divine government. Things which to us, with our depraved natures and corrupted hearts, appear to be of little consequence are of tremendous weight as viewed in the light of Heaven's purity and glory. We may forget our sin, or we may confess it, and as our hearts feel relieved, we may think it is now a thing of the past; that it no longer has an existence. But Infinite Justice looks upon it as a blot, a stain in the universe, which is not easily removed.

And first, we are led to this conclusion by the act of God's giving his dear Son as an offering for its removal, and for the vindication of the divine government when sin has brought contempt upon it. Jesus Christ came to "put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." Heb. 9:26. When we consider that God gave his only beloved Son, who had always pleased him, and in whom he greatly delighted; and that the Son, who was glorified with the Father before the world was, and who was the brightness of his glory, in an agony of almost overwhelming sorrow prayed that if it were possible the cup might pass from him, and yet meekly drank that cup in unparalleled submission, we must conclude that a necessity somewhere existed in the nature of the work to be accomplished, for such an immense sacrifice on the part of the Father and the Son.

We have remarked that the pardon of sin is relative, as we know of no better form of words in which to express a very important truth. God will never disregard the claims of his law. And though pardon may be considered as absolute, so far as the pardoned sinner is concerned, it is plainly taught that forgiveness is granted to the penitent by transferring his sin to another who suffers for him; that pardon is not absolute, or is not granted in such manner that the penalty may not be suffered at all. Though we no longer rest under its condemnation, its existence is a recognized fact in the government of God.

This truth is taught, not only in the death of God's Son, who bore our sins on the cross, but in the closing work of the high priest on the day of atonement. When the priest blotted out the sins of the people in the most holy place, or in the words of the ordinance, "cleansed it and hallowed it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel," by sprinkling the blood of the offering upon the mercy-seat, that did not end his work. The people were forever cleansed and set free from the sins so washed away by the sprinkling of the blood upon the mercy-seat; and the sanctuary was cleansed, by which the sins of those for whom atonement was made, were removed from the presence of Jehovah; but the sins still existed, and were removed from the presence of God to be placed upon another object.

Two goats were presented before the Lord and lots were cast upon them; one to be a sin-offering to be slain, the blood of which was sprinkled in the sanctuary; the other for a scapegoat, which was not slain, and concerning which the priest took no action till after the sanctuary was cleansed, that is, till after the sins of the people were removed from before the throne of judgment. Let this be carefully noted, as it will help to correct erroneous views regarding the scapegoat.

J. H. WAGGONER.

Rk July 7, 1874 J H Waggoner

The Atonement.—No. 21.

It has been supposed that the scape-goat also typifies Christ, a supposition for which there is no foundation in the Scriptures.

Some authors consider that, as the sin-offering typified the crucified Saviour, so the scape-goat presented alive before the Lord, typified the Lord as risen for the justification of his people. But this view is inadmissible from the order of the service. We notice that, 1. The goat was slain as a sin-offering; this typified the death of Christ on Calvary. 2. The priest took the blood and went into the sanctuary for the people; this typified the risen Saviour going into "Heaven itself, by his own blood, to appear in the presence of God for us." 3. After he had made an end of reconciling the holies, that is, after the atonement was fully made in the sanctuary, then the priest brought the live goat and laid both his hands upon the head of the goat, and confessed over him the sins of the children of Israel, putting them upon the head of the goat; this must certainly typify something in the future to be performed after the sanctuary in Heaven is cleansed.

But the sins placed on the scape-goat can be of those only who have "afflicted their souls," and are accepted of God, for they who are impenitent and continue to transgress the law of God, bear their own sins—their sins are on their own heads. And when the sins of God's people have been transferred through the priest to the sanctuary of God, and from thence removed to the head of the scape-goat, the goat was then sent away to "a land not inhabited," and there "let go," or caused to remain. And this clearly proves that the pardon of sin is relative; that the sin is removed from the penitent believer only by transfer; but such transfer does not destroy or put out of existence the sin, as a future action in reference to it is appointed by the Lord.

There is something analogous to this in the New Testament, and it accords with the meaning of Lev. 16:8, as given by reputable authorities. The Hebrew word for scape-goat, as given in the margin of Lev. 16:8, is Azazel. On this verse, Jenks in his Comprehensive Commentary remarks:—

"Scape-goat." See different opinions in Bochart. Spencer, after the oldest opinions of the Hebrews and Christians, thinks Azazel is the name of the devil; and so Rosenmüller, whom see. The Syriac has Azzail, the angel (strong one) who revolted."

Thus we have the definition of the Scripture term in two ancient languages, with the oldest opinion of the Christians in favor of the view that the scape-goat is a type of Satan.

Charles Beecher in his work, "Redeemer and Redeemed," makes an argument that the name Azazel refers to Satan, from which we copy as follows:—

"The use of the preposition implies it. The same preposition is used on both lots, La-Yehovah, La-Azazel; and if the one indicates a person, it seems natural the other should, especially considering the act of casting lots. If one is Jehovah, the other would seem for some other person or being; not one for Jehovah, and the other for the goat itself.

"What goes to confirm this is, that the most ancient paraphrases and translations treat Azazel as a proper name. The Chaldee paraphrase and the targums of Onkelos and Jonathan would certainly have translated it if it was not a proper name, but they did not. The Septuagint, or oldest Greek version, renders it by ἀνομιαν, a word applied by the Greeks to a malign deity, sometimes appeased by sacrifices.

"Another confirmation is found in the book of Enoch, where the name Azazel, evidently a corruption of Azazel, is given to one of the fallen angels, thus plainly showing what was the prevalent understanding of the Jews at that day.

"Still another evidence is found in the Arabic, where Azazel is employed as the name of the evil spirit.

"In addition to these, we have the evidence of the Jewish work Zohar, and of the Cabalistic and Rabbinical writers. They tell us that the following proverb was current among the Jews: 'On the day of atonement, a gift to Sammael.' Hence Moses Gerundinensis feels called to say that it is not a sacrifice, but only done because commanded by God.

"Another step in the evidence is when we find this same opinion passing from the Jewish to the early Christian church. Origen was the most learned of the Fathers, and on such a point as this, the meaning of a Hebrew word, his testimony is reliable. Says Origen: 'He who is called in the Septuagint ἀνομιαν, and in the Hebrew Azazel, is no other than the devil.'

"Lastly, a circumstance is mentioned of the Emperor Julian, the apostate, that confirms the argument. He brought as an objection against the Bible, that Moses commanded a sacrifice to the evil spirit. An objection he never could have thought of had not Azazel been generally regarded as a proper name.

"In view, then, of the difficulties attending any other meaning, and the accumulated evidence in favor of this, Hengstenberg affirms, with great confidence, that Azazel cannot be anything else but another name for Satan." pp. 67, 68.

Also on the opinion that the scape-goat typified the Saviour after his resurrection, Mr. Beecher has the following:—

"Matthew Henry says: 'The slain goat was a type of Christ dying for our sins, the scape-goat a type of Christ rising again for our resurrection.' But he forgets that the goat was so unclean that its touch rendered the man by whom it was sent, unclean, and necessitated a thorough washing. Was Christ unclean in his resurrection? It is said, 1 Tim. 3: 16, that he was 'justified in the Spirit;' and Rom. 4: 25, 'He was delivered for our offences, but raised for our justification.' Purity is the grand idea associated with Christ's resurrection, and therefore such a view of the type is manifestly impossible."

Gesenius, in his Hebrew Lexicon, also says:—

"(Obviously in verse 8 the antithesis lies between for Azazel and for Jehovah."

Irenaeus, writing in A. D. 185, quotes an elder's words against Marcus, who was accused of heresy, as follows:—

"Marcus, thou former of idols, inspector of potents, skilled in consulting the stars, and deep in the black arts of magic. Ever by tricks such as these confirming the doctrines of error. Furnishing signs unto those involved by thee in deception, wonders of power that is utterly severed from God, and apostate, which Satan, thy true Father, enables thee still to accomplish, by means of Azazel, that fallen, yet mighty, angel. Thus making thee precursor of his own impious actions."—Irenaeus against Heresies, book 1, chap. 15, p. 68. This shows that such an opinion was held by Christians at that time.

In the common conception of the word, the term scape-goat is applied to any miserable vagabond who has become obnoxious to the claims of justice; and while it is revolting to all our conception of the character and glory of Christ, to apply this term to him, it must strike every one as a very appropriate designation of the devil, who is styled in the Scriptures, the accuser, adversary, angel of the bottomless pit, Beelzebub, Belial, dragon, enemy, evil spirit, father of lies, murderer, prince of devils, serpent, tempter, &c., &c.

In Rev. 20, there is something that bears a striking analogy to the action of the High Priest in regard to the scape-goat, and is, doubtless, a fulfillment of that type. This scripture, ushering in the first resurrection—the resurrection of the just, who are raised at the coming of Christ, certainly refers to a period beyond human probation, and therefore after the sanctuary is cleansed. An angel is seen to come down from Heaven, and bind the dragon, which is the devil, and cast him into the bottomless pit, where he is shut up a thousand years.

By reference to the Scripture use of this term abyss (rendered bottomless pit), we find the very idea of Lev. 16: 21, 22, carried out, for it is literally a desert waste, void, or land not inhabited. In every place where the term is used in such a manner as to determine a locality, it is connected with the earth, or a part of the earth. In Rev. 9, at the sounding of the fifth trumpet, the abyss was opened, and locusts came out, &c. This describes the action of the Mahometan power. In chap. 11, the beast that ascends out of the abyss is said to make war against the two witnesses and to kill them. By careful expositors of prophecy this is referred to the French Revolution. In chap. 17, the seven-headed and ten-horned beast is said to ascend out of the abyss. Chap. 18: 1-10, refers to the same beast in another phase of its existence, and these chapters clearly point out European powers. Thus far we find it confined to the earth. Paul, in Rom. 10: 7, uses this term in the same manner. "Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead)." The abyss, here rendered deep, in other places rendered bottomless pit, refers to the grave, or, at most, to the state of death. In Gen. 1: 2, "and darkness was upon the face of the deep," the abyss points out a void, waste, or uninhabitable state of the earth; and in no case, where it is possible to trace its connection, has it any location but the earth.

Two facts only need notice to show the perfect fulfillment of the types in the scripture under consideration. (1.) Satan is called the prince of the power of the air. By his creation as an exalted angel he has the power of traversing the air as well as the earth. To deprive him of that power and confine him to the earth would fulfill Rev. 20. (2.) When Satan is bound, at the coming of Christ, the earth will be desolated, and left without an inhabitant.

The proof that the earth will be desolated at the coming of Christ is found in many scriptures. It will be admitted by all that at his coming his saints will be caught away from the earth to meet him in the air. 1 Thess. 4: 16, 17. And it is abundantly shown that all the wicked are given to the sword in that day. Jer. 25: 15-33; Joel 3: 9-16; 2 Thess. 1: 6-8, &c. It is at the coming of Christ that the battle of the great day is fought. Jeremiah says he saw the earth, and it was without form and void, and there was no man. Jer. 4: 19-29. It was turned again to the state of desolation in which it was when first created, before the Spirit of God in formative power moved upon the face of the abyss. Says the Lord by the prophet:—

"I will utterly consume all things from off the land, saith the Lord. I will consume man and beast; I will consume the fowls of heaven.

The great day of the Lord is near, . . . That day is a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, a day of wasteness and desolation, . . . The whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy; for he shall make even a speedy riddance of all them that dwell in the land." Zeph: 1: 14-18.

The harmonious testimony of the Scriptures shows that the binding of the devil, and his confinement in the abyss, "in a land not inhabited," answer exactly to the type of the scape-goat.

Some have questioned in regard to the meaning of Lev. 16: 10, where the scape-goat is reserved "to make atonement with him, and to let him go for a scape-goat into the wilderness." While, in general, the definition of the original is, to cover, expiate, or forgive, Gesenius gives as one definition, "to do away, or obliterate." After the atonement is made with the blood of the sin-offering, the sin itself still exists, and falls somewhere else. In the type it was laid on the scape-goat; in the antitype, on the devil. And when he is destroyed, sin perishes with him; it is, in his extinction, literally "done away, or obliterated." It has no more a record in the word of God, nor a place in the universe. In this sense only has the scape-goat, or Satan, anything to do with the atonement. It is the blood that makes atonement. See Lev. 17:11; Heb. 9:22. But the blood of the scape-goat was not taken for man. He was not offered as an offering. Practically, as far as the people of God are concerned, it would not make a particle of difference whether laid on Satan, or disposed of some other way; they are secure when the blood on the mercy-seat has procured release for them; they are then acquitted at the throne of judgment.

And here we would ask, What could be more fitting than that the author and instigator of all sin should receive the guilt of those transgressions which he has incited mortals to commit, but of which they have repented, back upon his own head? And what could be a more striking antitype of the ancient ceremony of sending away the scape-goat into the wilderness than the act of the mighty angel in binding Satan and casting him into the bottomless pit at the commencement of the thousand years?

This is a point of transcendent interest to every believer. Then the sins of God's people will be borne away to be remembered no more forever. Then he who instigated them, will have received them back again. Then the serpent's head will have been bruised by the seed of the woman. Then the "strong man armed" (Satan) will have been bound by a stronger than he (Christ), and the house of the strong man (the grave) spoiled of its goods (the saints). Matt. 12:20; Heb. 2:14. Then will the work of the enemy in sowing tares among the wheat (Matt. 13:24-45), be forever remedied, and the tares will have been gathered into bundles to burn, and the wheat gathered into the garner. Then our great High Priest will have come forth from the sanctuary to pronounce the everlasting blessing upon his waiting people. Then shall we have come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels. Then will the redeemed raise their glad voices in the song of Moses and the Lamb. Oh, glorious day! May the Lord hasten it in his good time. Who would not, in view of this, take up the petition of the beloved John, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus!"

J. H. WAGGONER.

Light from the Sanctuary.

ONE distinguishing doctrine of S. D. Adventists is that of the sanctuary and its cleansing. Though it is clearly taught in the Scriptures, yet no other people teach it. The typical nature of the sanctuary of the "first covenant" is clearly shown in the letter to the Hebrews, and the priesthood of Christ and the sanctuary of the new covenant are shown to be the antitype of the earthly sanctuary and priesthood, so that by a reference to the arrangement and cleansing of that sanctuary, we have the true light on the ministration of our High Priest and the cleansing of the sanctuary of the second covenant at the end of the 2300 days. The disappointment at the end of those days in 1844, led to the examination of the subject of the sanctuary of which Christ is the minister, which must be the one to be cleansed in the close of this dispensation; and as light on the sanctuary was obtained, light from the sanctuary was also received. In the earthly sanctuary, the law of God, the ten commandments written by the finger of God on tables of stone and enshrined in the ark of the covenant, was placed in the inner sanctuary, the holy of holies—that law which is now held by the many to be changed or abrogated. But that sanctuary was typical of the true; Heb. 8:1-5; and if the 2300 days have expired, the time has come for the closing work in the latter to be performed by Christ, the High Priest, the work of removing the sins of his people from the sanctuary, which is called its cleansing. And if the days are ended, and consequently prophetic time is "no longer," Rev. 10:6, 7, the seventh angel must commence his sounding; for it is in the days of his voice, "when he shall BEGIN TO SOUND," that this closing work, which is the finishing of the "mystery of God," should be accomplished. Accordingly we read, "And the seventh angel sounded And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. 11:15-19. It was at the end of the 2300 days in 1844 that the inner apartment of the temple was opened for the cleansing of the sanctuary—the closing work of our great High Priest—and as the result of the inquiry after the cause of the great disappointment of those who then expected the second advent of Christ, "there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Here was indubitable proof of the perpetuity of the entire code of ten commandments, down to the sounding of the seventh trumpet at the close of the dispensation. And from the holy of holies, where the ark was seen, the third angel takes his credentials and goes forth to preach "the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus." The commandments are to be kept; they are to be restored to the true Israel of God, while Christ is before the mercy-seat, the covering of the ark, to make reconciliation for his people and blot out their transgressions of that holy law. And thus the mystery of the gospel of God is to be finished by the last work of our High Priest in Heaven and the last message of the gospel on earth. A flood of light pours forth from the sanctuary.

We believe in God. We believe in his "sure word of prophecy," and in his providence in its fulfillment. Since 1844 the light from the sanctuary on the perpetuity of the moral law came to me before I ever heard of a Seventh-day Adventist. I was taught the true Sabbath from my infancy, and never kept any other. And knowing that in this we were in advance of first-day keepers, I did not take that interest in the early advent movement, originating as it did with those who were the transgressors of this holy law, as I otherwise should. Consequently I was not disappointed at their disappointment. I expected it, though blind and ignorant as to the truth in the matter. But after those days, as I was reading this chapter in my family, I remarked that there was an evidence of the perpetuity of the ten commandments that I never noticed before. In all my association with S. D. Baptists, hearing preaching and reading their publications, I do not remember of ever meeting with this argument, clear and unanswerable as it is. It might have been used without professing faith in the advent at hand; but it was reserved to the time of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, to be brought out in fulfilling the prediction: "And the seventh angel sounded, and the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." And now my former brethren cannot use this powerful argument in favor of the Bible Sabbath without incurring the risk of being called Adventists. But they are welcome to the use of it; and it is one of the clearest and most conclusive and unanswerable arguments that can be adduced.

Light from the sanctuary!—from the place where God sits enthroned between the cherubim, above the mercy-seat, beneath which is the holy law—the fundamental principles of his government. "Justice and judgment are the habitation [foundation] of his throne." Ps. 89:14. This is the true source of light. "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." 1 Jno. 1:5.

R. F. COTTRELL.

THE PRIESTHOOD OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

THE Levitical priesthood has ceased. It pertained to the old covenant which has vanished away. Heb. 8:13. In the new covenant the priesthood belongs to Christ, who is our High priest. "And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death; but this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood. Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. For such a high priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens." Heb. 7:23-28. In the 17th verse he says: "Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec."

This shows that there were many priests under the old priesthood, but only one under the new,—Christ, who is a mediator between God and men. 1 Tim. 2:5. He is a minister of the sanctuary. Heb. 8:2. In the old dispensation there was but one sanctuary or temple, in the new there is but one. This sanctuary is in Heaven, not on earth. "And the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. 11:19.

Those, therefore, who now worship God in truth and in spirit, do not worship toward an earthly sanctuary or altar, but toward the heavenly. Through faith they are begotten from above of Christ, not of a priest upon earth. Christ is their father. Isa. 9:6. He is the Prince of peace, and they are the children of peace, the children of God. "Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God." Matt. 5:9. They are the children of the free woman, if their citizenship is in Heaven, and they look for our coming Lord. "For our conversation [politeuma, citizenship] is in Heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." Phil. 3:20, 21. "But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all." Gal. 4:26. Christ is the priest or head of the church, and he is the Saviour of the body. Eph. 5:23. And they that believe in his name and keep his commandments are his friends and church.

Christ is the true shepherd and bishop of our souls. 1 Pet. 2:25. And he has given or appointed in his church "some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ." Eph. 4:11, 12.

Pastors and teachers are also called elders, bishops, and overseers. "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in the word and doctrine." 1 Tim. 5:17. This shows that there were elders in the churches who did not preach. All members should honor and obey their elders in the Lord. "Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves; for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief; for that is unprofitable for you." Heb. 13:17. Paul called the elders of the church of Ephesus, when about to depart from Miletus, and exhorted them thus: "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." Acts 20:28. He told Titus to "ordain elders in every city." Titus 1:5. An elder who is thus appointed and ordained in a church, in harmony with the mind of the Holy Spirit, possesses an office which is far more honorable than that of any minister or bishop who is called by "his Majesty's special command." And though he may be despised by men, yet the blessing of God will rest upon him, if he is faithful in his calling.

The office of an evangelist is to preach the word, reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine. 2 Tim. 4:2-5.

Prophets foretold future events. Philip the evangelist had four daughters who prophesied. And Agabus was a prophet. Acts 21:9-11.

The word apostle is from the Greek word apostolos, which means a messenger. Paul and his fellow-laborers were the "messengers of the churches." 2 Cor. 8:23. Epaphroditus was Paul's companion in labor and fellow-soldier; "but your messenger [apostolos]." Phil. 2:25. Thus there were more than twelve apostles in the ancient church. Silvanus and Timotheus were apostles. 1 Thess. 1:1; 2:6. Barnabas was an apostle. Acts 14:14. They were "ambassadors for Christ," preaching the word of reconciliation "in Christ's stead." 2 Cor. 5:20. And the apostles, messengers, or ambassadors of Christ, have a commission from Christ, which lasts unto the end of the world. "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen." Matt. 28:19, 20.

Nov 23, 1876

-2- J. G. Matteson

By this commission the messengers of Christ are commanded to do three things: 1. To teach all people who will be taught; but from those who will not receive them they must turn away. Luke 10:10. Paul shook his raiment against the Jews who opposed him at Corinth, and said, "Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean; from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles." Acts 18:6. 2. To baptize those who receive the word. "Then they that gladly received his word were baptized; and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls." Acts 2:41. 3. To teach those who are baptized to observe all the commandments of God; for the Father and the Son are one.

Such apostles or evangelists Christ will have unto the end of the world, and he will be with them. But those who do not follow his commission should not claim to be his ambassadors. Those who gladly receive the word of God, believe and are baptized, and afterward learn to keep all the commandments of God for this dispensation, are members of the church of Christ on earth. And those who guide their fellow-men in this heavenly way, laboring in word and doctrine, are Christ's ambassadors.

We will now consider those words in the New Testament which are translated priest, priesthood, &c. And when we learn what the priesthood is under the new covenant, we can understand wherein the Catholics, State churches, Mormons, and others, differ from the teachings of the Bible on this subject.

Hierateuo, the priest's office, is found only once, and is applied to the office of Zacharia under the old covenant. Luke 1:8.

Hieratia, the office of the priesthood, occurs twice. Luke 1:9, and Heb. 7:5. In the first place, it is spoken of Zacharia; in the last place, of the Levites. This priesthood is changed, Heb. 7:12, and transferred to Christ, who is not called after the order of Aarao, but after the order of Melchisedec. Verses 11, 13.

Hierosunee, priesthood, is mentioned four times, and translated priesthood in every instance. Heb. 7:11, 12, 14, 24. The first three verses speak of the Levitical priesthood, the last of the "unchangeable priesthood" of Christ.

Hieraterma, priesthood, is found twice. 1 Pet. 2:5, 9: "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." "But ye are . . . a royal priesthood." It is spoken of the people of God in general.

There is, consequently, no other priesthood in the new covenant but the Melchisedec priesthood, which belongs to Christ, and that priesthood which belongs to all the children of God as they offer up "spiritual sacrifices," and "the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is the fruit of our lips giving thanks to his name." Heb. 13:15; 1 Pet. 2:5. Those who try to build up any other priesthood in this dispensation are building on sand, for they have no foundation in the word of God to build upon.

Arkierens, high priest or chief priest, occurs one hundred and twenty-three times in the New Testament, one hundred and thirteen times it is applied to the high priests of the old covenant, and ten times to Christ. The last-named places are: Heb. 2:17; 3:1; 4:14, 15; 5:5, 10; 6:20; 7:26; 8:1; 9:11.

Hierens, priest, is found thirty-two times in the New Testament. It is nineteen times applied to the Levitical priesthood; once to the heathen priest at the temple of Jupiter, Acts 14:13; twice to Melchisedec, Heb. 7:1, 3; three times to the people of God, Rev. 1:6; 5:10; 20:6; and seven times to Christ, Heb. 5:6; 7:11, 15, 17, 21; 8:4; 10:21.

The priest and church of the new covenant are, therefore, none else but Christ and his members on earth. The Christian's temple is in Heaven, where Jesus himself ministers as our true mediator and high priest. Heb. 8:2. But the ambassadors of Christ we may call teachers, overseers, elders, bishops, prophets, evangelists, and apostles, according to the gifts and offices committed to them by the Holy Spirit.

The word "preacher" is also a scriptural expression for an evangelist. It is translated from keerus, which means a herald, a public messenger, a lecturer, author, preacher. It occurs three times in the New Testament. 1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11; 2 Pet. 2:5.

Every church should, if possible, have an elder or leader; but it is not necessary that one should preach every time the members meet together. Yet it is necessary that the brethren should try to pray and edify one another, that all may be encouraged. 1 Cor. 14:31. We should sing and pray with the Spirit, and with the understanding, and help one another on in Christian attainments, doing all things decently and in order. Verses 15, 26, 40.

But, above all, we must become acquainted with the "more excellent way," which is the way of love. Charity, or love, suffers long, is kind, rejoices in the truth, hopes all things, endures all things. "And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness." Col. 3:14. Without this, all rules are but empty ceremonies.

"As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God. If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth; that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ; to whom be praise and dominion forever and ever. Amen." 1 Pet. 4:10, 11.

LESSONS FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

LESSON XX.—THE SERVICES OF THE WORLDLY SANCTUARY.

QUESTIONS.

1. Repeat Dan. 8:14.
2. When did this cleansing of the sanctuary commence?
3. This must be the cleansing of what sanctuary?
4. Why?
5. What do we now want to ascertain?
6. What will it be necessary to do in order to know what is meant by the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary?
7. Why? Heb. 8:5
8. How was the worldly sanctuary consecrated before the services commenced in it? Lev. 8:10.
9. Who conducted the services there? Ex. 29:44.
10. How were the priests set apart for this work? Read Ex. 29.
11. Of what did the services of the sanctuary consist?
12. How may they be classified?
13. Of what did the daily morning service consist?
14. What was the evening service?
15. How did the services on the Sabbath differ from those on other days?
16. What chapter gives a full description of the special services on feast days, new moons, and yearly sabbaths?
17. Where were the sin offerings presented? Lev. 4:4.
18. What did the one who brought a sin offering first do? Lev. 4:4, 24.
19. What did this act signify?
20. After the guilty man had laid his hand upon the head of the victim, what did he next do?
21. What did he show by this?
22. What did the priest do with the blood of the victim? Lev. 4:5-7.
23. Where was the altar of incense?
24. What was the second veil?
25. How was the sanctuary polluted with the sins of the people?
26. How was the guilt of the transgressor figuratively transferred to the victim?
27. How from the victim to the sanctuary?

SYNOPSIS.

It has been shown that the cleansing of the sanctuary, referred to in Dan. 8:14, was to commence in the autumn of A. D. 1844. This cleansing must be that of the heavenly sanctuary; for the services of the worldly sanctuary ceased hundreds of years before the expiration of the 2300 days. We now want to ascertain what that cleansing is.

Heb. 8:1-5 tells us that the priests of the worldly sanctuary served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. It will be necessary, then, to notice the services of the worldly sanctuary in order to understand what is meant by the cleansing of the heavenly.

Before the services commenced in the tabernacle built by Moses, Aaron and his sons were set apart for the priesthood, and consecrated in a most solemn manner by being anointed with holy oil, and sprinkled with the blood of sacrifices. The tabernacle also, and all its holy vessels, were anointed.

The services of the sanctuary consisted mainly of various offerings called burnt offerings, meat offerings, sin offerings, peace offerings, etc. Lev. 7:37.

There were the perpetual daily services; the special services on feast days, new moons, and yearly sabbaths; the sin offerings for individuals; and the services on the great day of atonement.

The daily morning service consisted of a lamb, as a burnt offering; a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of oil, as a meat offering; a fourth part of an hin of wine, as a drink offering; and the burning of incense upon the golden altar. The same services were repeated at evening. On the Sabbath, these offerings were doubled; two lambs being offered in the morning, and two in the evening. Ex. 29:38-42; 30:7, 8; Num. 28:9, 10.

The special services on new moons, annual sabbaths, and feast days are fully described in the twenty-third chapter of Leviticus.

The sin offerings for individuals were presented at the door of the tabernacle. The one who presented the offering, first placed his hand upon the head of the victim. By this act he not only confessed that he had broken God's law, but figuratively transferred his guilt to the victim. He next took the life of the victim, thus showing that death is the penalty for violating the law of God.

The priest then took some of the blood of the victim into the holy place. There he dipped his finger in the blood and sprinkled it before the second veil seven times. He also put some of it on the horns of the altar of incense.

Thus, in a figure, the sin of the individual was transferred, first to the victim, and then, through the blood of the victim, into the sanctuary itself. In this way day by day throughout the year, the sanctuary was polluted by the sins of the people.

G. H. BELL.

LESSONS FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

LESSON XII.—THE SERVICES ON THE DAY OF ATONEMENT.

QUESTIONS.

1. What scriptures show that it became necessary to cleanse the sanctuary?
2. Why did it become necessary to do this?
3. How had the sanctuary become polluted by the uncleanness of the people?
4. How often was this cleansing performed? Lev. 16:2; Heb. 9:6, 7.
5. On what day was it done?
6. What was made complete by the ceremonies of this day?
7. Where were the services performed that were described in our last lesson? Lev. 4:4-7.
8. When did the high priest enter the most holy place?
9. How did he prepare himself to enter this sacred apartment? Lev. 16:12, 13.
10. Why was this precaution necessary?
11. How was the high priest dressed while engaged in these solemn services? Verse 4.
12. What animals were required for the services of this day?
13. What did the priest first offer?
14. For what purpose was this offering made?
15. What did the priest do with the blood of the bullock?
16. What did he do with the young goats at the door of the tabernacle?
17. Which goat did he take as a sin-offering for the people?
18. How did he offer it?
19. For what purpose was this offering made?
20. What is the penalty for breaking the law of God? Eze. 18:20.
21. Why did the goat have to suffer this penalty?
22. What does the blood represent? Lev. 17:11.
23. Why was the blood of these sin-offerings sprinkled upon the mercy-seat?
24. What was the mercy-seat?
25. What was beneath it? Lev. 16:13.
26. What work did the priest perform after he went out of the most holy place?
27. How was this work performed?

SYNOPSIS.

By reading Lev. 16:16, 19 it will be seen that it became necessary to cleanse the sanctuary from the uncleanness of the children of Israel. This cleansing, called the work of atonement, was performed once a year, on the tenth day of the seventh month. Lev. 16:20. The ceremonies of this day completed the yearly round of services.

The services described in our last lesson were performed in the first apartment of the sanctuary, and at the altar of burnt-offerings in the court. Only once a year was the priest allowed to enter the most holy place, and this was on the day of atonement.

Before entering this sacred apartment, he filled the golden censer with live coals taken from off the altar. On these coals he sprinkled incense, so that as he entered the most holy place, a cloud would rise before him; for the glory of the Lord which rested upon the mercy-seat was so dazzling that no man could approach it and live.

While engaged in these solemn services, the high priest wore a plain linen suit instead of the rich garments in which he usually ministered.

The animals required for the services of this day were a bullock and a kid for sin-offerings, a kid for the scape-goat, and two rams for burnt-offerings.

The high priest first offered the bullock as a sin-offering for himself and his family. After killing the bullock, he took some of the blood and entered the most holy place. There he sprinkled the blood upon the mercy-seat eastward, and before the mercy-seat seven times.

The priest then presented the young goats before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle, and there cast lots upon them; one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for the scape-goat. He then killed the goat on which the Lord's lot fell, and did with its blood as he had done with the blood of the bullock. This was to make an atonement for the sins of the people.

In a figure, the sins of the people were laid upon the goat—their sin-offering; and so the goat had to suffer the penalty that the people deserved to suffer for having broken the law of God. The blood, which represents the life, was sprinkled on the mercy-seat to show that the law, written on the tables of stone deposited beneath it, demanded the life of those who had broken that law.

Then the priest went out, and made an atonement for the first apartment, called here the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar of incense, to cleanse it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel. "And he shall go out unto the altar that is before the Lord, and make an atonement for it; and shall take of the blood of the bullock, and of the blood of the goat, and put it upon the horns of the altar round about. And he shall sprinkle of the blood upon it with his finger seven times, and cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel." Lev. 16:18, 19. G. H. BALL.

LESSONS FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

LESSON XIII.—APARTMENTS OF THE HEAVENLY SANCTUARY.

QUESTIONS.

1. For what did the priest first make an atonement on the tenth day of the seventh month? Lev. 16:11-14.
2. What was the next step in the important services of that day? Verses 15, 16.
3. What work of cleansing was performed in the first apartment? Verses 18, 19.
4. After he had made an end of reconciling, or purifying, both holy places, and also the altar, what did he do? Verses 20-22.
5. What was then done with the scape-goat? Verse 22.
6. What was employed in cleansing the worldly sanctuary? Heb. 9:7.
7. What must be employed in cleansing the heavenly sanctuary? Heb. 9:12.
8. What was typified by the sin-offerings of the tabernacle service? Heb. 9:24-26; 1 Cor. 15:3; 2 Cor. 5:21.
9. How may we know that the heavenly sanctuary has two apartments? Heb. 9:23, 24.
10. What might be inferred from Heb. 9:8; 10:19?
11. What can you say of the Greek word here rendered holiest?
12. How is it rendered in Heb. 8:2?
13. How in Heb. 9:24?
14. How does the Douay Bible render it in all these passages?
15. How is it rendered in Macknight's translation?
16. Then what do these passages show, when properly translated?
17. Who had a view of the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary? Isa. 6; Rev. 4.
18. What did they both see? Rev. 8:3.
19. What did they both hear?
20. In speaking of what he saw, what does John say of the opening of a door?
21. What door must this be?
22. What did John see in his vision that is not noticed in Isa. 6?

SYNOPSIS.

When the high priest had completed the work of making an atonement for the sanctuary, to cleanse it, he went to the door of the tabernacle, and laying both his hands upon the head of the scape-goat, confessed over it the sins of the people. Then the goat, bearing the sins of the people, was sent away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness, and there released.

Thus we see that the worldly sanctuary was cleansed by the blood of sin-offerings; so the heavenly sanctuary must be cleansed by the blood of Christ; for the priests of the worldly sanctuary served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, and Christ is the great sin-offering, of which those of the worldly sanctuary were but types.

The heavenly sanctuary must have two apartments; for the holy places of the earthly sanctuary were patterns of things in the heavens,—figures of the true holy places.

From Heb. 9:8; 10:19, some infer that Christ ministers only in the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary; but the Greek word here translated holiest, is hagion, a noun in the plural number, meaning holy places. In Heb. 8:2 the same word is translated sanctuary, and in Heb. 9:24, holy places. In the Douay Bible it is rendered holies in all these passages; and in Macknight's translation, holy places.

So we see that when these passages are properly rendered, they show positively that our Lord does minister in both apartments of the sanctuary above.

Both Isaiah and John had a view of the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary, both saw the golden altar, both saw the throne of God with the holy beings near it, and both heard the same words.

In speaking of what he saw, John says that a door was opened in Heaven, not into Heaven; this door must have been the door of the sanctuary. John also saw the seven lamps of the golden candlestick, and in Rev. 11:19 he says, "And the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament."

G. H. BELL.

LESSONS FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

LESSON XXIII.—MINISTRATION IN THE FIRST APARTMENT OF THE HEAVENLY SANCTUARY.

QUESTIONS.

1. Of what did the work in the first apartment of the earthly sanctuary chiefly consist?
2. What is offered in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary? Rev. 8:3, 4; Heb. 9:12; 1 Pet. 1:18, 19; Eph. 1:7.
3. Who presents these offerings?
4. What does the blood denote?
5. When the priest offered the blood of the victim, what did he typically present?
6. What corresponding work is really done by Christ?
7. What does Christ do when the penitent sinner seeks forgiveness?
8. How are the sins of penitent believers transferred to the heavenly sanctuary?
9. How were the sins of the people borne in the type?
10. How in the antitype? 1 Pet. 2:24.
11. How may we know that Christ enters upon the closing work of his ministration when he enters the second apartment of the heavenly sanctuary?
12. How often was the typical round of service repeated?
13. Will the round of service ever be repeated in the heavenly sanctuary?
14. What will end with the ministration in that sanctuary?
15. Why will probation close at that time?
16. What do we read in Dan. 8:14?
17. When did that prophetic period end?
18. Then when did the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary begin?
19. To what sanctuary must this cleansing refer?
20. How long, then, has our great High Priest been ministering in the most holy place?
21. How long will this work continue?
22. What reason have we for supposing that it will be brief, when compared with the ministration in the first apartment?
23. How long since the ministration commenced in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary?
24. How long since it commenced in the second apartment?

SYNOPSIS.

The work in the first apartment of the sanctuary on earth, consisted chiefly in the offering of incense, and the blood of sin-offerings. In the first apartment of the sanctuary in Heaven, our great High Priest offers the prayers of saints and his own blood. Rev. 8:3, 4; Heb. 9:12; 1 Peter 1:18, 19; Eph. 1:7.

The blood denotes the life, and when the priest offered the blood of the victim, he presented its life to meet the demands of the broken law; so Christ presents his own blood,—his life, in the sanctuary in Heaven.

When the penitent sinner seeks forgiveness, through the merits of a crucified Redeemer, Christ takes the guilt upon himself, presenting his own blood in behalf of the sinner, and in this way sins are transferred to the sanctuary in Heaven.

The innocent victims offered in the earthly ministration bore the sins of the people in a figure, but Christ has really borne them on the cross. 1 Peter 2:24. On the cross he shed his blood; there he gave up his life; and that sacrifice is accepted in behalf of guilty men.

Since the ministration in the second apartment was the closing work in the worldly sanctuary, so it must be in the heavenly. The typical round of service was repeated every year, but the round of service in the heavenly sanctuary will never be repeated. That sanctuary will be cleansed but once, and when that work of cleansing is completed, our probation will be over; for there will then be no more offering for sin.

In Dan. 8:14 we read these words: "Unto 2300 days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." We have seen that this prophetic period ended in 1844; so the cleansing of the sanctuary must have begun at that time. This cleansing must be that of the heavenly sanctuary, for no other sanctuary was in existence at that time. Since 1844, then, our great High Priest has been ministering in the most holy place.

How long this work will go on we cannot tell; but since the corresponding work in the earthly ministration occupied only one day in the entire yearly round of service, it seems probable that the closing work in the heavenly sanctuary will be comparatively brief.

G. H. BALL.

LESSONS FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

LESSON XXIV.—THE CLEANSING OF THE HEAVENLY SANCTUARY.

QUESTIONS.

1. To what must the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary correspond?
2. What were the two leading acts in the cleansing of the earthly sanctuary?
3. In what must the cleansing of the heavenly consist?
4. How are the sins of penitent believers transferred to the heavenly sanctuary?
5. In what way do the sins of all men find a place in the sanctuary above? Rev. 20:12.
6. What do we learn from Rev. 20:12 in regard to the number of the books of record kept in Heaven?
7. What book is named in that verse?
8. What book is named in Mal. 3:16?
9. What does the book of life contain? Luke 10:20; Phil. 4:3; Rev. 13:8.
10. What is recorded in the book of remembrance?
11. What must the other book, or books, contain?
12. What use is to be made of these records? Rev. 20:12.
13. What will God bring into judgment? Eccl. 12:14.
14. What do we learn from Matt. 12:36?
15. What from 1 Cor. 4:5?
16. Are all these things recorded in the books?
17. How may we know that all these things find a place in the record? Rev. 20:12.
18. What are we making, day by day, and moment by moment?
19. Who is noting every particular in our history?
20. Where will we have to meet this record?

SYNOPSIS.

Since the priests of the worldly sanctuary served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary must correspond to the cleansing of the earthly.

The cleansing of the earthly sanctuary consisted in presenting the blood of the sin-offering as an atonement, and in the removal of the sins that had been transferred to the sanctuary during the year. So the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary must consist in presenting the blood of Christ, and in the removal of sins. We see, then, that the blood of Christ is offered in the second apartment, as well as in the first.

It has already been noticed that Christ takes upon himself the sins of penitent believers, and thus their sins have been transferred to the heavenly sanctuary. There is also a record kept of the sins of all men; for we read in Rev. 20:

12 that the dead are to be judged out of those things that are written in the books, according to their works. From the same verse we learn that there must be at least three books, and that one of them is the book of life.

In Mal. 3:16 we learn that a book of remembrance is written for them that fear the Lord. The book of life contains the names of those who have entered the service of Christ. The book of remembrance contains a record of their good deeds,—their acts of repentance, confession, obedience, and sacrifice.

We conclude, then, that the other book, or books, mentioned in Rev. 20:12 must contain a record of the deeds of the wicked. As we have already noticed, men are to be judged by the record found in the books. This record is very close: "For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil." Every idle word, as well as every secret purpose or motive, will be carefully entered in the books kept in the sanctuary above.

Day by day, and moment by moment, we are making our history; while the recording angel, with unfailing accuracy, is noting every particular. This record we will have to meet in the judgment; where with all the countless millions of earth, we shall be judged out of the things written in the books, according to our works.

G. H. BELL.

LESSONS FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

LESSON XXV.—THE CLEANSING OF THE HEAVENLY SANCTUARY. CONTINUED.

QUESTIONS.

1. Why does the heavenly sanctuary need to be cleansed?
2. What positive proof does the Bible furnish in regard to the necessity for the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary? Heb. 9:23.
3. How has this sanctuary become polluted?
4. What must be done when the sanctuary is cleansed?
5. Can the sins be blotted from the record before that record has served its purpose?
6. What purpose is it to serve?
7. What must be done before the cleansing of the sanctuary can be completed?
8. What names are entered in the book of life?
9. What will the examination of the books of record show?
10. Whose names will be blotted out of the book of life?
11. Whose will be retained?
12. What action will Christ take in their case? Matt. 10:32; Luke 12:8.
13. What reference is made to this in 1 John 2:1, 2?
14. What in Heb. 7:25?
15. What action will be taken in regard to the sins of the faithful?
16. How do you show that the work described in this lesson will decide the cases of all men?
17. What is this work sometimes called?
18. What does Dan. 7:9, 10 describe?
19. Who presides at this tribunal?
20. By whom is he attended?
21. What was done preparatory to beginning the work of examination?
22. Where does the investigative Judgment take place?
23. How do you show that the work of the investigative Judgment constitutes the cleansing of the sanctuary?
24. What does Christ do when the work of blotting out sins is completed?
25. How do you show that this act completes the cleansing of the sanctuary?
26. Why does it seem proper that Satan should finally bear the sins of God's people?

SYNOPSIS.

We have seen that the heavenly sanctuary is polluted by the sins of God's people. They are borne by the High Priest of that sanctuary, and are also placed on record there. It is plain that when this sanctuary is cleansed, these sins will be removed. Christ will lay them off, and they will be blotted from the record; but this record cannot be blotted out until it has served its purpose. Out of the things written in this record the dead are to be judged. It is certain, then, that the cleansing of the sanctuary can never be accomplished until the books have been examined, and judgment has been passed upon all who have once entered the service of God; for not until then can their sins be blotted out.

All who have ever entered the service of God have had their names entered in the book of life. The examination of the books of record will show what names are to be retained in the book of life, and what are to be blotted out. The names of all who have been unfaithful will be blotted out, while the names of those who, by their acts of repentance, confession, faith, and obedience, have made complete work of overcoming, will be retained. Rev. 3:5. Christ will confess their names before his Father and the holy angels, and present his blood as an atonement for their sins. Their sins will then be blotted out, and the heavenly record will be clean.

When that work is completed, the cases of all men are virtually decided; for all those whose names have never been entered in the book of life will be lost, and those whose names are blotted out of it will share the same fate.

This work is sometimes called the investigative Judgment. Dan. 7:9, 10 describes the opening scene of this tribunal. God the Father, here called the Ancient of Days, presides in awful majesty. He is attended by a countless host of heavenly beings; and the books are opened.

This scene must have been in the second apartment of the heavenly sanctuary; for there is where the work of cleansing was chiefly performed, and this solemn work of the Judgment is the cleansing of that sanctuary. Here Christ presents his blood as an atonement for the sins of his faithful followers, and here their sins are blotted out.

When this work is complete, Christ lays off the sins of his people upon the head of Satan, the antitypical scapegoat, and then the cleansing of the sanctuary is complete; for the sins that polluted it are no longer borne by Christ, and no longer found in the books of record.

That Satan should finally bear these sins and suffer for them is entirely proper; for he is the author of sin, and the one who has tempted man to disobedience in all ages of the world.

G. H. BELL.

LESSONS FOR BIBLE CLASSES.

LESSON XXVI.—THE SECOND ADVENT OF CHRIST.

QUESTIONS.

1. What offices did Christ fill?
2. What office did he fill when upon earth?
3. In what office has he been acting since his ascension?
4. In what office will he come to earth the second time?
5. What proof can you give that he will come as a king?
6. What is his last work as priest?
7. What will he do when this work is completed?
8. To whom has this coronation scene been presented in vision?
9. Where may we find a brief description of it?
10. For what purpose does Christ come to the earth the second time?
11. Into what state will those be brought who are accounted worthy of this change?
12. What is said of them in Rev. 20:6?
13. Could it be possible that such blessings would be conferred upon men before their sins were blotted out?
14. When are their sins to be blotted out? Acts 3:19.
15. What great event takes place immediately after this time of refreshing?
16. Then which comes first in the point of time, the blotting out of sins, or the second advent of Christ?
17. The blotting out of sins is a part of what work?
18. To what does the cleansing of the sanctuary pertain?
19. Then does the investigative Judgment come before or after the second coming of Christ?
20. What scripture furnishes further proof of this fact?
21. Who are to have part in the first resurrection?
22. Can they be accounted worthy before their account has been examined, and decision rendered in their cases?
23. To what work does this examination and decision belong?
24. Then to what conclusion must we come?
25. When did the cleansing of the sanctuary begin?
26. When did the investigative Judgment commence?
27. In what does the cleansing of the sanctuary consist?
28. What does Christ do after this work is completed?
29. What will he do immediately after his coronation?
30. What proofs can you give that the investigative Judgment will precede the second coming of Christ?

SYNOPSIS.

Christ is a prophet, priest, and king. When he was upon the earth he was a teacher, or prophet; since his ascension, he has acted as High Priest of the heavenly sanctuary; but when he comes again, he will come as King of kings, and Lord of lords, as may be seen by reading Rev. 19:11, and onward.

The cleansing of the sanctuary and laying the sins of his people upon Satan is his last work as priest. He then comes before his Father to be crowned king. This coronation scene was presented to Daniel in vision, and is briefly described in Dan. 7:13, 14.

When Christ comes to earth, he comes to give a resurrection to the righteous dead, and translation to the righteous living. See 1 Thess. 4:16, 17.

Those who are accounted worthy of this change will then be made immortal. Luke 20:35, 36. These are they of whom it is said, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." Rev. 20:6.

Now it is certain that such blessings will not be conferred upon men until their sins have been blotted out. It would be mockery to call them to account for their sins after they had been made immortal, had become like the angels, and had reigned with Christ a thousand years. But their sins are to be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord, as will be seen from Acts 3:19, 20. Immediately after this, Christ is to come. Acts 3:20, 21. We see, then, that the sins of God's people are to be blotted out before Christ comes to the earth to gather his jewels.

But the blotting out of sins is a part of the work of cleansing the sanctuary, and pertains to the investigative Judgment. Thus we see that the cleansing of the sanctuary and the investigative Judgment precede the second advent of our Lord to this earth. This is further proved by Luke 20:35, 36, which speaks of some who are accounted worthy of a part in the first resurrection. Now they cannot be accounted worthy till their account has been examined, and decision rendered in their cases. But this examination of accounts and decision of cases is the work of the Judgment, and so that work must take place before the first resurrection, and also before the second coming of Christ; for that resurrection takes place at the time of his coming.

G. H. BELL.

REFUTATION OF THE DOCTRINE OF INSTANTANEOUS SANCTIFICATION.

BY M.D. D. T. BOURDIEU.

THOUGH the doctrine of instantaneous sanctification is being received by many in this age, and occupies a prominent place in most modern revivals, yet I cannot forbear expressing the conviction, and offering the proofs, that it is anti-scriptural, and is one of the most dangerous errors that the human mind can embrace.

It is a very clearly revealed truth that sanctification is effected through the truth, the word of God. John 17:17; 1 Pet. 1:22, etc. It is equally evident, and we trust no one will be disposed to deny, that truth is progressive in its manifestation, and consequently in its practical application. Even the path of the just shines more and more through the light of sanctifying truth. Prov. 4:18. And in the time of the end there was to be an increase of knowledge on the prophecies, and many, understanding and improving upon this knowledge, were to be purified, and made white, and tried. Dan. 12:9, 10. How, then, can we avoid the conclusion that sanctification is a progressive work?

Sanctification is a cleansing from sin, not only in the record of our past lives, but also in our natures and practices; the setting apart of the body and mind, in practice, from sin to holiness. It is a moral repair of the soul in practical tests to which it is subjected, and can be recognized only in such a use of the soul and its powers as is in accordance with the word of God. And this cannot be the work of a moment.

All who believe the Bible must admit that there is a mighty cleansing from sin in conversion, when we become children of God. Sanctification must therefore embrace conversion. Indeed, conversion, or the first and thorough start in conversion, is the beginning of sanctification. This being the case, sanctification cannot be an instantaneous work. In conversion, as well as in sanctification, there are certain conditions to be complied with, such as repentance, faith, baptism, prayer, etc., which it takes more than a moment to perform. The mind must be enlightened on the nature of sin and the means of pardon and justification, the proud will must submit to God, the bitter pangs of repentance must be experienced, and faith must be exercised in Christ, who died as our substitute and arose for our justification, and now pleads in behalf of the penitent believer the merits of his precious, atoning blood. As these and other steps are taken, the work of conversion and sanctification progresses. It then continues through the work of subduing the remains of sin in the soul, which were perhaps unobserved in the beginning of sanctification, and in forming a holy, symmetrical character, the foundation of which was laid in the first and thorough start in conversion.

Although men cannot devise a plan of sanctification, nor sanctify himself simply by his own strength and efforts, yet the Bible clearly teaches that man must co-operate with God both in conversion and sanctification. "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted," said Peter, under the influence of the converting and sanctifying Spirit. Acts 3:19. He afterward wrote, "Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth." 1 Pet. 1:22. To ancient Israel the Holy One said: "Sanctify yourselves, therefore, and be ye holy; for I am the Lord your God. And ye shall keep my statutes, and do them: I am the Lord which sanctify you." Lev. 20:7, 8. And Paul, writing for the special benefit of those who should live till the coming of Christ, says: "Abstain from all appearance of evil. And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly." 1 Thes. 5:22, 23.

Now not only is it true that man cannot perform all the duties of conversion and sanctification in one moment, but it is equally true that God does not wholly sanctify man in so short a time. Surely God would not lay down a plan of progressive sanctification for man to follow, and then counteract and supersede that plan by sanctifying men wholly, in an instant.

God and Christ are one in the work of the sanctification of men, and while carrying forward this work on earth, Christ said, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." John 16:12. He knew there were bitter cups for men to take before they could be purged from sin,—cups from which ease-loving human nature would shrink, not seeing at first the necessity of taking them,—cups that it would take time to digest. He knew the deceitfulness of the human heart, and that it requires time, and the influence of varied circumstances, to fully develop what there is in it. Hence his prudence in bringing sanctifying truths to bear upon his followers only as fast as they could bear them and put them in practice.

God does not sanctify men entirely in one instant. If he did this, he would throw out of the account every moral duty and every gospel duty that could not be performed in this short space of time, but which, according to the Bible, he helps men to perform in the work of sanctification. For let it be borne in mind that the use of man's God-given faculties, in seeking for pardon, in abstaining from sin, and in doing that which is right, so far as he has knowledge and opportunity, is involved in this work. God sanctifies men in furnishing them the means of sanctification, and in helping them to use these means. God cannot go further in sanctifying men than they will accept and strive to carry out the duties and conditions he has enjoined upon them. He will not sanctify and save men independently of their actions. It is not his plan to sanctify men entirely in one instant, though he can every moment sanctify them in proportion as they will co-operate with him in this progressive work.

Nor will the Spirit of God act against God and his Son, and against the progressive plan that God lays down for men to follow, in doing the entire work of sanctification for an individual in one instant. The Spirit and the truth agree. The Spirit inspired men to write the Bible, and was to guide into all truth. John 16:13. It bears with men, while helping them to overcome their sins. It does not pass over sin and righteousness in the work of sanctification. Its first office is to convince men of sin, then of righteousness, then it rains men before the Judgment to abide its fearful consequences. Verses 9-11. Then as they further prepare the way for this mighty sanctifying agent, by yielding to God in self-abasement and true humility, by thorough repentance, self-denial, importunate prayer, and other earnest efforts in overcoming sin, it helps them mightily to mortify the deeds of the flesh, and bear the fruit of the Spirit. Rom. 8:13; Gal. 5:22, 23. Then follow the comforting blessings of the Spirit, to encourage men to advance further in holy living. All this is not the work of a moment; and men who will follow on to know the Lord, to know themselves, and to maintain a deadly conflict against sin, by the grace and help of God, may have more and more of the aid and comfort of the Spirit, as they hunger and thirst after the influences of the Spirit working in its different offices, and after holiness.

Trials enter largely into the Bible plan of sanctification. We must be tried in all points, to see our defects of character, and to overcome them. On some points we have to be tried several times. This agrees with the experience of every child of God. Those who are without trials and chastisement are bastards, and not sons. Heb. 12:8. "When he has tried me," says patient and pious Job, "I shall come forth as gold." Job 23:10. Thus Christ sits as a refiner and purifier of silver. Mal. 3:3. We must buy the gold tried in the fire. Rev. 3:18. This is not done in a moment. If it was, we could easily endure the sufferings of one moment. Sanctification would be cheap and popular, and all would have it and be saved.

The growth of the Christian graces, illustrated by the principle of addition (2 Pet. 1:5-11), proves sanctification to be progressive. This growth is simply advancement in sanctification. Take, as an illustration, the graces of faith and humility. In proportion as they increase, unbelief and pride, the opposite unsanctified traits, decrease. And it is a sin to harbor unbelief, it is a sin to harbor pride, whether in a notorious or in a limited degree. He that is unbelieving lies in making God a liar (1 John 5:10), and disobeys God; and what will not a proud man do in worshipping self, and to scorn the worship of others! But even the last remains of pride must be overcome in order for one to be wholly sanctified. So of unbelief, and other sins.

Growth in nature is not instantaneous. Mushroom growths indicate poor, decaying materials. Jonah's gourd lasted but one night. Yet we must, in sanctification, grow up into Christ our living Head (Eph. 4:15), improving upon the grace of God, which helps mightily in conquering sin and living righteously. Titus 2:11-14. We must "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour" (2 Pet. 3:18), and by beholding Christ in the excellencies of his spotless character, seek to be changed from "glory to glory" in his image. 2 Cor. 3:18. We must grow understandingly, embodying in our characters only such traits as will not crumble and fail in the trying day. We must improve upon the growing season, which will soon be past, lest we be rooted out as cumberers of the ground, to be destroyed for not having borne the fruits of holiness.

Self-examination is a very important duty in the work of sanctification. By it we discover our sins, that we may overcome them; and those who have attended to this duty faithfully know that it is not done in a moment, and that it must be oft-repeated. Sanctifying faith is operative; it is accompanied by, and is seen in, good works. James 2:17-26. It lays hold of Christ for pardon and overcoming grace more than once or twice. So with the exercise of prayer and of other means of grace.

The relations that we sustain to the law of God and the office of that law prove sanctification to be a progressive work. To be cleansed from sin, we must know what sin is, and we must know what is right, that we may perform it in forsaking sin; and "by the law is the knowledge of sin." Rom. 3:20. "Sin is the transgression of the law." 1 John 3:4. The law approves every virtue and condemns every sin. It is the moral rule of righteousness. Ps. 119:172; Isa. 51:7. It is spiritual (Rom. 7:14), governing our spirits and thoughts as well as our actions. Viewed in this light, the law is very comprehensive, so that David could say of it, "Thy commandment is exceeding broad." Ps. 119:96. "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." Verse 18. Of the godly man he says, "In His law doth he meditate day and night." Ps. 1:2. Does he thus meditate simply for amusement! Nay, verily, but to review old duties and discover new ones, and to advance the work of sanctification.

Other plain and direct Bible declarations support us, refuting the doctrine of instantaneous sanctification; but we have space to present only a few. "Let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God." 2 Cor. 7:1. This language was addressed to those who were sanctified, and called to be saints. 1 Cor. 1:2. These very persons were exhorted to perfect holiness (or sanctification, French translation). The expression, "perfecting sanctification," implies a work commenced, which must be completed. Again: "Let us go on to perfection," i. e., complete sanctification. Heb. 6:1. Here was a work begun among the pious Hebrews which must be completed by going on, by making advancement.

Another strong argument in favor of progressive sanctification is derived from the experience of the most pious characters of the Bible. Job, as we have seen, looked beyond his trials for a greater degree of purity of character than he already possessed. Moses, from being a very rash man, through a series of sanctifying trials became the meekest man of his day. The apostle Paul, whose advance in the work of sanctification was so rapid that he could exhort others to follow him (1 Cor. 4:16, etc.), after years of progress, said, "I die daily." 1 Cor. 15:31. And again: "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; . . . but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Phil. 3:13-14. Can we expect to advance faster than this devoted servant of Christ? Daniel and John were greatly beloved of God, yet even in vision, when filled with a reverential sense of the glory and holiness of the eternal world and heavenly beings, they both showed the need of further advancement in holiness. Daniel, giving his view of himself, said: "My comeliness was turned in me into corruption," etc. Dan. 10:8-11. And John, in vision, was mildly reproved for a lack of discrimination in his acts of veneration. Rev. 22:8, 9.

How can men, in view of such palpable proofs against instantaneous sanctification, claim that they were wholly sanctified on a certain occasion, and that they have ever since lived without sin, and in the enjoyment of perfect love? I write with due respect for honest people who thirst after holiness, yet have partially received this doctrine in consequence of not understanding the Bible view of the subject; and I earnestly desire that this article may help to tear away the veil that many weave out of this doctrine to hide the deformity of their characters. I also hope to be benefited myself in reviewing and applying to my own case the duties and tests of Bible sanctification. Several years have passed since I wrote a treatise on sanctification, agreeing with this article; and the series of purifying trials through which I have since passed has convinced me that I then had un sanctified traits of character that I did not fully see, and that I was not so far advanced in the work of sanctification as I thought I was. May God be merciful, and help me, as well as my readers, to be thorough.

The following tests may help us to determine whether or not we are walking in the way of sanctification, and to what extent:—

1. Do I cherish a love for the Bible that will prove a complete safeguard against neglecting its frequent and regular perusal, with a desire to understand and practically carry out its teachings?

2. When I come to those portions of the Bible that may be termed present truth, because they apply especially to the present time, faithfully exposing the sins of the age, showing our dangers and duties with reference to solemn and momentous events that are impending, do I embrace them as heartily as I do generally-received truths of the Bible, against which no special opposition is raised?

3. Have I heartily repented of all my known sins, exercised faith in Christ, and been baptized, thus becoming a child of God?

4. Do I delight frequently and regularly to attend to the duties of prayer and self-examination? or are these duties inapud to my spiritual taste? are they tiresome, and frequently neglected?

5. Do I still retain my first love? or have I to repent of having lost it? Rev. 2:4, 5.

6. As love for God and our neighbor consists in keeping God's commandments (1 John 5:2, 3), can I be said to enjoy perfect love if I knowingly, carelessly, or obstinately break any of God's commandments?

7. Do I, when the holy Sabbath comes, find it easy and a pleasure to break away from worldly cares, and consecrate the day to the Lord in memory of his rest, in the contemplation of his exalted attributes as manifested in his wonderful works, and with love, gratitude, praise, and adoration for his amazing love and all his rich benefits? If I do not find this work easy, have not self and self-interests taken too much of my attention, strength, and affection through the week, and do I not come far short of loving God as much as I should?

8. Knowing that those who love God and their brethren love to commune with them, do I sufficiently appreciate this communion in the public services of the house of God to let nothing except impossibilities keep me from securing it?

9. Am I punctual in attending to the ordinances of the Lord's house, and to all the means of grace? and as I attend to the ordinances,—partake of the emblems of the broken body and spilled blood of the Saviour,—can I say that I am so far advanced in sanctification that there is no further need of self-abasement, confession of sins, and pleading for pardon and overcoming grace?

10. Can I truly say that I love the Lord with all my heart (always giving him my best affections)! with all my soul (life--squandering none of my vitality for selfish purposes)! with all my strength (even strength invested in property that properly belongs to him, if it has been withheld)! and with all my mind, all my mental powers being used to his glory!

11. Do I love my neighbor as myself, looking for his interest and prosperity, spiritual as well as temporal, as I do for my own, doing unto him in all things as I would that he should do unto me?

12. Am I willing to lay down my life for my brethren (1 John 3:16), and (which comes before this) to bear with them and suffer from them, veiling my feelings, denying myself, sacrificing, even when unappreciated and ill-treated, that they may be saved!

13. Do I love my enemies with that love with which Christ has loved me! or do I simply love those who love me, evincing selfish love, or rather selfishness?

14. Do I do all that I can by the use of my talents, means, influence, and by all possible efforts, to advance the cause of God in pushing forward the work of saving men?

15. Do I love purifying trials, counting it all joy when I fall into divers temptations, rejoicing in tribulations (James 1:2; Rom. 8:3), in short, in the suffering part of religion, which is so unpopular and so low in the spiritual market? or do I try to evade this important means of sanctification, and murmur when it is applied to me?

16. Has patience, with me, had its perfect work, so that I never give way to impatience, and am perfect and entire, wanting nothing? James 1:4.

17. Do I ever speak properly, and never offend in word, being entitled to the appellation of "perfect man"? James 1:26; 3:2.

18. Do I always master my appetites and passions? or do they often or occasionally master me?

19. Am I temperate in all things?

20. Do I rejoice at the prosperity of others, whether in temporal or spiritual things, as I do when I am prospered myself? or do I envy the prosperity of others? Oh, the base, deceitful, and hateful workings of envy, a trait which originated with Satan, and in some degree has ever since been exercised by men in destroying the innocent! Am I entirely free from this criminal and most hateful trait of character?

21. Do I love counsel and reproof? or do I shun, repel, and despise these necessary means of sanctification? Surely, if I am wise and without sin, I shall not be hurt by counsel, nor even by false accusations and abuse.

22. Do I feel elated when praised and promoted, and experience mortification and insupportable uneasiness when abused and slighted? If so, self is not dead, and pride has a place in my heart.

23. Do I never give way to unbelief, "the sin which doth so easily beset us"? Heb. 12:1.

24. Do I realize more and more of the presence and aid of the Spirit of God in convincing me of sin and righteousness, as well as in comforting me, as I overcome sinful emotions? or do I have to complain of desolation in this respect? If so, how can I speak of advancement in the work of sanctification, or of entire sanctification?

25. And finally, the end of sanctification being exemption from sin in the practice of holiness, as I come before the mirror of God's law, do I find myself free from the sins it condemns, and do I perform the duties it enjoins? Have I no other gods before the living God? Do I give my best affections to any creature, or to any created thing, or to the fruits of my thoughts or physical actions? Do I ever worship the work of my hands, or objects that I have obtained? Do I ever mention God's name or sacred things carelessly and without proper reverence? Do I consecrate to God his holy rest-day, not making it simply an animal rest, but devoting it wholly to the Lord in occupations designated by his word? Do I invariably honor my parents and superiors? Do I pay a strict regard to the lives, chastity, reputation, property and interests of others, never harboring, nor expressing, nor acting out hatred, impure, obscene thoughts, deceit, nor covetousness? Is my life in strict harmony with this searching, perfect, unerring rule of holiness?

Let us never boast of perfect love and entire sanctification until we stand clear before all these and similar tests of Bible sanctification. Those who are the farthest advanced in sanctification are the last ones to boast of it. As they draw near to God, and get a clearer view of Jesus, the perfect Pattern, they see defects in their characters and the importance of making greater efforts to overcome them. Those who boast of their attainments evince a lack of weakness, and show that they have had but an indistinct view of Jesus.

We should not be discouraged in view of the magnitude of the work yet remaining to be done. God, who has called us to the work, is faithful, and able to help us perfect Christian character. As we heartily repent of our known sins, endeavoring to get a further insight into our true condition, the blood of Christ cleanses us, and the Spirit of God helps our infirmities, removing sin from our natures and practices. And as our day, so shall our strength be. The grace of God is sufficient, and we may come off victorious through our Lord Jesus Christ.

The precious blood of Christ also cleanses those walking in the way of sanctification from those sins of ignorance that they have had no opportunity to see and directly rement of, and should they die without a knowledge of these sins, the righteousness of Christ could be imputed to them, and they would be accounted holy, Christ being unto them sanctification as well as justification, with reference to these sins, as well as with reference to those of which they have repented. But the blood of Christ never cleanses from known sins that are not repented of and turned away from, so that persons dying in those sins cannot expect to be cleansed by the Lord among the pure and holy, to share with them in the reward of the righteous.

Anciently, when the priests or the people obtained a knowledge of their sins of ignorance, they were required to repent of the same and exercise faith in Christ for pardon. This they did as they offered their sacrifices. Lev. 4, etc. And under this economy Inspiration says: "The times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent." Acts 17:30.

"For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins." Heb. 10:26. No cleansing, no pardon on the part of Christ and the Father. "Jesus said unto them, If ye were blind, ye should have no sin; but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth." John 9:41; 15:22, 24. How can such claim that they are holy, without sin, and that Jesus has saved them?

The doctrine of instantaneous sanctification being anti-scriptural, its tendency and fruits must be evil.

1. It tends to discourage a class of conscientious persons, who, being measurably influenced by it, but still seeing defects in their character, and seeing no point in their experience where they could say, I am perfect, are in danger of concluding that they know nothing of religion, while they may have actually made progress in the work of sanctification.

2. It leads some who perhaps have sometime commenced to lead a Christian life, but have gone back instead of going forward, who have large self-esteem and but little conscience, to overlook evil traits in their characters that will prove their ruin unless they are overcome.

3. It leads those who receive it not to attach proper importance to personal efforts and good works; for it brings the matter to a point so small that it precludes the possibility of thinking or doing much. So the easy conclusion is reached that if God does such a great work almost, if not quite, independently of our actions, personal efforts are of but little consequence.

4. It shuts out important truths and duties, the person reasoning thus: If I was wholly sanctified and saved years ago, before I had any knowledge of these truths, what need is there now of my receiving and practicing them? Thus it arrays itself against the Almighty, who certainly represents that the truths for our time are necessary for our sanctification.

5. It retards, and when fully received, stops the work of sanctification, even on the supposition that in some cases what is called instantaneous sanctification and complete sanctification is a part of sanctification. For with the impression that a part of sanctification is the entire work, how can one be persuaded to perfect holiness?

6. It is a prominent cause of fanaticism, especially with those who are eccentric and are governed more by feeling than by sound reason. Religion is a reasonable thing, calling into healthy and harmonious exercise all the powers of body and mind; but instantaneous sanctification is unreasonable as well as anti-scriptural. Wrapping itself in an unaccountable mystery, it blinds the eyes of the understanding, dethrones reason and supercedes the rational use of the mind. Keeping the mind centered on a point—a special or supposed blessing—gives very narrow views and makes the recipient of the blessing one-sided. Allowing the feelings to take the lead and bring disorder into the soul, grieves away the Spirit of God, and the way is opened for strange feelings and disorderly spirits to come in, and fanatical results follow, which Satan has used deceitfully but effectually to disgrace Christianity.

7. As this doctrine is but a part of that easy theology which is fast becoming popular, because it goes around sins without reproving them, and makes conversion a mysterious something that comes upon a man and transforms him without his knowing how it is done, or something that is done so easily that the man of sin need not die (for it is unpleasant to die), so that man may enter the church reformed in name, but not in reality,—it is very evident that it is an invention of Satan to quiet men's consciences when they should be aroused; to help swell the cry of peace and safety when sudden destruction is about to come on the sinner, whether in Zion or out of Zion; to hide sins of the deepest dye, and fasten on men under the pious garb of the very essence of religion a terrible self-deception which we fear, with many, will be broken only when the awful judgments of Jehovah shall bring to light the soul-polluting, deceptive, and hidden works of darkness and dishonesty before sinner, saint, and holy angels.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY, AND THE JUDGMENT.

On the tenth day of the seventh month, in each year under the Mosaic dispensation, the high priest entered the most holy place of the earthly tabernacle, and performed a work which is spoken of as the cleansing of the sanctuary. It is generally held by Seventh-day Adventists that the service then performed answered in the type to the great day of Judgment, which was entered upon in the sanctuary in Heaven on the tenth day of the seventh month in A. D. 1844.

There are many reasons which are offered in proof of that hypothesis. It is not proposed in this brief article to even present a summary of them; the only design of what is written being to throw a side-light upon the question found in Dan. 8:13: "Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" The reply to this interrogation was given to Daniel instead of the saint who asked the question. It was as follows: "And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

If there is any significance whatever in this response, it will be found in the fact that it in some way furnishes a clue by which Daniel, or the church, whom he represented, should be able to ascertain how long the persecution of the church as brought to view in the prophecy should continue. Now what are the facts, provided we admit that the cleansing of the sanctuary relates to the commencement of the Judgment? They are, (1) the Judgment commenced in 1844; because the 2300 days, commencing the count at A. D. 457, would terminate at that time; (2) The declaration that the Judgment would commence (or the sanctuary be cleansed) was the same as stating that the persecution of God's people would come at that point; since Daniel had been already informed (chap. 7:25) that when the Judgment should sit the dominion of the little horn (i. e., the papacy) should be taken away to consume and destroy it to the end. In other words, that even its power or ability to persecute any farther should be taken away.

Having now seen that if the cleansing of the sanctuary spoken of in the connection related to the commencement of the Judgment at the end of the 2300 days, the 14th verse does contain a direct answer to the question found in the previous verse, and that when otherwise construed, the answer given by one of the saints to Daniel does not furnish a direct response to the interrogation made, we now inquire in conclusion whether the history of the events as they have occurred verifies the correctness of our interpretation. To this query facts which have transpired before the eyes of our generation will furnish the needed answer. Subsequently to 1708, and before 1844, the power of the papacy seems to have been restrained to that extent that practically speaking it had ceased to be a persecuting power. Nevertheless, it still held on to its temporal authority, and the theory that it was the Heaven-appointed corrector of heretics. But about the year A. D. 1844, certain political combinations seemed to originate which gradually increased in numbers and influence, until at last, between the years 1844 and 1848, they were able to bring such a pressure to bear upon the pope that he was finally driven into exile. Subsequently to that period, he regained his throne and a portion of his former prestige. From that time to this, however, revolutions and combinations have succeeded one another, and by slow degrees his temporal power and territory have been taken from him, until at last he does not rule over a single state, and has not the power of inflicting physical punishment upon even the most contemptible of the myriads of the so-called heretics who now laugh to scorn all his pretensions to the right to wield the sword against those who set at naught his authority as the successor of St. Peter.

Here, then, we discover the perfect agreement between the prophecy as construed by us and the events of history. At the end of the 2300 days—or at the commencement of the Judgment in A. D. 1844—we discern in the political affairs of Europe unmistakable evidence that a higher power than any earthly king has decreed the utter humiliation of the papacy. The prophet had predicted that from that precise point of time the work of gradual decay and disintegration should commence. "The Judgment shall sit," said he, "and they shall take away his dominion to consume and to destroy it to the end." Thus it has been. He has not been overthrown in a moment as the result of some masterly onslaught on the part of any one military chieftain; but his power has gradually wasted away as the consuming victim gradually disappears when placed upon the glowing embers of the altar. How striking is the fulfillment, and how strong its confirmation of the doctrine that He who both caused the prophecy to be written and its fulfillment to be accomplished, is now engaged in the solemn work of the Judgment; or, that which is identical with it, the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary.

W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

THE TWENTY-THREE HUNDRED DAYS.*

BY MRS. J. O. CORLISS.

TEXT: "And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8:14.

THIS language is found in the midst of a very important line of prophecy, one which all commentators are agreed can be understood, though all are not so well agreed as to its importance. We think, however, that since God has seen fit to give it to his people, and our Saviour has said, "Whoso readeth, let him understand" (Matt. 24:15), it is not only right and proper to investigate the prophecy, but highly important that we understand it. In this investigation, the first question that arises is, To what sanctuary does the text refer? Certainly not to the earthly sanctuary, for that was cleansed once every year, and 2300 literal days would cover a period of more than six years. Besides, in verse 17 the angel tells Daniel that the vision will be at the "time of the end," at which time the earthly sanctuary with its offerings and sacrifices was to be no more, having been superseded by the substance, the heavenly sanctuary, with its better sacrifices, of which the earthly was but a shadow.

When will this heavenly sanctuary be cleansed? Not at the end of 2300 literal days; for then the event to transpire at their close would have taken place in the time of Daniel and his people. But it did not take place then; for Daniel was commanded to seal up the vision (verse 26); and we further learn from the next chapter that Daniel himself did not understand it for a number of years. Now, as "God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets" (Amos 3:7); and since he did not reveal this to Daniel for more than twice the number of literal days mentioned in the prophecy itself, we are shut up to the conclusion that they must be symbolical days. The leading expositors of prophecy are unanimous in teaching that a day in symbolic prophecy represents a year. In this they are in harmony with the Scriptures. God said to Ezekiel, when he sent him to Jerusalem to symbolically lay siege to it, "And when thou hast accomplished them, lie again on thy right side, and thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days: I have appointed thee each day for a year." Eze. 4:6. Other scriptures might be produced, but this is enough to establish the point. Hereafter, then, we will speak of the days mentioned in our text as 2300 years.

Having learned the nature of these days, the next point that claims our attention is, When do they end? Although Gabriel was commissioned of God to explain the vision, and make Daniel understand the matter, yet after his interview with Gabriel, the prophet said he "was astonished at the vision, but none understood it." Dan. 8:27. But did the angel ever fulfill the command of God, and make Daniel understand the vision? We shall see. After looking the matter over a long time, Daniel concluded that the vision referred to the sanctuary in Jerusalem, which had been long trodden down; and as the time had nearly come for it to be restored, according to former prophecies, he offered an earnest prayer that God would turn away his wrath, and let his face shine upon the desolate sanctuary. Dan. 9:3-17. While he was thus sup-plicating before God, the angel Gabriel came again to the prophet, and said, "O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding." Verse 22. After commending Daniel for his zeal in trying to settle this perplexing question, he adds, "Therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision." He then commences to explain: "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city."

The Hebrew word here rendered "determined," is defined by Gesenius to mean, literally, to cut off; tropically, to divide, and so to determine. But from what were the seventy weeks, or 490 days, cut off? From whatever was in the vision; for this is what Daniel was considering with the angel. Then the 490 days were cut off from the 2300 days, and were to end with the privileges of the Jewish people.

The next verse tells us that sixty-nine of these weeks reach from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah. In sixty-nine weeks there are 483 days, or literal years. These reach to the time when Messiah will be revealed. The word Messiah means "anointed." John 1:41, margin. By comparing Acts 10:37, 38, with Mark 1:10, we learn that Christ was anointed with the Holy Spirit at his baptism. The chronological table in my Bible at the head of the first chapter of Mark, says that Christ was baptized A. D. 20. Now if we shall reckon back from this point 483 years, and find the date to which it reaches exactly agreeing with the time when the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem was given, the starting point of the 2300 years will be established beyond a doubt. But when did the command to restore and build Jerusalem go forth? From the seventh chapter of Ezra we learn that it was in the seventh year of Artaxerxes, or 457 B. C. Now let us see if our former computation agrees with this. Subtract A. D. 20, the time of Christ's baptism, from 483 years, the time specified to reach forward to that point from the command to restore and build Jerusalem, and we are carried back to 457 B. C. Or, if we choose to let the chronological table settle the date of the command to restore and build Jerusalem, we can reckon forward 483 years to ascertain when the anointing of Christ should take place. As 457 B. C. does not cover the entire period of 483 years, we subtract the 457 B. C. from the 483 years, which leaves 26 years, the time the 483 years extend this side of the Christian era; and, as we have before shown, this is the very time when Christ was baptized. This conclusion is strengthened by the Saviour's statement immediately after his baptism, when, evidently referring to the sixty-nine weeks, he proclaimed, "The time is fulfilled." Mark 1:15.

But if sixty-nine of the weeks reach to the anointing of Messiah, what of the seventieth week? What marks its termination? The angel said to Daniel: "And he [Christ] shall confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease."

* Sermon preached at Otsego, Mich., Wednesday evening, Jan. 22, 1880. Reported by M. P. Mulser.

Christ preached three and a half years, and died in the middle of the seventieth week. After his death, the disciples preached to the Jews the remaining three and a half years, or until the Jewish Sanhedrim formally rejected him by persecuting his followers, and God gave the great apostle his commission to the Gentiles. Afterward, when referring to the matter, we hear him say: "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles." Acts 13:46. See also Rom. 1:16, and Matt. 10:5, 6.

Having now disposed of the seventy weeks, which we have already shown to be a part of the 2300 days (years), and which consequently began at the same time, we are ready to answer the inquiry, When do the 2300 years end? Having learned that they commenced A. D. 457, we have only to subtract that date from the 2300 years, which leaves 1843 years this side of the Christian era. But let it be noticed that it requires all of 457 and all of 1843 to make 2300 full years, so that if the 2300 years began with the commencement of A. D. 457, they would not end till the last day of A. D. 1843. But as the work of building Jerusalem did not commence till the seventh month of A. D. 457, to make the entire time of 2300 years, these seven months should be added to the end of A. D. 1843, which would carry us to the seventh month of A. D. 1844, as shown by the following diagram:—

"But," remarks one, "these are the very conclusions reached by Wm. Miller and his associates, when preaching the end of the world." Very true, and all the learned men of their day failed to refute their computation of the time. And why? Simply because they followed the Bible, which sustained them in their reckoning. The objector may ask, Then why did not the Lord come, as they predicted? Because they were mistaken, not in the time, but in the nature of the event to transpire. The cleansing of the sanctuary is not the coming of the Lord.

By referring to the book of Hebrews, we showed, last night, that the earthly sanctuary was built after the pattern of the heavenly, and that the services of the earthly were a shadow of those in the heavenly sanctuary. If so, the services of the heavenly sanctuary must be the same as those in the earthly. To illustrate: You see the shadow of my fingers on the wall; there are just as many fingers in the shadow as are on my hand, and no more. Now if I were to lose one of my fingers, and hold up my hand again here, you would notice the loss of that finger in the shadow on the wall. So you see the shadow can represent no more than the substance contains.

In order, then, to understand the nature of the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, we have only to trace the cleansing of the earthly, and will therefore briefly review that work. We learned last evening that when a person had broken one of God's commandments, he brought a victim to the door of the sanctuary, and confessed his sin upon its head. The victim was then slain, and its blood was taken by the priest to minister for the penitent. By this ceremony the sin was transferred from the sinner to the sanctuary. This sin remained there till the day of atonement, when the sanctuary was cleansed, and the sin removed. We also learned that on that day of atonement, the high priest passed from the outer apartment of the sanctuary to the most holy place, taking with him the sins of his people, and the blood of a sin-offering. In the most holy place he presented before God the blood, and atoned for the sins, after which they were placed upon the head of the scape-goat, and borne away from the camp of Israel forever.

This was in one sense a day of judgment to the children of Israel; for if any neglected to bring a victim and confess his sins, and have them conveyed into the sanctuary, they were not taken by the high priest in before God, and atoned for, but remained with the sinner, and he died for his sins. So it is in the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, in the gospel dispensation. All have an opportunity to confess their wrongs, and through the blood of Christ have them conveyed into the sanctuary above. But if any have died without confessing their wrongs, those wrongs rest upon them, and when the sins which have been conveyed into the sanctuary by confession are atoned for, the sins of the unrepentant are left out, and will be visited upon the heads of the guilty.

But when does the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, or the work of atonement, commence? At the close of the 2300 years, in 1844. Then Christ, our high priest, passed into the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary, to begin the work of atonement. Then the investigative Judgment commenced, and from that point the work of separation has been going on. That this is a time of judgment, is shown by Rev. 11:18, 19, where the prophet speaks of the time of the dead that they should be judged, and adds: "And the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." In the earthly sanctuary the ark of the testament was in the most holy place, which was entered only on the day of atonement. Hence when the ark of God's testament was seen in the open temple above, it must have been on the occasion of our High Priest's entering the most holy place, at the end of the 2300 years, in 1844.

This Judgment work is clearly announced in the great three-fold message of Rev. 14:6-12. The first angel proclaims in a most solemn manner that the hour of God's Judgment is come; the second angel follows closely, announcing the fallen condition of the professed church; while the third angel follows the other two, uttering a solemn warning against the worship of the beast, and at the same time presenting a remedy to prepare the world to stand in the Judgment. This three-fold message develops a class of people who, while waiting for the Lord from Heaven, keep the commandments of God and have the faith of Jesus.

The Judgment must decide cases by some standard; and by reference to the statement of the apostle Paul, in Rom. 2:12-16, we learn that that standard is the law of God, the very same introduced by the third angel, after the Judgment hour has been announced. How much like our blessed Lord, if when the Judgment hour arrives his people are found breaking his law, to send a warning message telling them of their mistake.

Let us now briefly notice the nature of the Judgment announced by this message. If a man here commits a crime, he is not condemned without a trial; but his case is investigated, and a verdict rendered for or against him, according to the evidence adduced. In other words, no man is properly condemned without first having an examination. Now if God is more just than mortal man (Job 4:17), and if it be true that at the coming of the Lord the dead in Christ rise first—or before the wicked—and are made immortal in the twinkling of an eye, as the Scriptures plainly teach, then we are shut up to the conclusion that the decision in their cases at least had been reached before the coming of the Lord and their resurrection from the dead. Every one, then, will have an investigation of his case, and the Bible plainly declares that every man will be judged according to his deeds. This would necessitate an examination of his entire life record, and we understand this to be just the nature of the Judgment work commenced in 1844, and announced by the first angel of Rev. 14.

But how is every man judged according to his deeds, if no record of his life is kept? In Dan. 7:9, 10, we find the following sublime description of the Judgment: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of Days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; the Judgment was set, and the books were opened."

In this text we are told that the books are opened; but just how many, and what they contain, it does not state. We read again, however, from Rev. 20:11, 12: "And I saw a great white throne, and Him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened, which is the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." From this scripture we learn the nature of these books. The book of life contains the names of all those who have ever entered the service of God, while the other books contain a record of their lives. From the record made in these books, decision is rendered in the case of each whose name is in the book of life.

Peter says that judgment begins at the house of God. 1 Pet 4:17. Let this book in my hand represent the book of life, and we will suppose that Abel's name stands first on the list. Here is the Judgment open, with the Judge upon the throne, surrounded by all his angels. The book of life is opened, and Abel's name is called. Then the angel that attended him through life presents a record not only of his words and deeds, but the secret motives of his heart. Eccl 12:14. If that record shows that Abel confessed all his wrongs and became an overcomer, the Lord Jesus Christ, as high priest, pleads his own blood in Abel's behalf, and the decision is given, let his sins be blotted out, and his name be retained in the book of life. But if any whose name has been entered there upon his giving his heart to God, shall afterward have grown careless and indifferent, and shall have neglected to confess his heart-wanderings and put away his wrongs, the record will reveal it, and the mandate will go forth, Let his sins be retained, and his name be blotted from the book of life.

This is not a fancy sketch. Turn with me to Rev. 3:5, and read: "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels." Here Christ is represented as standing before God and the angels when the names in the book of life are being examined, and he declares that he will there confess the names of those who have overcome. My friend, have you entered the service of God, and had your name recorded in the book of life? If so, your case will soon be reached. Oh, how my soul is thrilled at the thought that the book containing my name has been open for more than a quarter of a century, and as record after record is being examined, the time is drawing near when my name will be called, and I too shall pass the test. How shall I meet it?

In the earthly sanctuary the stonement occupied but one day in each year. Evidently the same work in the heavenly sanctuary will occupy but a correspondingly short time. Just how far the record has been reviewed, or how long it will take to finish the work, none can tell; but when the last name shall be reached, then the decree recorded in Rev. 22:11 will go forth: "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." The cases of all will then have been decided, and the announcement will be made: "Behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Rev. 22:12.

At that time, shall we with joy behold his face, and hear him say to us, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant"? If so, then we shall be happy forever. But oh, if it shall then appear that our names are not in the book of life, what despair will fill our souls! what agony will rend our hearts! We may call for the rocks and mountains to fall on us, and hide us from the face of the Lord; but that will afford us no relief, for our doom is fixed, and our cases hopeless.

How much better to seek the Lord now, and put our wrongs away while the opportunity is given. Our probation will soon close; and if the work of the Judgment should decide our cases to-night, how many would be ready? As I ask this question, I feel like crying, O Lord, make me more like thee! My dear friends, if you have not yet made your peace with God, I entreat you, as one who loves your souls, make it now. Give yourselves wholly to his service. And when the Lifegiver comes, may we all share in the overcomer's reward.

THE SANCTUARY.

BY JOSEPH CLARKE.

In Lev. 19:30 and 26:2, the people of God were commanded to reverence his sanctuary. This was the earthly sanctuary built by Moses; and the people to whom the command was addressed were Israelites. But in Heb. 8:1, 2, we find that Christ is a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man. From Heb. 9:24, it appears that this sanctuary is in Heaven; and from Dan. 8:14 we learn that an important work is to be performed in the heavenly sanctuary at the end of the 2300 prophetic days.

This fact has been, to a great degree, lost sight of by the church, for many ages past; and the sanctuary has been lost sight of; but in Rev. 11:19, the sanctuary, or temple, is brought to view as connected with the scenes of the last days; and in Rev. 8:3-5, the ark of God's testament, the golden altar, the censer, and the sacred fire, are mentioned in connection with the same scenes, as though the Lord would, in the last days, call his people to the consideration of the heavenly sanctuary, and the work to be there accomplished. This work is of the deepest interest to all who value the ministrations of Christ, our High Priest, who there pleads for his people, and there decides their cases. See Rev. 11:18.

Beneath the mercy seat, before which our Saviour ministers, is the law of God, the ten commandments. In the bosom of that law is the fourth commandment, unchanged since God spoke it from Sinai, and engraved it with his own finger on the tables of stone. Thus the Sabbath and the sanctuary are closely connected. Now, is it not a fair and honest conclusion, that Sabbath-keepers who will stand in the terrible scenes of the last days, and be acquitted at last in the court of Heaven, must see the Sabbath in connection with the sanctuary, and the truths to be made clear at the same time? The rays of divine truth emanating from the sanctuary are lighting up the pages of inspiration with a clear and beautiful light. It seems to us that all must see this light and walk in it, or be left in darkness.

THE TARRYING LORD.

BY F. PEABODY.

Why does our Lord tarry? Why did he not come when his people looked for him? Where is he? Will he ever come? You ask these and many more questions very often. We do not blame you for asking these questions, but sometimes think you ought to believe when we tell you what the Bible says. We think Paul has plainly shown that the Lord has a work to do before he comes. Read the eighth and ninth chapters of Hebrews. He tells us in a familiar way that Christ is our high priest, and that he is performing a service in the heavenly sanctuary, just as the priest did in the earthly one built by Moses. You can learn so much more than I can tell you by reading in Exodus, commencing at the twenty-fifth chapter, that I will ask you to take time to read. You will see that the high priest went into the holiest place every year to cleanse it of sin. You will learn what his service was, and what he did when he came out. It was a solemn thing to go into the awful presence of the Lord. The people did not know but that something might have been neglected in making preparation, and that on that account the priest had died. The priest had bells of gold on his garments, so that the people could hear him when he was moving about, and know that he was still performing the solemn services of the day of atonement.

Now, if you will read the eighth and ninth chapters of Hebrews, you will see that according to Paul's view, Christ is doing similar service in a sanctuary above. While the Lord is there, his people have a work to do here. They must not only get ready to meet him when he comes, but they must call the attention of the world to the place where he is. We hear no sounding of bells from within the heavenly sanctuary, but we hear a message-cry raised that Christ is there, and is doing service still. Now, when his work is done, and the work of his people is done, he will come, and will not tarry.

The reasons why he did not come when his people thought he would, seem so plain that we will only give this one: He never promised to come at that time. If he had, he certainly would have come. He said he would commence the Judgment-work at that time, and they thought the court would be held here on this earth, and that all the world would be present. They very soon discovered that the Lord had done all he promised to do at that time. If we read Dan. 7: 8, 9, we shall find that the Judgment scene was to be in Heaven. We there learn who constitutes that grand tribunal. The Ancient of Days, God himself, sits as judge; Christ is the advocate, and the angels are the audience and helpers. Every case on the calendar is a criminal one; the result of each case is life or death, and from the decision of that court there is no appeal. The Lord entered upon this grand assize when the people thought he was coming to earth.

I think by this time you can see where the Lord is, what he is doing, and why he tarries. When the priestly work is done, the kingly will begin. We know he will come. He has said he would, and his word has never failed. Shall we suppose that he will fail just now?

There is one thing that you and I will do well not to do. While the Bridegroom tarries, it will be better for us not to slumber. Matt. 25: 5. Sleep now is fatal. Please read how our brother Paul looked at this matter when he wrote Heb. 10: 34-39. Would you advise us to give up, and look no more for him, because he tarries? We cannot, no, we cannot, though he tarry ever so much longer. He knows best. We leave it to him. "Even so come, Lord Jesus." Rev. 22: 20.

(Continued.)

5. The Day of Atonement.—"On the tenth day of the seventh month there shall be a day of atonement." Lev. 23:27. Many reasons are adduced for fixing upon this particular day. "Some have fancied this was the day of the year on which our first parents fell. Lightfoot computes that this was the day on which Moses came the last time down from the mount." But all is mere supposition, as no reason is given by Inspiration. We do know that a day of expiation was appointed for the end of every yearly sanctuary service. This day was to be kept more sacredly than any other of the annual sabbaths. "Ye shall do no work in that same day." Verse 28. "It shall be an holy convocation unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls." "Whosoever shall it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people." Verses 27, 29. It was to be a day of humiliation, of careful self-examination, and of repentance and confession of sins; and such employment was enough without allowing "any manner of work." Verse 31. Paul speaks of it as "the fast day." Acts 27:9. (See also margin.) Fasting seems inseparably connected with mourning in the Scriptures. See Matt. 9:14, 15. The solemn appointments of the day of atonement could be better understood, the heinous nature of sin and the holiness of God more deeply realized, while abstaining from food.

The public duties of this great day probably began with the usual morning sacrifice (as it was never to be omitted); then followed the extraordinary sacrifice for the occasion, which was a bullock, a ram, and seven lambs. These offerings the high priest made in his own official garments; but now he put off his rich attire, and dressed himself in plain linen, like the rest of the priests. As sinners, they all stood on a level before God, and it was fitting that their dress should indicate that he "is no respecter of persons." It may have foreshadowed the act of Christ, our great high priest, in leaving his robes of royalty when he came as a sin-offering, and clothing himself with the "clean, indeed, but mean garments of our mortality."

The peculiar work of the day devolved on the high priest alone. So Jesus "trod the wine-press alone." A second was anointed, that in case of sickness or ceremonial defilement he might act in the place of the high priest. This second was the heir of the high priest, or the first in succession in whom was found no blemish or infirmity, and at his death succeeded to the high priesthood. In the degenerate times of Christ, this office was often changed. "Jewish writers say the high priest was to dwell alone in the temple to prepare himself for the service of this great day. During seven days he was to do the work of the inferior priest, and he must have the institution read to him again and again that he might be fully apprised of the whole method."

Proceeding to the special services of the day, the high priest first took a bullock for himself and the other priests (Ps. 135:19) as a sin-offering; then he should "take of the congregation of the children of Israel two kids of the goats for a sin-offering (both together constituted the sin-offering, verse 10), and one ram for a burnt-offering." Lev. 16:5. He should "cast lots upon the two goats, one lot for the Lord and the other lot for the scape-goat." Verse 8. Jewish writers thus describe this casting of lots: "The priest, placing one of the goats on his right hand and the other on his left, took his station by the altar, and cast into an urn two pieces of gold exactly similar, inscribed, the one with the words 'for the Lord' and the other for 'Azazel' (the scape-goat). After having well shaken them together he put both his hands into the box and took up a lot in each; that in his right hand he put on the head of the goat which stood on his right, and that in his left he dropped on the other." "The oldest opinions of the Hebrews and Christians think Azazel is the name of the devil. The Syriac has Azail, the angel (strong one) who revolted." Of these two goats, one must be slain as a type of the great offering in Jesus to meet the justice of God, and the demands of his broken law; and the other sent away into a land of forgetfulness, as a type of the fate of the "angel who revolted" and led the human race into sin, and in token of the entire remission of our sins, as though we had not sinned.

"Most ancient nations had vicarious sacrifices, to which they transferred, by certain rites and ceremonies, the guilt of the community at large. The white bull, sacrificed to Apis by the Egyptians, was of this kind. They cut off the head, and after having loaded it with execrations, that if there be any evil hanging over them or the land of Egypt, it may be poured out upon that head, they sold it to the Greeks, or threw it into the Nile."—Herodotus. Petronius Arbitrator says the ancient inhabitants of Marseilles (a colony of Phœnicians from Asia) whenever afflicted by pestilence, took one of the poorer citizens, who offered himself for that purpose, and having fed him a whole year with the purest and best food, adorned him with vervain, then clothed him with sacred vestments, led him round their city, loading him with execrations, and having prayed that all the evils to which the city was exposed might fall upon him, they precipitated him from a rock. But the custom nearest to the Hebrew is found among the Hindus, with whom a horse is used for a goat."—Dr. A. Clarke. "The horse so sacrificed is in place of the sacrificer, bears his sins with him into the wilderness into which he is turned adrift, and becomes the expiatory victim of those sins."—Hallid.

The high priest first killed the bullock for himself and for his house; then, while the blood of the victim was being received into a vessel, taking a censer of live coals in his right hand and a platter of sweet incense in his left, he, amid the solemn attention and the anxious prayers of the assembled multitude, crossed the porch and the holy place, opened the inner veil, which opened into the holy of holies, and, standing before the ark, deposited the censer of coals on the floor, emptied the plate of incense into his hand, poured it on the burning coals, and the apartment was filled with fragrant smoke." The Lord veiled the sacred mysteries of the most holy place and himself from mortal gaze in a cloud. Verse 2. Thus he would impress upon his people a reverence for himself and his worship. At that time God manifested himself by visible symbols, and there was danger of familiarity lessening their awe of his terrible majesty. It is different with the things of faith. We are now invited to "come boldly [with confidence] unto the throne of grace." The more frequently we visit our mercy-seat, thus becoming better acquainted with our God, the more reverently we adore and love him.

The high priest then brought the blood of the bullock "from the priest whom he had left stirring it that it might not thicken," say the Jews, and went again into the most holy place. He sprinkled the blood upon the mercy-seat with his finger once, and seven times before it; passing out, he sprinkled in like manner the holy place and the altar, so making an atonement for the sanctuary, or cleansing it from imputed sin. Verse 16. Their sins had been borne into it by faith through the year, while even the daily ministrations of the priests had not been so faultless as to need no expiation. No inferior priest was worthy to remain in any part of the sanctuary while the atonement was being made. Most solemn must have been the feelings of the high priest while standing in the presence of injured Deity—most careful to do everything as had been prescribed, that he did not. All this time the people without were praying for themselves and for him, intensely anxious, fearing their sins were too great for forgiveness. If he tarried a little longer than usual, it is said they were terrified, fearing the wrath of God on account of their sins had consumed him; and when he appeared, they felt greatly relieved.

After sprinkling all the sacred vessels of the sanctuary, the priest mixed some of the blood of the bullock and the goat, to show the equal need of atonement for priest and people, and put it on the horns of the altar. Verse 18.

Now the high priest brought the live goat, laid both his hands upon his head, and confessed "over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins." Verse 21. "In one sin there may be many transgressions, from its several aggravating circumstances." In confession, we should cover all the ground minutely, confessing everything for which we desire forgiveness. The goat was then to be taken away by a man appointed for the purpose. "Into a distant, solitary, and desert place, in early times, he was let go to escape for his life, but in the time of Christ was carried to a high rock twelve miles from Jerusalem, and there being thrust over the precipice he was killed."—Jamison. "On the day of atonement, on the tenth day of the seventh month, corresponding to our . . . October, Lev. 16, together with chap. 23: 27-32, as containing special allusion to the observance of the day, was publicly read. The rehearsal of these passages, appointing the solemn ceremonial and the details of the successive parts of it, above all, the spectacle of the public departure of the scape-goat under the care of its leader, must have produced salutary impressions of sin and of duty."—Ibid. The high priest, after sending away the scape-goat, resumes his own attire, again bathing himself. The services of the day had been accompanied with numerous washings of the entire person or of the hands and feet, representing the purity of Christ. "Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord." One took the bullock and the goat for sin-offerings without the camp and burned them; and he and the one who took away the scape-goat, being thereby ceremonially dolled, tainted by the sin borne by these victims, had to wash their clothes and bathe their persons before coming into camp again.

The annual day of atonement typified the work of Jesus, our High Priest, who makes reconciliation for the sins of the people. Heb. 12: 17. The Jewish services on this day did not look forward to the coming year, so the atonement of Christ was not made on the cross previous to his ministration in the heavenly sanctuary. The victim was slain then (he appears before the throne in Heaven as a Lamb that has been slain, Rev. 5: 6), the provision for his future ministration was made at that time; but his blood did not expiate sins before they were committed, as it must have done had the atonement been made on the cross. The day of atonement ended the round of yearly service; so the antitypical day of atonement will end the gospel age. It will not be repeated; there is no other probation for us; but Jesus has appeared once for all,—has made one grand sacrifice of himself; there will be one final, most solemn day of atonement, and the probation of the human family is forever ended. The priests ministered in the holy place till the last day of the year; so Jesus ministers in the holy place of the heavenly sanctuary till the antitypical day of atonement; then his services in the most holy place close probation forever. Our sins have been confessed for 1800 years, looking by faith to our sin-offering in Heaven. By faith we see him in the antitypical day of atonement, making, not a figurative, but a real application of the merits of his blood for the sins of his people, and the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, to which there had been a judicial imputation of sin, as in the earthly sanctuary.

When this work will be done in Heaven is clearly shown in tracts, as, "The Sanctuary and Twenty-three Hundred days," "The First Angel's Message," and in other publications, as, "The Sanctuary and Its Cleansing," "Thoughts on Daniel," to be had at the REVIEW Office, to which we invite the serious attention of the reader as one who has an infinitely important personal interest in the work of the great High Priest; "for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." Acts 4: 12.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.

A CRITICAL exposition of this subject is not here attempted. For such a treatment, the work of Eld. Smith is complete. This article is to express some general bearings the subject seems to us to carry with it, which certainly would take nothing from its solemnity, but give a thrilling interest to it.

"Unto two thousand three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8:14. In Daniel 2, the line of events symbolized by the great image terminates with the little stone smiting the image on its feet and toes. In the interpretation, Daniel gives "a kingdom which the God of Heaven shall set up" as the thing symbolized by the little stone. The whole view disclosed is earth's history given and terminated, and followed by the everlasting kingdom of God, "wherein dwelleth righteousness," and no sin.

In Daniel 7, the line of events symbolized by the four beasts terminates at the last Judgment. Verses 9, 10. Here we have earth's wicked nations brought to Judgment, found wanting, and their place given to the "people of the saints of the Most High," with no more sin; for none shall survive the ordeal of that solemn Judgment whose opening is described in Daniel 7.

In Daniel 8, the line of events introduced under the symbols there described reaches to the "cleansing of the sanctuary," and is terminated by it. It appears plain that the cleansing of the sanctuary in the eighth chapter, corresponds with the setting up of the kingdom by the God of Heaven in the second, and the sitting of the great Judgment and the giving of earth's kingdoms to the people of the saints in the seventh chapter. The second, seventh, and eighth chapters describe, under three classes of names and symbols, the great road that leads through the greatness, and cruelty, and sin of earth, to the shores of immortality, and the sinless kingdom.

The cleansing of the sanctuary, then, is the removal of sin from the earth and from all the dominions of God. At the end of the twenty-three hundred days, God will either make a sudden end of sin and evil throughout his vast dominions, or he will then begin that work which, being once begun, will not be abandoned until the great song of redemption rises from "every creature which is in Heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," and swells through renovated creation and sweeps through eternity; and, without a protest or a discordant note, ascribes "blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever." Rev. 5:13.

The cleansing work begins in the sanctuary on high, by the removing of the sins of God's people from the books there kept; but that being accomplished, the work will extend to every point in the universe that has the touch or taint of sin, and will not cease until God's wider dwelling-place, the universe, is as pure and clean as his own immaculate being.

If it should be objected that the Bible cleansing of the sanctuary relates only to the cleansing by blood of the sins of God's people from the records on high, and does not relate to nor include the cleansing by fire of the earth and the "habitation of devils," it may be answered that in all those other lines of prophecy in Daniel, with which the eighth chapter seems, at least, to coincide, we are brought to the boundary line between God's tolerance of evil and his final disposal of it. Such a coincidence would indicate that it is the final removal of evil that is brought to view in the cleansing of the sanctuary.

It may also be noted that, at the typical cleansing of the sanctuary, those who did not afflict their souls on that day were to be cut off from among their people. This cutting off was their death, inflicted as a type of the second death to be visited upon those whose sins shall not be purged by the blood of the Lamb at the great anti-typical cleansing. The cleansing was completed in the type by the infliction of death upon the wicked, to represent that, in the great anti-typical cleansing at the last day, the wicked will receive the second death. To state the matter in other words: In the type, the priest's work at the time of cleansing the sanctuary could not be said to be fully done until the impenitent were cut off; so the great cleansing at the close of the gospel work by our great "High Priest," cannot be said to be fully accomplished until the wicked are cut off from their place in God's dominions.

Glorious thought! are we indeed arrived at the age of the world in which our Lord is to set his hand to this work?

As surely as we are in the last days covered by the great image; as surely as we are under the form that the last of the four great beasts was to assume at the sitting of the Judgment; so surely are we past the close of the twenty-three hundred days and in the time of the cleansing of the sanctuary.

H. WYAN.

SYNOPSIS OF THE ATONEMENT. NO. 1.

BY REV. H. A. ST. JOHN.

1. REASON leads to the idea of an atonement.
2. The "laws of Nature" are either (a) the laws which Nature has made, or (b) the laws which a Supreme Being has made for the government of Nature.
3. Nature never made a law. (Don't know enough.)
4. Nature and the Bible do not conflict.
5. The Bible leads into a field of truth where Nature makes no attempt to follow.
6. The laws of Nature present no standard of right.
7. Nature's laws are destitute of morality.
8. There is implanted in man a sense of justice, or convictions of right.
9. No counterpart in Nature.
10. These convictions are a moral basis.
11. God is a supreme moral governor.
12. He has, necessarily, a moral law.
13. Moral wrong is the transgression of God's moral law.
14. Moral wrong exists.

I. SIN OUGHT TO BE PUNISHED.

1. It injures the subjects of the government.
2. It brings contempt on the government.
3. It insults and abuses the Creator and Governor.

II. CAN THE SINNER BE CLEARED?

Not unless one of three things takes place:—

1. The law be suffered to be trampled upon with impunity.
2. The law be abolished.
3. The Governor pardon.

III. PARDON SUPPOSES OR RECOGNIZES,

1. The guilt of the condemned.
2. The power of the government.
3. The justice of the law transgressed.

IV. WHAT THE GOVERNOR MUST DO IN GRANTING PARDON.

He must do one of the following things:—

1. Disregard the strict claims of law and justice; or,—
2. Make satisfaction to the law by voluntary substitution.

V. VOLUNTARY SUBSTITUTION.

1. It recognizes the claims of the law.
2. It honors and maintains the government.
3. It dispenses mercy.

VI. THE ATONEMENT IS NECESSARY.

1. Future obedience will not justify the guilty.
2. We have no ransom to bring.
3. We are incapacitated by immoral practices.
 - a. Treason is the highest crime.
 - b. The government has the sole right to free therefrom.
 - c. He who will not accept the conditions is a traitor still.

Two things must be required of a transgressor, or rebel:—

1. Unqualified submission to the laws which have been transgressed, and,—
2. A hearty acceptance of the plan, or conditions, offered for his restitution.

Rights of Subjects.

1. The government must plainly reveal its laws.
2. The government must plainly reveal its conditions of pardon.

Remarks and Questions.

1. Man has ruined himself by sin.
2. How may he be acquitted and restored?
3. How shall we obtain the information?
4. Who shall act as our mediator?
5. Do we not need a revelation?
6. Reason is not evidence.
7. Reason cannot create evidence.
8. Reason can only weigh evidence when presented.
9. Revelation and evidence are the same.

Attributes of Deity.

1. Wisdom; 2. Power; 3. Holiness; 4. Truth; 5. Justice; 6. Love; 7. Mercy.

To each of these seven attributes belong infinity, immortality, and eternity.

Here is another instance where the number seven signifies completeness, or perfection. Seven colors, properly arranged and blended, make a complete rainbow. Seven attributes, properly blended, make a perfect character.

Law.

1. Law is the basis of government.
2. God has made a plain revelation of his law. Ex. 20:3-17.
3. God's law is perfect and holy. Ps. 19:7; Rom. 7:12.
4. Character, the exact counterpart of the law obeyed.

A Complex System.

The system under which the people of God lived in the Old Dispensation was complex. It consisted of the following elements:—

1. The Moral Element.
2. The Civil Element.
3. The Ceremonial Element.

The Moral was the basis of all, existing prior to, and independent of, the others; and was from the beginning the standard of duty to God, and to our fellow-men.

The Civil enforced the Moral laws, especially in their relations to their fellow-men.

The Ceremonial expiated their violations of the Moral, and had especial reference to their relations to God.

Law and Government.

1. Government is a system of laws maintained.
2. God's moral law is the basis of his government.
3. This law is summarily contained in the ten commandments.
4. Sin is the transgression of God's law.
5. Death (not endless misery) is the penalty for sin.
6. Moral duty, whether it be called law or gospel, cannot justify the sinner.
7. God's plan of salvation contemplates prevention, as well as cure.

SYNOPSIS OF THE ATONEMENT. NO. 2.

BY RLD. B. A. ST. JOHN.

Christ's Death Vicarious.

1. THAT which is done for another is vicarious.
2. Christ died for us; his death was vicarious.
3. There can be no atonement where there is no vicariousness.
4. The life of the flesh is the blood. Gen. 9:4.
5. In the type, the death of the sin-offering was vicarious.
6. Both justice and mercy pervade the atonement.
7. Did Christ, the Son of God, die?
8. Trinitarians and Unitarians have but a human sacrifice.
9. "I am he that liveth and was dead." Rev. 1:18.
10. Man cannot atone for himself, being under condemnation.
11. One person cannot atone for another; all are involved in sin.
12. Were a part of the race free from sin, they could not atone for the other part. To illustrate: He who owed all that he possessed could not justly use his possession to pay the debt of another. Men, whether saints or sinners, owe all their service to God.
13. Angels are inadequate for the same reason.
14. Jesus is the only adequate sacrifice. Prov 8:30; John 17:5; Heb. 1:1-14; Col. 1:15-17.

Sacrifice and Atonement.

1. There is a clear distinction between the death of Christ, and the atonement.
2. In the type three things are requisite:—
 - a. He shall lay his hands on the head of the offering.
 - b. He shall kill it.
 - c. The priest shall make atonement.
3. Killing the offering and making the atonement were distinct and separate acts.
4. The day of atonement was the tenth day of the seventh month.
5. The earthly sanctuary, with the services of the high priest, was typical of the heavenly sanctuary, and the work of the Lord Jesus Christ therein. Heb. 8:1-5; 9:9-11.
6. Jesus entered with his blood. Heb. 9:12.
7. Christ's death was not the atonement, but only preparatory to it.
8. At conversion sin is pardoned, only. This is justification by faith. Rom. 5:1.
9. Atonement is the blotting out of sin. This is justification in fact. Acts 3:19.
10. No sins are blotted out except of those who have repented, and been converted. Acts 3:19-21.

11. Reconciliation and atonement are not the same.
12. Reconciliation precedes the atonement.
13. The death of Christ, the offering of his blood, opens the way for reconciliation.
14. Reconciliation secures an interest in the atonement.
15. The death of Christ does not take anything from our actual guilt.
16. We are as deserving of punishment as if he had never died.
17. Reconciliation is mutual. Eze. 16:62, 63.
18. God's justice, not his love, must be appeased, or pacified.

Times and Manner of Atonement.

1. There was an appointed time for making the atonement. Dan. 8:14.
2. The time appointed was at the termination of the 2300 prophetic days, which was in the autumn of A. D. 1844.
3. This refers to the heavenly, or antitypical sanctuary, as the type was destroyed in A. D. 70.

THE ARK OF THE TESTIMONY.

BY ELD. R. F. COTTRELL.

READING the directions given to Moses for building the sanctuary, Ex. 25, the first thing described is the ark, into which the testimony of God, written by himself on tables of stone, was to be placed. It was proper to give this the first place in the description, as it was the thing of the first importance, the great central object of the tabernacle. The testimony gave name, not only to the ark which was made on purpose to contain it, but to the entire building, it being called "the tabernacle of the testimony," Num. 1:50, 53. Above the mercy-seat, which was the covering of the ark, was the place where Jehovah dwelt by the glorious symbol of his presence.

All that pertained to the tabernacle and its furniture, was to be made according to a pattern which was shown to Moses in the holy mount. Ex. 25:9, 40. That which was shown to him was either "the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in Heaven," Rev. 15:5, or a model of it; for Paul, speaking of the "worldly sanctuary," or the "first tabernacle," with its "vessels of ministry," calls them "the patterns of things in the Heavens." Heb. 9:23.

Everything of the tabernacle and its contents was the work of human hands, except the testimony engraven upon the tables. The engraving was done by the finger of God. As all else was made according to the pattern, and was therefore a true representation of things in the Heavens, it would be extremely unreasonable to suppose that the testimony, written by the finger of God, was not a true copy of the law of God contained in the heavenly temple.

Here is an argument for the perpetuity and immutability of the ten commandments. As long as this law remains in "the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man," so long it must remain the law of God. But it remains there till the seventh trumpet sounds, the sounding of which does not cease till the dead are judged, and the risen saints receive their reward in the kingdom of God. Rev. 11:15-19. One of the events which transpires during the sounding of the seventh angel is expressed as follows: "And the temple of God was opened in Heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." The sacred ark of God's testimony is still in Heaven. That holy law is still binding in every jot and tittle. It is in vain for men to claim that one of its holy precepts is either abolished or changed in the least. This law is the rule by which God will bring every work into judgment. Men of all ages and nations will be judged by this one perfect rule.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.—NO. 1.

THIS is a subject of the most thrilling interest to mankind. The fact that God by his prophet appointed the time for the cleansing of the sanctuary more than two thousand years before it was to take place, clearly indicates that it is an event of no trivial importance. It must be an event of such magnitude as to deeply concern the human race. It does not seem unreasonable to suppose that the apostle alludes to this prophecy when he says that God "hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness." This supposition may be verified in the sequel.

In connection with a chain of prophecy beginning with the Medo-Persian Empire, and reaching to the end of earthly rule, we have revealed the definite period which should reach to the time of the cleansing of the sanctuary. Daniel says: "Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8:13, 14.

After Daniel had seen the vision of the ram, the goat, and the little horn which became exceeding great, and had heard the words concerning the sanctuary, and was very desirous to learn the meaning, he heard a voice which said, "Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision." In obedience to this, the angel proceeded to explain the symbols. Said he, "The ram which thou sawest having two horns, are the kings of Media and Persia. And the rough goat is the king of Grecia; and the great horn which is between his eyes is the first king." Thus two of the three kingdoms which he had seen in symbol are expressed by name. The other, though not named, is so described as to make its application certain. Compared with the former powers, it was to be exceeding great; it was to stand up against the Prince of princes, the Lord Jesus Christ; and it was to be the great persecutor and destroyer of the people of God. These specifications have been fulfilled by no other power than that of Rome. It is the only empire that has arisen exceeding in power the other two; it is distinguished above all others by its persecutions of the people of God; and it is the power that sought the life of Jesus at his birth, and that finally nailed him to the cross.

But although the three symbols were so clearly interpreted, yet at the close of the chapter the prophet could say, "I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it." What part of it was unexplained? Only the time. All that Gabriel had said of that part of the vision "which was told" was that "the vision of the evening and the morning which was told is true; wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days." That this relates to the appointed time for the cleansing of the sanctuary is evident from the marginal reading of verse 14: "Unto two thousand and three hundred evening morning; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Since, therefore, the time was left unexplained, no date being given for its commencement, it is reasonable to expect that Gabriel will make the prophet another visit to complete the work assigned him; namely, to "make this man understand the vision." The record of such a visit is found in the next chapter.

Now, as the empires of the vision were to extend over a period of thousands of years, and yet were symbolized by short-lived animals, it is reasonable to suppose that each day of the vision was the symbol of a year; for 2300 literal days would cover but a very small part of the duration of those empires. And we have a rule given by inspiration for the interpretation of symbolic days. "I have appointed thee each day for a year." Eze. 4:6. And it will appear as we proceed that this is the true principle of the interpretation of the prophetic periods. It would be absurd to suppose that the 2300 days were given for any other purpose than the benefit of men. And to be a benefit, they must be understood. An event of no little importance to the people of God is to take place at the end of the period; but unless we have a date for its beginning, it is impossible to know when it will close. The Lord has not left us without the needed information. In Dan. 9, and only there, is given the beginning date of the vision.

In this chapter we learn that Daniel had been studying the prophet Jeremiah concerning the seventy years of the captivity in Babylon; and he probably supposed that the vision which he had had of the cleansing of the sanctuary was to be fulfilled in their return from captivity, rebuilding the temple, and re-instituting the services in that sanctuary as it had been in former days. But while he was importuning in behalf of the Lord's "sanctuary that was desolate," Gabriel suddenly touched him, and said, "O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding;" as much as to say, You do not understand what you heard of the sanctuary and its cleansing. Then, calling his attention directly to the vision, he says, "Therefore understand the matter and consider the vision."

He then proceeds to the point in the vision left unexplained in the eighth chapter, the time, and says: "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city." The word rendered "determined" literally signifies "cut off." From what, pertaining to that vision, could seventy weeks be cut off, but the 2300 days? There is no reasonable doubt that the seventy weeks, which are 490 days, are a part of the 2300 days. So much of the great period was given to the Jewish people. The seventy weeks reach to Christ, and include the work of his mission to earth, a part of which was "to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up [to make sure] the vision." The time is made sure by the dates that are fixed by the appearing of Christ, and the events of his mission.

The angel then gives the point from which to reckon the time of the vision. Without a starting-point the period would be useless; therefore he gives it with emphasis as follows: "Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks." Jerusalem was in ruins. The commandment for its restoration was that of God, given before in prophecy (Isa. 41:26-28; 45:13), and was carried into effect by Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes, whose successive action is recognized as the legal establishment of that commandment by the authority of the Persian Empire. Ezra 6:14.

The decree of Artaxerxes, which marks the going forth of the commandment, was in the year A. C. 457, a date which has been established by the infallible testimony of many eclipses. Sixty-nine weeks, or 483 prophetic days, extend from this date to the Messiah, that is, to Christ. This period was fulfilled in exactly 483 years, which proves that we have made no mistake in reckoning the days of the vision as years, nor in fixing their date at A. C. 457.

In the fall of A. D. 27, just 483 years from A. C. 457, Jesus began his ministry with the announcement, "The time is fulfilled." Mark 1:15. The sixty-nine weeks ended at this point, not at his birth, but at the time when his anointing took place, at his baptism, the word Messiah signifying "the anointed one." See John 1:41; Acts 10:37, 38; Luke 3:21, 22; 4:14-21.

One week of the seventy remained in which the covenant was to be confirmed with many. Verse 27. In the midst of this week the sacrifice and oblation were to cease. This must signify that he should take these away by becoming himself the great sacrifice for sin which these typified. Heb. 10:1-13; Col. 2:14-17. Our Lord preached three years and a half, to A. D. 31, when he was crucified. This being in the midst of the seventieth week, three and a half prophetic days completed the seventy weeks in A. D. 34, where the exclusive work for the Jews ended, and the work for the Gentiles began in the conversion of Saul, who was at once commissioned to them. Acts 26:16-17. Here ended the seventy weeks which were cut off from the 2300 days. These 490 years finished, there remained 1810 to transpire before the beginning of the work of cleansing the sanctuary. As the 490 ended in the fall of A. D. 34, the remaining 1810 ended in the fall of 1844.

It is not possible that the 2300 days could extend to the present time. They are ended; and as the evidence was clear previous to 1844 that they would then come to an end, nothing can be gained by trying to set aside that evidence. The sealed book was already open (Dan. 12:4, 9; Rev. 10:2), and a special proclamation on prophetic time was then made. Rev. 10:6; 14:7. The great disappointment of 1844 was the result of the error that the earth was the sanctuary, and the burning of the earth its cleansing. See 2 Pet. 3:10. As this was to take place in the day of the Lord, it was held that the Lord must come at the end of the days. This ignorance was overruled by God to give energy and emphasis to the prophetic proclamation that was then due. Rev. 14:8, 7. The light on the sanctuary of the new dispensation, which is the only one that the text could refer to, has been the result of a prayerful study of the Bible since that time. R. F. COTTRELL.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.—NO. 2.

"Then verily the first covenant had also [as well as the second covenant] ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary." Heb. 9:1. The sanctuary of the first covenant being distinguished as worldly, how shall that of the new covenant be distinguished? "We have such an High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. 8:1, 2. As the sanctuary on earth was destroyed with the destruction of Jerusalem, and has not existed since that time, it is evident that the work predicted to take place in the sanctuary so late as A. D. 1844, must relate to the sanctuary of the new covenant. We shall find, by our investigation, that the sanctuary of the first covenant was a type, and that of the second its antitype. The first covenant extends from the time of Moses to the death of Christ; the second, or new covenant, begins with the death of Christ and reaches to the end. Gal. 4:24-26; Heb. 8:7-13; Luke 22:20.

The sanctuary of the first covenant is described by the apostle as the tabernacle built by Moses in the wilderness of Horeb. In Ex. 25, the directions for the building of this sanctuary begin. The Lord spoke to Moses to call for materials of various kinds from the people, and, said he, "Let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them." From this we learn that the sanctuary is the dwelling-place for God. Then follows a particular description of the building with its furniture, all of which must be made according to a pattern which had been shown to Moses while on the mount. "And look that thou make them after their pattern which was showed thee in the mount." The leading features of this tabernacle, as also of the temple afterward built in Jerusalem, was that it had two apartments, the holy and the most holy. Though courts and chambers were added to the temple, yet the main features were the same. The brazen altar, that for burnt-offerings, was in the court of the tabernacle without the door, which was on the east side. On entering the first apartment we find the furniture to consist, on the south side, of the candlestick with seven lamps; on the north side, of the table with its twelve loaves of show-bread; and the golden altar, the altar of incense, before the veil which divides this apartment from the second, or most holy. Passing the second veil, we find the ark of the testimony, which was made expressly to contain the tables of testimony, tables of stone on which were written the testimony of God, the ten commandments, graven by the finger of God upon the tables. The covering of the ark was called the mercy-seat, or propitiatory, on each end of which was a cherub of beaten gold, the two cherubim having their faces turned inward and downward toward the mercy-seat. Above the ark, between the cherubim, was the shakinah, the symbol of God's presence.

Now, that this sanctuary, constructed so carefully after a pattern shown by God to Moses, was a representation, or type, of the real temple of God in heaven, the new covenant sanctuary, the sanctuary of this dispensation, where Christ himself is the high priest, is taught very plainly by the apostle in Hebrews 8 and 9. Christ in his priesthood is first introduced thus: "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Here is a plain contrast between the true sanctuary where Christ is, and the one pitched by man. Then he speaks of the necessity that Christ should make an offering typified by the priests on earth. Then of the service of these priests he says, "Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." How plain it is that the service of the priests on earth was typical, or that it shadowed forth the priesthood of Christ in the true sanctuary in heaven! Then to make it clearly understood he adds: "As Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern shown to thee in the mount."

He then proceeds in chapter 9 to describe the sanctuary of the first covenant, and the service of the priests in the first and then in the second apartment, and says: "The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all [holy places] was not made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing: which was a figure for the time then present." Verses 8, 9. Again, in verse 23, speaking of the tabernacle and the vessels of the ministry, he calls them "the patterns of the things in the heavens;" and in the following verse he adds: "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." No more testimony is needed to prove that the tabernacle with its two apartments was a true representation of that where our High Priest now ministers in heaven. Now we will notice other testimonies of Scripture which allude to the heavenly sanctuary, of which the earthly was a figure. "A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary." Jer. 17:12. "For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary; from heaven did the Lord behold the earth." Ps. 102:19. "The Lord reigneth; let the people tremble: he sitteth between the cherubim; let the earth be moved." Ps. 99:1. Our risen and glorified Saviour, "made a High Priest forever after the order of Melchisedec," appeared to his servant John on the Isle of Patmos, and in his address to the churches he represents himself as walking amid the seven golden candlesticks, a plain allusion to the candlestick with its seven lamps in the first apartment of the earthly sanctuary. Rev. 2:1.

Again, in chapter 4 we read: "A door was opened in heaven;" not the door of heaven, but a door in heaven. "A throne was set in heaven, and one sat on the throne." Verse 2. "And there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God." Verse 5. In chapter 8:3 an angel is seen with a "golden censor" with much incense, "that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne." In the tabernacle this golden altar was in the first apartment, or the holy place. Again we read, "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. 11:19. The ark of the testimony containing the ten commandments was in the most holy place, "after the second vail." This, then, is the opening of the second apartment; and it takes place under the sounding of the last of the seven trumpets, in the close of the dispensation, when "the mystery of God," the work of the gospel, is to be finished. Rev. 10:7. And when the work of mercy closes, and the wrath of God is about to be poured out, it is said, "And after that I looked, and, behold, the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened." Rev. 15:5.

These testimonies show that there is a temple of God in heaven where our High Priest is, and that it is furnished and arranged in the same manner as that which Moses was commanded to make "according to the pattern which was shown to him," and which Paul calls, "The patterns of the things in the heavens," and "The figures of the true." Our next inquiry will be concerning the service of these priests, "who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things," in order that we may learn the order of the service of our great High Priest in the true sanctuary in heaven. His priestly work being out of our sight, we must depend upon the types given for the order of his ministration, and the work of cleansing the sanctuary.

R. F. COTTRELL.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.—NO. 2.

We have found that the sanctuary of the first covenant was a type, or representation, of the true sanctuary, the temple of God in heaven, the place where our High Priest now ministers. And it seems scarcely necessary to repeat the truth so clearly revealed in the 8th and 9th chapters of Hebrews, that the services of the priests on earth were the representation of the services of our Lord in heaven in behalf of all his people. His service in offering his own blood is the only one that can take away sin. The earthly priestly service could only point to the real sacrifice and offering of Jesus in the heavenly sanctuary. And as the priests served only in the first apartment till the great day of atonement, when the sanctuary was to be cleansed, so Christ as high priest must minister in the first apartment until the time appointed for the cleansing of the sanctuary, the end of the 2300 days, which, as we have seen, terminated in 1844. The apostle points to this fact; for after describing the sanctuary, giving the arrangement in both apartments, he says, "Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always into the first tabernacle accomplishing the service of God. But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people."

The services in the tabernacle consisted of a daily ministration mornings and evenings, special offerings for the yearly feasts, and the offerings made in behalf of sinners for the forgiveness of their sins. This last being the leading feature in the work of the sanctuary, and the one which made the cleansing of it a necessary work, calls for a more special examination, as pertaining to our subject. When a person had sinned, and saw his need of pardon, he took an innocent animal, such as the law prescribed, and brought it to the priest at the door of the sanctuary. He there confessed his sin, laying his hand upon the head of the victim. He then slays it, and the priest takes the blood and in some cases puts some of it with his finger on the horns of the brazen altar by the door of the tabernacle, and pours out the remainder at the base of the altar. In other cases he bears the blood into the sanctuary, dips his finger in it, sprinkles it seven times before the Lord, before the vail of the sanctuary, puts some of the blood on the horns of the golden altar, the altar of sweet incense which is before the Lord, and pours out the residue at the bottom of the altar of burnt-offering at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

The meaning of this ceremony is obvious. The sinner is convicted of his sin, and desires pardon. He comes with his offering. He confesses his sin, laying his hand on the head of the innocent victim, thus in a figure transferring his sin and guilt to it. Then, as the wages of sin is death, the innocent is slain in the stead of the guilty. Thus the sinner acknowledges that death is his due on account of his sin; but his sin being laid upon another, he receives pardon. And as the life of the flesh is in the blood, the sin is borne with the blood of the offering to the sanctuary, where it is left for the present. But this blood could not really take away sin. The offering could only point forward to the death of Christ, the real offering for sin, and express the faith of the penitent in the promise of God of a Redeemer, of whom coming to earth the ancient patriarch Job was so confident (Job 19:25), the Deliverer of whom Isaiah prophesied. Isa. 59:20; Rom. 11:26.

But transferring the sin to the victim, and thence in the shed blood to the sanctuary, was not the end of the matter. They were remembered again in the day of atonement at the end of the year. "But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year." Heb. 10:3. On the great day of atonement, the time appointed for closing up the round of service in the sanctuary, there must be an offering of atonement made for all Israel. The high priest must enter the most holy place, where is the ark of the covenant containing the sacred law of God, the transgression of which is sin; and he must enter with the blood of a sin-offering for all the people to make an atonement for them to cleanse them from all their sins, and to bear out of the sanctuary the sins that had been confessed and lodged there during the year. And every individual must afflict his soul in that day, though he had made his offerings for every known sin previously during the whole year. This day of atonement, when the sanctuary was cleansed, and also the people from all their sins before the Lord, was the most solemn day to Israel of all the year, as it was considered by them a day of judgment. It was a type of the final judgment in which the sins of all the saved will be blotted out.

R. F. COTTELL.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.—No. 4.

HAVING seen how the earthly sanctuary became defiled by the sins conveyed to it by the blood of the sin offerings during the year, we now come to the ministration by which it was cleansed at the close of the yearly round of service. In Lev. 16 this work is described. The time appointed was the tenth day of the seventh month. On that day only the high priest was permitted to enter within the second veil, where the mercy seat and the ark containing the law of God were situated. And he must enter there with an offering for his own sins before he could minister in behalf of the people. Our High Priest is without sin; consequently offering in his own behalf is no part of his work.

On the day of atonement the high priest receives from the congregation of the children of Israel two kids of the goats for a sin offering, and one ram for a burnt offering. The two goats are presented before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle, and lots are cast upon the two, one lot for the Lord, and the other for Azazel, called the scape-goat. The goat upon which the Lord's lot fell was to be offered as a sin offering for the people. The slaying of this goat typified the death of the great sin offering, Jesus Christ. But the scape-goat is presented alive before the Lord to receive the sins which have been atoned for, and are borne out of the sanctuary by the high priest. After offering the blood of the bullock which is for himself, sprinkling it upon the mercy-seat and before the mercy-seat seven times, he then kills the goat of the sin offering which is for the people, brings its blood before the veil, and sprinkles it upon the mercy-seat and before it as he did the other.

We read: "And he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins; and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation, that remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness." Lev. 16:16. From this we learn that the cleansing of the sanctuary was made necessary by the sins of the people; its object being the removal of their sins by which it had been defiled. "And he shall go out [of the most holy place], unto the altar that is before the Lord [the golden altar in the outer apartment], and make an atonement for it: and shall take of the blood of the bullock, and of the blood of the goat, and put it upon the horns of the altar round about. And he shall sprinkle of the blood upon it with his finger seven times, and cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel." Verses 18, 19.

Why must an atonement be made for the golden altar? why must it be cleansed? The sins of the people have been laid there, conveyed thither with the blood of the offerings for sins. It is cleansed also by the offering of blood, the final offering for sin. "And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat; and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and he shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness. And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited [Job., a land of separation]; and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness." Verses 20-22.

This ceremony typified the final disposal of sin. The sins were borne out of the sanctuary by the high priest,—a type of Jesus Christ, the mediator of the new covenant,—placed upon the head of the goat representing another person called Azazel, and sent away into a land of separation. Thus the sins of all Israel,—those who have complied with the conditions given, who have afflicted their souls, have consecrated themselves to the service of God, and ceased from their own selfish labor,—are removed from them as far as the east is from the west, and they are free. See verses 29-31.

The service of this solemn day of atonement was a representation of the final blotting out of sins by our great High Priest in the sanctuary in Heaven, in that judgment described in Dan. 7:9, in which he is brought near before the Ancient of days to finish his priestly work and receive his kingdom, preparatory to his return to earth as King of kings and Lord of lords. See Luke 19:11-15. The Jews looked upon it as a day of judgment; and well they might; for those who complied with the conditions, and humbled themselves with prayer and fasting, were, in the figure, freed from all their sins; while those who did not afflict their souls in that day were to be cut off from among the people. Lev. 23:27-30.

We who live now in the real day of atonement, will do well to learn a lesson from this. Our time on earth is about to close. If we have faith in what God has revealed to us, and deny ourselves of all ungodliness and worldly lusts, consecrate ourselves to the service of God, and labor for our fellow-men in a self-sacrificing way, evincing a true missionary spirit, we shall have our sins blotted out and be accounted worthy to have a part in the world to come. But if we do not seek God in earnest, holding fast the faith once delivered to the saints, our names will be blotted out of the book of life, and we shall be cut off from Israel and consigned to the second death. May God give all to realize the importance of the present time.

R. F. CORRIE.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.—NO. 5.

THE first covenant has grown old and vanished away. Its sanctuary was left desolate when Jesus departed from the temple for the last time; and in a few years afterward it was utterly destroyed. The blood of the new covenant has been shed (Luke 22:20); and those services which were "a shadow of things to come" were nailed to the cross. Col. 2:14-17. Those "cerual ordinances imposed on them until the time of reformation" have ceased; because "Christ being come an high priest of good things to come," has entered the "greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands," not "by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood." Heb. 9:9-12.

But though the sanctuary of the first covenant and its services have passed away, we have in its stead the sanctuary and priesthood of the new covenant; and as the two thousand and three hundred days extend down to these last days, this must be the sanctuary to be cleansed at the end of the days; for the Lord now has no other. Where are the sanctuary and priesthood of the present dispensation? Says the apostle, "We have such an high priest who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man." Heb. 8:1, 2. The objection that some are ever ready to raise, that there is nothing in heaven that needs cleansing, shows an entire ignorance or misapprehension of the subject. The cleansing of the earthly sanctuary was not the removal of physical filth, but of the sins that had been transferred to it by the blood of sin offerings. It was cleansed by a final application of the blood that was offered for the sins of the people. And when the high priest had finished the work of atonement in the sanctuary, he bore out the sins of the people, put them on the head of the scape-goat, and sent them away.

We will let the inspired word decide whether or not it is necessary for the heavenly sanctuary to be cleansed. Heb. 9:23, 24; "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." No argument on this text is necessary to those who will consider the force of the language used. We can state it no plainer than this: That as the earthly holy places, the two apartments of the sanctuary, were purified with the blood of the animals which were offered in sacrifice, so the heavenly holy places, of which the earthly were patterns or figures, must be purified with the better sacrifice, the blood of Christ.

According to the type, our High Priest must minister in the first tabernacle from his ascension to Heaven until the appointed time for the sanctuary to be cleansed, and then he must enter the most holy to finish his work of intercession, and remove all the sins of the saved from the presence of God, blotting them from the book of his remembrance, laying them upon the head of the antitypical scape-goat, and sending them away to the land of everlasting separation, the bottomless pit.

Accordingly, John in the Revelation, at the beginning of this dispensation, has a view of our great High Priest walking amid the seven golden candlesticks, which are in the first apartment of the sanctuary. His ministration begins here, as in the type. Rev. 1:13; 2:1; 4:5. This is a necessity; the Scriptures would be broken if Christ in his ministration in the true sanctuary in heaven should not follow the order so clearly prefigured in the worldly sanctuary. His service must be in the holy place until the appointed time for entering the most holy place to cleanse the sanctuary; that is, to perform the closing part of his work as priest, the final act of atonement, the removal of the sins of all his people.

When the appointed time arrives, the most holy place is opened. "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." The ark is in the most holy place. In the type this was not opened till the day appointed for cleansing the sanctuary. In the antitype, when we come to the sounding of the seventh angel, the last of the series, this temple is opened. Rev. 11:15-19. This is an event of surpassing interest to all. The closing work of the gospel is now to be done. It is "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound," that the mystery of God is to be finished. Rev. 10:7. In a few of the first years of his sounding, the work of the gospel is to be finished by the last work of Christ as priest in heaven, and the preaching of the last message of the gospel on earth. Rev. 14:9-12.

The ark contains the law of God, the ten commandments. It was made for the express purpose of containing this law written on tables of stone. Ex. 25:10-16; 31:18. "Sin is the transgression of the law." Nothing is sin which is not a violation of the holy principles set forth in the ten commandments. It was sin against this law that made an atonement necessary. The ark containing these commandments was placed in the most holy place. It was covered by the mercy-seat to indicate that there was mercy for the repentant sinner. And it was to make atonement for the violation of this law that all the blood of sin offerings was shed. These offerings were only types; they could not take away one sin. Hence they could do no more than to point forward to the blood of Christ as a real sacrifice, and to the atonement which he was to make before the ark and mercy-seat in heaven. So when the true tabernacle is to be cleansed, the inner apartment is opened, and the ark is seen. The law of God is beneath the mercy-seat in heaven. We all have sinned against that law; but Christ has entered there to make atonement for those who repent and seek pardon. His work will soon be finished, and his people saved.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY. - NO. 2.

All the sacrifices of the ancients from the days of Abel to Christ, and all the services of the priesthood in the sanctuary of the first covenant, could not take away a single sin. Heb. 10: 4. Their sacrifices could only point them forward to the sacrifice of Christ, and their sanctuary and services of priests therein could only point them to the services of our great High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary, and the atonement for sin to be made by him. The law of God existed; it was in the ark of the testimony in the sanctuary. They were sinners in fact; but there was no atonement but in figura. Their all depended upon the death and intercessions of Jesus Christ—his death as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world, and his priestly intercessions in the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man. Had not the Mediator of the new covenant died "for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament" (Heb. 9: 15), not one of them could be saved.

But the typical system was of great service to the ancients as it pointed them forward to the real sacrifice for sins, and the real atonement to be made by Christ in heaven. And it is of no less value to us, since it is the means by which we learn the order of the ministration of our High Priest out of our sight, in heaven, especially of the closing part of his work, the cleansing of the sanctuary, the blotting out of all the sins of the saved, which is their acquittal in the Judgment. By the study of the type we learn concerning the antitype.

1. The sins of the sinner were laid on the victim for sacrifice. Then the sinner shed the blood of the sin offering outside of the sanctuary. So Christ was slain on the earth by us, sinners. Our sins being laid upon him, he was slain for us. He bore our sins in his own body on the cross. 1 Pet. 2: 24. He died for all; but the atonement is not yet made. This is the work of a priest. It is a necessity that the blood should be offered in the sanctuary, in order to remission. Lev. 4: 27-35.

2. In the typical service the priest must bear the sins in the blood of the sacrifice to the sanctuary, presenting them before God with intercession, and leave them there till the day of atonement or cleansing of the sanctuary, when they are to be borne out of the sanctuary. So Christ, having entered the heavenly sanctuary by his own blood which was shed for us, makes intercessions for all those to the uttermost that come unto God by him. Heb. 7: 25. The victim was slain on Calvary; but the atonement must be made by the priest; and Christ was not a priest till he ascended to heaven. "For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest." See Heb. 8: 1-4. And in his priestly service he must follow the type. His ministration must be confined to the first apartment of the sanctuary till the time appointed for its cleansing. Lev. 16: 2.

3. In the type the appointed time came once in a year. Ex. 30: 10. Lev. 16: 29; 23: 27. The round of service was completed on the tenth day of the seventh month; and it was repeated "year by year continually;" but Christ was offered and performed the round of service but once. Heb. 10: 1-18. As there was an appointed time for the atonement in the most holy of the earthly sanctuary, so the time was appointed for this work in the true tabernacle. "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8: 14. As we have seen, the time expired in A. D. 1844. Consequently the final work of the atonement is now being done.

4. Not only was the day appointed, so that all Israel could know when it came, but when the time arrived a special announcement was made by the blowing of trumpets. Num. 29: 1; 10: 10. Accordingly as we came to the end of the days in 1844, the trumpet was blown—a message sounded through earth, addressed to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people saying, with a loud voice, "Fear God, and give glory to him: for the hour of his Judgment is come." This is a fact of history; and the history is the record of the fulfillment of prophecy. And this proclamation was based on the 2300 days, which ended at that time. It was the trumpet which announced the great and solemn day of atonement. Does the reader object that that message proved false; because the time of the Judgment did not then come? He may change his mind, if he will have patience to investigate till he has learned that the cleansing of the sanctuary, the final work of atonement, the blotting out of the sins of the saved, and that part of the Judgment in which they are accounted worthy of a place in the world to come and in the resurrection to eternal life, are one and the same thing, and that this must take place before the coming of Christ, when they who have been accounted worthy will be raised from the dead, putting on immortality in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. Luke 20: 35, 36; 1 Cor. 15: 51, 52. And it is evident from Rev. 14: 6-12, that the Judgment-hour message is not the last message of probation; for the warning of the third angel implies mercy to those who heed it, presenting a final choice between the worship of the beast and the commandments of God.

Thus we are brought to the inevitable conclusion that Jesus, our great High Priest, has entered within the second veil to make the atonement for his people, blotting out their sins, and that he is about to come to those who look for him, without sin unto salvation. See Heb. 9: 28; Acts 3: 19-21. We learn from the types and other scriptures that when the sinner comes to God and finds pardon and acceptance, that this is not the final disposal of his sins. The final disposal of sin depends upon faithfulness up to the day of reckoning. When the sinner brought his offering and confessed his sins, they were, in a figure, laid on the sin offering, and in its blood conveyed to the sanctuary and left there till the day of atonement, which was a type of the investigative Judgment. Those who were then found faithful, had their sins borne out of the sanctuary and sent away to the land of separation; but those who were not faithful up to that time had no part in this final offering which was for all the true Israel, and consequently they were cut off. Lev. 16:29, 39; 23:29. Their sins were not atoned for, were not sent away: but reverted upon their own heads.

This is in perfect accordance with other portions of Scripture. "But when the righteous turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and doeth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doeth, shall he live? All his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned: in his trespasses that he hath trespassed, and in his sin that he hath sinned, in them shall he die." Eze. 18:24. No credit is given for past obedience, if we turn again to sin. This is taught in the parable of the unmerciful servant. He owed his lord ten thousand talents; but earnestly pleading for patience on the part of his lord, the latter "was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt." But when he showed himself unworthy of such favors, by his abuse of his fellow-servant, "his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors till he should pay all that was due unto him." The forgiveness granted was revoked, and the whole debt was required to be paid. And Jesus said, "So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses." Matt. 18:23-35.

The apostles did not teach the blotting out of sins immediately on conversion. Said Peter, "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you; whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution," etc. Acts 3:19-21. From this testimony it seems clear that the sins of all his people are to be blotted out just before the second coming of Christ. This is the closing work of his priesthood, the cleansing of the sanctuary. "For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord." Lev. 16:30. When all the sins of God's people are blotted out, they are adjudged to eternal life. Professors who have failed to overcome, will have their names blotted from the book of life. Rev. 3:5.

R. F. CORRELL

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.—NO. 7.

At the close of the 2300 days in 1844, a message was sounding forth throughout the earth, "Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his Judgment is come." It was a message of the word of God promised in prophecy. Rev. 14:6, 7. It was announced as promised. The promise being once redounded, it does not remain still due. That work will not be repeated. It was God's work, and needs no mending. But the inference that the Lord must come to earth at the end of the days was human. It was founded in ignorance; yet it did not hinder the work of the Lord, but was overruled to help it forward. That was not the last message of the gospel, as it was then supposed to be; and the cleansing of the sanctuary was not the cleansing of the earth by fire, as it was believed. In the fulfillment of the prophetic program, time has been given in which to learn the truth concerning the sanctuary and its cleansing, the opening of the judgment in heaven (Dan. 7:9), and the last message of the gospel on earth. Rev. 14:9-12.

The day of Judgment is not a literal day of twenty-four hours; but, like the "day of salvation," it extends over a period of more than a thousand years. And there are several distinct events to transpire in a regular order in that day. And there are two principal parts in the Judgment in respect to both classes, the righteous and the wicked; namely, the judicial, or investigative, and the executive. In the former, decisions are made; in the latter, the decisions are executed. The execution of the Judgment in respect to the saved takes place in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the coming of Christ and the first resurrection. Luke 14:14; 1 Cor. 15:23, 51, 52; 1 Thess. 4:16, 17; Rev. 20:4-6. This being the case, the books must be opened, and the decision for life or for death in each case made before the coming of Christ.

In harmony with this, the opening scene of the Judgment is described in Dan. 7:9. This scene transpires in heaven before the Ancient of days. "God is judge himself." Ps. 50:6. The Son of man is brought near before him; and when his intercessions for his people as priest are ended, and their sins blotted out, he receives the kingdom and returns to earth as king. Rev. 14:14; 19:11. He is as a nobleman that went into a far country to receive a kingdom and return. Luke 19:12-15. And when he returned, having received the kingdom, he rewarded his faithful servants. He returns to execute the judgment rendered in heaven. "For as the Father hath life in himself; so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself; and hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man." John 5:26, 27. He executes judgment by raising the dead,—his saints to the resurrection of life, the wicked a thousand years thereafter to the resurrection of damnation. Verses 28, 29; Rev. 20:4, 5.

The Judgment passes upon the living and the dead. "Who shall judge the quick [living] and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom." 2 Tim. 4:1. The decisions are made in regard to the dead while they are dead. In Dan. 7, the thrones cast down, or rather placed, are thrones of judgment. The great multitude, the "ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands," are not men, but angels. See Rev. 5:11, where they are called angels. The Son of man comes not to the earth, but to the Ancient of days. The closing of the priesthood of Christ, the cleansing of the sanctuary, takes place within the second vail; and as soon as the sins of his people are all blotted out, he receives his kingdom and returns to the earth to execute judgment, and give eternal life to all whose sins have been blotted out.

The cleansing of the sanctuary is the final removal of the sins of all the saved. But when it is decided that their sins are forever canceled, it is decided that they are accounted worthy to obtain the world to come and the resurrection to eternal life. Hence when the time appointed for the cleansing of the sanctuary arrived, the message declaring that "the hour of his Judgment is come," was true. And that the judgment of Dan. 7 transpires before the coming of Christ, and the destruction of that power "whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming" (2 Thess. 2:8), is evident from the fact that after "the judgment was set, and the books were opened," it is said, "I beheld such because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." Verse 11.

Many great words have been spoken by the papacy. The popes have accepted such titles as "His Holiness," "Vicegerent of the Son of God," "Our Lord God, the Pope," "Another God upon Earth," "King of kings and Lord of lords." But nothing more boldly blasphemous has ever been uttered by that power than the words of Pius IX. when he said of himself, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." And the decree of the infallibility of the popes by the bishops and chief dignitaries of the Romish church throughout, is the very culmination of blasphemous assumption. These have taken place since the judgment in the sanctuary has been in session.

David seems to have been tempted on account of the prosperity of the wicked, until he went into the sanctuary of God ; then he understood their end. By the decision of the judgment there rendered, they are cast down to destruction. Ps. 73 : 2-19.

The rule of the Judgment is the unchangeable law of God. Eccl. 12 : 13, 14 ; Rom. 2 : 12, 16 ; Jas. 2 : 10-12. The law, as written by the finger of God, was in the most holy place of the sanctuary. And it was for the purpose of obtaining pardon of sins against that law, that every sin offering was made. In the day of atonement the ark of the commandments was approached with the blood of a sin offering for all the faithful in Israel, in order that all their sins might be removed from them finally and forever. The original copy of that law is in the sanctuary in heaven. "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. 11 : 19. Christ makes a real atonement in behalf of all his people from the beginning of the world to the end, to remove their sins, which are neither more nor less than their transgressions of that law. When this is done, they are judged worthy of eternal life.

Our High Priest has entered the inner sanctuary. The hour of Judgment is come. Doubtless the cases of the ancients are first taken up from generation to generation. The time will come, we know not how soon, when the last, the living, generation will come in review before God. In a moment that we are not apprised of, our individual cases will be passed upon. Then our destiny for life or death will be fixed. Oh ! how it behooves us to heed the admonition of our Saviour : "Watch ye, therefore, for ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning : lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch."

R. F. COTTRELL.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.—NO 6.

(Concluded.)

THE days of the voice of the seventh angel are here. Rev. 10:7. The mystery of God, the work of the gospel of human salvation, will soon be finished. Our Intercessor is closing his ministry in behalf of sinners. He is making the final offering of the merits of his own blood in the heavenly sanctuary, for the removal of the sins of all those who have complied with the conditions of salvation, during every age of the world. Soon the work will be completed, and the unalterable decree will pass upon all the living: "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still. And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Rev. 22:11, 12.

What shall we do in order to be prepared for that day? We must heed the last warning of the gospel, which the Lord is now sending out to all the world. Rev. 14:9-12. We must be found keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. While the closing work of Christ's ministry in the temple of God in heaven is transpiring, a corresponding message, the last message of the gospel, is being proclaimed to the inhabitants of the earth. While our High Priest is making the final offering of his blood before the mercy-seat which covers the ark of God's testimony in heaven, the last fearful warning against following the traditions of the great apostasy, is being given. The effect will be that the true people of God will be seen in their patience keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Christ.

The rule of the Judgment in the ark of God in heaven, is the rule of righteousness to all people upon earth. It is the same law which was written by the finger of God on tables of stone, and placed in the most holy of the earthly sanctuary. It is a perfect law and therefore unchangeable. The transgression of it always was, and always will be, sin. The transgression of this law was that which made the death of the Son of God necessary, in order that lost man might be saved. And unless his death and intercession shall atone for those sins, they will sink us to perdition. And if our sins are blotted out by our High Priest in heaven, we must be found keeping all these commandments when he returns to earth.

My brethren, since we hope to hail the coming of the Lord with joy, as soon as this message has finished its work, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness. We must be perfected while Jesus pleads. Soon he will finish all his pleading. Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned. Behold, the judge standeth before the door. The Lord is sending the last warning to mankind. He has called us to this specific work. We are in the watching, waiting time; and while we watch and wait, there is work for us to do. So while we seek that personal consecration to God which we must have to be approved, nothing will help us more in this, than taking upon us the burden of the work for our fellow-men. The world must be warned of the coming day of wrath. Who is to share in this work, but those who have been enlightened with the light of present truth? So while we watch and wait, let us work.

Who can tell the joy of those whose sins are canceled, no more to be remembered forever! And it will not be ephemeral, but everlasting joy. May the reader and the writer have a part in it.

R. F. COTTELL.

BOOKS IN HEAVEN.

BY ELA. J. F. HENDERSON.

WORDS spoken may be forgotten, but that which is written, never. It may pass from the mind of the writer, but as long as the record is preserved, the facts remain the same. Some to-day argue that the mind of God will retain the acts of each and every individual, and that in this manner every secret thing will be brought into judgment. Eccl. 12:14. We are not to dispute what God is able to do, or the capacity of One infinite in knowledge; but what he is doing, and what his plans are in regard to our salvation, are themes of vital importance,—themes which deeply concern us, and about which we are commanded to search the Scriptures. John 8:39.

That the Judgment is to take place from "those things written in the books," is so definitely stated as not to be questioned. Rev. 20:12. Order is said to be heaven's first law; and in the plan of salvation we shall find a perfect business system (if that expression may be allowed), in which the minutest details are carried out and recorded. All business of importance has its records; and the more perfect the system, the more complete the records. Hence, in the books of heaven, "every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil," must be recorded, and will come up in the Judgment. Compare Eccl. 12:14 with Rev. 20:12.

Thus the idea is conveyed of a complete and perfect record being kept of each individual. When entering the U. S. army, the mustering officer was particular to record the age of each, the height, complexion, occupation, residence, etc.; and these records could probably be found to-day in the city of Washington. But how much more complete are the records of heaven! "The very hairs of your head are all numbered" (Luke 12:7); "in thy book all my members were written." Ps. 139:16. "The Lord pitieth them that fear him: for he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust." Ps. 103:13, 14.

Taking the record of Peter as an example (Acts 10), God knows our business, place of residence, name, surname, etc. "Send men to Joppa, and call for one Simon, whose surname is Peter. He lodgeth with one Simon, a tanner, whose house is by the seaside." Acts 10:3, 6. A more complete direction given in a few words could not be given. From the above, we are positive that the books of heaven make a complete record of our identity; and although we may pass away and moulder to dust again, are not our very photographs printed on the pages in heaven? So there will be no mistake in again producing the same individual in the resurrection.

"We have an High Priest who can be touched with the feelings of our infirmities; and a Lord that pitieth us even as a father pitieth his child; so that of even our tears it is said, 'Are they not in thy book?' " Ps. 56:8. A book of remembrance is kept before God: "Written before him for them that feared the Lord and thought upon his name." Mal. 3:16. Hence the affliction, the sorrows, the sighs, the tears of those suffering for Jesus and the truth's sake, are "bottled" in heaven (Ps. 56:8); printed on the pages of her books; and in the Judgment, we be unto those who have offended or been the cause of their suffering. Matt. 18:3-7.

There are more books than one kept in heaven. Rev. 20:12 says that "the books were opened," that "another book was opened," which is the book of life. Thus at least three books are mentioned, as "books" cannot be less than two, and is probably more. We learn from Rev. 13:8 that in this "book of life" are written the names of the righteous only. It must have been that Moses referred to this book when he asked God, for the sake of the children of Israel, to blot him out of the book which he had written. But the Lord answered, "Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book." Ex. 32:32, 33. This proves that it is possible for names to be blotted out after they are written in the "book of life." "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life." Rev. 3:5.

Those books may not be composed of paper made from linen rags; but they are books, nevertheless, made of heaven's material, upon whose pages the angels are indelibly writing every word (Matt. 12:36), "with every secret thing" (Eccl. 12:14), all of which will be revealed in the day of Judgment (Dan. 7:10; Rev. 20:12), with the angels as witnesses to the truthfulness of the records. But above all does the "book of life" concern us. The women who were fellow-laborers with Paul have their names there (Phil. 4:3); those who did not worship the beast have their names there (Rev. 13:8); and all those who overcome will have their names retained there. Rev. 3:5.

How is it, reader, with us? The Judgment is now in session. Rev. 14:7. The "book of life" is now opened, and one by one the cases of all are being decided for or against eternity. Are your name and mine written there? and if so, will they be retained there?

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY ELD. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. BIBLIST.—"Maud, answer the door-bell, if you please; it seems that we are to have a call this evening."

MISS MAUD.—"Father, this is Mr. Thoughtful."

MR. B.—"Good evening, Mr. Thoughtful. Are you well, sir?"

MR. T.—"I am quite well, I thank you, physically speaking; but I confess to a little embarrassment of mind on account of the nature of my mission. As I approached your door, I queried whether you would not smile when you learned the character of the errand which has brought me to your house on this dark night."

MR. B.—"Well, neighbor Thoughtful, of course I do not know to what I am indebted for this call, but I presume that you have come for some good purpose, and I confess that your remarks have excited in me a curiosity to know just what your errand is; so you will please divulge the secret immediately."

MR. T.—"Well, to be frank with you, I have been reading, of late, the five books of Moses, and for some reason which I cannot explain my mind has been particularly impressed with the account given therein of the tabernacle and its service. It struck me as being very remarkable that such a building should be reared up under such circumstances, and that the Lord should have given such minute directions for the construction of even its most unimportant parts. Why! the pins, the taches, the sockets, the loops, the needle-work, and indeed everything connected with the building, is described as minutely as though the fate of the whole people depended upon their being made on just such a plan."

"Now, to be brief, I have thought this matter over until I have become satisfied that there was a significance in the tabernacle and its service that I have never understood; and knowing your acquaintance with the Scriptures, I have called this evening to see if you can give me any light upon this subject."

MR. B.—"Well, neighbor Thoughtful, I am glad that you have called this evening on the errand that has brought you here. Some years ago I had an experience somewhat similar to your own. For months my mind was occupied, more or less, by thoughts very much like those you have just expressed. It occurred to me, as it did to you, that the tabernacle and the temple which succeeded it must have been designed to answer a purpose much higher than that of merely furnishing a place where victims could be offered. I do not know that I ever should have obtained any special light on the subject had it not been for an event that I have ever since looked upon as a providential occurrence.

"While walking through the town of C. one day, my attention was attracted by a large tent that had just been pitched upon the commons. My first impression was that it was connected with some circus. I soon discovered my mistake, however. On a streamer that was flying from the top of the center pole, I read these words, 'What Is Truth?' In a moment I discovered that the occupants of the tent must be religionists of some sort. My curiosity was aroused, and I immediately entered the tent, that it might be satisfied. There was but one person therein. He was a young man of fair intelligence, and as he seemed disposed to be quite communicative, I began to inquire into the nature of his mission. He frankly told me that he was a Seventh-day Adventist, and that he was seeking to propagate their faith. I had heard considerable about that people, and was so far prejudiced against them that I was about to turn upon my heel and leave the tent in disgust, when my attention was attracted by a prophetic chart that was suspended behind the desk. My curiosity was aroused a second time, and I thought that I would at least approach near enough to it to get a better view of the hideous-looking creatures that were portrayed thereupon. The young man seemed to read the exercises of my mind, and wishing to hold on to me for further conversation invited me to enter the desk and examine the chart at my leisure. This I did, glancing over the representations of beasts and angels, till at last my eye rested upon a diagram purporting to present a ground plan of the tabernacle of Moses. By the way, Maud, I think I have a fac-simile of it in the book-case yonder; look it up, if you please."

MAUD.—"Yes, father, I know just where it is. This is it, is it not?"

PLAN OF THE SANCTUARY.

Mr. B.—“Yes, this is the one. Now, Mr. T., if you have studied the book of the law carefully, you will perceive that this diagram, which we will place on the table before us, presents a view of the plan of the inside of the tabernacle according to the description given therein. There is the dividing wall that separates it into two apartments, which are called respectively the holy and the most holy place. You will observe that the most holy place is exactly square, and occupies one-third of the tabernacle. In it you will notice the following articles: 1. The golden censer; 2. The ark of the covenant, overlaid with gold, and containing the tables of the law of ten commandments, and the pot of manna, and Aaron's rod that budded; 3. On the ark you will see that the cherubim are placed and are represented as overshadowing the mercy-seat, or cover of the ark, with their wings.

“Passing now to the first apartment, you will discover that the only articles that it contains are the candlestick,—or more properly the lamp-stand with seven lamps,—the table of shewbread, and the golden altar of incense. By carefully comparing this diagram with the accounts given of the tabernacle in Exodus, chapters 25-27, you will find that it correctly outlines the building in question, and properly locates every article of furniture that it contained.”

Mr. T.—“Very good, Mr. B.; but I do not see that this diagram relieves my difficulty in the least. I have studied the question so long and so earnestly that I could have sketched the tabernacle and its furniture just as you see it there, without making a single mistake. The point which I cannot fathom is this: Granting that the tabernacle contained just what is found in the diagram, why did it contain these things rather than something else?”

Maud.—“Yes, Father, that is the very thing that I too would like to understand. I am not much of a Bible student, I confess; but the same queries which have troubled Mr. T. have suggested themselves to my mind heretofore.”

Mr. B.—“Well, I see that I have critics to deal with, and I am not averse to your questioning me at the proper time; but permit me to suggest that if you had not interrupted me in my story, I should have reached your difficulty ere long. Let me resume my account, therefore. In the meantime, you will remember that I was in just the position you now occupy; I could not comprehend the reason why the tabernacle was made just as it was made.

“Well, as I was saying, my eye lit upon the diagram in question, and it immediately occurred to me that it was not impossible that the young preacher might be able to throw some light on the question that had perplexed my mind so long. Pointing to the diagram, I said, ‘What is this that you have here, sir?’ ‘That,’ said he, ‘is a diagram that we employ in our lectures when we wish to illustrate the sanctuary question.’ ‘But,’ I replied, ‘what do you mean by the sanctuary question?’ ‘Well,’ he remarked, ‘it would take some time to make you comprehend the sanctuary question in its full scope. If, however, you will attend my lectures regularly, and listen candidly to all I may have to say on that topic, I assure you that—little as it is understood at the present time—I will prove that it presents one of the most important themes found in all the Scriptures.’

"Impatient at the proposed delay, and anxious to get his views of the subject, I replied, 'I do not object particularly to listening to your lectures, sir, provided they shall be interesting and profitable; but, to tell the truth, I am so anxious to get the facts in regard to the sanctuary question that I cannot bear the thought of listening to a whole course of lectures before reaching them. Could you not by conversation, or in some other direct method, impart to me the information that I desire?' To this the preacher replied, 'I will tell you what I will do. You attend the lectures each evening, bringing your friends with you, and I will grant you the liberty to come to the tent each day during the forenoon, and we will spend several hours together in canvassing this subject from the Bible standpoint.'

"I immediately accepted his proposition, and the next day we entered upon our task. The result was that I soon became convinced that he had light upon the subject in advance of anything that I had ever received. It would be impossible to even give an outline of his theory to-night, as it is already past nine o'clock; so I will make this suggestion: You return to-morrow evening, Mr. T., to this room, and I will give you some of his ideas respecting the design of the sanctuary, or the tabernacle; for these are but two terms for the same thing."

Mr. T.—"Very good, Mr. B., I gladly accept your proposition, and as my interest in the subject is very deep, you may look for me to-morrow evening at a very early hour. Good night, Mr. B. Good night, Miss Maud."

Mr. B.—"Good night, Mr. T."

Maud.—"Good night, Mr. T."

Mr. B.—"Maud, did I understand you to say that you do not comprehend the sanctuary question?"

Maud.—"No doubt you did, father; for that is what I stated."

Mr. B.—"I am surprised that the daughter of a Seventh-day Adventist should not be posted on a topic so much discussed by our people. But never mind, my daughter, it is not too late for you to get an understanding of this subject. Be sure to be present hereafter at the interviews between Mr. B. and myself, and I think that I shall be able to make the question so plain that you cannot fail to comprehend it fully."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY REV. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. BIBLIST.—There, Maud, the door-bell is ringing. As I feared, Mr. Thoughtful is here before we are ready for him. But no matter, usher him in, and we will make the best of the situation.

Mr. Thoughtful.—Good evening, Miss Maud.

Maud.—Good evening, Mr. Thoughtful.

Mr. T.—Good evening, Mr. Biblist. You see that I am here betimes. The fact is, Mr. B., I am so deeply interested in the question that was before us last evening that I could hardly wait for the sun to set before starting to meet my appointment.

Mr. B.—I am very glad, Mr. T., that your mind is thoroughly aroused to the importance of understanding the types and ceremonies of the Mosaic law, and more especially those that relate to the Tabernacle of Witness. By the way, did you ever notice the signification of the title, "Tabernacle of Witness"? You will remember that Stephen employs this term, in his address to the Jews, just before his martyrdom. You are aware that a witness is a person who bears testimony to certain facts. It is to be inferred, therefore, from the expression employed by Stephen, that the tabernacle in some way was designed to attest certain great truths. Indeed, I think I shall be able to make it clear that there was nothing connected either with its form or its services that was not designed to teach a lesson of some sort.

But pardon me; I had almost forgotten to connect what I have to say to-night with what we were talking about last evening. Let me see; I think I left off at the point where the young preacher arranged to spend several hours with me each day explaining the sanctuary question. Well, suffice it to say that I accepted his invitation, and visited the tent every forenoon for a number of days. The result was that I became thoroughly converted to his theory of the lesson taught by the tabernacle, or the temple, for you will remember that, as before remarked, the temple was nothing more or less than the tabernacle reproduced on a larger and grander scale. The services, also, in both were the same. The terms temple, sanctuary, and tabernacle are used interchangeably in the Bible, and applied at different times to both of these buildings.

Mr. T.—Then I understand you to say that the views of the sanctuary question which you are about to present, are the same as those held on that subject by S. D. Adventists?

Mr. B.—Yes, sir. It is not a little remarkable that they are the only denomination who seem to have any special light on this subject.

Mr. T.—It matters but little to me by whom the Lord speaks, provided only that he speaks by some one. You know, Mr. B., that I have not much sympathy with your Sabbath views, and that I do not take much stock in your notions about the perpetuity of spiritual gifts; but that is nothing here or there. I suppose that all churches have more or less error in their creeds; so, if you please, proceed with your explanation.

Mr. B.—Well, neighbor T., I confess that I should like to talk with you at some time about the Sabbath and spiritual gifts; but we cannot do it to-night, as we have before us a definite purpose; i. e., the discussion of the sanctuary question. Without further delay, therefore, I will resume my work. From this point onward, I shall allow the young preacher to drop out of view altogether, and I shall present the subject as I understand it after years of investigation. In doing so I will lay down certain theses, and then proceed to demonstrate their correctness, as follows:

1. God has a temple in heaven.
2. The tabernacle of Moses and the temple of Solomon were types of the temple in heaven.
3. The services of the earthly tabernacle and temple, with their priesthood and their offerings, shadowed forth—dimly, it is true—the priesthood and services of the heavenly temple.
4. The yearly round of services in the earthly tabernacle and temple represented the whole of Christ's work in the heavenly temple in connection with the salvation of men, from the time of his ascension until the close of the judgment.
5. The sanctuary question, when properly understood, teaches that judgment commenced in the heavenly temple in 1844, and will continue till the coming of Christ, which event is near at hand.

Mr. T.—Pardon me, Mr. B., if I say that your theses appear to me to be so absurd that they cannot possibly be true.

Mr. B.—Patience, Mr. T. I am quite sure that they do not appear any more improbable to you than they did to me at first, and yet I believe, to-night, that they are sound, as firmly as I do that the Bible is the book of God.

Mr. T.—With all due respect for your convictions, permit me to say that your first thesis seems to me to be extremely preposterous. If I understand you aright, you take the position that there is a tangible temple of God in heaven. To admit such a thing would be to go against every conception of heaven that I have entertained heretofore. Why, the very thought of a literal temple in heaven is ridiculous in the extreme. Who can entertain the idea for a moment, that there can be any thing literal in the place where God dwells?

Mr. B.—Might I not with propriety reverse your question and ask, Who can entertain for a moment the idea that there is nothing literal in the place where God dwells? Try, for a moment, to conceive of such a condition of things, and you will find it altogether out of the question. What! nothing literal about heaven? Is it not located on a literal world? Has it neither center nor circumference? neither grass, nor flowers, nor trees? Is not the river of life there? Is not the tree of life there? If so, are they immaterial? Where is God? and where is his throne located? Does the Great Ruler of the universe hold his court in some particular point in space where there is nothing that can be either seen or touched? Is he, and are the mighty host of heaven, floating about in space, perpetually divorced from everything that is real and substantial? If heaven is such a place, then assuredly the heaven that God has made is not adapted to those for whose benefit it was created. Such a heaven has in it nothing inviting to men as they exist at the present time. It is only with the greatest effort that they can imagine such a state of affairs, and when they have done so, the effort is painfully unpleasant.

Mr. T.—I am ready to admit that there is some force in your reasoning when considered from the standpoint of our present capabilities. It is true that I find my own mind continually creating for itself a heaven that is filled up with things of sense, such as birds, fountains, hills and valleys, lakes and streams, mountains and plains, clouds and sunshine; but I say to myself that possibly it may not be thus when the spirit is released from this bodily clod. Then our tastes may be entirely changed.

Mr. B.—Your confession is a frank one, and embodies the experience of every reflecting mind. It has more weight, however, in deciding the question before us than you have imagined. Heaven, everywhere in the Bible, is portrayed as the reward of the saints. It is the design of a reward to induce men to put forth great exertions for its attainment. Therefore, as the dreamy, immaterial, intangible, floating sort of a heaven that you have been speaking about can have no attractions for men in their present condition, it could not lead them to greater efforts to attain unto holiness, and would consequently fail to accomplish the purpose for which heaven is employed in the Scriptures. There is not, in all the Bible, an allusion to heaven incompatible with the idea that it is a literal place, containing literal things. Take, for example, the largest reference to it found in the Scriptures; i. e., that contained in the 21st and 22d chapters of Revelation, or the description of the New Jerusalem. Do you not remember that it is made up entirely of a representation of a beautiful city, with gates, and walls, and streets, and palaces, and that in the midst of the grand avenue of the city is located the river of life, the tree of life, and the throne of God and the Lamb?

Mr. T.—Yes, I recollect that such is the case, and I have many times wished that heaven might prove to be just such a place as is described in the chapters of which you speak.

Mr. B.—Very good, sir; your instincts prove to be more nearly right than your education. Be assured that God has not given you these instincts to lead you astray, or to mock them and you by refusing to gratify them by granting that which they draw you toward. The God of nature is the God of the Bible, and he has not made an instinct which he is not willing to gratify.

But, Mr. T., you believe in the resurrection, do you not?

Mr. T.—Yes, sir, very firmly.

Mr. B.—I mean a resurrection of substantial bodies; perhaps not just such bodies as we wear now, but nevertheless made up of flesh and bones.

Mr. T.—Yes. If the Scriptures teach anything on that subject, it is that the saints will have bodies as literal as that of Christ after his resurrection; and we know that he ate and drank, that he was handled by the disciples, and that he still bore in his person the prints of the nails and the wound made by the spear.

Mr. B.—Very good; we agree on that point. I suppose that you will admit also that the saints are to go to heaven in their resurrected bodies?

Mr. T.—Yes, sir; undoubtedly they will.

Mr. B.—I did not suppose that we should differ on that point, as it is one on which Christians generally are agreed. The next inquiry that I wish to make is this: If heaven is not a place that contains tangible objects, is there not an incongruity in taking to it men with such physical organs as the eye, the ear, the hand, the foot, etc., etc.? Of what value would the material eye be in a place where there were no substances to be reflected upon its retina? Immaterial things—if such there can be—cannot be perceived through the medium of the natural eye merely. The physical ear can only perform its function where it can be affected by the vibration of atmospheric air; but atmospheric air is literal and tangible, and if it exists in heaven, there must be something literal and tangible there. The nose is so constructed that it recognizes odors only when particles from the objects that give them forth come in contact with the membrane with which it is provided. The nose, therefore, would be of no service in such a heaven as you believe in, as there would be there no material substances to send forth the particles that render its action possible. The sense of feeling is produced only when the nerves come in contact with a tangible body ; but why carry our nervous systems to heaven with us if there is nothing there in the shape of substance, the nature of which they can communicate to our minds when they come in contact with them ? I repeat : The whole plan by which a man is resurrected with such organs as we possess now, and then taken to heaven, is worse than a failure, unless heaven is a literal place and contains literal objects. I do not say that God could not produce an arrangement that would answer the purpose of the five senses as they exist at the present time ; but what I do say is this : It is preposterous to suppose that he would give to the resurrected body such organs of sense as we now have, if the saints are not to go to a substantial heaven ; since they would be of no use in any other, and since God always adapts the means to the end.

Maud.—Excuse me, father, if I say, that I cannot see the bearing of all this talk about a tangible heaven. I thought the point that you were trying to prove is that God has a temple in heaven. If I am right, permit me to inquire what difference it makes, so far as that question is concerned, whether or not there is anything substantial in heaven ?

Mr. B.—Very much, my daughter. If heaven is a literal place and contains literal things, then there is nothing incongruous in the proposition that God has a literal temple therein. On the other hand, if there is nothing in heaven that partakes of the nature of substance, then, of course, there can be no substantial building there. You see the point, Mr. Thoughtful ?

Mr. T.—Certainly, sir ; furthermore I must confess that your argument based upon the resurrection body and its organs has wonderfully shaken my former theory on this subject.

Mr. B.—I am glad to hear you say so, Mr. Thoughtful, as I perceive that you have reached the point, now, where you are able to weigh, without prejudice, the Bible testimony on this subject. It is too late to enter upon the Scripture proofs to-night ; but at our next sitting I think I can present you with a line of texts that will be conclusive.

Mr. T. Then I will bid you both good-night in the expectation of resuming the subject to-morrow evening.

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY ELIJAH W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. THOUGHTFUL.—“Pardon me, Mr. B., for entering without rapping; but as the door stood ajar I thought I would come in without putting you to the necessity of answering to the bell call. I hope that both you and Miss Maud are quite well.”

MR. BIBLIST.—“Usually so, I thank you, Mr. Thoughtful, and we are glad that you have come early. By the way, did it occur to you to bring your Bible?”

MR. T.—“Yes, sir; I have done so because I thought I would like to mark the texts which you may cite.”

MR. B.—“It will be well for you to do so, as it will enable you to consult them again at your leisure. Let me see; I believe when our last interview closed we were on the point of examining the Bible proofs respecting the existence of a literal temple in heaven. I will therefore enter upon the task immediately. The first text to which I will call your attention is Ps. 11 : 4. It reads as follows: ‘The Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord’s throne is in heaven: his eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men.’ You will observe that the phraseology of this passage is such that there can be no doubt that the temple alluded to is located in heaven, from which point the Lord is represented as narrowly watching the affairs of the children of men. A similar text is found in Ps. 102 : 19: ‘For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary; from heaven did the Lord behold the earth.’ You will remember that the terms ‘sanctuary’ and ‘temple’ are interchangeable. Thus we have a second direct mention of a temple of God in such a connection as to show that it must be located in heaven. Let us pass now to the New Testament. Here is a passage in the eighth chapter of Hebrews that is in point: ‘Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched and not man.’ Please notice how explicit this testimony is. The sanctuary, or tabernacle, spoken of can neither be the tabernacle of Moses nor the temple of Solomon, since it is one that was pitched by the Lord and not by man; whereas the former buildings were made by Moses and Solomon respectively. Again there can be no question that it is located in heaven, as it is one in which Christ—now sitting at the right hand of the Father—is ministering.

“Passing now to Rev. 15 : 5-8 we read: ‘And after that I looked, and, behold, the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened: and the seven angels came out of the temple, having the seven plagues, clothed in pure and white linen, and having their breasts girded with golden girdles. And one of the four beasts gave unto the seven angels seven golden vials full of the wrath of God, who liveth forever and ever. And the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power: and no man was able to enter into the temple, till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled.’ Whatever may be our conceptions about the matter, here is a scene located in heaven which presupposes the existence there of a temple of some sort. John saw the angels going into it and coming out therefrom, and he also saw therein the ark of the testament. This same temple is spoken of in Rev. 7 : 13-15. Wait a moment, and I will read the passage to you. Yes, here it is: ‘And one of the elders answered, saying unto me, What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they? And I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said to me, These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple: and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them.’ I have read this passage for the definite purpose of proving that the temple of God in heaven is a literal structure. Had angels alone been seen coming out of it, some one might have claimed that the building, like them, was immaterial. Such a claim would be preposterous, since it would be nonsense to talk of an immaterial temple. But the passage that I have just read sets the whole matter at rest, as it teaches that the temple in question is to be occupied by material beings.”

MR. T.—“How do you prove that?”

MR. B.—“Very easily. The scene in Rev. 7 : 13-15, is located after the resurrection, and represents the host of the redeemed as ascribing the glory of their salvation to God and the Lamb. But if resurrected, they, like Christ, will have material bodies, and will need a material temple in which to worship; it follows, therefore, that the one in which John saw them was a temple of that order. Do you feel, Mr. Thoughtful, that the case would be rendered any stronger by the introduction of additional passages of like character with those already introduced? If so, I will continue to produce them.”

MR. T.—“No, sir; I do not know that there would be anything gained thereby. Those already cited are sufficient in number to prove the existence of a class of texts of that kind.”

"There is, however, one question that I would like to ask. What was the design of God in creating such a temple?"

Mr. B.—"With our present knowledge of him and his ways, it is impossible to answer your question fully. It is quite probable, nevertheless, that the heavenly temple, as we shall see hereafter, is the place where Christ performs much of the work connected with the redemption of our race. In that temple is the throne of God; and it is there, therefore, that decisions are made, and from there that messengers are dispatched to all parts of the universe to execute the divine will."

Mr. T.—"I think that I catch your idea, and I do not know that I have any particular objection to offer. I recall what John says in Rev. 5:11: 'And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne and the beasts and the elders; and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands.'

Mr. B.—"Yes, your citation is in point. It is not impossible that the elders were taken from among those who arose with Christ (Eph. 4:8), and who, perhaps, are now engaged with him in the heavenly temple in working out the plan of salvation for fallen men. If so, they, having material bodies, would require a material temple in which to officiate in connection with the Son of God."

Mr. T.—"To be frank with you, Mr. Biblist, I must confess that all my prejudice against your theory of a temple in heaven has vanished. Your reasoning, coupled with the scriptures which you have quoted, seems to be unanswerable. I find that in order to evade either the first or the last, an amount of twisting is necessary that is not compatible with candor. I grant, therefore, that you have proved your first proposition."

Mr. B.—"Very good; then we are prepared for the second thesis. That, you will remember, was expressed in these words: 'The tabernacle of Moses and the temple of Solomon were types of the temple in heaven.' We could hardly open the question to-night as it is already quite late, and I suggest, therefore, that we postpone its consideration, properly speaking, until our next meeting. At that time I shall expect Maud to give us a clear idea of what is meant by the words, 'type and antitype.'"

Maud.—"I do not think, father, that it would require much time to do that. I have opened Webster's Dictionary to the word 'type,' and find it defined as follows: 'A figure or representation of something to come; a token; a sign; a symbol:—correlative to antitype.'"

Mr. B.—"Well, Maud, you have performed your task very well with the aid of Mr. Webster, but you have defeated, in a measure, my original design, which was to ascertain whether you yourself had a clear conception of the subject. As you have circumvented me in the first instance, I will try again. This time you will please explain to me, independently of the dictionary, what you understand by the term 'antitype.'"

Maud.—"Well, I suppose that the antitype is the thing which is represented or shadowed forth by the type. We have an example in the paschal lamb which was slain at the time of the Passover. That lamb was a type of Christ, and Christ was, therefore, the antitype of the lamb; that is, the lamb represented in a figure that which Christ was to suffer. The lamb was the symbol, and Christ was the thing symbolized thereby."

Mr. B.—"Well, that is quite satisfactory. Now tell me what you would understand should I say to you that the tabernacle of Moses was a type of the temple of God in heaven."

Maud.—"Why, I should take it for granted that you meant to declare that the tabernacle of Moses was designed to be a representation of the temple of God in heaven."

Mr. B.—"Exactly. I perceive that you comprehend just what is meant by the terms of the thesis which we are to consider to-morrow evening, and I hope you will also be able to grasp fully the arguments which will be advanced in support of the thesis itself."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY ELD. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. BUBBLER.—"As all are present, we will resume the discussion at the point where we dropped it at our last interview. Let me see; I think we were about to examine the thesis which states that the 'tabernacle of Moses and the temple of Solomon were types of the temple in heaven.' Yes, I am right. We had not entered upon the discussion of the thesis; but Maud had explained the term 'type' as used therein, defining it to be anything that is employed to represent or symbolize some other thing, as for example the 'paschal lamb,' which was a type of Christ. The antitype, she told us, is that which is symbolized by the type. In the light of that explanation I am to prove to-night that the tabernacle of Moses and the temple of Solomon, which, practically, were the same thing, were representations or shadows of the temple in heaven. The first text that I shall employ for this purpose will be found in Ex. 25:18. I read, 'And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring me an offering: of every man that giveth it willingly with his heart ye shall take my offering. And this is the offering which ye shall take of them; gold, and silver, and brass, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair, and rams' skins dyed red, and badgers' skins, and shittim wood, oil for the light, spices for anointing oil, and for sweet incense, onyx stones, and stones to be set in the ephod, and in the breastplate. And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them.'"

MAUD.—"Father, what is the meaning of the word 'sanctuary'?"

MR. B.—"If you will observe the passage closely, my daughter, you will see that it answers your question quite satisfactorily. Here are the words to which I refer: 'Let them build me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them.' From this language you readily discover that the sanctuary was built that the Lord might dwell therein; in other words, the sanctuary was a dwelling-place for God."

MAUD.—"You don't mean to say, father, that God really dwelt in the tabernacle built by Moses?"

MR. B.—"Your question is a very natural one, my daughter, and suggested itself to my own mind when first I commenced the investigation of this subject. After much reflection I am satisfied that God did not dwell in the tabernacle in the sense in which he is said to dwell in the temple in heaven; i. e., by his bodily presence (if I may be allowed the expression), but simply by a sort of spiritual presence, the visible token of which appeared in the shekinah which was visible between the cherubim. It was there that he met his people, and, through the high priest, communicated with them. When they wished to address him in prayer or otherwise, they either went to the tabernacle, or turned their faces in that direction; thus showing that it was their conviction that it was the point where alone the spiritual presence of God was to be manifested. Nor is it necessary for the purpose of proving that the tabernacle was a type of the heavenly temple, to show that the former was actually and constantly the dwelling-place of God's person. A type is sometimes but a crude representation of its antitype. We have already seen that God dwells personally in the temple in heaven, and all that is required in this particular, so far as the tabernacle is concerned, in order to prove that it was a type of the heavenly temple, is to show that it contained something to represent the presence of Jehovah therein. That we have already found in the shekinah, or visible glory, that appeared between the cherubim. Is this point clear to your mind, Mr. Thoughtful?"

MR. THOUGHTFUL.—"Yes, sir; quite so."

MR. B.—"Then I will pass to another text. Here is one in Ex. 25:8, 9: 'And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them. According to all that I shew thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it.' Here, again, in verse 40, is another important testimony: 'And look that thou make them after their pattern, which was showed thee in the mount.' Perhaps I had better read two other texts before commenting upon those already read. The first you will find in Acts 7:44: 'Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speaking unto Moses, that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen.' The second text is located in Heb. 8:4, 5: 'For if he were on earth he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law, who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount.' Do you see the bearing of these texts, Maud, upon the subject?"

MAUD.—"I cannot say that I do, father."

MR. B.—"Do you, Mr. Thoughtful?"

MR. T.—"Not fully, sir. There are just two points that these passages seem to establish: The first is, that the Lord commanded Moses to build the tabernacle according to the pattern shown to him by the Lord in Mount Sinai; the second is, that Moses did that which he was commanded to do."

Mr. B.—“Precisely so, Mr. Thoughtful; these are the very points that I wish to prove by them. Now if I can show that the pattern shown to Moses in the Mount, and according to which he made the tabernacle, was a pattern of the heavenly sanctuary or temple, then I shall have made out my case, shall I not?”

Mr. T.—“Yes, sir; for in so doing you will prove that the tabernacle was a type, or representation, of the heavenly temple; the very thing that is claimed in your second thesis.”

Mr. B.—“Do you grasp the point, Maul?”

Maul.—“Yes sir, and I am waiting to see whether you can make the necessary proof.”

Mr. B.—“Very good; then I will proceed to my task. I read Heb. 9: 22, 23: ‘And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission. It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these.’ Paul is speaking of the provisions of the law of Moses. According to it, he says nearly everything is purged by blood, and without shedding of blood is no remission. The blood of which he here speaks is that of bulls and goats, and the things to be purged by such blood were the ‘patterns of things in the heavens.’ Passing to the heavenly things themselves, he says of them, by way of contrast, that it was necessary that they should be purified with ‘better sacrifices than these;’ that is, with the blood of Christ’s sacrifice. Do you catch the point? Here are two classes of ‘things’ mentioned: 1. The heavenly things; 2. The patterns of heavenly things. The patterns of heavenly things, beyond dispute, were the tabernacle and its implements. It is equally clear—since the pattern must be like the thing after which it is patterned—that there must be in heaven something resembling the Mosaic tabernacle, as the latter is declared to be the pattern of something in heaven. Thus, then, it is proved that the tabernacle has its duplicate in heaven; and as we have seen that the temple of God is there, and that Christ, our High Priest, officiates therein, the inevitable conclusion is that the tabernacle of Moses was made after the pattern of the temple of God in heaven, and is nothing more nor less than a type of the same. Farther proof that the Mosaic tabernacle was fashioned after the pattern of the heavenly temple you will find in still other texts. Take for example Heb. 8: 3-5, which has been introduced once before. I read it again: ‘For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer. For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law, who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed thee in the mount.’ Mark this testimony well! In verse 5, when speaking of the priests of the earthly temple and tabernacle, it says of them that they ‘serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things.’ In other words, it declares that in heaven there are priests who do just what the priests on earth did; or rather, the priests on earth did just what their exemplars in heaven are doing. But, I inquire, in what portion of heaven were those priests doing the work in question? The answer is obvious, In the heavenly temple.

Mr. T.—“I do not quite see that point. How do you know that it was in the heavenly temple that these priests served?”

Mr. B.—“It is very easy to assign a reason for such a belief. In verses 1, 2, of this same chapter it is stated that Christ is our High Priest, and that he ministers in heaven in the true tabernacle that the Lord pitched and not man. If, therefore, the High Priest ministers in the heavenly tabernacle, it follows that the inferior priests minister there also; since they are always joined with the High Priest in service.”

Mr. T.—“Yes; I see it now.”

Mr. B.—“Again, it is susceptible of proof that the heavenly temple, like the tabernacle of Moses, had two apartments. Can you tell me, Maul, what the two apartments of the Mosaic tabernacle were called?”

Maul.—“Yes, sir. The first was called the holy, the second the most holy place.”

Mr. B.—“Very true. Well, as I was saying, it can be proved that the heavenly temple also has a holy and a most holy place. Turn, if you please, to Heb. 9: 11, 12. I read: ‘But Christ being come as an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place (holy places; margin), having obtained eternal redemption for us.’ The original Greek, as indicated by the marginal reading, has holy ‘places’ instead of holy place as rendered in our version. But the plural implies the existence of at least two things. There must therefore be two apartments, or holies, in the heavenly temple. This point will be made more clear as I read to you verses 23, 24, of the same chapter: ‘It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us.' I need not repeat what has been said to the effect that where there are places, there must be more than one place. The text declares that the holy places made with hands—i. e., those in the Mosaic tabernacle—are the figures of the true (holy places). Now if the holy places in the Mosaic tabernacle were the figures of those in the heavenly temple, then the latter must have just two holy places, since the former had only that number. In other words, a tabernacle with two holy places could not be said to be the figure of a temple with either more or less than two holy places."

Mr. T.:—"I confess that my interest in this subject is becoming intense, and I think of but one thing more that would be required to enable me to endorse fully the theory that the temple in heaven is the antitype of the earthly tabernacle; i. e., the proof that there is furniture in the heavenly temple, and that it is the same or similar to that which was found in the tabernacle of Moses."

Mr. B.:—"Fortunately, I am able to furnish you the testimony that you desire respecting every article of furniture in the tabernacle with the exception of the table of show-bread. The censer, the candlestick, the golden altar, and the ark of the covenant, are all spoken of as having a place in the heavenly temple. I will read the passages that contain mention of them without comment. Turn first to Rev. 8:3: 'And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne.' Now open your Bible at Rev. 4:5: 'And out of the throne proceeded lightnings and thunderings and voices; and there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God.' Lastly I call your attention to Rev. 11:19: 'And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament; and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail.' As the ark was made especially to become the depository of the tables of the law, the presence of the ark in the temple of God in heaven presupposes the existence therein of duplicates of the tables of the law. So far as the cherubim are concerned, it will, of course, be admitted that their antitypes will be found in living form in the heavenly temple where John saw a host of angels numbering, as he said, 'ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands.' Thus, as intimated above, we have been able to find in the heavenly temple the antitype of every article of furniture contained in the earthly tabernacle with the exception of the table of show-bread. The failure to mention this in the incidental references to the contents of the heavenly temple does not prove that it was not there in some form; while the specific allusions to all the other articles of furniture with which it was associated in the tabernacle of Moses, furnish a strong presumption that it has a place in the temple of God along with the censer, the ark, the tables of the covenant, the altar of incense, and the candlestick.

"Unless you have some objection to offer, or some question to ask, Mr. Thoughtful, I think we had better suspend our labors for the evening."

Mr. T.:—"Your suggestion is a good one. My mind is overwhelmed with reflections which naturally grow out of the theme under consideration, and it would be a relief to spend a short time by myself in digesting the arguments that you have advanced at this interview. To be candid with you and true to my own feelings, I must confess that I am literally dumfounded. I have not an objection to offer, or a question to ask. I cannot conceive how it is possible that these things should be set forth in the Bible so plainly, and I never discover them before."

Mr. B.:—"No doubt early education and after prejudice have served to cover the truth from your view."

Mr. T.:—"It must be that such is the case. You recollect that Lorenzo Dow once said that prejudice is like the cork that will let nothing either into, or out of, a bottle. I am resolved that for the future I will not condemn any theory till I at least know something about the basis upon which it rests. I bid you both good-night."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY ELD. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

Mr. THOUGHTFUL.—“You see, Mr. Biblist, that I have not forgotten my appointment. The subject of last evening's conversation would not permit me to do that, as it has been in my mind during nearly the whole day. Pardon me, sir, for entering your study without the usual formalities; but I believe that in doing so, I am simply acting upon your own suggestion.”

Mr. Biblist.—“Yes, Mr. Thoughtful, be free to come in at any time without stopping to knock. It saves me the necessity of answering the door-bell, and I confess I rather like the informality that such a course betokens. Our interviews should be characterized by the familiarity of a family chat, rather than the stiffness of a formal call. To-night we are to consider the third thesis in our series. It runs like this: ‘The services of the earthly tabernacle and temple, with their priesthood and their offerings, shadowed forth the priesthood and services of the heavenly temple.’ You will observe that this thesis is but an extension of the last one considered. According to that, the tabernacle was a type of the temple in heaven. If this one be true, the services and priesthood of the Mosaic tabernacle were typical of the services and priesthood of the heavenly temple. The latter thesis would almost seem to be a necessary consequence of the former one. That is, if the tabernacle typified the heavenly temple, it would naturally be inferred that the services and priesthood of the former typified the services and priesthood of the latter. It is a fact, also, that in proving the second thesis, the third has been proved, so far as the priesthood is concerned. In quoting Heb. 8:3, these words have already been introduced: ‘For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law, who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things.’ Nothing could be plainer than the testimony of this text. It teaches distinctly that the Mosaic priesthood shadowed forth, or typified, the priesthood of the heavenly temple. Standing alone, it would establish all that has been claimed on this point. It might not be out of place, however, to call attention to some things that are spoken respecting the high priest. You will recollect that we have had occasion to use Heb. 8:1, 2, and that we found in it these words: ‘We have such an High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man.’

“I am very anxious, Maud, that you should understand this question in all of its parts and bearings. There are few persons with whom I have met, who comprehend it more fully than your mother did in her lifetime. I do not see, therefore, why you cannot master it in all its details. Let me ask you a question or two about the passage just read, in order to determine whether you fully comprehend its bearing upon the subject. What is meant by the expression, ‘The tabernacle not made with hands?’”

Maud.—“Why, it is an appellation given to the heavenly temple to distinguish it from all earthly temples and tabernacles. The latter were made with hands, the former, by God, or without human hands.”

Mr. B.—“That is capital, my daughter. Now tell me what the passage teaches about a high priest.”

Maud.—“It declares, in substance, that Christ is our high priest, and that he ministers in the temple in heaven.”

Mr. B.—“Precisely so. When you have leisure, if you will read the ninth chapter of Hebrews carefully, you will find that Paul, in a very able argument found therein, shows both the parallelism and the contrast between the Jewish high priest and Christ when acting in the capacity of high priest.”

Maud.—“How is this, father; how can the Jewish high priest be a type of Christ as a high priest, and yet be contrasted with him?”

Mr. T.—“Exactly, Miss Maud; that is the very question that I was about to ask.”

Mr. B.—“Well, I see that I must mind my logical p's and q's when conversing with two such critics as I have before me to-night. I suppose Maud reasons that as ‘turn about is fair play’ she has a right to question me as fully as I have questioned her. But let me see if it is not possible to explain the seeming discrepancy which has troubled both of you. I think that a single declaration of Paul will do the work if I can only succeed in finding the passage in which it is contained. If I mistake not, it is located somewhere in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Yes, here it is, the tenth chapter and first verse: ‘For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices, which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect.’ You are aware that a shadow is frequently distorted, and that it seldom gives the exact outlines and proportions of the body that casts it.

The shadow of a man at noon, for example, is about three feet long, whereas about the time of sunset, it measures several rods in length. So too, according to Paul, the types and figures of the Mosaic law give but an imperfect outline of their antitypes. Sometimes they resemble the latter only in a single particular, differing from them as widely as possible in every other respect. Take, if you please, the paschal lamb. It resembled Christ, perhaps, only in the time and manner of its death, and the docility of its character. Aside from these, the contrasts were infinite. The lamb was a four-footed animal, with little or no reasoning power; while Christ was the divine Son of God, infinite in wisdom and power.

"Returning, now, to the ninth chapter of Hebrews, let me make good my statement that Paul both compares and contrasts the Jewish high priests with Christ the high priest of the heavenly temple. In verse 7 of that chapter we read that the high priest went into the most holy place every year, where he offered blood for himself and for the people. In verse 12 it is shown that Christ, unlike the priests in question, will only enter the most holy place of the heavenly temple once. It is obvious also, since he was without sin, that he will not need to offer his own blood for himself as the Jewish high priests, being transgressors, were compelled to offer the typical blood for themselves. Again, the latter were subject to death, and therefore had successors; whereas Christ, being immortal, will need no successor. Thus much by way of proving that there were contrasts between the Jewish high priests and our High Priest.

"Now I wish to demonstrate that the parallelisms between the former and the latter are so marked that they prove that the one was the type of the other. To do so, I shall use the same ninth chapter of Hebrews. I read the 6th and 7th verses: 'Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God. But into the second went the high priest alone once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people.' Please notice that it was the high priest alone who entered the most holy place of the Mosaic tabernacle. This he did once a year, carrying with him the blood of a slain victim. That blood, it was stated, he offered 'for himself and for the errors of the people.' The question that now arises is, Was that a genuine or a typical work merely, which the high priest performed? That is, Did the blood offered really make an atonement for sin, or did it simply prefigure the veritable atonement to be made by the blood of Christ? This question is answered by inspiration in verse 9: 'Which [the first tabernacle] was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect as pertaining to the conscience.' Here it is distinctly taught, in harmony with reason, that the service of the tabernacle could not remove guilt from the conscience of the sinner. The blood of bulls and goats cannot remove sin.

It must be, therefore, that the ceremony in question performed by the high priest was merely a typical one, that represented a genuine one to be made at some future time in the use of better blood and at the hands of a greater high priest.

"Let us see if we can find the antitypical blood and the antitypical high priest. I read verses 11 to 14 inclusive: 'But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us. For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of a heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?' Words could hardly set forth a great truth more clearly than the foregoing do the fact that Christ is our high priest in the heavenly temple not made with hands, and that he, as the antitype of the Jewish high priest, will offer before the throne of God in the behalf of penitent transgressors, not the worthless blood of bulls and goats, but the antitypical blood shed by himself, which alone can make men perfect as to the conscience. The service performed by the Jewish high priest was not altogether an empty one, since it was appointed by the Lord, and, as the apostle says in the passage quoted above, availed to the cleansing of the flesh; i. e., brought the sinner into such a relation to God that his worship was acceptable. Furthermore, through it the people were enabled to give such an expression of their faith in the anticipated atonement to be made by Christ, that God could accept this outward expression of their desires to avail themselves of the plan of salvation, and grant them conditional pardon of their sins.

"The only remaining feature of the tabernacle service not yet considered is the sacrificial offerings. There is such a universal agreement that these, generally speaking, represented the sufferings and death of Christ, that I need not discuss that point here. I suppose that you, Mr. Thoughtful, are in harmony with the popular theory in the particular in question."

Mr. T.—"Decidedly so, sir."

Mr. B.—"Then we are united in the opinion that the offerings of the ceremonial law were typical so far that they shadowed forth the sacrificial death of our great high priest, Christ."

Maud.—"Yes father, but that occurred on the earth; how, therefore, can you make the offerings that represented it types of something that is to take place in heaven?"

Mr. B.—“A very pertinent question, Maund, and one that deserves a candid answer. This is my reply: So far as the death of the victims is concerned, of course it related to the death of Christ on the earth. Not so with the offering of their blood before the ark in the most holy place on the great day of atonement. That, beyond all controversy, typified the presentation of the blood of Christ before the throne of God.”

Mr. T.—“How do you prove that?”

Mr. B.—“In this way: We have seen that the shekinah was simply a type of God; that the mercy-seat, or cover of the ark, represented the throne of God; that the ark and the tables of the law have their antitypes in the temple in heaven, and that the Jewish high priest was a type of Christ, who is also in heaven. In fine, it has been proved that the whole service of the tabernacle of Moses, so far as considered hitherto, was a typical service merely. It remains to be seen whether the offering of the blood before the ark on the day of atonement was an exception to the rule. If it was a type—as we have presumed that it was—then we should be able to find something answering to it in the antitype. Happily this can be done with but little trouble.

“Turning again to the ninth chapter of Hebrews, I read verses 11 and 12 once more: ‘But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.’ Comment is hardly required. The passage tells the story so clearly that it is difficult to misapprehend its import. You notice that it is speaking, not about the tabernacle of Moses, but about that which was made without hands, i. e., the one in heaven. It says that Christ entered the holy place of that tabernacle—not with the blood of calves and goats—but with his own blood, having obtained eternal redemption for us. Here, then, is that for which we have been looking, the antitype of the service performed by the Jewish high priest when he entered the most holy place of the Mosaic tabernacle to make atonement with the blood of animals. We see that the ceremony which he enacted then and there, was to have its counterpart in the act of Christ in offering his own blood in the heavenly sanctuary for the sin of his people. With this text we complete the line of evidence to prove our third thesis; i. e., ‘The services of the earthly tabernacle and temple with their priesthood and their offerings shadowed forth the priesthood and services of the heavenly temple.’ If there are any points in what we have been over this evening that are not quite clear to your mind, Mr. Thoughtful, I shall be glad to elucidate them more fully before closing our interview.”

Mr. T.—“I do not know that there are any questions that I would like to ask at this time. I think I have a very clear apprehension of that branch of the subject that has been before us at this sitting. I am more and more impressed with the thought that God’s hand is leading us in this investigation. My heart is filled with gratitude to him, and to you under him, for the light that I am receiving.”

Mr. B.—“If Maund has no inquiries to make, we will consider this sitting closed, remembering that to-morrow night we shall discuss a thesis of most thrilling interest.”

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY ELD. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

Mr. BIRLIST.—“As you and Maud are on time to-night, and soon to be anxious to enter upon the evening's work, I will make no delay, Mr. Thoughtful, but proceed promptly to business. I believe that our thesis runs like this: ‘The yearly round of service in the earthly tabernacle and temple represented the whole of Christ's work in the heavenly sanctuary in connection with the salvation of man from the time of his ascension until the close of the judgment.’ Can you tell me, Maud, what is meant in our thesis by the term ‘yearly round of service?’”

Maud.—“I do not know that I can, sir; that is, I do not understand why the tabernacle service is called a yearly round of service. The name ‘service,’ I suppose, applied to the offering of sacrifices and other acts of worship performed by the priests and the people.”

Mr. B.—“Your definition of service, Maud, is correct; but I am somewhat surprised that you cannot tell me why that service is called a yearly round of service in the thesis under consideration. I fear that you have not given close attention to the many lectures that you have heard upon the subject of the sanctuary.”

Maud.—“I acknowledge, father, that what you say is true. I never understood the sanctuary question, and I had almost given up all hope of doing so until you commenced your talks with Mr. Thoughtful on the question. Since then I have made up my mind that I can and will understand it.”

Mr. B.—“Very good, my daughter; I am glad to hear you express yourself so decidedly, and I will see if I cannot make this matter of the yearly round of service plain to your comprehension. The expression ‘round of service’ naturally implies a circuit or circle of service. Hence a yearly round of service is one that is completed in a year's time. Do you catch the idea?”

Maud.—“Yes, sir; but were the tabernacle services gone through with each year? and did they at the beginning of each year commence right at the point where they began the previous year and go over the same ground again?”

Mr. B.—“Exactly so, Maud. Every year of tabernacle service commenced with the regular morning and evening sacrifices, the sin offerings and the thank offerings, etc., offered by different individuals, and ended with the great day of atonement that had a service peculiar to itself. There were different feast days, also, that were celebrated at stated times in a manner definitely prescribed by the law; but these, as already intimated, were of regular occurrence and fell on their proper days of the month without interfering with the commencement or close of the sacred year. It was as though you should open a running account with a merchant—say on the first day of January each year—and on the thirty-first day of December pay up all arrears, balance the books, and commence a new account. This figure will not apply in every particular, as we shall see hereafter; but it will serve to give you an idea of the yearly cycles of the tabernacle service.”

Mr. T.—“Will you be so kind as to repeat what you said about the tabernacle services. If I understood you aright, you stated that the services and sacrifices on the day of atonement differed materially from the service and sacrifices of other days.”

Mr. B.—“Yes, sir; you understood me correctly. For three hundred and sixty-four days in the year the priests superintended the slaying of victims and the making of offerings on the great brazen altar that was in the court before the tabernacle. Do not fail to discriminate at all times between the brazen altar that was outside, and the golden altar of incense that was inside, the tabernacle. Nothing but incense and bread was offered on the latter, while victims and other offerings were burned on the former. The priest slew and dressed the public sacrifices; but victims offered by private individuals—with the exception of turtle doves and young pigeons—were slain by the persons offering them. The process in all cases where the victims were offered on the account of sins committed was like this: the person having committed the sin or sins, in question, laid his hands upon the head of his victim—in the meantime confessing his sins—and then he slew the victim with his own hand. By this act he acknowledged his fault, confessed that his own life had been forfeited by his sin, and professed his faith in the coming Messiah, through whose substitutional death he hoped for pardon and restored life. It is not quite certain that every Jew had a clear understanding of the plan of salvation through the sacrificial death of Christ when he performed these services; but it is true beyond dispute that it was the purpose of God through these sacrifices to prefigure the atonement to be made by his Son through the offering of his own blood. Hence we hear John the Baptist —while pointing to Christ—saying, ‘Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.’

“After the individual sinner had confessed his sins over the head of his victim and slain that victim with his own hands, the priest took a portion of the blood thus shed, and, conveying it in a basin into the first apartment of the tabernacle, he sprinkled it on the ground directly in front of the veil that separated the holy from the most holy place. Just behind that veil was the ark that contained the law that the sinner had transgressed. Right above the ark and the law, was the shekinah, or visible glory, that typified the presence of the God whose law the sinner had broken. It is manifest, therefore, that the design in carrying the sacrificial blood and depositing it in the tabernacle in front of the ark was to present in a figure before God himself, the sinner's confession of his guilt, and his prayer for pardon on account of his faith that Christ was to die in his behalf, and thus atone for his sins.

"As I have remarked, this ceremony continued for 364 out of the 365 days of the year. Day by day victims of the character in question were sacrificed by scores and hundreds, and their blood was borne into the sanctuary. When we take into the account the fact that the whole Jewish nation by individuals were all compelled to go to the one tabernacle and make offering for their sins, we can form some conception of the mighty concourse of people that were constantly going and coming to and from the tabernacle for sacrificial purposes. To enumerate the victims that were offered in a single year, would be impossible; but the number must have been prodigious. The cost also of the sacrifice thus offered no doubt reached figures of almost incredible proportions. At times, it must have required the services of an army of priests to do the work that devolved upon them. Take, for example, the passover occasions. At such times, the lambs slain must have reached hundreds of thousands, as it is estimated that the people in attendance upon such feasts sometimes numbered several millions. I make these remarks to impress upon your mind the scope and dignity of the tabernacle service. All were required to be represented in them or suffer the penalty of being separated from the people of God. A service that demanded such an expenditure of time and money, and the neglect of which was fraught with such terrible consequences, could not have been a thing of trifling character. God would not have suspended the salvation of souls upon something that was not of vital consequence. Nothing but the explanation that has been given can properly elucidate this matter. Without Christ there is no salvation. Since his death, we point backward to his cross as the hope of the world. Before his day, the believing Jew, through the shed blood of his sin offering sprinkled in the holy place, pointed forward to the same cross, as that which was to bear the antitype of his slain victim. Christ is the key and the only key that will unlock the mysteries of the tabernacle services.

"But to return to the subject directly before us; i. e., the final disposition of the sins of the penitent Hebrew who had presented the blood of his sacrifice in the holy place of the sanctuary. You will remember that the priest had sprinkled a portion of it on the ground before the veil that was in front of the ark, and by that act the sinner had acknowledged, in the person of the priest, his guilt under circumstances exactly calculated to call the attention of the Lord to his sorrow for the transgressions committed and to his profession of faith in the coming Christ as the Saviour of the world. Up to the point thus reached there has been no demonstration on the part of Jehovah to show that he has accepted the confessions of the penitent. The priest—probably one of the common priests—has uttered no word nor performed any act other than that presenting the petition for pardon from the offender. He has not even brought the plea of the suppliant into the immediate presence of the Lawgiver. Indeed, if he were a common priest, he could only do that at the penalty of his life; for it was death for any to enter the most holy place, save the high priest. He alone could pass behind the veil, and enter that place which was awful on account of the bright shining of the shekinah which was the symbol of the Divine Being. We have seen that he (the high priest) was a type of Christ. There is no being in all the universe, except Christ, who would dare to approach the mighty God to plead for the extension of mercy and pardon to a sinner. Hence we read that God out of Christ 'is a consuming fire;' and again; 'there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.'

"The question, therefore, is, Will Christ accept the confessions of the transgressor, and plead his case at the tribunal in heaven? This is the all-important point in the mind of the helpless offender against God's law. He can have no peace of conscience until that question is settled. It cannot be expected, of course, that Jesus would come to every penitent, and communicate to him the fact that he had undertaken his cause; and yet there are ways in which he could assure him that if his professions were sincere, he might rely upon his all-prevailing intercessions. As the tabernacle service as a whole was typical, it might be reasonably expected that there would be something in its ceremonies to throw light upon this most significant subject. To bring the criminal into the presence of his injured and indignant Lawgiver, cause him to confess his guilt, and then leave him in uncertainty as to the result, would be cruel indeed; but if he were to receive assurance of help and pardon, from whom must it come? Manifestly; in the first instance, from the one who was to undertake his case, i. e., Christ. John says, 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous.' He must first present the case, and then God must decide in the promises. But if Christ is willing to do that, and if he was ready to give to the sorrowing violator of God's commandments contained in the ark the proof of his readiness to do so, through whom could he give expression to that readiness, in the tabernacle service? To settle that point it is only necessary to determine who was the representative of Christ—if he had any—among those who officiated at the tabernacle. Maud, what have we learned in regard to that matter in our previous interviews?"

Maud.—"What matter, sir?"

Mr. H.—"Why, the matter of Christ's representative in the tabernacle."

Maud.—"Yes, sir; I understand you now. I think that several evenings ago, it was very clearly proved from the 8th and 9th chapters of Hebrews that the high priest was a type of Christ."

Mr. B.—"I will ask you a question, Mr. Thoughtful. What have we seen that the blood of the slain victims symbolized?"

Mr. T.—"The blood of Christ."

Mr. B.—"Very true. But what has the blood of Christ to do with the pardon of sin?"

Mr. T.—"I think we have read a text in Heb. 9:22 that will answer your question. Yes, here it is: 'And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission.'"

Mr. B.—"That is exactly in point; it shows that Paul understood that the law taught the great lesson that the shedding of blood was inseparably connected with the pardon of the sinner. He emphasizes the same doctrine, and connects it a little more fully with the shedding of Christ's blood in Rom. 6:25: 'Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God.' But we must not stay away from the point under examination. You will remember that it was this: If the transgressor expressed his sorrow for sin by confessing it over the head of his victim, and then shed the blood of that victim as an act which, in the tabernacle service, betokened his sense of his lost condition and desire for pardon and life through Christ, where, in that service, was he taught that in so doing Christ would plead his own blood in his behalf and secure his pardon? Maud has told us that the high priest was a type of Christ. We might therefore expect that in some part of the tabernacle service, he, as the representative of Christ, would perform some act that would illustrate the manner in which, and the time at which, Christ would plead his own blood before the Father, and secure thereby the forgiveness and salvation of those who, through the sacrifices offered, besought his intervention in their behalf. It is now quite late, and I shall postpone the discussion of that topic till to-morrow evening."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY ELD. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MAUD.—"I think Mr. Thoughtful is coming, father. Yes, he is at the door now."

Mr. Biblist.—"Come right in, Mr. Thoughtful. I hope you are well this evening, sir."

Mr. Thoughtful.—"Yes, sir; I am very well, and I trust I may continue to be so, and you and your daughter, likewise; at least, until we have completed the investigation of the topic that has occupied our attention for several evenings. It is a misfortune to be ailing at any time, but it would be especially such just now. As it is, the time that separates evening from evening seems only too long."

Mr. B.—"I am very thankful that your interest does not flag. We have now reached a point in our researches where I think it must become intensified. We are about to examine that feature of the sanctuary service, in which its highest interest centers. You will remember that at the close of our last interview we were looking among the tabernacle ceremonies for something that would assure the sinner that his sins—which had been carried into the first apartment of the sanctuary, in connection with the blood of his victim—would be forgiven by the great God against whom he had offended. That ceremony, I think we shall find in the services of the great day of atonement. In order to make it clear that such is the case, it will be necessary to describe the services of that day quite fully. You will please bear in mind the fact that the day of atonement, as heretofore stated, always fell on the tenth day of the seventh month of the Jewish year, or in that month of the Jewish year which answers to our October. On the occasion in question, the whole Hebrew nation, as far as possible, were expected to be present at the tabernacle. No day, in either the sacred or secular calendar of the Israelites, could compare in point of solemnity with the great day of atonement. So far superior in importance were its services to those of other days, that the high priest alone was thought worthy to enter the tabernacle while the atonement service proper was in process of enactment. Neither did he venture to perform the duties that devolved upon him at that most solemn period, until he had first bathed his flesh in pure water, and placed upon his person the holy garments which were made in every respect conformably to the directions given by the Lord to Moses. Perhaps I cannot do better than to read to you a portion of the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus right here, as it contains explicit directions in every particular for the conducting of the services that characterized the day of atonement. Here it is:—

"And the Lord spake unto Moses after the death of the two sons of Aaron, when they offered before the Lord and died; and the Lord said unto Moses, speak unto Aaron thy brother, that he come not at all times into the holy place within the veil before the mercy seat, which is upon the ark; that he die not: for I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy seat. Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place; with a young bullock for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering. He shall put on the holy linen coat, and he shall have the linen breeches upon his flesh, and shall be girded with a linen girdle, and with the linen mitre shall he be attired: these are holy garments: therefore shall he wash his flesh in water, and so put them on. And he shall take of the congregation of the children of Israel two kids of the goats for a sin offering, and one ram for a burnt offering. And Aaron shall offer his bullock of the sin offering, which is for himself, and make an atonement for himself, and for his house. And he shall take the two goats, and present them before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. And Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for the scape-goat. And Aaron shall bring the goat upon which the Lord's lot fell, and offer him for a sin offering. But the goat on which the lot fell to be the scape-goat, shall be presented alive before the Lord, to make an atonement with him, and to let him go for a scape-goat into the wilderness. And Aaron shall bring the bullock of the sin offering, which is for himself, and shall make an atonement for himself, and for his house, and shall kill the bullock of the sin offering which is for himself. And he shall take a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small, and bring it within the veil. And he shall put the incense upon the fire before the Lord, that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy-seat that is upon the testimony, that he die not. And he shall take of the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it with his finger upon the mercy-seat eastward; and before the mercy-seat shall he sprinkle of the blood with his finger seven times. Then shall he kill the goat of the sin offering, that is for the people, and bring his blood within the veil, and do with that blood as he did with the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it upon the mercy-seat and before the mercy-seat. And he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel and because of their transgressions in all their sins; and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation, that remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness. And there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place, until he come out, and have made an atonement for himself, and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel. And he shall go out unto the altar that is before the Lord, and make an atonement for it; and shall take of the blood of the bullock, and of the blood of the goat, and put it upon the horns of the altar round about. And he shall sprinkle of the blood upon it with his finger seven times, and cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel. And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat: and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness. And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited: and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness. And Aaron shall come into the tabernacle of the congregation and shall put off the linen garments, which he put on when he went into the holy place, and shall leave them there.

"It is not necessary to read farther, as you now have the substance of what is said in the chapter about the services of the day of atonement. I have read this much, because of the importance of the ceremony that we have been considering. There is nothing to compare with it in grandeur and impressiveness in all the ritual of the Jews. What we want now is a key that will unlock its mysteries. No doubt you have observed that the services of the day of atonement differ from those of other days in that they relate to the people as a whole, instead of private individuals, the offerings (with the exception of those that relate to the high priest) being made for the mass of worshipers assembled at the tabernacle. You have noticed, also, that the design of the ceremony performed was that of cleansing both the people and the tabernacle from that uncleanness that results from sin."

Maud.—"I do not see, father, how the tabernacle could be rendered unclean by the sins of the people among whom it was pitched. Surely sin is not a tangible thing; besides, the common people did not go into the tabernacle, did they, father?"

Mr. B.—"You are right, Maud, in supposing that the multitude did not go into the tabernacle, and you are correct in your statement that sin cannot impart physical uncleanness. I am glad that you asked the question which you have asked, because it enables me to make the very point right here that I wished to make at this time. Nearly every one who commences to investigate the sanctuary question is troubled just as you have been. The moment they read about cleansing the tabernacle, they immediately conclude that the Scriptures mean to teach that it needed purging from physical pollution. This is a great mistake. There are several considerations which will prove it to be such. First, the high priest instead of employing soap, sand, and water, as he would have done had he wished to purify the tabernacle from uncleanness of a physical nature, actually introduced into it the blood of animals, which was calculated to render it more unclean, physically speaking, than it was before. Secondly, there was no act of his that was of a nature to convey the impression that he was dealing with anything that was physically corrupt. Thirdly, it is distinctly declared that it was the sins of the people from which he sought to purify the sanctuary, but, as you have already intimated, sin cannot impart tangible uncleanness, and consequently it must have been moral corruption to which the cleansing referred."

Mr. T.—"But how, let me inquire, was it possible to cleanse the tabernacle from the moral uncleanness of the people, since sin is not a separate entity, and since, as you say, it cannot impart its own moral impurity to physical objects?"

Mr. B.—"You and Maud do not perceive it, Mr. Thoughtful, but your reasoning, which is indeed quite logical, is helping me on in the direction of the very conclusion to which I wish to bring both of you. We are now agreed that the high priest on the day of atonement did not deal with physical impurity. I wish now to make another point, which is this: The work which he performed was purely ceremonial, and did not even dispose permanently of the sins of the people; in other words, it was merely a figure of a future work to be done in another place, by different blood, and by another high priest, i. e., in the heavenly temple and by Christ. To do this I have but to remind you that Paul says in the ninth chapter of Hebrews that the Mosaic tabernacle 'was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect as pertaining to the conscience.'"

Maud.—"Well, father, as you say that the cleansing of the tabernacle did not result in its physical purification, and also that it could not take away the sins of the people, I do not see that it amounted to anything anyway."

Mr. B.—"Be patient, my daughter. That which reveals to us great practical truths is only second in value to those great truths themselves. The Bible is not salvation itself, but it shows us the way in which we can be saved, and is therefore of infinite service to fallen man. So, too, with the services of the day of atonement, when taken in connection with those that took place each day in the year. It taught by a most impressive symbolism the great facts that relate to the plan of redemption. Let us trace the unfolding of these facts one by one in the tabernacle service. First, the penitent confessed his sins over the head of his victim, and then slew the victim with his own hands. By that act he confessed the enormity of sin, and the necessity for the death of a substitute in order to secure pardon. Secondly, the carrying of the blood into the tabernacle taught the need of pleading the blood of Christ before the Father, whose law the sinner had broken. Thirdly, the continuance of these daily presentations of the blood in the first apartment of the sanctuary for three hundred and sixty-four days of the year, signified that the sins of the transgressor were not to be finally disposed of until the lapse of a long period of time, and that the sins of all the people were to be presented before the Father, and acted upon at the same time. Fourthly, that in the antitype when the great day of atonement shall be reached, and the blood of Christ shall be offered for all, probation will end, incorrigible sinners will be eternally lost, and saints will receive full pardon and their transgressions be remembered no more. I say that such were the lessons of the sanctuary, for that is what Paul teaches. Hear him: 'For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God.'

Mr. T.—"From what book are you reading?"

Mr. B.—"Pardon me, sir; I read Hebrews 9: 13, 14. In the eleventh and twelfth verses of the same chapter you will find an equally pertinent testimony. But to return to the subject: The words of Paul that I read a few moments ago prove that Christ's blood is alone efficacious in cleansing the heart of the sinner from his transgressions. (On former occasions it has been proved that the high priest was a type of Christ, and that the ceremonies that he performed in the earthly tabernacle shadowed forth an antitypical work which Christ was to perform in the heavenly. It must be true, therefore, that the time will come that the heavenly high priest will perform a service that will match the service enacted by the Jewish high priest on the day of atonement, as the shadow corresponds in its outlines with the substance by which it is cast. Let us see, therefore, if we can determine just what lesson was taught by the ceremonies of the day of atonement. In the thirtieth verse of the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus are these words: 'For on that day [the day of atonement] shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord.' Here is the proof that in the type the Jewish high priest did a work that related to the cleansing of the people from their sins. That work, as already shown, was not a genuine work, as the blood employed in it, according to Paul, could not take away sin. Christ's blood alone can do this, and as the high priest simply prefigured what Christ is to do at some time, it follows that he (Christ) will actually, at the proper time, purge the people from their sins, by an application of his own blood to their hearts. Agreeably with this thought we read in 1 John 1: 7, 'The blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.' As in the type the work of cleansing the people was performed on a specific day, it is to be inferred that the type was designed to teach that the great antitypical atonement will take place at some definite time in the future. At our next talk I will enter upon the specific work of locating that event."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY REV. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. BIBLIST.—“We are all present again, and I will commence the work of the evening by inquiring of Maud whether she recollects the point at which we closed our last interview.”

MAUD.—“Yes, sir, I think that I do. You had just quoted the 29th and 30th verses of the 16th chapter of Leviticus, in which it is stated that on the day of atonement the high priest should make regularly, each year, an atonement to cleanse the people from all their sins, before the Lord.”

MR. B.—“Very good, Maud; but what did I prove respecting the atonement made? Did I show that it was genuine or merely ceremonial and typical?”

MAUD.—“You proved that it was merely typical, and foreshadowed a genuine atonement to be made by Christ, our heavenly High Priest, at some time in the future, which time you engaged to locate for us this evening.”

MR. B.—“Well done, my daughter; you seem to have completely comprehended the argument made at our last sitting.”

MR. THOUGHTFUL.—“I am very anxious, Mr. Biblist, to have you locate exactly the time when Christ, our High Priest, will, with his own blood, make an atonement for the sins of his people in the heavenly sanctuary; but before you do so, I would be glad to have you explain a little more fully the ceremonies of the Jewish day of atonement. I think I understand them all tolerably well, with the exception of those that related to the two goats. If I recollect aright, there were two kids of the goats brought to the door of the tabernacle upon which the high priest cast lots. One of these lots was called the lot for the Lord's goat, and the other the lot for the scape-goat. The goat upon which the Lord's lot fell, was slain, and a portion of his blood was taken into the most holy place and sprinkled before the ark. The other goat was not slain at all; but after the priest had placed his hands upon his head, and confessed over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, he sent him away into the wilderness by a man selected for that purpose. Now I would like to know whether both of these goats typified Christ in his work?”

MR. B.—“I perceive, Mr. Thoughtful, that you are not far from a correct comprehension of the significance of the services of the day of atonement. Your mind has already caught the idea that the Lord's goat typified Christ, but you are puzzled to see how the scape-goat could also represent him. Your perplexity is not without some cause. In the first place, it is difficult to see why one should be called the Lord's goat and the other the scape-goat, if both symbolized the Son of God in different stages of his sacrificial work. In the second place, there is nothing in Christ's work for the salvation of men that answers to the sending away the goat into the wilderness. It could not relate to anything in his career that antedated his crucifixion, since it followed the slaying of the Lord's goat, which typified that event.

“Whatever the ceremony of the scape-goat typified, its fulfillment must be sought for in the closing work of Christ when acting as high priest, as it was about the last transaction that took place on the day of atonement. But as we have seen that the yearly round of service in the tabernacle, which terminated on the day of atonement, symbolized the whole period of Christ's ministration in the heavenly sanctuary clear up to the close of probation, then, as the scape-goat was sent into the wilderness just as that yearly round of service was being completed, that event must transpire some time in the future, or just after Christ ceases to plead his blood for man, and the plan of salvation is finished. Here is the natural order of events: 1. The slaying of the Lord's goat, which was fulfilled at the crucifixion; 2. The offering of the blood of the Lord's goat in the most holy place, that contained the ark, for the sins of the people in work which will not be completed till Christ offers his blood in behalf of the last sinner who will be saved; 3. The sending away of the scape-goat, loaded with the sins of the people, into the wilderness, or a transaction that will not meet with its anti-type until Christ has completed the work of atoning for the last sinner who will be saved. Do you catch the idea, Mr. Thoughtful?”

MR. T.—“Yes, sir, I think I do. It is this, if I understand you aright: The day of atonement in the Jewish service represented occurrences which in their fulfillment cover the closing portion of the Christian dispensation. The last of those occurrences was the sending of the scape-goat into the wilderness, and must, therefore, be fulfilled in something that is to take place at the close of probation, or in the future.”

MR. B.—“Very correctly stated, Mr. Thoughtful. You see that the only difficulty in understanding the matter, springs from a failure to consider the events in the order in which they transpired, remembering that they were designed to symbolize transactions that in their enactment would cover long periods of time.”

MAUD.—“Well, father, I do not see that you have told us as yet what the scape-goat typified. That is what I would like to understand.”

Mr. B.—“Well, my daughter, if I can only be assured that you comprehend the significance of the Lord's goat, then I will try to satisfy your curiosity in reference to the scape-goat.”

Maud.—“Why, I think that is very plain. It represented the Lord Jesus Christ, and the presentation of his blood by himself before the throne of God in heaven to atone for the sins of men.”

Mr. B.—“One more question, Maud; when will the blood of Christ cease to be pleaded for sinners?”

Maud.—“Not until probation ends.”

Mr. B.—“Pardon me, Maud, if I ask when we are to look for the antitype of the scape-goat?”

Maud.—“Not until probation is ended; for the scape-goat was not sent into the wilderness until the blood of the Lord's goat had been fully presented before the ark.”

Mr. B.—“Very true; very true. Now let us see if we can identify the antitype of the scape-goat. Look in your Bibles in the margin of Lev. 16:8, and you will see the word Azazel, which is placed there as a substitute for the word scape-goat, warranted by the Hebrew original. The text when amended to harmonize with this marginal reading, would stand as follows: ‘And Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for the Lord and the other lot for Azazel.’ Thus it appears that Azazel must have been the name of a person whom the scape-goat was taken to represent. The next query is, Who is that person? I do not know as there is anything in the Scriptures that will help us on this point; but there seems to be an abundance of outside testimony to prove that Azazel was one of the appellations given by the Jews to the devil. Maud, step to the library, there, and hand me a work entitled, ‘The Sanctuary and Its Cleansing.’ By the way, Mr. Thoughtful, if you are anxious to investigate the sanctuary question, you should provide yourself with this work. It treats the subject quite exhaustively, and costs but one dollar. It is published at the REVIEW AND HERALD Office, Battle Creek, Mich. I read from page 310:—

“We are not without direct evidence to the same purpose [i. e., that Azazel was one of the names of the devil.] The Hebrew word for scape-goat, as given in the margin of Lev. 16:8, is Azazel. On this verse, Jenks, in his Comprehensive Commentary, remarks: ‘Scape-goat. See different opinions in Bochart. Spencer, after the oldest opinion of the Hebrews and Christians, thinks Azazel is the name of the devil; and so Rosenmüller, whom see.’ The Syriac has, Azail, the angel [strong one], who revolted.” These authorities unmistakably point out Satan. Thus we have the definition of the Scripture term for scape-goat, in two ancient languages, with the oldest opinion of both Hebrews and Christians, in favor of the view that the scape-goat is a type of Satan. Charles Beecher, in “Redeemer and Redeemed,” pp. 67, 68, says: “What goes to confirm this is, that the most ancient paraphrases and translations treat Azazel as a proper name. The Chaldeo paraphrase, and the targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, would certainly have translated it if it was not a proper name, but they do not. The Septuagint, or oldest Greek version, renders it by ἀνάνησις [ἀποποιήσις], a word applied by the Greeks to a malign deity sometimes appeased by sacrifices. Another confirmation is found in the book of Enoch, where the name Azazel, evidently a corruption of Azazel, is given to one of the fallen angels, thus plainly showing what was the prevalent understanding of the Jews at that day.”

“Here follow several pages, in which the author presents numerous additional testimonies bearing upon the same point with those that I have just read; but I will not stop to read them now. You can examine them at your leisure. Those that I have read furnish abundant evidence that Azazel was a name applied to Satan by the Hebrews. The connection in which the word is employed in the account given of the cleansing of the sanctuary as found in the 16th chapter of Leviticus, confirms the opinions of the authorities thus quoted. In the original the preposition (la) is used in connection with both of the goats. On this point Charles Beecher in his work, ‘Redeemer and Redeemed,’ makes an argument which has in it much force. He says: ‘The use of the preposition implies it. The same preposition is used on both lots, La-Yehovah, La-Azazel; and if the one indicates a person, it seems natural the other should, especially considering the act of casting lots. If one is for Jehovah, the other would seem for some other person or being; not one for Jehovah, and the other for the goat itself.’”

Maud.—“I never knew, father, that Henry Ward Beecher was thought to be much of a theologian.”

Mr. B.—“You mistake, my daughter; it is not from Henry Ward Beecher's writings, but from those of his brother Charles, that I have quoted. Besides, if Henry Ward himself should happen to reason soundly upon a given point, we should be willing to give him credit, and accept his conclusions as readily as we would those of a man who was proverbially logical in his turn of mind and sound in his theology.”

“But to return to the subject. We have now seen that the scape-goat was a type of Satan. The next thing in order is that of locating the time at which he will stand related to the sanctuary work in heaven as the scape-goat did, on the day of atonement, to that on the earth. No; I misspoke myself; we have already located the time of that event at the close of probation; what we want now is to find, if possible, some prophetic occurrence in the Scriptures that will confirm the theory that Satan will at the proper time experience a fate which would have been properly set forth by the type of the scape-goat. I read Rev. 20:1-3: 'And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled; after that he must be loosed a little season.'

"In the next verse the Revelator says: 'And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was unto given them.' This verse associated the binding of Satan with the Judgment; since, taken in the connection in which it stands, it proves that it was taking place at or about the time that the angel bound the dragon with a chain; but as probation closes with the Judgment, and as Christ will cease to plead his blood at that time, the binding of Satan, chronologically speaking, falls at a point of time that answers exactly to that at which the scape-goat was sent into the wilderness; i. e., immediately after the high priest had presented the blood of the Lord's goat before the ark and the shekinah, the latter representing the presence of God."

Maud. "But what about the wilderness, and the man that led away the scape-goat?"

Mr. B. "So far as the man is concerned, Maud, do you not perceive that the angel in binding Satan and leading him away to cast him into the bottomless pit, fulfills in a very striking manner the type presented by the Hebrew who led away the scape-goat?"

Maud. "Why, yes, sir; I have not thought of that before; but now I see it clearly."

Mr. B. "Enough, then, on that point. Now let me remind you that Paul says that the law had a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, and then I will consider the antitype of the wilderness. If the angel should cast Satan into a 'bottomless pit,' as declared, it would match the type near enough to warrant us in accepting it as its antitype; but I think that the original will do more for us than the King James' version does. Scholars tell us that the Greek word translated 'bottomless pit' signifies an abyss, bottomless, deep, profound. It is the same word which is translated 'deep' in Gen. 1:2. In the 16th chapter of the Revelation there is an account of the seven last plagues, the closing one of which is poured out at the second advent. That plague, through the earthquakes that attend it, leaves the earth in a broken down and desolate condition, resembling in a striking manner the situation in which it was at the time spoken of in Gen. 1:2. At that time, therefore, it would answer to the bottomless pit of Rev. 20:1-3. A wilderness in the Scriptures often means a barren, desolate, and uninhabited region, and would consequently very properly be employed to typify the earth without inhabitants and broken down in structure, as it will be after the coming of Christ. It is the earth in the chaotic condition just spoken of, that I believe is the antitype of the wilderness into which the scape-goat was driven on the day of atonement."

Mr. T. "Let me see if I understand you aright. Do you mean to say that at the coming of Christ the earth will be made desolate, and that Satan will be confined therein, and that this confinement will be the antitype of the scape-goat and the wilderness brought to view in the account of the services of the day of atonement?"

Mr. B. "Exactly so. In the 24th chapter of Isaiah we learn that the earth is to be 'removed as a cottage,' that it is to be 'utterly broken down,' that it is to be 'clean dissolved,' etc. These are but other allusions to the state of the earth for a thousand years after the coming of Christ. This thousand years will fall between the resurrection of the righteous and that of the wicked brought to view in Rev. 20:1-6. During that same thousand years the devil will wander up and down the earth with no one to tempt, and with the prospect before him of terrible judgment for the ruin that he has wrought in this fair world of ours. At the end of the thousand years the wicked will be raised, and he will be loosed for a time, and be allowed to tempt them once more. I read the record of these events from Rev. 20:6-10: 'Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years. And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, and shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle; the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever.'

Mr. T. "Where will the righteous be during the thousand years?"

Mr. B. "In heaven. By reading 1 Thess. 4:16-17 you will learn that they go to heaven at the advent of Christ. Here we must leave the subject until to-morrow evening."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY ELD. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. THOUGHTFUL.—"I enter your room this evening, Mr. Biblist, with no reluctance, I assure you. My mind has been occupied during the whole day with the topic that we had under discussion at our last sitting, and there are several questions that I would like to propound for your solution."

MR. BIBLIST.—"Very good, sir; you can proceed to state your difficulties, and I will remove them if possible."

MR. T.—"There are two that occur to me just now. They are these: 1. What was there in the type of the scape-goat sent into the wilderness to answer to the punishment of Satan in the lake of fire? 2. How do you explain the statement found in Lev. 16: 10 to the effect that the scape-goat was to be used in making 'an atonement'?"

MR. B.—"Well, Mr. T., I will give you credit for searching out two of the most difficult questions that you could have asked in connection with this subject. They are not entirely new to me, however, and I will answer them to you as I did to my own mind when they first suggested themselves to me. It is true that there is nothing in the type that seems to foreshadow the destruction of Satan in the lake of fire. I account for it in this way: The casting of Satan into the lake of fire will take place at the end of the thousand years that will commence with the resurrection of the just at the coming of Christ, and end with the resurrection of the unjust. The cleansing of the most holy place in the heavenly sanctuary closes with the judgment of the righteous at the coming of Christ. It would not have been proper, therefore, that anything should appear in the services connected with the cleansing of the most holy place of the Mosaic tabernacle that would foreshadow events to take place after the closing work in the most holy place in the heavenly temple.

"Let me state it another way: The wicked will have no part in the atonement made by the blood of Christ. You will remember that the sins of penitent confessors alone were carried into the holy place of the tabernacle, and that they alone were atoned for and confessed over the head of the scape-goat. It follows from this that the atoning service in both the earthly and the heavenly sanctuary related to the righteous exclusively. This being true, the atoning service in the heavenly sanctuary will end just before the coming of Christ, since the cases of the saints are decided before that event in order that they may be resurrected or changed when it takes place. In connection with the judging of the saints the case of Satan is brought up. It is decreed that he shall be punished for the sins that he has caused the people of God to commit, and then an angel is commissioned to bind him and lead him away into the desolated earth as soon as it is broken up by the earthquakes of the last days. Subsequently the same angel casts him into the lake of fire; but this event was not shadowed forth in the type because it will not take place in immediate connection with the closing work in the most holy place in the heavenly temple. Do you comprehend the argument, Mr. Thoughtful?"

MR. T.—"I think I do, sir. It is this: The casting of Satan into the lake of fire was not prefigured in the type because it was not to take place in immediate connection with that which the type shadowed forth, that is, the cleansing of the most holy place in the heavenly temple."

MR. B.—"Precisely so, sir. You comprehend my meaning quite fully. Now to your second question. It is said that the scape-goat was to be presented alive before the Lord to make an atonement with him. Mark it. It is not for him (the goat), but with him (the goat) that the atonement was to be made. An atonement is that by which reconciliation is made for sin. We have seen that the scape-goat typified Satan. If, therefore, the atonement was made for the goat, it would imply the salvation of Satan, a thing that is out of the question; but as it is said that the atonement was to be made with the scape-goat, I understand that the expression simply implies that Satan (the antitype of the scape-goat) in some way is to play a part in the scheme for the reconciliation between God and penitent men. That part consists in his suffering in his own person for the sins that he has induced the righteous to commit, and which the high-priest in the typical service confessed over the scape-goat, laying his hands upon his head. It seems therefore, that before God could consistently pardon men for their sins, he felt compelled to insist that Satan, who was a party to man's criminality, should, in the presence of the universe, and in connection with the making of the atonement by Christ, have the sins of the saints rolled back upon his head in so far as he was responsible for them. In other words, that no atonement would have been satisfactory to God that did not involve the punishment of the great deceiver in a manner so public that the people of God would witness his doom, and be most profoundly impressed with the exceeding sinfulness of sin. It is certain that an atonement could not have been made with the scape-goat in the primary sense of that word (that is, a sacrifice for sin); since Paul says in Heb. 9: 22, that "all things are by the law purged with blood, and without shedding of blood is no remission;" and since the scape-goat was not slain. The only remaining sense, therefore, in which an atonement could be made with the scape-goat was that of using the scape-goat as he was used in connection with the services of the day of atonement, to illustrate the fact that Satan would eventually suffer for the sins of the saints as one of the necessary conditions to God's plan of reconciling men to himself. That God had a right to make such a condition, no one can dispute; that it was both just to Satan and instructive to men cannot be denied; that it was very properly made prominent in the services of the typical day of atonement, must be obvious to every one."

Mr. T.—"I thank you for your explanations, Mr. B.; they are quite satisfactory, and now I am more than ever anxious to have you locate the time, if it be possible, when these momentous events are to take place."

Maud.—"That is the way I feel too, father; I wish that you and Mr. T. would be kind enough to avoid these nice points of doctrine, until you have settled the point of time. I have been waiting for that now for two evenings."

Mr. B.—"Be patient, Maud; you should remember that the points we have been examining are important ones, and that it is necessary for every one to consider them carefully before he can become intelligent on the subject of the sanctuary. It is because they are unwilling to do this that so many Seventh-day Adventists are unable either to comprehend or defend the faith of our people on that point. The fact is, to speak plainly, many persons are so lazy mentally that they will not put forth the necessary effort to understand one of the grandest questions in the book of God. It is of but little use to be able to locate the exact time when the great day of atonement was entered upon in heaven, until one can give a good reason for believing that it must have commenced at the date in question."

"But I must enter upon my task. To-night I can do but little more than to lay the foundation for my argument. I wish in the first place to call your attention to the fact that the day of atonement covers a section of the judgment work. It will not take long to do this, as the services performed thereupon related to the confession of sin for the people on the part of Christ before the Father and the pleading of his (Christ's) blood before Him (God) for their final and complete remission."

Mr. T.—"Do you not believe that Christ made an atonement for our sins on the cross?"

Mr. B.—"No, sir, I do not. He died on the cross, thus laying the foundation for the making of the atonement through his blood in the close of the world's history and at the time of the Judgment."

Mr. T.—"But do we not read in Rom. 5: 11 that we have already received the atonement? Yes; here it is: 'And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement.'"

Mr. B.—"Your text would be in point, sir, if it were a correct translation of the original, which it is not. I read from the Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, Article Atonement: 'And as to Rom. 5: 11 it is well known that the original word there used is not atamos, but katallogen, and should have been rendered reconciliation.' In harmony with what I have just read, the New Version reads, 'Through whom we have now received the reconciliation.' Dean Alford's translation has it the same, substantially, as the New Version, 'Through whom we have now received our reconciliation.'"

Mr. T.—"I see that I shall be compelled to surrender my strong text."

Mr. B.—"Yes; and I believe that there is not a passage among those usually employed to prove that the atonement took place at the cross that will justify such a conclusion. The doctrine itself is contrary to reason. When sin is once atoned for, it is fully disposed of, and can never be charged to the account of the offender again. To reason, therefore, that the sins of those who are converted were atoned for on the cross, would be to argue that such persons could not be lost; a doctrine which you as a Methodist, Mr. Thoughtful, will not be very likely to endorse, and one that is contrary to the plain declarations of the Scriptures. Let me read a text on this point. Here it is in Eze. 18: 24: 'But when the righteous turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and doeth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doeth, shall he live? All his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned: in his trespass that he hath trespassed, and in his sin that he hath sinned, in them shall he die.' The class mentioned in this passage are converted men, since they are spoken of as being righteous. It follows, therefore, that converted men can be lost, since those in question died in their sins. But if the atonement was perfected at the cross in an absolute sense, then either a man can be lost after his sins have been atoned for, or else he can be converted without having his sins atoned for, and be lost. Either of these positions is fatal to the doctrine of an atonement completed at the cross; since it would be absurd to reason that there are two classes of converts, the sins of one of which were atoned for at the cross, while those of the other were not atoned for there, and never will be. At your leisure you can read Heb. 6: 4-6, which confirms the doctrine of Eze. 18: 24, or the possibility of a man's becoming a castaway after his conversion.

"Now let us consider the atonement for a moment in the light of the sanctuary question. In its service the sins of the people were confessed and carried, in connection with the blood of the victim that represented Christ, into the first apartment of the sanctuary for 364 days in the year. During this time no final disposition was made of them. They remained under the eye of God, the blood of the victim testifying the penitence of the offender and his faith in Christ. All this time these sins were not atoned for. They stood against the parties who had committed them. On the last day of the year—called by way of distinction, the day of atonement—all these sins were carried into the most holy place by the high priest, confessed again before God, and finally atoned for in figure through the offering of the blood of the Lord's goat and the ceremony of the scape-goat. This, says the 30th verse of Leviticus 16, was done that the people might be cleansed from all their sins before the Lord. It follows, therefore, that they had not been cleansed from the sins that they had confessed, previously to the day of atonement. Having seen that the yearly round of the tabernacle service represented the whole period of probation, we see that the lesson taught by that round of service is simply this: Up to the time of the antitypical day of atonement, sinners will continue to confess their sins before God, pleading in connection with those confessions the shed blood of Christ. When the day of Judgment is reached, Christ, our high priest, will offer before his Father his own blood for the purpose of making an atonement for the sins of his people. Then those sins will be pardoned absolutely, and Satan, the antitypical scape-goat, will have them rolled back upon his head. Previous to this time, confessing sinners had been pardoned conditionally, and the favor of God seemed as the result of faith in Christ and the atonement to be perfected by him in the future. All this while, however, the record of their sins was preserved; and in case they apostatized, they would be punished for those sins in the Judgment—aggravably to Eze. 18: 24—as fully as if they had never repented of them. This is in harmony with Heb. 9: 24-26, where we learn that Christ, unlike the high priest, was to enter into the most holy place but once to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself; not, of course, by sacrificing himself in the most holy place in the heavenly temple, but by presenting there in behalf of his people, the blood that he shed for them on Calvary.

"This is also in harmony with reason; for the plan that men should receive conditional pardon upon repentance, and absolute pardon if faithful, at the Judgment, is much more consistent with wisdom, than that their sins should be atoned for before they were committed and while they were still on probation.

"Now that we have seen that the day of atonement typified a portion of the judgment work in heaven, the next point I wish to make is that the Judgment will commence some little time before the coming of Christ."

Mr. T.—"Why, I supposed that the Judgment would commence after the coming of Christ. Is not that the general view?"

Mr. B.—"Yes, sir; but it is, nevertheless, erroneous. When Christ descends to this earth, he will not raise the dead and then decide whether they belong respectively to the righteous or the wicked; but he will destroy the living wicked, and resurrect the righteous dead out from among the wicked dead. There is the record in 1 Thess. 4: 16, 17: 'For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the cloud to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord.' In the third chapter of Philippians, Paul declared that he was willing to lose all things that he might know Christ and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death; if by any means he might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Paul was not afraid that he would fail altogether of being resurrected. He knew very well that the Lord had promised that all that are in their graves should hear his voice and come forth."

Maud.—"What did he mean, then, father?"

Mr. B.—"I will tell you, Maud. There are to be two resurrections, a thousand years apart; the first will be that of the righteous, the second that of the wicked dead."

Mr. T.—"How do you prove that, sir?"

Mr. B.—"I will prove it, Mr. Thoughtful, by reading to you Rev. 20: 5, 6. Here it is: 'But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years.' You will observe that this passage proves the two things that I have assumed: first, that there are to be two resurrections; secondly, that they are to be a thousand years apart; but I see that our time is up, and I will postpone further consideration of the subject until to-morrow evening."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY ELD. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. BIBLEIST.—“Well, we are all present again, and I will see if Maud can pick up the thread of the argument where we left it last evening, and tell me what I was endeavoring to prove when our interview closed.”

MAUD.—“I think I can do that, sir, without any trouble. You were trying to prove to us that the Judgment will begin before Christ comes, and you had just read several passages for that purpose.”

MR. B.—“Yes. I read 1 Thess. 4:16, 17, and repeated a portion of Phil. 3:10, 11. The first text I adduced in order to demonstrate that the righteous dead will be raised at the very moment when Christ reaches the atmosphere of our earth. The second I brought forward to prove, inferentially, that there are to be two resurrections; one of the righteous at the coming of the Lord—or the same one spoken of in 1 Thess. 4:16, 17—and the other of the wicked, to take place later. By way of confirming my interpretation of Phil. 3:10, 11, I read Rev. 20:5, 6, where it is positively stated that there is to be a first and second resurrection; the first, of the blessed and holy, and the second (a thousand years later), of the wicked dead. Such, I say, was the situation when our conversation closed last evening. The point we were on is a very important one (I mean the point of the two resurrections), and I will add a few more words, although it would seem that Rev. 20:6 should be regarded as conclusive.

“In the expression found in Phil. 3:11, ‘If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead,’ the words translated ‘resurrection of the dead’ are ἐκστασις τῶν νεκρῶν, and should have been translated as they are in the Emphatic Diaglott, ‘Resurrection out of the dead ones.’ It would then read, ‘If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection out of the dead ones.’ Rotherham, in his Emphasized New Testament, gives it thus: ‘If by any means, I may advance into the out-resurrection that from among [the] dead.’ Our Lord has a similar expression in Luke 20:34, 35: ‘And Jesus, answering, said unto them, The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage; but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead (out of dead ones), neither marry, nor are given in marriage.’ You see the bearing of these texts. It is this: If the righteous are to be resurrected out of ‘the dead ones,’ then, of course, ‘the dead ones’ out of whom they will be resurrected, are the masses of the dead, good and bad. But when the righteous are raised up out of that multitude, the wicked dead will be left behind, and this will necessitate a second resurrection; thus confirming the doctrine set forth in Rev. 20:5, 6, and rendering it clear that our interpretation of Phil. 3:10, 11,—i. e., that it teaches that Paul strove that he might have a part in the first resurrection,—is correct.”

MAUD.—“Don’t get the impression, father, that I am getting very anxious again to have you locate immediately the time for the commencement of the Judgment; but really I cannot see what the doctrine of the two resurrections has to do with fixing the time for that event.”

MR. B.—“Nevertheless, Maud, it has very much to do with it, as you will see hereafter. Mr. T., here, like most Christians, locates the Judgment at the coming of Christ. This being true, of course he would not look for that event before the second advent. Now if the Judgment should happen to commence before the latter event, he and his orthodox friends would not be looking for it, and would be liable to be taken by surprise; would they not?

MAUD.—“Yes, sir.”

MR. B.—“Very good. Now what I propose to show by the two resurrections is, that the judgment of the righteous and the separation of the righteous dead from the wicked dead, must take place before the coming of the Lord. It will not need a long argument to do that. We have seen that the resurrection of the righteous dead and the change of the righteous living will occur while the Lord is yet in mid air, and before his feet have touched the earth. In 1 Cor. 15:51, 52, the apostle says: ‘Behold, I show you a mystery: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.’ That which takes place in the ‘twinkling of an eye’ literally consumes no time whatever. Such, however, is not to be the case with the Judgment. Solomon says, ‘There will be a time there [in the Judgment] for every purpose and for every work.’ To suppose that Christ would judge billions of men in a second of time is preposterous. It would be equally so to conclude that he could resurrect the righteous out from among the dead without first deciding that they were righteous. But to decide that they were such, would be at least to commence the work of the Judgment. Agreeably with this thought, we find Christ, as quoted above, speaking of those who should be counted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead." Let me repeat my argument upon the basis of this passage: "To account worthy to obtain the resurrection from the dead," is to judge to be worthy to obtain that resurrection; for "account," in the connection in which it stands, must have substantially the same sense as to judge. But what was the object of the Judgment in question? Why, it was to decide whether the parties under consideration were worthy to be resurrected. How ridiculous, then, it would be to argue that they would be resurrected first, and then judged to see whether they were worthy of that resurrection; that is, of the first resurrection.

"Thus I have proved that the commencement of the Judgment must precede the advent. I have done this by showing, first, that there will be two resurrections a thousand years apart; the first, that of the righteous at the coming of Christ; the second, that of the wicked later on. Secondly, by showing that the righteous are to be decided to be such before their resurrection, and therefore before the coming of Christ. Thirdly, by showing that such a decision before the coming of Christ could not be made without entering upon the Judgment; and therefore, that the Judgment must be inaugurated some little time before the advent. If the foregoing theory were tested by the typical day of atonement brought to view in the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus, it would be found to be correct. That day, as has been seen, covered that portion of the Judgment in which the cases of the righteous will be decided and their sins be blotted out. You will remember that during its hours the people congregated about the tabernacle and knelt in solemn prayer, awaiting the decision of their cases. It is said that on this day their fasting was so severe that they were not allowed to eat anything in the line of food equal in size to a date. Such a position, and such rigorous fasting, betokened their great anxiety in regard to the decision of their cases. But uncertainty in reference to such a decision, implies that when the antitype is reached, probation will not have ended and Christ will not have come. Again: the sacrificing of the bullock and the rams on the day of atonement, for the sins of the high priest and the people, proves that, in the conception of Jehovah, the typical day of atonement represented a period when probation would still continue; else there would be no significance in the offering of victims for the expiation of sins."

Mr. T.—"You do not suppose, Mr. Biblist, that in the antitypical day of atonement, Christ, our high priest, will have any sins of his own to atone for before the Father?"

Mr. B.—"Certainly not, sir. In that particular he will differ from the typical high priest, who was a mere man. It is true, no doubt, however, that the offering of the bullock and the rams on the day of atonement was designed to represent the penitence of the priest and the people for whatever sins they might commit on the day of atonement not otherwise provided for in the scheme adopted. Christ will not plead his blood finally for any man, until that man has by some act expressed a desire to have him do so. If, as we have argued, the day of atonement represented a section of the Judgment, commencing some little time before the close of probation, then during that section of the Judgment thus marked off by, say, some years before the close of probation and during which Christ will be officiating in the most holy place in the heavenly sanctuary, the people of the Lord then living will no doubt be guilty of a variety of sins that it will be necessary for them to confess before Christ can blot them out."

Mr. T.—"Wait, if you please, sir; I do not catch that idea."

Mr. B.—"Perhaps it is a little obscure; let me state it in another form. The Judgment will commence some years before the end of probation and the coming of Christ. During that time the living saints will be liable to commit sins. During that time also, Christ, our high priest, will be confined in his work to the most holy place in the heavenly sanctuary. Judging from the type, he will first occupy himself with the sins of the dead saints, and then, just at the time of his advent, he will examine into the cases of the living saints, taking into consideration the sins that they have committed after the Judgment had commenced. This consideration being completed, and the exact reward of each having been decided upon, he will blot out their sins and shortly after that descend to this earth to translate them, put to death the living wicked, and resurrect the righteous dead."

Mr. T.—"I think I understand you now. You mean to say that the circumstances that offerings were made for the people on the typical day of atonement can be accounted for on the ground that they were designed to cover the sins that they might have committed on that day, and had not therefore been confessed previous to its commencement?"

Mr. B.—"Precisely so, sir."

Mr. T.—"Reasoning from the type to the antitype, you conclude that in the latter Christ will first occupy himself after the commencement of the Judgment with those sins that were confessed before that event (the commencement of the Judgment), and that he will then consider and blot out the sins that his people have confessed while he had been engaged in examining into the record of the dead."

Mr. B.—"That is correct, Mr. Thoughtful, and I wish now to read you a passage that relates to the time in question. Here it is in Rev. 22: 11, 12: 'He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still. And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be.' From this passage it is evident that there is to be a point of time between the deciding of all cases in the Judgment and the coming of Christ. First, the Lord says, 'Let him that is unjust, be unjust still, and him that is holy be holy still,' and then he adds, 'Behold, I come quickly to give my reward,' etc.; hence, as I have just stated, it must be true that a certain period of time will elapse between the fixing of the destiny of every man and the descent of Christ to this earth."

Maud.—"Will the saints know that their cases are decided favorably before Christ comes?"

Mr. B.—"Yes, I suppose they will."

Mr. T.—"Will they not be liable to sin after that event?"

Mr. B.—"Assuredly not; else Christ's words, 'Let him that is holy be holy still,' would not secure the end for which they were uttered."

Maud.—"Why, father, what will keep them from sinning?"

Mr. B.—"I suppose, my daughter, that they will be preserved from sinning by a special exercise of the divine power and grace."

Mr. T.—"I understand that this period of which you speak lies between the close of probation and the coming of the Lord."

Mr. B.—"Yes, sir."

Maud.—"Will the wicked know that they are lost?"

Mr. B.—"Yes, Maud, I suppose that they will. If you will read the 15th and 16th chapters of Revelation, I think you will be satisfied that such is the case. In verse 1 of the former chapter the seven angels who are to pour out the seven last plagues are brought to view. In the 8th verse it says, 'And the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power; and no man was able to enter into the temple, till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled.' By reading the 16th chapter you will learn that the seven plagues are to be poured out upon the last generation of sinners. The seventh plague completes their utter destruction. According to the 8th verse of the 15th chapter quoted above, no person will be able to enter the temple of God while the plagues are being poured out. The declaration that no one will be able to enter the temple during the pouring out of the plagues, was designed to teach that the ministration there will cease during the period covered by the plagues. This implies two things; viz., that judgment will be completed at that time, so far as the righteous are concerned, and that the probation of the wicked will be closed. This must be so because where there is no ministration, of course there can be no service; and where there is no service there can be no forgiveness of sin. Thus we have additional confirmation of the theory advanced heretofore that probation will end before the coming of the Lord."

Mr. T.—"Have you any means of determining just how long before the coming of Christ probation will end?"

Mr. B.—"I do not know that we have. In the 18th chapter of Revelation, Babylon, or the apostate Roman Church, is brought to view. The devotees of that church, according to the 16th chapter of Revelation, are to be the recipients of some of the plagues. In the 8th verse of the 18th chapter of Revelation it is said that the plagues of Babylon 'shall come in one day.' The day spoken of is prophetic time, and therefore represents a year of literal time. From this it is safe to conclude that the plagues will all be poured out in a single year. This being true, no more than a year will elapse between the close of probation and the coming of the Lord, since probation is to end just before the angel having charge of the first plague, pours out his vial."

"But to return to Maud's question respecting the wicked. There are many reasons for believing that they will understand that their doom is sealed. Before the plagues are poured out, mercy will cease to plead, and the Spirit of God will be withdrawn entirely from the unrighteous before that time. It will no longer plead with them, and they will be left very much in the condition of one who has committed the unpardonable sin; i. e., a condition that might be partially described by the language of the apostle found in Heb. 10: 26, 27:

'For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.' In the 24th chapter of Matthew the tribes of the earth, or the wicked, it is said, will mourn when they shall see the sign of the Son of man. In the 6th chapter of Revelation, the same class is spoken of, in connection with the same event, as calling upon the rocks and mountains to fall upon them and hide them. In the 16th chapter of Revelation, when standing in close proximity to the advent, they are represented as 'gnawing their tongues for pain, and blaspheming the God of heaven because of their pains and their sores.' These texts, independently of any other considerations, render it certain that the living wicked at the time of Christ's second coming will be conscious that their destiny has been sealed previously, and that their destruction is at hand. I pray that God may save us from sharing their experience before, or their fate at the second advent. Tomorrow night we will take up the subject again at this point."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY REV. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

Mr. Biblist.—“I presume, Mr. Thoughtful, that you have been meditating through the day somewhat upon that phase of the Judgment question that I presented last evening. I mean that portion of the argument then made that related to the view that the Judgment will commence before the advent. Have you any objections to offer to the positions taken?”

Mr. Thoughtful.—“I do not know that I have, sir. There are some that have suggested themselves to my mind, but upon reflection I have discovered that they were not tenable. I confess, however, that I find it somewhat difficult to give up my preconceived notions upon that point. You know how natural it is, sir, to cling to inherited opinions.”

Mr. B.—“Yes, sir; I am aware that the tendency of which you speak is very strong, and many times proves a great hindrance to progress in the direction of truth. Sometimes, indeed, we meet with individuals who are so completely enslaved by traditional error that no amount of testimony can induce them to believe differently from what their fathers believed.”

“Now that I have referred to the idea that the Judgment will commence before the advent, perhaps I had better advance one or two more arguments which will, I think, settle that doctrine beyond all dispute. In the seventh chapter of Daniel the Judgment work is brought to view. I will commence to read at verse nine: ‘I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; the Judgment was set, and the books were opened. I beheld then because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake: I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame.’”

Maud.—“Why, father, I don't see any sense in the first part of that text which you read. It said ‘the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit.’ I do not see what he could sit upon if the thrones were cast down.”

Mr. B.—“Your criticism is a very just one, my daughter. The difficulty, however, is in our translation of the passage. I had been aware for many years that there was something wrong about our rendering of that text, and being thrown into the society of a gentleman who was a Hebrew by birth and a fair scholar, I requested him to read those verses to me from the Hebrew text, translating them into English. I did not make known the object that I had in view, but to my great satisfaction he read the passage like this: ‘I beheld till the chairs were placed, and the Ancient of days did sit.’ Since then I have looked up the authorities upon the point, and have found that the translation that he gave me was correct.”

Mr. T.—“Now that you speak of that matter, Mr. Biblist, I recollect that a few months ago the same point was brought up in the International Sunday-school lessons and settled about as you have settled it here to-night.”

Mr. B.—“Yes, sir; I remember having seen in those lessons the criticism of which you speak. But we have wandered from the subject, which was the commencement of the Judgment before the advent. In Daniel 7:9-11, just read, the Judgment scene is introduced. There can be no doubt on this point, for it says distinctly in verse ten that ‘the Judgment was set and the books were opened.’ The point to be decided, therefore, is this: Did the Judgment there spoken of commence before or after the coming of Christ? It will not take long to determine this point. There are two facts found in the connection that will decide the matter conclusively. In verse eleven the great and terrible beast mentioned in verses seven and eight is referred to again, and an allusion is made once more to the little horn upon his head that had the ‘eyes of a man and a mouth speaking great things.’ Commentators generally agree that the little horn was a symbol of the papacy, and the beast a symbol of the Roman people or government. Admitting these propositions to be true, we might close our investigation right here; since it was during the existence of the ‘horn’ and that of the inhabitants of the territory once occupied by the Roman government that the books were opened and judgment was entered upon.”

Mr. T.—“I do not discover the proof for that point, sir.”

Mr. B.—“Well, sir, let me see if I cannot make it clear to your mind. In verse ten Daniel informs us, among other things, that he beheld the books open and the Judgment in session. In verse eleven he continues his narration in these words, ‘I beheld then.’ ‘Then’ is an adverb of time, and is equivalent here to the expression, ‘at that time.’ The time referred to was the one at which he saw the Judgment in session; but what attracted his attention just at that point? It was, according to the record, the ‘great words’ spoken by the ‘little horn.’ To re-state the matter, while he was looking intently at the Judgment scene, the little horn commenced to talk so blasphemously that it caused him to withdraw his attention from the Judgment to listen to what the horn was saying at the same time that the Judgment was proceeding. Do you agree with me thus far, Mr. Thoughtful?"

Mr. T.—"Yes, sir; I think I must. Your reasoning seems to demonstrate quite satisfactorily the contemporaneous existence of the horn and the Judgment."

Mr. B.—"Very good, sir. The other point that I made was this: The 'little horn' did, by general agreement, represent the papacy; and it follows, consequently, that the Judgment must begin during the existence of the papacy; for it (the Judgment) was going on when Daniel heard the 'little horn' (the papacy) uttering 'great words.' Do you admit the soundness of the reasoning on the latter point?"

Mr. T.—"I confess that I can detect no flaw in it, sir."

Mr. B.—"Very good, again. Now let me ask you a question: Will either the papacy or the wicked Roman people continue to exist after the coming of Christ?"

Mr. T.—"Certainly not, sir. We read in 2 Thess. 2:8 (if I mistake not) something which bears directly upon this point. Yes, here it is: 'And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming.' The person to whom the title 'that Wicked' is applied in this passage is, I suppose, the pope of Rome; hence it follows that he will be destroyed by the brightness of Christ's coming."

Mr. B.—"Your text is well chosen, and your deduction therefrom is most logical. Now for the other point. If the Judgment is to be going on while the pope of Rome is in existence, and if he (the pope) is to be destroyed by the brightness of Christ's coming—or the refulgent glory of the advent—then the Judgment must commence before the advent."

Mr. T.—"Yes, sir; your inference is fairly drawn from your premises. I have no further objection to offer."

Maud.—"Tell me, father; did not Daniel live about five or six hundred years before Christ, and did not the papacy arise between five and six hundred years after Christ?"

Mr. B.—"Yes, my daughter."

Maud.—"Then how was it possible for Daniel to hear the pope of Rome speak great words?"

Mr. B.—"He heard those words in the Spirit, my child. I mean that he was in vision, and while he was in that condition he seemed to hear the little horn say things which he was actually to say many centuries subsequently to Daniel's time."

Maud.—"Has that prophecy been fulfilled, father?"

Mr. B.—"Yes, Maud; the pope of Rome has fulfilled it in a most remarkable manner in our own generation, as we shall see by and by."

Maud.—"I wish you would tell me all about it now, father."

Mr. B.—"Be patient, Maud; it is better to follow the natural order of the subject than to gratify curiosity at the expense of that order. I have one more point bearing on the commencement of the Judgment that I wish to make before leaving that branch of the subject. In Rev. 14:6-12 we have a prophecy which will be equally useful with that just read from the book of Daniel in proving that the Judgment will precede the advent. In that prophecy three angels are represented as flying in the midst of heaven and delivering solemn messages to the inhabitants of the earth. I will read the language of the first one of the series. Here it is in verses six and seven: 'And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his Judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of water.' After the first angel delivered his message, a second followed, declaring that Babylon had fallen; and a third followed him, warning men against the worship of a certain beast which symbolized papal Rome."

Maud.—"You do not believe, father, that any one ever saw three such angels flying through the sky and delivering such messages."

Mr. B.—"No, Maud, I do not; neither do I think that they ever will; and that is the very point that I wish to make right here. Those angels represented three great religious movements that were to take place at some time in the world's history. That such is the case may be demonstrated from the message of the first angel. It is said of him that 'he had the everlasting gospel to preach to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people.' Angels never have preached and never will preach the gospel to the nations of the earth. Said Christ to his disciples after his resurrection, 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature.' This is the grand commission of the Christian ministry, and covers all time and all places. It follows, therefore, that the angel of Rev. 14:6, 7 is a symbol of a special movement to take place in the church, as the result of which the gospel will be preached with unwonted power in all quarters of the globe. The burden of the church at the time in question will be the proclamation that 'the hour of God's Judgment has come,' since the angel says in so many words, 'Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his Judgment is come.' Now, what we want to ascertain is whether the Judgment proclamation in question will be given to the world in immediate connection with the coming of Christ, or at a point of time antedating that event. To do so will not be difficult.

"After the first angel announces to the world that the hour of God's Judgment has come, the second and third angels make their proclamations to the inhabitants of the earth, and then the second coming of Christ takes place as brought to view in these words found in verse fourteen: 'And I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the Son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle.' Thus it appears that the proclamation of the first angel's message will be separated from the coming of the Lord by a period of time long enough to admit of the giving to the world of the second and third angels' messages. Recollecting that, as before proved, these messages represent religious movements that are to be carried forward by the church, you will see at once that they would require considerable time for their fulfillment.

"Men would not, in the ordinary course of things, come to an agreement in a moment in regard to any great doctrinal points in reference to which they were to enlighten the world. As in the case of the great Reformation of the sixteenth century, the truth would dawn upon their minds by degrees. It would naturally take years for a body of men to be developed who should be sufficiently united upon such an important doctrine, as that of the commencement of the Judgment, for example, to warrant them in giving their views to the world in the form of a proclamation. After the desired unanimity of opinion had been reached, they would then be but just prepared to enter upon the special work of preaching their peculiar views to others. As the field of their operations would cover the habitable globe, it would, under the most favorable circumstances, require years for the performance of their task. But that which is true of the first angel's or Judgment message, would be equally true of the second and third messages. It would take much time to develop them doctrinally; and, after this was done, years would be consumed in carrying them, by the ordinary processes, around the world. In other words, it would be impossible for the prediction respecting the second and third angels' messages to be fulfilled in a brief space of time.

"It is difficult to see how, without the working of a miracle, these proclamations could be made as extensively as the record demands in a period of time much less than half a century; but, if this conclusion be legitimate, then we need not be surprised if we shall find that the time of the commencement of the Judgment and the giving of the first angel's message shall antedate the coming of the Lord by a period of time nearly as great as that covered by the lifetime of a single generation of men.

"Perhaps, Mr. Thoughtful, you can give me a résumé of the reasons that I have offered for believing that the Judgment must antedate the advent. This point is so important that I wish to be certain that you have grasped the argument in its favor."

Mr. T.—"I will try. First, there are to be two resurrections a thousand years apart. The first will occur at the coming of Christ—at the very instant that he descends; but this presupposes an antecedent decision of their cases, or a Judgment, as the Lord would not first resurrect the righteous as such and then hold the Judgment to determine whether they were indeed righteous. Secondly, the seven last plagues are to be poured out before the coming of Christ; but probation will end before that is done, and consequently the destiny of those receiving the plagues, as well as that of those who will not receive them, will be decided before the advent; in other words, they will have been judged before the Lord comes. Thirdly, in the seventh chapter of Daniel, the Judgment is represented as going on while the papacy is still in existence; but as the papacy will be destroyed at the coming of Christ, the Judgment must take place before that event. Fourthly, in the fourteenth chapter of Revelation, three great religious movements are represented as taking place before the coming of the Lord. The first of these is a proclamation by the church to the world that the hour of God's judgment has come. After this proclamation is made, two others are to be given to the world, and then Christ will come; but to carry these last two proclamations around the world would require many years, and, therefore, the session of the Judgment as marked by the giving of the Judgment message must precede the advent by that length of time."

Mr. B.—"A very good recapitulation of the points made, Mr. Thoughtful. To-morrow night we will relieve Maud's patience by entering upon the work of fixing upon the exact year at which the Judgment commenced. I say commenced, because I proposed to prove that it is now going on in heaven."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY REV. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. BIRNIE.—“To-night we are to locate the commencement of the Judgment. It has already been proved that it must take place some years before the coming of Christ. It has been shown also, that the Church will know when the hour of Judgment has been reached, and will make a proclamation of that fact throughout the world. The source from which such information is to be derived by them undoubtedly is the Scriptures. To them, therefore, we will turn and make inquiry for the facts necessary for the building of a correct theory upon this subject. The prophecies furnish the most natural source of information such as we desire. Indeed it is difficult to see how it would be possible to obtain the light for which we are seeking from any other quarter unless it were through special revelation.

“The first prophecy to which I shall refer is found in the 8th chapter of Daniel. I will read the first fourteen verses of the same:

“In the third year of the reign of King Belshazzar a vision appeared unto me, even unto me Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first. And I saw in a vision; and it came to pass, when I saw, that I was at Shushan in the palace, which is in the province of Elam; and I saw in a vision, and I was by the river Ulai. Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and behold, there stood before the river a ram which had two horns: and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great. And as I was considering, behold, an he-goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes. And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power. And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns: and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him: and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand. Therefore the he-goat waxed very great: and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven. And out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land. And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it prospered, and prospered. Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.” Chap. 8: 1-11.

“In what I have read there has been brought before you the vision proper, as seen by Daniel at the time in question. The prophet proceeds to state that he sought for the meaning of the vision, and that the angel Gabriel was commissioned to explain it to him. The latter entered upon his task and presented it until Daniel fainted and fell into a sickness that lasted for some days. When he recovered, according to his own declaration, he was astonished at the vision, and neither he nor any one else understood it.”

Maud.—“But I thought you said, Father, that the angel Gabriel was commanded to make Daniel understand the vision. Why did he not do so?”

Mr. B.—“A very pertinent question, Maud. We must not interpret Daniel to mean that he did not understand any of the vision, for Gabriel explained a portion of it to him quite fully. Doubtless he would have made it all plain to Daniel's comprehension at that time, had not the latter fainted and become incapable of considering the matter further. Gabriel was not reluctant to his duty, however; and, as I propose to show now, discharged it very satisfactorily at a subsequent interview. To do this, it will be necessary first to ascertain just how much of the vision the angel did explain to Daniel before the latter fainted. You will notice that there were four things that were brought prominently to view in the vision given; viz., the ram, the goat, the little horn, and the time for the cleansing of the sanctuary. So far as the first three of these are concerned, Daniel could not have been left in doubt; since the angel told him expressly what they signified. Here are his words:—

“The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia. And the rough goat is the king of Grecia: and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king. Now that being broken, wherein four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power. And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practice, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand.”

“From the foregoing, as remarked above, Daniel must have known that the ram, the goat, and the little horn were symbols of several lines of kings that should succeed each other. He was distinctly informed that the four horns that sprung up on the head of the goat, were four kingdoms that should "stand up out of the nation" symbolized by the goat, or Grecia. He was also informed that the little horn which came out of one of the four horns of the goat, represented a king of "fierce countenance," who would arise in the latter portion of the history of the kingdoms typified by these horns. So far as the sanctuary is concerned, Daniel, being a prophet, must have understood its ordinary signification. There remains, therefore, but the one point of time about which there could have been any serious question in the mind of the seer. To him that point was one of infinite consequence. He very readily perceived that the people of God were to meet with terrible persecution at the hands of the succession of dynasties that had been shown him in vision. How natural, therefore, that he should long to obtain positive information respecting the duration of these calamities! Indeed one of the saints (angels) brought to view in verse thirteen, seems to have appreciated the anxiety of Daniel to know about the length of time covered by the vision, and so he addressed to one of his associates the words: 'How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?' The intensity of the interest with which Daniel must have listened for a reply to this interrogation can well be imagined; but how great must have been his disappointment when it came in the following words: 'Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.' At the first glance it no doubt appeared to him to be both irrelevant and indefinite. What had the cleansing of the sanctuary to do with the termination of the woes of the people of God? Again, of what use was it to state that their persecutions would end at the close of a certain period of time, without assigning the data by which either the commencement or close of that period could be ascertained? Such, we say, were the perplexities under which Daniel probably labored. Under these circumstances it was with the greatest propriety that he declared he was 'astounded at the vision, but none understood it.'

"By way of confirming the correctness of the opinion advanced above, to the effect that it was the question of time in the vision that particularly troubled Daniel, I wish now to call your attention to the next vision the prophet had. It is found in the ninth chapter of his book, and was separated from the vision of the eighth chapter by about fifteen years. The chapter opens with a prayer of Daniel which contains a humble confession of the sins of the Jewish people, and an earnest plea for pardon and restoration. While Daniel was supplicating the divine mercy, Gabriel, the same angel who was instructed to explain to Daniel the vision of the eighth chapter fifteen years previously, descended swiftly from heaven and touched the prophet while engaged in his devotions. Said he to Daniel, 'Thou art greatly beloved, and I have come to give thee skill and understanding, therefore understand the matter and consider the vision.' From these words you readily discern the fact that the angel had in view the communicating to Daniel information respecting some vision that the latter had not fully comprehended. The vision of the eighth chapter being one of that character, and being the last one that had been vouchsafed to the prophet, it is safe to conclude that it must have been the one to which the angel referred. That which confirms this hypothesis, is the circumstance that Gabriel commenced to talk to Daniel immediately about time, the very point in the vision in the eighth chapter on which, as we have seen, he had left him in the dark formerly. 'Seventy weeks,' said he in the commencement of his explanation, 'are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy.' I repeat that the fact that the only point of consequence in the vision of the eighth chapter which Daniel did not understand sufficiently for all practical purposes, was that of time, and that this fact coupled with the circumstance that the angel commenced to talk immediately with Daniel about time as connected with a former vision, renders it quite certain that it was the special mission of Gabriel at the visit in question, to complete the work of making Daniel understand the view given in that chapter; in other words, that it was the special object of Gabriel's return to the earth to explain to Daniel where the twenty-three hundred days would commence and terminate. But if Gabriel did give to Daniel the data that enabled him to fix the beginning and close of the twenty-three hundred days, then we shall be able to find the boundary lines of those days also, since inspiration has recorded the words that passed between the angel and the seer."

Maud.—"I do not see, father, that we should be any nearer the point of locating the time of the commencement of the Judgment than we are now, even if we were able to tell just when the twenty-three hundred days ended."

Mr. B.—"There, my daughter, is where you are very much mistaken, as you will perceive further on. Tell me, if you please, Mr. Thoughtful, what we have already proved that the cleansing of the sanctuary each year among the Jews typical."

Mr. Thoughtful.—"Why, sir, we have seen that it symbolized the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, or the work of the Judgment which is to be entered upon in heaven just before the coming of the Lord."

Mr. B.—"Very true, sir; now, if you please, tell me what is to take place at the end of the twenty-three hundred days spoken of in Daniel 8:14."

Mr. T.—"It is said that the sanctuary will be cleansed at that time."

Mr. B.—"Do you see the connection now, Maud, between the twenty-three hundred days and the Judgment?"

Maud.—"I begin to, sir. You think that the reference to the cleansing of the sanctuary at the end of the twenty-three hundred days is equivalent to a declaration that the Judgment will sit at the end of those days."

Mr. B.—"Exactly so, Maud."

Mr. T.—"How do you know that the allusion is not to the cleansing of the sanctuary otherwise called the Jewish temple?"

Mr. B.—"Your question, Mr. T., cannot be answered in a word. Before disposing of it fully, it will be required that we decide whether the twenty-three hundred days are to be looked upon as literal or as prophetic time."

Maud.—"What do you mean, father, by prophetic time? Are there two kinds of time?"

Mr. B.—"I am somewhat surprised, Maud, that you should ask such a question. You have certainly heard that matter explained many times. However, I will try to make it clear to you now if you have never understood it before. In the symbolic prophecies,—as, for example, those of the books of Daniel and the Revelation,—one thing is frequently taken to represent another. In many instances beasts symbolize earthly governments. Take, for instance, the chapter under consideration, i. e., the eighth of Daniel, in which the ram and the goat in its various phases typify Medo-Persia, Grecia, and Rome. The history of these governments stretches over many centuries. There would, therefore, have been an incongruity in representing the animals that symbolized them as living through all those long ages. To avoid that inconsistency, and to keep up the artificial representation of things, time, I think, was introduced in such a manner as to make a day stand for a year. There would be no impropriety in representing a ram or a goat as living for twenty-three hundred days (about six and a half years), whereas it would be unnatural to attribute to them lives covering twenty-three hundred years and over. Such, I say, may have been the reason why in these prophecies a day represents a year; a week, seven years; a month, thirty years; and a prophetic year, three hundred and sixty literal years."

"Whether I am correct or not in my theory on this point, it is nevertheless a fact that the books of Daniel and the Revelation are, when interpreted agreeably to the view that in them a day is made to stand for a literal year, found to be in harmony with the facts of history; whereas, when otherwise construed, they contradict those facts. This is so obvious to all scholars, that commentators generally are agreed that it is necessary to interpret them in harmony with this principle. Please step to the library, Maud, and hand me a volume entitled, 'Facts for the Times.' Thank you; this is it. I read from p. 52 an extract from the writings of Prof. Stuart: 'It is a singular fact that the great mass of interpreters in the English and American world, have, for many years, been wont to understand the days designated in Daniel and the Apocalypse as the representatives or symbols of years.' I have found it difficult to trace the origin of this general, I might say almost universal, custom.—Hints, p. 77. Again he remarks: 'For a long time these principles have been so current among the expositors of the English and American world, that scarcely a serious attempt to vindicate them has of late been made. They have been regarded as so plain, and so well fortified against all objections, that most expositors have deemed it quite useless even to attempt to defend them.'—Hints, p. 8.

"With the reading of this extract we will close the present interview. I have proved two things this evening, which are of great consequence in fixing the time for the Judgment. The first is that the twenty-three hundred days of Daniel 8:13, 14 are prophetic, and stand for twenty-three hundred literal years; the second is that the termination of those years will reach to the cleansing of the sanctuary, or the point at which the Judgment will commence. To-morrow night it will be in order to show exactly when the twenty-three hundred years commenced and ended."

"By the way, Mr. Thoughtful, I had nearly forgotten to answer your question as to how it could be proved that the sanctuary, that was to be cleansed at the end of the twenty-three hundred days of Daniel 8:13, 14, was the heavenly rather than the earthly sanctuary. You see that by establishing the proposition that the twenty-three hundred days in question represent twenty-three hundred literal years, I have entirely removed your difficulty; for even though we should commence those years at the time at which Daniel had his vision, or in B. C. 555, they would reach many hundred years this side of the point where the Jewish temple was destroyed, never to be built again. In other words, I have proved that the heavenly sanctuary must have been the one to which the angel alluded, as it was the only one that was in existence at the time at which he said that the sanctuary should be cleansed."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY REV. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. BIBLIST.—“In our talk last evening it was demonstrated that the 2300 days of Dan. 8:13, 14 represented a period of time that would close with the opening of the Judgment. By way of confirming that view still further, I wish to show that it is one that agrees with the general scope of the context. To do this, I call attention once more to verses 13 and 14. In the first of these, one saint (angel) is represented as asking another saint, ‘How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?’ Now the obvious signification is this: How long will these persecuting powers, Persia, Grecia, and Rome, be permitted to trample under foot the sanctuary and the host, or people of God? A direct answer to this interrogatory would involve a statement as to when the last of the persecuting powers, i. e., Rome, should cease to oppress the people of God.”

MR. THOUGHTFUL.—“Why do you say that Rome was one of the persecuting powers brought to view in the vision?”

MR. B.—“First, because the little horn which sprang out of one of the four horns of the goat, and finally overtopped them all, reaching even to the stars, could not have met its anti-type in any other power than that of Rome, which finally subdued the four kingdoms into which the Grecian Empire was divided. Secondly, because Rome, in crucifying Jesus Christ, ‘stood up against the Prince of princes’ as it was said; that the little horn would do. Thirdly, because papal Rome will be destroyed, as we have seen, by the brightness of Christ’s coming, thus fulfilling the prediction that the little horn will be ‘broken without hands.’ Fourthly, because in the visions of the second and seventh chapters of Daniel’s prophecies, the Roman power stands related to Persia and Grecia as the little horn is related to them in the eighth chapter, and is represented therein as above all other nations the oppressor of God’s people.”

MR. T.—“Your reasoning is quite satisfactory, so far as Rome is concerned; and now, if you will tell me what is meant by the daily sacrifice, which seems in the thirteenth verse to be connected with the transgression of desolation, I will be greatly obliged.”

MR. B.—“If you will look at your Bible, you will notice that ‘sacrifice’ is a supplied word. Leaving it out, the text would read thus: ‘How long shall be the vision concerning the daily and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot.’ The original word which stands for the one translated ‘daily’ is said by scholars to be equivalent to ‘continual.’ Were it rendered thus, the passage would read, ‘How long shall be the vision concerning the continual, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?’ When thus read it would signify that the people of God were to be trodden under foot by two desolating powers, one called the continual desolation, and the other the transgression of desolation. By the continual desolation it is probable that reference was had to the pagan persecutors of the people of God. By the transgression of desolation was no doubt meant the papal persecutors of the Church of Christ. It is from these two sources that the worshippers of the most high God have received nearly all their persecutions. In Daniel’s day paganism was the prevailing or ‘continual’ occasion of alarm to the Church. In subsequent ages Catholicism superseded paganism in the control of the world and the oppression of God’s people.

“That the daily sacrifice of the Jewish temple worship was not alluded to in the question of the saint, is evident from two facts: First, there was nothing in the vision given that in any way related to the daily sacrifice; and secondly, the taking away of that sacrifice was something that could be accomplished instantly, and therefore required no time whatever.

“But I must return to the consideration of the 2300 days. We have seen that in reply to the question by one of the saints as to how long the vision should be to give the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot by paganism and Catholicism, another saint replied, ‘Unto two thousand and three hundred days, then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.’ Now, if our theory is correct, that the cleansing of the sanctuary is another name for the work of the Judgment, then, in order to give force and point to the reply of the saint in question, it must be shown that the commencement of the Judgment furnishes the boundary line of the persecuting power of the papacy,—the last of the two great forms of false religion which were to oppress the Church of Christ.”

MR. T.—“Can you prove that?”

MR. B.—“Yes, sir. I read from the seventh chapter of Daniel: ‘And he [the papacy] shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hands until a time and times and the dividing of time. But the Judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end.’”

Mr. T.—“That is grand. I never before could see any relevancy between the answer of one of the saints to the question of the other saint. Now I have it. The first saint inquired as to how long the people of God should be subjected to their oppressors, as brought to view in the vision, and the second saint replied virtually that their persecutions would end when the Judgment should sit.”

Mr. B.—“Quite right, sir. Hereafter we will consider in the light of history the accuracy of the answer made. Now we will try again to find the commencement of the 2300 days. You will remember that according to my theory the angel Gabriel, at his second visit to Daniel, undertook to explain to him this very thing. At that time he introduced his remarks by these words: ‘Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people,’ etc. The word in the original which is translated ‘determined’ in our version is nechtak, and properly signifies ‘cut off.’ Gesenius, in his Hebrew Lexicon, defines nechtak as follows: ‘Properly, to cut off; tropically, to divide; and so, to determine, to decree.’ But if the seventy weeks were cut off from something, the next inquiry is, From what were they cut off? To this I reply: They must have been cut off from a period of time longer than that which they represented, and that as the 2300 days of Dan. 8:14 furnishes the only period of that kind that had been introduced to Daniel in the vision in regard to which Gabriel was trying to give him light, it must be that the seventy weeks were cut off or separated from those days, and devoted to the people of Daniel, the Jews. If so, then the seventy weeks would commence with the 2300 days. Again: it would follow that if we could determine the beginning or the end of the seventy weeks we could find the beginning of the 2300 days.”

Mr. T.—“How is that? I do not see how the fixing of the end of the seventy weeks would enable you to find the commencement of the 2300 days.”

Mr. B.—“Permit me to illustrate. Can you tell me, Maud, when the first century from the adoption of our national constitution will end?”

Maud.—“I cannot, sir; because I do not know when it began.”

Mr. B.—“Well, let me see if I can help you. The first seventy-two years of that century ended the same year that the war of the rebellion broke out, or in 1861. Now can you answer my question?”

Maud.—“Yes, sir; I think I can. If the first seventy-two years of the century ended in 1861, all that we have to do is to deduct seventy-two years from 1861 years, and we shall have the time at which the century commenced. Seventy-two subtracted from 1861 leaves 1789. It follows, therefore, from what you have said, that our present constitution must have been adopted in A. D. 1789. Measuring forward one hundred years from that point, it is plain that the first century since the adoption of our constitution will end in A. D. 1889.”

Mr. B.—“Is the conclusion which Maud has reached correct, Mr. Thoughtful?”

Mr. T.—“Yes, sir; she has certainly found the correct date for the adoption of the constitution.”

Mr. B.—“Very good, sir. Now, by applying the same principle to the solution of the problem of the 2300 days, we shall reach results equally reliable. That is, as the seventy weeks commenced with the 2300 days, if we can find the end of the weeks, we certainly can find the commencement of the days from which they were cut off.”

Mr. T.—“Yes, I think you are right there; but how can you determine where the weeks end?”

Mr. B.—“I think that the clue to the ending of the weeks can be discovered in the language of the angel. You will remember that he commenced with the declaration, ‘Seventy weeks are determined [cut off] upon thy people.’ Of course the angel does not mean that at the expiration of the seventy weeks the Jewish people and the city of Jerusalem would cease to exist absolutely; for such a statement would not have been true in fact. Seventy weeks, counting seven days to the week, and allowing each day to represent a literal year, would equal 490 years. But since Daniel’s time over 2,000 years have elapsed, and the Jews still survive. The statement therefore, must have been relative; that is, Gabriel should be understood as meaning that the Hebrew nation at the end of the seventy weeks would cease to be the peculiar people of God, and their holy city cease to enjoy the special honor of being the grand center of their worship. The context harmonizes with this view. The things mentioned as those which were to take place within the seventy weeks are such as transpired at the point of time which marks the passing away of the Jewish and the opening of the Gentile or Christian age, in which there was to be neither Jew nor Greek, Barbarian, Scythian, bond, nor free.

“Let us consider, then. (1) The transgression of the Jews was to be finished within the seventy weeks, i. e., their transgression of the Sinaitic covenant was to be brought to an end by its abolition and the institution of the new covenant. (2) An end was to be made of sin, or more properly, offerings for sin. This was fulfilled in the crucifixion of Christ, who offered himself once for all. (3) Reconciliation was to be made for iniquity; i. e., through the blood of Christ. (4) Everlasting righteousness was to be brought in; i. e., the righteousness which comes through faith in Christ. (5) The vision and the prophecy were to be sealed up or made sure; i. e., those portions of the prophecy which were to be fulfilled during the seventy weeks were of such a nature that they would confirm the accuracy of the prophecy, and throw light upon its significance. (6) The anointing of the most holy was to take place; i. e., Christ, after his resurrection, was to ascend to heaven, anoint the heavenly sanctuary, and enter upon his work as high priest.

"Having seen that the seventy weeks were to cover the period during which the Jews were to be the peculiar people of God in the sense that they were to enjoy certain prerogatives not vouchsafed to the Gentiles, it is now in order to determine when the point of time was reached that they lost those special prerogatives. If we can do that, we shall have found the end of the seventy weeks; for they were to terminate with the coming in of the Gentiles, as before seen.

Mr. T.—"Were not the Jews cast off at the crucifixion?"

Mr. B.—"Theoretically, it would seem that such was the case; but practically speaking, it does not seem to have been true. You are aware that for several years after the crucifixion the apostles gave their exclusive attention to the preaching of the word to their own nation. Even as late as A. D. 41, Peter was called in question for preaching to Cornelius and his Gentile friends. It would seem, however, that in the order of God the work had been actually begun as far back as A. D. 34 or 35, at which time Saul was called and commissioned to carry the gospel to the Gentiles. It is with this event, therefore, that we must terminate the supremacy of the Jews. As remarked above, it is impossible to decide upon the exact date of Saul's call to the ministry. It could not have been far, however, from the close of A. D. 34. Measuring back from that point 400 years, or seventy prophetic weeks, we strike the commencement of B. C. 456, or the end of B. C. 457. That date, therefore, must be about the point where the seventy weeks, or the 490 years, commenced. But as the seventy weeks and the 2300 days began together, the commencement of the 2300 days, like that of the seventy weeks, lay somewhere about the close of, or within, the year 457 B. C. (The exact point within the year I will consider more fully hereafter). Now, remembering that the 2300 days were equal to 2300 years, and having ascertained approximately the point at which those years commenced, it is comparatively easy to determine when they ended. To do this, all that is necessary is to deduct the 456 years which elapsed before the Christian era from the 2300 years, and we shall have as a balance the number of years in this dispensation which must pass before the end of the 2300 years will be reached. Thus, 456 years deducted from 2300 years leave 1844 years; that is, A. D. 1844 was the date at which the 2300 years ended. But as the sanctuary was to be cleansed at the end of the 2300 years, and as we have seen that the cleansing of the sanctuary spoken of in Dan. 8:14 in connection with the 2300 days marks the commencement of the Judgment in heaven, it follows that A. D. 1844 was the year in which that most solemn of all events was inaugurated."

Mr. T.—"You mean to say, then, that the Judgment was entered upon in heaven in A. D. 1844?"

Mr. B.—"Yes, sir; and to-morrow night I will furnish additional proofs on that point."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY REV. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

Mr. BILIST.—“Our interview closed last evening with an effort to locate the termination of the 2300 years of Daniel 8:14. You will remember that, according to the conclusion reached, they must have ended somewhere about the close of A. D. 1844. From the data employed, it was found impossible to locate their expiration to a day. It was made certain that the seventy weeks, which commenced right where the 2300 days began, must have expired when the apostles turned to the Gentiles; but the precise point at which that took place cannot be ascertained from New Testament authority. The conversion of Paul, which marks that event, according to Usher's chronology as found in the margin of our Bibles, is A. D. 35. It will not be claimed by any intelligent person that this date is anything more than an approximation to the true one. For ought that can be shown to the contrary, it may vary several months from the precise point of time at which Saul was converted. If that event took place anywhere from about the middle to the latter part of A. D. 34, it will show that Mr. Usher's date was as nearly accurate as could have been expected under the circumstances. To-night it is my purpose, by another line of testimony, not only to establish the general correctness of the conclusion reached last evening, to the effect that it must have been at sometime in A. D. 34 that the apostle turned to the Gentiles, but also that it was in the autumn of that year that this occurrence took place. To do this I shall employ the words of the angel which are found in immediate connection with those upon which we have based our argument thus far respecting the termination of the 2300 days in 1844. I read Daniel 9:25-27, inclusive:—

“Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks; the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times. And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself; and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week; and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate.”

“Mark the introductory words, ‘Know therefore.’ They connect logically that which follows with that which had gone before. That which had gone before was the statement that seventy weeks were determined upon Daniel's people and upon the city of Jerusalem to accomplish certain purposes. Seventy weeks are equal to 490 years of time. With the 25th verse the angel proceeds to locate the beginning and the end of those weeks more definitely than he had previously done, by giving a connected series of events that should mark certain points along the line of their passage. The first to which he calls attention was the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, which was then in ruins, and its people in captivity at Babylon. The second was the manifestation of the Messiah. The third was the completion of the building of the street and the wall of Jerusalem. The fourth was the cutting off of the Messiah, or the crucifixion of Christ. The fifth was the confirming of the covenant with Christ with many for one week. The sixth was the act by which Christ caused the sacrifice and oblation of the Jewish service to cease in the midst of the week.”

Mr. Thoughtful. “Did you not say, sir, that the events that you have just enumerated were to cover exactly seventy weeks?”

Mr. B.—“Yes, sir; and now I will prove that such is the case. The angel stated that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem there should be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks (or in all, 69 weeks), and then the Messiah should be reached. Subsequently he attributes two acts to the Messiah; viz., The confirming of the covenant with many for one week, and the causing of the sacrifice and the oblation to cease. These events together cover but one week, inasmuch as it is stated that he (Christ) shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease in the midst of the week; i. e., the covenant week. Thus it appears that the 69 weeks from the going forth of the commandment relating to Jerusalem, and the one week devoted to the confirming of the covenant, cover all the events to which the angel assigns definite time. But 69 weeks and one week make 70 weeks.”

Mr. T.—“How do you know that the covenant week followed the 69 weeks?”

Mr. B.—“Why, sir, the 69 weeks only reached to the Messiah, and as the latter could do nothing until after he was manifested, the confirming of the covenant and the causing of the sacrifice and oblation to cease must have followed that event, i. e., they must have taken place in the next or seventieth week."

Maud.—"What difference does it make, anyhow, father, whether the period of which the angel spoke covered 60 or 70 weeks?"

Mr. B.—"Very much, Maud. I am trying to prove that the period of which the angel speaks in the 25th verse is identical with the seventy weeks of the 24th verse. To do this, I have shown that they are of precisely the same length. If I am not correct on that point, my whole argument must fall to the ground. On the other hand, if I am right in that matter, then, as you will see hereafter, I shall be able to confirm, beyond all question, the soundness of the logic employed heretofore in fixing upon the commencement of the seventy weeks of the 24th verse. You will remember that it was by finding the commencement of those weeks that I was enabled to ascertain the end of the 2300 days or years."

"In the 24th verse I found the data which helped me to locate the end of the seventy weeks. This done, I was able to find their beginning by measuring backward 490 years, or the length of time that they covered. In the 25th verse it is very different. There events are brought to view which will furnish the criterion for establishing both the beginning and the end of the weeks. The former is marked by a commandment to restore and build Jerusalem. It is that commandment for which we will now make search. There are four documents which different individuals have put forward as being the commandment in question. I shall select one of them and prove that it is the one that the angel had in view, and then I shall show that the others cannot lay claim to the honor of being mentioned by the angel, as they do not fulfill the required conditions. The particular commandment to which I refer as the genuine one, is found in the 7th chapter of Ezra. It was given by Artaxerxes, king of Persia, in the seventh year of his reign. That year synchronized with B. C. 457, as will be seen from the following extract taken from the Advent Herald :—

"It is by the canon of Ptolemy that the great prophetic period of seventy weeks is fixed. This canon places the seventh year of Artaxerxes in the year B. C. 457; and the accuracy of this canon is demonstrated by the concurrent agreement of more than twenty eclipses. This date we cannot change from B. C. 457, without first demonstrating the inaccuracy of Ptolemy's canon. To do this, it would be necessary to show that the large number of eclipses by which its accuracy has been repeatedly demonstrated have not been correctly computed; and such a result would unsettle every chronological date, and leave the settlement of epochs and the adjustments of eras entirely at the mercy of every dreamer, so that chronology would be of no more value than mere guess-work."

"So far as the character of the decrees found in the 7th of Ezra is concerned, it is everything that could be desired. The angel stated that the one to which he alluded should cover the restoration and building of Jerusalem. This is true of the commandment found in Ezra 7:11-26. I will not read it as a whole, but you can do so at your leisure. It will not be disputed by any one that the decrees of Artaxerxes authorized the rebuilding of Jerusalem. The important question is, Did it meet the other requirement of the prophecy? i. e., did it restore the city? Its rebuilding is one thing, restoration is another and entirely different thing. To restore in the sense of the prophecy would be to make Jerusalem what it was formerly, i. e., the grand center of the Jewish worship. To do this, it was necessary that the kings should recognize the right of the Jews to worship the true God, and to authorize the priesthood to enforce the Mosaic ritual law. To prove that such was done, I will read a verse or two from the decree: 'And thou, Ezra, after the wisdom of thy God, that is in thine hand, set magistrates and judges, which may judge all the people that are beyond the river, all such as know the laws of thy God; and teach ye them that know them not. And whosoever will not do the law of thy God, and the law of the king, let judgment be executed speedily upon him, whether it be unto death, or to banishment, or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment.' You observe that the power conveyed in these verses was ample, as I have before intimated, for the restoration of the Jewish polity."

Mr. T.—"If any one should take the position that the restoration of Jerusalem necessitated its independent existence as a nation, how would you show that such was not the case?"

Mr. B.—"That could be done very easily, sir. The commandment to which the angel referred was to go forth before the manifestation of the Messiah; but the Jewish state never had an independent existence from Daniel's time to that of Christ. If, therefore, the angel had reference to the restoration of the Jewish state to an independent existence, in his language to Daniel, then his words were broken."

"But to return to the work of identifying the commandment of the seventh year of Artaxerxes with that to which the angel alluded. To prove that they were identical, it must be shown that the former was properly related in point of time to the following events: 1. The manifestation of the Messiah; 2. The completion of the street and wall of Jerusalem; 3. The cutting off, or crucifixion, of the Messiah; 4. The ceasing of the sacrifices and oblation in the midst of the week; 5. The confirming of the covenant with many of the Jews for one week. I will consider them in order. The manifestation of the Messiah comes first. There were to be 69 weeks (483 years) from the going forth of the commandment in question to the Messiah the Prince. There is a difference of opinion as to the exact point of time at which Jesus became the Messiah, some claiming that it took place at his birth, others that it occurred at his baptism. That the angel called the infant Saviour 'Christ' at his birth, there can be no dispute. It is also admitted that 'Christ' in the Greek means the same as Messiah, i. e., the anointed one. It will be conceded also that Christ was anointed in a special sense at his baptism. Here is what Peter said about the matter, as recorded in Acts 10: 37, 38: 'That word, I say, ye know, which was published throughout all Judea, and began from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached: how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power; who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with him.'

"I think I can offer three conclusive reasons in support of the theory that the angel had in view that period in the Saviour's life which marked his entry upon his public ministry, and which began at his baptism. First, Jesus was almost entirely unknown to the masses of the Jewish people, and gave few if any signs of his divinity until after his baptism. Secondly, the Jewish priests, who were types of Christ, were not anointed until they were thirty years of age, at which time they entered upon their life-work. Thirdly, the Messiah, as we have seen, was to be manifested at the end of 69 weeks, and to be cut off or crucified in the middle of the seventieth week, or three and a half years later.

"Now it is clear that the angel referred to a point of time when Christ would be publicly proclaimed as the Messiah; but it is a fact, as stated above, that this did not take place until his baptism, up to which time he remained in comparative obscurity. Again, as stated, the Jewish priests were not anointed until they entered upon their special office; but it would follow from this that Jesus, their antitype, should also be anointed when he entered upon his special office; i. e., at thirty years of age, or at the time of his baptism. Once more: as there were to be but three years and a half (half of a week) from the point where the Messiah was to be manifested as such, in the sense of the prophecy, till his crucifixion, the angel could not have dated the Messiahship of Jesus from the time of his birth, since it was separated from his crucifixion by thirty-one years. This last point standing alone should settle the question beyond all controversy that it was not until his baptism that, in the judgment of the angel, our Lord became the Messiah in the full sense of that term."

Mr. T.--"What, then, will you do, sir, with the fact that the angel called him 'Christ' at his birth?"

Mr. B.--"He must have done so by way of anticipation.

"But to return to the subject. The next thing to be considered is the date of our Lord's baptism. I read Luke 3: 21: 'Now when all the people were baptized, it came to pass that Jesus also being baptized, and praying, the heaven was opened. And the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him, and a voice came from heaven, which said, Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased.' Now if you will look at the margins of your Bibles you will see that the date placed opposite to these verses is A. D. 27. Here is an opportunity to test the question whether we have the right commandment, chronologically speaking. If we have, then, according to the prophecy, 69 weeks, or 483 years, must have intervened between its going forth and the baptism of Christ in A. D. 27. Adding 457 years - the time that elapsed from the date of the going forth of the commandment in the seventh year of Artaxerxes till the birth of Christ to the 26 years between the latter event and the commencement of A. D. 27, and we have exactly the required number of years; i. e., 483. But as the decree of Ezra was addressed to those in authority at Jerusalem, and as it took him five months to go from Babylon to Jerusalem, we must date the going forth of the decree from the time that it was placed in the hands of those to whom it was addressed; say in the seventh month of B. C. 457. Seven months of that year, therefore, elapsed before the decree had, in the sense of the prophecy, gone forth. For this reason we must commence to calculate our 483 years from the seventh month of B. C. 457. Should we do so, they would terminate in the seventh month of A. D. 27, or about the point where the baptism of Christ is generally located. Thus it appears that the commandment of the seventh year of Artaxerxes fully meets the conditions of the prophecy, so far as the first test is concerned. At this point we must adjourn for the evening."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

AN IMAGINARY CONVERSATION ON A VERY IMPORTANT THEME.

BY REV. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

MR. BIBLIS:- "Last night, when our interview came to a close, we had located the termination of the sixty-nine weeks in about the middle of A. D. 27, at the baptism of Christ. Can you tell me, Maud, how we happened to fix upon that date for the ending of the weeks?"

MAUD:- "Yes, sir, I think I can. You showed that they commenced with the going forth of a commandment to restore and build Jerusalem given in the seventh year of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, which is found in the seventh chapter of Ezra, and was issued in the middle of B. C. 457. You then proved that sixty-nine weeks, or 483 years, measuring from the middle of B. C. 457, would reach to the middle of A. D. 27, or to our Lord's baptism."

MR. B:- "Very good, so far; but what had the Lord's baptism to do with the matter?"

MAUD:- "Why, the sixty-nine weeks, or 483 years, were to reach to the Messiah, or the Anointed One, and you said that Jesus was not anointed until his baptism."

MR. B:- "Your theory of my argument is correct, Maud; but I doubt whether you could give us the steps by which I reached my conclusions."

MAUD:- "Let me try, father."

MR. B:- "Very well; you may do so."

MAUD:- "You said there were but two opinions on this subject; one was that Jesus was actually the Messiah, or Anointed One, at his birth; the other was that he was not such until his baptism. Then you proved that the latter opinion must be correct, since the angel placed the manifestation of the Messiah but half a week, or three years and a half, before his crucifixion, whereas his birth took place thirty-one years before that event."

MR. B:- "That is superb, Maud; I perceive that you are fully capable, with close attention, of mastering this subject in all of its details."

MR. THOUGHTFUL:- "I am not quite satisfied with the location of our Lord's baptism in A. D. 27. You seem to rely entirely upon Mr. Usher's chronology as given in the margin of our Bibles; at the same time you admit that he is not always exactly correct."

MR. B:- "Well, let me see if I cannot fortify Usher's date somewhat, and thus relieve your mind. I read verses 1-3, inclusive, of the third chapter of Luke's gospel: 'Now in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judaea, and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Ituraea and of the region of Trachonitis, Lymanias the tetrarch of Abilene, Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests, the word of God came unto John, the son of Zacharias, in the wilderness. And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins.' By these verses the commencement of the preaching of John the Baptist is located in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar. This monarch, according to Lardner, Pridenax, Dr. Hales, and others, commenced to reign conjointly with Augustus Caesar two years before the death of the latter, which took place Sept. 27, A. D. 14. Passing backward two years, we reach A. D. 12, the point where, according to the authorities quoted above, the rule of Tiberius commenced. Measuring forward fifteen years, the point where, according to Luke's gospel, John entered upon his special work, we come to Sept. 27, A. D. 27. But Luke says that John began his work in, or during, the fifteenth year of the rule of Tiberius. The middle of that year, therefore, cannot be far from the time at which John entered upon his mission. Measuring backward six months from the close of the fifteenth year of Tiberius, i. e., in the autumn of A. D. 27, we are brought back to the spring of that same year as the point which marks very nearly the entry of John the Baptist upon his ministry. We ascertain from Luke 3:22, 23, that Jesus was about thirty years old when he was baptized and commenced to preach the gospel of the kingdom. That was the age at which the priests generally, at the time in question, entered upon their office. As John was of the priestly line, it is probable that he commenced to baptize and preach at the same age at which the priests entered upon their work, i. e., when he was thirty years old. It is generally agreed that Jesus was six months younger than John. If so, and if John was thirty years old in the spring of A. D. 27, then our Lord must have reached thirty years of age in the autumn of that same year. But as Luke says that Jesus was baptized when he was about thirty years old, then his baptism must have taken place in the autumn of A. D. 27, the very year where Usher locates it, and in the exact season of the year where the sixty-nine weeks, commencing with the date of the decree found in the seventh chapter of Ezra, terminated.

"Now that we have established the accuracy of Mr. Usher's date for the baptism of Christ, I wish to read a passage from the sayings of our Lord by way of confirming the view that the sixty-nine weeks, which were to reach to his public manifestation, terminated at the point at which we have argued that they did."

MAUD:- "Pardon me, father; but I cannot wait to have you do that before I tell you of a discovery that I have just made which, I am sure, upsets your whole argument."

Mr. B.:—"Say on, my daughter, as you seem to have struck something that is very important."

Maud.:—"Now you say that Christ was baptized in A. D. 27; but does not A. D. stand for 'the year of our Lord'?"

Mr. B.:—"Yes, Maud, it is so understood generally."

Maud.:—"Well, then, A. D. 27 would stand for the 27th year from our Lord's birth, would it not?"

Mr. B.:—"By common acceptance it would, Maud."

Maud.:—"Well, if our Lord was baptized in A. D. 27, as you say, then he must have gone forward in that ordinance when he was twenty-seven years old; but Luke says that he was about thirty years old when he was baptized, does he not?"

Mr. B.:—"You will find a statement to that effect in Luke 3:23."

Maud.:—"Well, now, if Luke was right, then you must be wrong; for you differ by three years in regard to our Saviour's baptism."

Mr. B.:—"Your reasoning is very clear, my daughter, and your conclusions would be sound if your premises were well taken. People generally, like yourself, suppose that A. D. 1, as we call it, synchronized with the year of the birth of Jesus. This, however, is a great mistake, and one which scholars universally admit to be such. It is well understood by them that our Lord was born about four years previous to the beginning of our vulgar era. To show that such is the case, I read from the introduction to the gospel of Luke as found in the Revision Commentary: 'The so-called Christian era fixes the year of the Incarnation as that of Rome 754, four years too late.' That Bishop Usher adopted the view that Jesus was born about four years previous to our vulgar era, is evident from the margin of Luke 2:41, where the visit of Jesus to Jerusalem, at the age of twelve years, is put down as occurring in A. D. 8."

"Now that I have answered Maud's objection, I will pick up the thread of my argument where I laid it down. I was about to read a saying of our Lord at his baptism in A. D. 27. Here it is in Mark 1:13-15: 'And he was there in the wilderness forty days, tempted of Satan; and was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered unto him. Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye, and believe the gospel.'

"These words were uttered at the commencement of Christ's ministry and just after his baptism. It is clear from their import that when the Saviour said, 'The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye, and believe the gospel,' he alluded to some period the expiration of which was designed to mark the commencement of the gospel age; otherwise there would be no force in the language. The argument is this: the time for the setting up of the kingdom of God has been reached; consequently the kingdom itself must be at hand; wherefore you should repent and believe the gospel, which is the good news of the establishment of that kingdom. But permit me to inquire of you, Mr. Thoughtful, whether you know of any period of prophetic time, save the sixty-nine weeks, that ended in A. D. 27."

Mr. T.:—"No, sir, I do not. I cannot recall just now any evidence that there is any period, except the one of which you speak, that could by any possibility have been the one to which our Lord referred."

Mr. B.:—"If, then, the sixty-nine weeks did terminate in A. D. 27, and if, as we have seen, they were to reach to the manifestation of the Messiah, then we have a presumption in favor of the hypothesis that they represent the period of time to which the Saviour referred which amounts to demonstration itself. This being true, we have beyond all controversy proved that when we commence to count the seventy weeks from B. C. 457, the time when the decree of Artaxerxes as found in Ezra chapter 7, was issued, it is found that the first condition for the identity of this latter decree with the one which was to mark the beginning of the seventy weeks, is met; i. e., sixty-nine weeks, or 483 years, measuring from the date at which that decree was promulgated, reach to the manifestation of the Messiah."

"The next thing in order is to apply the text respecting the cutting off of the Messiah and the completion of the work of the rebuilding of the street and wall of Jerusalem. From the latter event, the angel said that there would intervene threescore and two weeks, and then the Messiah would be cut off: i. e., crucified. The complete restoration of the city, state, and polity of the Jews was accomplished in B. C. 408, under the reign of Darius Nothus. Sixty-two weeks, 434 years, measuring from that date, would bring us to A. D. 27, the close of the first sixty-nine of the seventy weeks from the going forth of the decree of the seventh chapter of Ezra. This is just as it should be. The angel at this point in the prophecy computed the time by whole weeks. After threescore and two weeks, said he, shall the Messiah be cut off. That is, there shall be sixty-nine complete weeks from the restoration of Jerusalem, and then shall the Messiah be crucified. Those sixty-two weeks ended in A. D. 27. The next week, therefore, and the one in which Christ was to be crucified, would terminate in A. D. 34. This agrees with the facts of history, since Christ was actually crucified, as nearly all will admit, between these two dates."

Mr. T.—“Your reasoning is good, sir, if your premise is correct.”

Mr. B.—“To what premise do you refer?”

Mr. T.—“Why, to the one relating to the completion of the restoration of Jerusalem in A. C. 408, where you commenced to calculate the sixty-two weeks.”

Mr. B.—“Pardon me, sir, if I say that the point of which you speak could hardly be regarded as a premise to my argument. That is nothing here or there, however. In the course of my reasoning I stated that the restoration of Jerusalem was completed in A. C. 408, or in the fifteenth year of Darius Nothus. I will read an extract from Dean Prideaux, which you will find in his ‘Connections,’ vol. I, p. 322: ‘In the fifteenth year of Darius Nothus ended the first seven weeks of Daniel’s prophecy. For then the restoration of the Church and State of the Jews in Jerusalem and Judea was fully finished, in that last act of reformation which is recorded in the thirteenth chapter of Nehemiah, from the twenty-third verse to the end of the chapter, just forty-nine years after it had been commenced by Ezra, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus.’

“Having seen that the decree of the seventh chapter of Ezra is rightly related to the crucifixion of Christ and the restoration of Jerusalem, the next thing to be considered is the ceasing of the sacrifice and the oblation.”

Maud.—“What is meant, further, by the oblation?”

Mr. B.—“An ‘oblation’ was anything offered to the Lord. In the case before us it related to certain offerings provided for in the law of Moses. The sacrifice spoken of in the same connection refers also to the offerings of the Levitical service. When the angel said that ‘he (Christ) should cease the sacrifice and the oblation to cease in the midst of the week,’ he meant to be understood as stating that the Saviour would supersede the offerings provided for in the ceremonial law in the midst (middle) of a certain week. That week we have already proved to be identical with the seventieth week of Dan. 9: 24, 25; in other words, that it was covered by the seven years lying between the autumn of A. D. 27 and that of A. D. 34. The middle of such a week would be located in A. D. 31, or three years and a half from its commencement in A. D. 27. Therefore, if we have found the right decree, it must be shown that the Mosaic law, which enforced the oblations and sacrifices, was made null and void in the middle of the seventieth week, or in the spring of A. D. 31. I need not stop here to argue that the Mosaic sacrifices were all abolished at the very moment when Christ died upon the cross. It was then and there, therefore, that the precise condition of things to which the angel alluded, was fulfilled: i. e. the ‘oblation and sacrifice’ ceased when Christ expired. But when was Christ crucified? I answer, in the spring of A. D. 31; or just three years and a half (half of a prophetic week) from the commencement of his ministry, and just three years and a half from the close of the seventieth week counting from B. C. 457, or the point where the decree given to Ezra was promulgated.

“There is one more point, but it need not occupy more than a moment. I refer to the week during which Christ was to ‘confirm the covenant with many.’ It was to be the seventieth, or last, in the series. It commenced, therefore, in A. D. 27, and ended in A. D. 34. There are two ways of doing any given thing. One is to do it personally, the other is to do it by proxy. General Grant, for example, conquered the Southern Confederacy. This he did without firing a gun himself. He did it, nevertheless; for he directed the soldiers who accomplished the work. So, too, with Christ: he preached to the Jews in person for the first half of the prophetic week in question, and in the latter half he did it through his disciples. You will recall the fact that up to A. D. 34, the end of the seventieth week, the preaching of the gospel was confined to the Hebrews. At that point Paul was converted, and the Gentiles were admitted to the benefits of the gospel.

“Thus it has been proved that the decree given to Ezra in B. C. 457 meets all the conditions necessary to show that it was identical with the one which the angel said should mark the commencement of the seventy weeks, and therefore, of the 2300 days also. First, it authorized the restoration of the Jewish state and polity. Secondly, 483 years from its promulgation reached to the manifestation of the Messiah. Thirdly, measuring backward sixty-two weeks, or 434 years from the date of Christ’s crucifixion, the point is reached where the building of the street and wall of Jerusalem was completed. Fourthly, the sacrifices and oblations of the Mosaic law were abolished by the crucifixion of Christ in A. D. 31, or in the middle of the seventieth week, calculating from B. C. 457, when the decree was issued. Fifthly, Christ and his apostles together devoted the seven years lying between A. D. 27 and A. D. 34 to the preaching of the gospel to the Jews, thus meeting that requirement of the prophecy which declared that he would confirm the covenant with many for one week.

“Here I must close for to-night. It would be a strange coincidence indeed, if we could find a spurious commandment which would meet all of the five conditions which I have just mentioned as those which would necessarily be met by the genuine commandment whenever it should be discovered. Indeed, if the tests applied do not settle the point of identity and prove that the decree of Ezra was the one that the angel had in mind, then I do not see how such a proposition could be proved at all.”

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

BY ELD. W. H. LITTLEJOHN.

A TALK ABOUT THE MILLER MOVEMENT.

MR. BIBLIST.—Our last conversation closed with the conclusion of an argument to prove that the decree for the restoration of Jerusalem, issued in the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and recorded in the 7th chapter of Ezra, was identical with the one to which the angel Gabriel alluded in Dan. 9: 25. It was found that the decree of Artaxerxes met the demands of the case in each of the five points wherein it was necessary that they should agree. The date of the decree of Artaxerxes was found to be about the middle of B. C. 457. As that decree marked the commencement of the seventy weeks, or 490 years, and as the seventy weeks and the 2300 days (2300 years) began at the same point, all that we have to do in order to find the termination of the latter is to measure forward just 2300 years from the autumn of B. C. 457. If you will do so, you will find that they ended in the autumn of A. D. 1844. Thus we are brought a second time to the fall of 1844 as the point where the Judgment commenced. In the first instance we obtained the starting point of the 2300 years by measuring backward 490 years from the point of time when the apostles turned to the Gentiles; in the second case, we located it by identifying the decree of Artaxerxes, given in B. C. 457, with the one which Gabriel evidently intended to indicate as something which would furnish the starting point of both the seventy weeks and the 2300 prophetic days.

"If anything were necessary to make the argument conclusive, it would be found in showing that the three other commandments which have been put forward by different individuals under the plea that one or another of them was that to which Gabriel made reference, could not meet the required conditions; for it is evident that there must be somewhere on record a decree that can be identified with the one pointed out in Dan. 9: 25. But this can be done very easily. Jesus must have become the Christ either at his birth, or at his baptism. If, therefore, any one of the three unexamined decrees was the genuine one, then 483 years, according to Dan. 9: 25, should reach from the time that it was issued to one of those events; for the angel said that from the going forth of the decree which he had in mind, sixty-nine weeks (483 years) should reach to the Messiah the prince. The three decrees in question are, (1) The decree of Cyrus made in B. C. 536, which is found in the first chapter of Ezra; (2) that of Darius, given in B. C. 519, and recorded in Ez. 6; (3) the commission to Nehemiah, given in B. C. 444, and found in Neh. 2. Applying the measuring line to the first of these decrees, you see that it was too early by fifty-three years if we locate the manifestation of the Messiah in A. D. 1, and too early by eighty years if we place it in A. D. 27. Applying the same test to the decree of Darius (B. C. 519), it will be seen that it was too early by thirty-six years if we calculate from the birth of Christ, and by sixty-three years if the count is commenced from his baptism.

"The remaining decree, or rather commission, is that to Nehemiah issued in B. C. 444; but 483 years, if they were calculated from B. C. 444, will extend to A. D. 39; this proving that the commission to Nehemiah was issued too late for our purpose, even when the manifestation of the Messiah is located in A. D. 27.

"Can you tell me, Maud, what I have proved in regard to the decrees of Cyrus and Darius and the commission of Artaxerxes?"

Maud.—"Yes, sir, I think I can. You have shown that the decrees of Cyrus and Darius were issued so early that 483 years, computed from the time when they were made, would not reach even to the birth of Christ by a number of years, while the commission to Nehemiah was issued so late that 483 years would carry us by the baptism of our Lord twelve years."

Mr. B.—"Yes, that is correct. We have tested four documents which comprise everything in that line that can with any degree of consistency be put forward as the commandment to which Gabriel referred; and we have found that the claims of three of them break down at the first trial, while those of the fourth have borne every test which has been applied. Have you detected any flaw in the argument, Mr. Thoughtful?"

Mr. Thoughtful.—"I confess, sir, that I have not, although I have watched it very closely."

Mr. B.—"I might leave the matter right here; but to make certainty doubly sure, I will add something more in the line of confirmatory evidence."

Maud.—"Yes, father; I remember now your promise."

Mr. B.—"What promise, my daughter?"

Maud.—"Why, you said that after you located the time you would tell me all about the great words which Daniel said the 'little horn' would speak between the commencement of the Judgment and the coming of Christ."

Mr. B.—"I had forgotten my promise; but I was about to speak respecting the very point to which you allude, as we have now reached the place for its introduction. You will recollect that the little horn was a type of the papacy. If, therefore, we are now standing in the time of the Judgment, we would naturally expect to find something in the history of the Romish Church answering to the great words which Daniel heard the little horn uttering after the books were opened, and the Judgment was set, but before the advent. In this we shall not be disappointed. You, Mr. Thoughtful, certainly cannot have forgotten the Ecumenical Council of Pope Pius IX. assembled in the city of Rome in A. D. 1869. That body was composed of about seven hundred prelates, who were gathered from all parts of Christendom. There in solemn assembly they insulted the intelligence of the age and blasphemed the God of heaven by passing the decree of papal infallibility. The decree was passed July 21, 1870."

Maud—"What is that, father?"

Mr. B.—"Why, my child, the doctrine of papal infallibility is a belief in the inability of the pope of Rome to err when deciding upon points of faith. Those who advocate it, therefore, practically believe that the pope in the matter in question is equal to the Deity himself. In other words, they hold that in the decision of points of faith his judgment is as reliable as that of Jehovah.

"As I was saying, the Ecumenical Council of 1869 passed the decree of papal infallibility. There were, I think, but two or three bishops who had the courage to stand out against the decision of the body, and thus provoke the displeasure of the pope. The result is that the Romish church has incorporated this most blasphemous doctrine into its creed. The action of the Council, taking place as it did this side of 1844, and shocking as it did the moral sensibilities of the truly Christian world, most strikingly fulfills Dan. 7:9-11.

"Another proof that we have already passed the point where the Judgment commenced, might be drawn from the circumstances connected with the history of the papal church since 1844. In Dan. 7:25, 26, there is a prediction which relates to the history of the papacy immediately after the inauguration of the Judgment in heaven. I read: 'And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time. But the Judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end.' Please mark this language well. There was to be a period of time during which the pope and his church should wear out the saints and oppress the law of God; but that was to be followed by one during which his dominion was to be consumed to the end. This latter period was to begin with the Judgment. Now what are the facts of history in this case? About A. D. 1844 a series of uprisings commenced in Italy, that culminated in the banishment of the pope from Rome. Subsequently he returned to his capital; but from that point forward his history has answered precisely to the announcements of the prophecy. Insurrection has followed insurrection, and revolution has followed revolution, in rapid succession. State after State has been taken from him, till at last the temporal power which enabled him to persecute the saints of God has been utterly taken away, and there is no longer a square rod of land over which he can exercise regal power. This state of things has not been brought about in a moment, but it has been done so gradually, and yet so steadily, that the prophet could hardly have described it more fittingly than in the use of the word consume, which suggests the idea of wasting away. A united Italy and an impotent pope, therefore, furnish another most striking evidence that we stand in the time of the Judgment.

"The next event to which I will call your attention as furnishing external evidence that the Judgment is now in progress, will be drawn from the history of the Protestant world. It is but natural to suppose that the true church on the earth during the time of the Judgment would have an experience appropriate to that most solemn occasion. Indeed, it has already been proved that they would not only be aware of the fact that the Judgment was in session, but also that they would make a solemn announcement to the world to that effect. It follows, therefore, that if the Judgment commenced in heaven in A. D. 1844, we should be able to point to some movement which was going forward at that time in the church on the earth which would answer to the proclamation of a Judgment message."

Mr. T.—"You will excuse me, sir, but really I cannot recall the argument that you made to show that the church would announce to the world the approach of the Judgment."

Mr. B.—"It was thrown in incidentally rather than otherwise, and so I will give it to you again in brief. I read from Rev. 14:6, 7: 'And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his Judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven and earth and the sea and the fountains of waters.' This angel is represented as preaching the gospel in all the world. But angels are not commissioned to preach the gospel. That work was committed to the ministers of Christ, as you will find by reading Mark 16:15, 16. It must be, therefore, that the angel in question merely symbolized the church of Christ. That being true, it follows that the church will at some time preach the gospel with unwonted power in all the earth, enforcing it by the consideration that the Judgment hour has been reached.

In other words, they will at some time announce to mankind, as the angel did that symbolized them, that they should 'fear God and give glory to him, because the hour of his Judgment had come.' They, of course, will do this at the proper time. But, as it has been shown, A. D. 1844 was the precise point at which a Judgment message could properly be given; since it was there that, according to the prophecy, the Judgment was entered upon.

"Returning now to the thread of my argument from which I was diverted by the question of Mr. Thoughtful, I inquire, Was there any considerable movement going forward in A. D. 1844 in connection with which it was proclaimed that the hour of the Judgment had been reached? Perhaps you can answer this question, Mr. Thoughtful."

Mr. T.—"I believe, sir, that the Miller movement occurred about that time. I was a small boy then; but I recollect that there was a great stir in the community where I lived because one of the Millerite ministers, so called, came that way and preached the doctrine that the advent of our Lord was near. I remember as distinctly as though it were but yesterday when I saw them, the charts which the minister used. They were covered with representations of angels and beasts such as are described in the prophecies of Daniel and John. I was not old enough to comprehend the argument of the speaker; but I was very much frightened, because I discovered evidence in the words and looks of the people that satisfied me that they believed that what the speaker said was true. Several times I heard my father and one Deacon Brown talking over the matter by themselves; and they seemed to agree that the preacher had brought forward some pretty strong arguments to prove that the Judgment day was at hand. This alarmed me very much; but I continued to go to meeting every night as long as the preacher remained there, and on every one of those occasions the church was incapable of holding the people who came out to hear the lectures. The excitement continued until the time passed at which the minister said that the world would come to an end, and then all, save a very few, seemed inclined to deny that they ever believed that the end of the world was near at hand. I have not thought much about the matter of late years until our conversation on the prophecies seemed to direct attention to A. D. 1844 as the point where the Judgment ought to commence. Since then, I have queried in my mind whether there could have been any connection between the Miller movement and that event."

Mr. B.—"It was very natural, Mr. Thoughtful, under the circumstances, for you to ask yourself whether the Miller movement was a fulfillment of the prediction found in Rev. 14: 6, 7. I propose to show you in our next talk that the coincidence between the movement in question and the prophecy to which I have alluded is so marked that every candid person, upon reflection, must admit that one cannot but be regarded as the counterpart of the other."

THE TEMPLE IN HEAVEN.

BY ELI. W. LITTLEJOHN.

THE TALK ABOUT THE MILLER MOVEMENT
CONTINUED.The Ascension Robes Scandal Explored.

MR. BIBLIST.—“At the close of our last night's sitting, we had advanced so far in the examination of our subject that the commencement of the Judgment had been located in A. D. 1844, and search was being made for some movement in the church at that time that was of sufficient magnitude and power to answer to the prophecy found in Rev. 14: 6, 7. Upon inquiry, it was found that Mr. Thoughtful in his boyhood days had listened to the preaching of a minister who was connected with what was known as the Miller movement. This man, according to Mr. Thoughtful's account, was a firm believer at that time, in the near coming of the Lord, and unhesitatingly preached that the day of Judgment was at hand. It appears, also, that he was able to present a Scripture argument in support of his theory that carried conviction more or less fully to the majority of minds. Had this man been alone in his work, he could not have fulfilled the requirements of the prophecy. But Mr. Thoughtful states, and history supports him in that statement, that there was at the same time a body of Christians known as the Millerites, who believed and advocated the same views that the preacher in question inculcated. The fact is that he was but the advance courier of an army of spiritual warriors as brave and ardent as himself in the advocacy of the doctrines to which he had given his support. It is worth our while, therefore, to pause and consider the claims of a movement which not only took place at the right time, but was also of the right character, at least in some respects. That the men who were engaged in it were most profoundly sincere, there can be no dispute. It is susceptible of proof that hundreds of them believed so firmly in the approach of the end of all things that, like the disciples of old, they disposed of all that they had, and devoted the proceeds to the propagation of their faith.

“As it regards the extent to which the Judgment message was preached by them and the rapidity with which it went, it may be safely said that it was proclaimed in all the civilized portions of the world, and that it was carried to them in a briefer space of time than any similar proclamation since the days of Christ. To prove this, and to show the spirit of the men who were engaged in the work, I will read an extract or two. Here is one taken from ‘Advent Tracts,’ vol. 2, p. 125, and penned originally by an English writer by the name of Mourant Brock:—

“It is not merely in Great Britain that the expectation of the near return of the Redeemer is entertained, and the voice of warning raised, but also in America, India, and on the continent of Europe. In America about three hundred ministers of the word are thus preaching ‘this gospel of the kingdom,’ while in this country about seven hundred of the Church of England are raising the same cry.

“I read again from an editorial in the Voice of Truth, an Adventist paper published in 1845:

“We are doubtless near that auspicious hour when the harvest of the earth will be reaped as described in Rev. 14: 14-16. The history of God's people in this mortal state, as given in that chapter, before being glorified, is nearly complete. The everlasting gospel, as described in verses 6 and 7, has been preached unto every nation, kindred, tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his Judgment is come; and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters.

No case can be more clearly demonstrated by facts than that this message has been borne to every nation and tongue under heaven, within a few past years, in the preaching of the coming of Christ as near at hand. Through the medium of lectures and publications the sound has gone into all the earth, and the word unto the ends of the world.

“Please note the fact that in what I have read the author claims distinctly for himself and his co-laborers that they are engaged in giving the Judgment message found in Rev. 14: 6, 7, insisting that it has been carried by them into all parts of the world, agreeably to the predictions of that text. We are now furnished with three important facts which afford a basis upon which to rest our conclusions respecting the Miller movement of 1844. First, it arose at a proper time to meet the requirements of a genuine movement of its kind; secondly, it was characterized by that devotion and power which ever marks the special work of the Lord; thirdly, going, as it did, to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people in the civilized portion of the world, it fully met the demands, so far as scope is concerned, of Rev. 14: 6, 7. Should we, under these circumstances, determine that the great Advent movement of 1844 was a counterfeit work, it is difficult to see how the genuine one could ever be identified. Where the specifications of time, character, and extent are fully met, the presumptions are altogether in favor of the genuineness of any movement that can fulfill them. God would never allow his people to be brought into a position where a portion of them were brought in 1844, unless his hand were guiding. To reject at that time the evidences that the hour had been reached for the proclamation of the Judgment message, would have been to deny the plain teachings of the Scripture.

"If you please, step to the door, Maud; some one is ringing the bell."

Maud.—"Father, this is Mr. Clerical; he wishes to see you."

Mr. B.—"Good evening, Mr. Clerical. I am happy to meet you. Be seated, if you please."

Mr. Clerical.—"Thank you, sir, I will shake hands with Mr. Thoughtful before sitting down."

Mr. B.—"I am glad that you have dropped in this evening, Mr. Clerical. I think it is the first time you have ever done me the honor to call."

Mr. C.—"Yes, sir, I think that it is; and to be frank with you, I must say that I should not have called to-night were it not for the purpose of doing my duty to one who is under my pastoral charge. Mr. Thoughtful, here, is a member of my church, and I hear that you have been filling his head with all sorts of heresies respecting the Judgment and the near coming of the Lord. Indeed, I hear, sir, that you have been trying to make him believe that William Miller and his fanatical horde moved out in the order of God in 1844. Now, sir, it seems to me that you should be in better business than trying to deceive people in regard to the true character of such a man as William Miller. I know all about him, sir. He was a poor, ignorant, hair-brained fanatic, who drew after him a crowd of men and women as ignorant and fanatical as himself. I remember the affair very well, sir. When the day came on which the coming of the Lord was expected, hundreds of his silly dupes went out into the grave-yards and upon the tops of houses, and there, arrayed in ascension robes, expected every moment to be caught up into glory. I am surprised that so intelligent a man as Mr. Thoughtful could be entertained with such nonsense as you have been pouring into his ears. I warn him to-night that he will lose his reputation in our church altogether unless he gives up visiting your house from night to night, and listening to these things. Why, only last evening we had a magnificent social at the house of one of the wealthiest families in town, and he could not be induced to attend, because, forsooth, he wanted to listen to a talk from you on the Miller movement. I bid you good night, sir."

Mr. B.—"Do not hurry away, Mr. Clerical. Be seated, sir; he wanted. If these things which you have said about Mr. Miller and his followers are true, I should be glad to know it myself. You have spoken very positively in regard to the character of Mr. Miller and his associates, and now I would like to know all that you can tell me about them. Did you ever see Mr. Miller, sir?"

Mr. C.—"No, sir, I never did."

Mr. B.—"Did you ever hear any minister of his faith preach?"

Mr. C.—"No, sir. I was quite young at that time, and besides, my father was a preacher, and was too sensible a man to allow his children to listen to such an ignorant fanatic as Miller was."

Mr. B.—"Did you ever read any of the writings of Mr. Miller, sir?"

Mr. C.—"No, sir. I doubt whether he knew enough to write anything that would be readable."

Mr. B.—"Notwithstanding your doubts, Mr. Clerical, it is a fact that Mr. Miller was a controversial writer, whose published works have been read quite extensively. Indeed, sir, I feel quite certain that you have misapprehended the character of the man, both as it regards his talent and his spirit. Let me read to you a few sentences from a volume which I have here in my library."

Mr. C.—"Written by one of his followers, I presume?"

Mr. B.—"Not so, sir. The title of the work is, 'Our First Century,' and it was written by R. M. Devens, a gentleman who in no wise sympathized with the doctrines of Adventists. He is a writer of considerable note, having published a life of Washington and one of Wellington, besides several other important works. Here, on page 437, I find something in point:—

"As a man, Mr. Miller is described as strictly temperate in all his habits, devoted in his family and social attachments, and proverbial for his integrity. He was naturally very amiable in his temperament, affable and attentive to all,—a kind-heartedness, simplicity, and power peculiarly original characterizing his manner. He was of about medium stature, a little corpulent; hair, a light, glossy brown; countenance full and round, with a peculiar depth of expression in his blue eye, of shrewdness and love. As a preacher, Mr. Miller was generally spoken of as convincing his hearers of his sincerity, and instructing them by his reasoning and information. All acknowledge that his lectures were replete with useful and interesting matter, showing a knowledge of Scripture extensive and minute, that of the prophecies, especially, being surprisingly familiar; and his application of the great prophecies to the great events which have taken place in the moral and natural world, was, to say the least, ingenious and plausible. There was nothing very peculiar in his manner; his gestures were easy and expressive; his style decorous, simple, natural, and forcible. He was always self-possessed and ready; distinct in his utterances, and frequently quaint in his observations; in the management of his subject, exhibiting much tact, holding frequent colloquies with the objector and inquirer, supplying the questions and answers himself in a very apposite manner; and although grave himself, sometimes producing a smile upon the faces of his auditors.

"Please notice some of the expressions in the selection just read. It says of Mr. Miller, that he was 'strictly temperate in all his habits,' 'devoted in his family and social attachments,' and 'proverbial for his integrity.' These certainly are excellent qualities; but the writer goes still further, and says, 'He was naturally very amiable in his temperament, affable and attentive to all,—a kind-heartedness, simplicity, and power peculiarly original, characterizing his manner. 'Kind-heartedness,' 'simplicity,' 'power,'—these are striking words. The man who possesses these traits of character which they represent, assuredly is no ordinary man; for he has the elements of true greatness. Here is something further on that bears directly upon the point of Mr. Miller's ability: 'Mr. Miller was generally spoken of as convincing his hearers of his sincerity, and instructing them by his reasoning and information. All acknowledge that his lectures were replete with useful and interesting matter, showing a knowledge of Scripture very extensive and minute—that of the prophecies, especially, being surprisingly familiar; and his application of the great prophecies to the great events which have taken place in the moral and natural world, was, to say the least, ingenious and plausible.'"

Mr. C.—"I don't care what Mr. Devens says. I know Mr. Miller was a fool. No man that had good common sense would ever put on a cotton ascension robe, as Mr. Miller and his rabble did, with the expectation of ascending to heaven in it."

Mr. B.—"Well, let us consider the matter calmly, Mr. Clerical. It is of no use to become excited. To my mind, it is evident that a man who, like Mr. Miller, was able to deliver three thousand lectures on the prophecies in ten years, and defend himself in the meantime against the attacks of some of the first scholars of the nation with such manifest success that he was able to gather around him a body of followers numbering scores of thousands, assuredly could have been no idiot. You admit that you did not know Mr. Miller or any of his co-laborers personally; you deny the conclusions reached by a judicious historian; you go against the natural presumptions based upon the inference that marked success won at great odds is a token of decided ability; and for this unusual course the only reason you assign is that Mr. Miller and his associates put on ascension robes for the purpose of ascending in them to meet their Lord. Now, sir, you will pardon me if I say that you, yourself, have been sadly duped if you have accepted as true the idle reports which have been floating about for years respecting the ascension robes alleged to have been worn by Mr. Miller and his followers in 1844.

OUR MEDIATOR.

THE work of Christ as the Saviour of men runs back to the fall of man in Eden. Thus, John says that he is "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." Rev. 13 : 8. It was a settled fact as soon as man fell that Christ would die to redeem the race. From that time forward he has carried upon his heart and mind the burden of a lost world. In the form of an angel he visited the patriarchs and prophets to instruct them in the work of God. See Acts 7 : 37, 38. Paul says that he was with the Israelites in the wilderness. 1 Cor. 10 : 1-4. Peter says that it was Christ who spoke through the old prophets. 1 Pet. 1 : 9, 10. He is said to be the foundation on which the prophets of the old dispensation and the apostles of the new were built. Eph. 2 : 20-22.

Christ is the head of the church (Col. 1 : 18), while the church is his body, and each child of God is a member of that body. 1 Cor. 12 : 26, 27. As the head sympathizes with all the body, with the least member of the body, so Christ feels all the sorrow and suffering of each Christian on earth. He suffers with them. Thus the prophet says, "In all their affliction he was afflicted." Isa. 63 : 9. The Christian need not think he is left alone in his temptations and trials. No, the dear Saviour ~~was~~ feels them all, and his great heart yearns over them. Paul says that Jesus loves the church as a husband loves his own wife.

"For," says he, "we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones." Eph. 5 : 25, 30. What a close relation, then, exists between Christ and his church. How it ought to encourage us when we are tried. Every true child of God is very precious in the eyes of the Saviour. He says that it were better for a man to be drowned in the sea than to offend the humblest one of those who love Jesus. Matt. 18 : 6. His love toward them is expressed in the most tender way and by the most forcible illustrations. He says that as a mother cannot forget her little babe—cannot fail to have compassion on it—so the Lord cannot forget his people, but rather loves them as that mother loves her own dear child. Isa. 49 : 15. Does the Lord mean what he says, and repeats, too, so many times? Can we not believe him and trust in his goodness to us?

Christ gave his life for his people. John 10 : 15. He bought them with his own blood. Acts 20 : 28. Then he ascended to the right hand of God, there to make intercession for all who come unto God by him. 1 Tim. 2 : 5. If we sin, he is our advocate with the Father. 1 John 2 : 1. The high priest in the Mosaic dispensation bore upon his heart the names of all the people when he went in to officiate before God. Ex. 28 : 29, 30. So Christ in heaven now bears on his great divine heart all his children on earth. He mentions each one by name before the Father (Rev. 3 : 5), and intercedes for them with groanings which cannot be uttered. Rom. 8 : 26, 27.

Just what Jesus was while upon earth, just the same he is now in heaven, the same tender-hearted, compassionate, pitying, loving Saviour. His work of suffering for man did not cease when he went to heaven. His heart feels for them as it did while upon earth. He talks about them with the angels; he prays to his Father for them; he sends angels to aid them; he is deeply interested in every plan on earth to carry out his work and bring souls to him. How deeply and how anxiously every true minister feels for the good of his flock. But Christ, the great Shepherd, with his divine heart of love, feels a thousand times more for them. May these thoughts lead us to love him and serve him more earnestly.

D. M. CANRIGHT.

THE MARGIN OF DAN. 8: 14.

BY N. J. BOWERS.

"AND he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed" (margin, "Heb., justified"). We as a people hold that the cleansing of the sanctuary here brought to view, is a work of judgment performed in the true tabernacle in heaven. The marginal translation makes this evident: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be justified." To justify is to make or pronounce just, which is a work of judgment. Any person or thing justified would have a prior work of judgment passed upon him or it. Just before the Lord comes, the following words have their application: "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still [let him remain unjustified, in which condition the Judgment just passed has found him]; and he which is filthy let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous let him be righteous [or justified] still; and he that is holy let him be holy still." Rev. 22: 11.

The sins of the people are in the sanctuary, and it must be justified, or made free from them. This is a work of judgment, as stated above. The types will cast some light on this. The priests served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. Heb. 8: 5. Their work prefigured that of Christ. Chap. 7: 11-15, and elsewhere in Hebrews. That their work was one of cleansing, which was a work of judgment on the great day of atonement, is plain. "And he shall make an atonement for the holy place because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins: and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation, that remaineth among you in the midst of their uncleanness." Lev. 16: 16; see also verse 33.

Here we have a work of atonement made for the holy place because of the sins of the children of Israel, which are called their "uncleanness." The sanctuary is cleansed, or purified (Heb. 9: 23), from these sins. They are removed from it. This is a work of judgment, or justification. "And Aaron shall bear the names of the children of Israel in the breastplate of judgment upon his heart when he goeth into the holy place, for a memorial before the Lord continually. And thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urim and the Thummim; and they shall be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the Lord: and Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually." Ex. 28: 29, 30. The names of the children of Israel, the names of the tribes, were borne in the breastplate of judgment in the holy place. The priests made an atonement for the holy place when the sanctuary was cleansed in this work of atonement. So this was, again, a work of judgment. There may be an allusion in Rev. 3: 5 to the work in Ex. 28: 29. The names of the children of Israel were borne in the breastplate of judgment, upon the heart of the priest when he went into the holy place for a memorial before the Lord. So our great anti-typical High Priest declares to the overcomer: "I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father and before his angels." May the names of all who read this be thus confessed before God.

In Lev. 16: 20 we read: "And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat." May not the reconciling of all things unto Christ, "whether they be things in earth or things in heaven," of Col. 1: 20, refer in part to the closing priestly work of judgment, on the part of our great High Priest in heaven?

As Jesus bears our names upon his great heart of love, as did Aaron the names of ancient Israel "upon the breastplate of judgment," may we prepare ourselves by afflicting our souls, by genuine repentance and a holy character, to stand in the Judgment and to enjoy eternal salvation in the kingdom of God.

RH Sept 15, 1885

Thompson

A SOLEMN THOUGHT.

BY GEORGE THOMPSON.

THERE is no fact more clearly established than that the twenty-three hundred days of Dan. 8 : 14 ended in 1844. To change this date would be to unsettle the chronology of the world, and cast the inhabitants thereof adrift on the trackless ocean of time without chart or compass by which to locate their bearings. At the ending of the twenty-three hundred days the great antitypical day of atonement began,—the foretold Judgment hour, when the cases of all are to be examined and judged according as their works shall be. See Rev. 22 : 12. Daniel beheld the commencement of the Judgment and saw thousand thousands minister unto the Ancient of days, and ten thousand times ten thousand stand before him. Dan. 7 : 10.

For almost forty years this great work in the sanctuary above has been going on ; and commencing at the beginning of this world's history and passing down through each consecutive generation, how far may their investigation have proceeded ! Has it reached the days of Noah ? of Daniel ? of the apostles ? the dark ages ? Luther ? Wesley ? We know not. All we know is that this solemn investigation is being made of all the successive generations of the past, and soon the cases of the living will pass in review before that august assembly. How solemn the thought ! Eternal destinies are being decided. Time carries us on for weal or for woe. Soon we must meet every act of our lives in the Judgment. The mandate will soon echo, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still ; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still ; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still ; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Rev. 22 : 11. The seer of Patmos beheld our time in vision and exclaimed, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." Verse 20. May this be our prayer to-day.

Willow Hill, Ill.

RH April 26, 1887

J. G. Mattison

THE INVESTIGATIVE JUDGMENT.

During the last part of the work of the little horn, when the voice of its great words is heard, and the body of the beast is about to be destroyed, or, in other words, when the power is taken away from the papacy, Judgment is held in heaven. This Judgment is the Investigative Judgment, which precedes the second coming of Christ.

The prophet says: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened." Dan. 7: 9, 10.

The Judgment could not be described in plainer words than these; and the eleventh verse shows, that it is going on at the time when the body of the papal beast is about to be destroyed, while the remains of the former beast, or kingdoms, still continue some time until Christ is revealed. Verse 12. When the time of probation has ended and the Investigative Judgment is finished, Christ has given up his high priestly office and receives the eternal kingdom of the Father. Then the Son of man will be revealed in his glory with all the holy angels, and at last he will receive the earth for an everlasting possession. "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." Dan. 7: 13, 14.

The people and nations which shall serve Christ are the saved of all ages. The Investigative Judgment will decide who out of every generation, from Adam to the last one upon whom judgment shall be passed, shall have part in the immortal kingdom. We need not wonder that such a Judgment should take place. Many have been in the habit of regarding the work of the Investigative Judgment as a transaction that may be finished in twelve hours; that the coming of Christ, the resurrection, the examination of the lives and works of all men, the decision of their fate, and the giving of rewards may all begin in the morning and be finished by sundown. But the Bible teaches no such thing, nor is it reasonable to believe such a statement.

Every earthly tribunal examines the case of the accused, and decides what punishment should be inflicted upon him, before the judgment is finished and executed. The Almighty Judge of all the earth is no less particular and just. He will judge every man according to his works. 2 Cor. 5: 10; Rev. 20: 12. He will let the people speak and come near to judgment. Isa. 41: 1; 48: 20. "He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people." "For God is Judge himself." Ps. 60: 4, 6. He will present before every wicked person their sins, and make it manifest that their punishment is in just proportion to their wickedness. "That every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." 1 Phil. 2: 11. "The salute of God shall execute upon the wicked" the judgment written." Ps. 140: 9. "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." Rev. 20: 12.

These texts prove plainly that the Judgment which shall come upon all men, has previously been written. It is therefore certain that the righteous Judge will closely examine every man's work, and decide his fate accordingly, and he will finally reward or punish every one in harmony with this decision. And just as the salute takes part in the Judgment during the thousand years previous to the second resurrection, that the wicked at the close of the thousand years may receive their proper punishment, so likewise God will hold an Investigative Judgment a short time previous to the resurrection of the righteous, and decide who shall have part in this glorious resurrection, and what reward every man shall receive.

The millions (the Danish and Swedish versions read thousand times thousand) that ministered unto the Ancient of days, and the hundred millions that stood before him, are, no doubt, the holy angels. Dan. 7: 10; Rev. 5: 11. (The last-named text, also, has thousand times thousand in the versions mentioned.) They stand as witnesses in the court. They have been ministering spirits, and have guided the children of God on their journey through life, from the days of Adam to the end of time. Thus they are reliable witnesses. Nothing can be more solemn than the thought that this wonderful work is now going on, and that the last name of the saints will soon be written in the book of life; that the time of probation soon will end, and the eternal Judgment, in which all the children of God shall partake, begin. This work is closely connected with the work of Christ in the Sanctuary, which will be considered hereafter.

THE VISIONS OF DANIEL AND JOHN.

A Brief Exposition of their Testimony relative to the Second Coming of Christ.

BY ELD. J. G. MATTESSON.

PART I—THE VISIONS OF DANIEL.
CHAPTER XI.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.

"And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the Sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8:14.

The doctrine of the Sanctuary is clearly presented in the Bible, and although we have not seen neither can see the heavenly Sanctuary, yet we can obtain a very clear understanding of it by considering the old sanctuary, which was a picture of the true. "For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." Heb. 9:24. "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such a high priest, who is set on the right hand on the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the Sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. 8:1, 2.

The Sanctuary is so very often spoken of in the Bible, that we need not be ignorant on this subject. More than one hundred times we find the word "sanctuary" in the Holy Scriptures. Nine of these speak of the heavenly Sanctuary, and this is also spoken of as the temple of God in heaven, and as the habitation of the Lord. "The Lord shall roar from on high, and utter his voice from his holy habitation." Jer. 23:20. "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament; and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail." Rev. 11:19.

The word "sanctuary" denotes a holy place or the place toward which worship is directed. The Sanctuary is not the earth. "And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them." Ex. 25:8. The Sanctuary is not the church; for the prophet says: "To give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot." Dan. 8:13. The host, or the church, is one thing and the sanctuary another.

The earthly sanctuary was built by the children of Israel. Ex. 25:8, 9. It was built after a pattern. Verses 9, 40. It had two apartments, the holy and the most holy places. The ark and the mercy-seat were brought into the most holy place. Chap. 26:33, 34; Heb. 9:1, 7. The priests officiated in this sanctuary. Ex. 28:43. But in the most holy the high priest could enter only once a year, that is, on the great day of atonement, the tenth day of the seventh month. Heb. 9:6, 7; Lev. 23:27.

The earthly tabernacle was cleansed with blood. Lev. 16. It was destroyed by the Romans A. D. 70, and has never since been built. It was a type or shadow of the Sanctuary of the new covenant, which is in heaven. "A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our Sanctuary." Jer. 17:13. "For he hath looked down from the height of his Sanctuary; from heaven did the Lord behold the earth." Ps. 103:19.

Jesus is high priest, and has become "a minister of the Sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. 8:2. The priests offered gifts according to the law in the earthly sanctuary, and they "served unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Verse 5. The earthly sanctuary was cleansed with blood, and it was also in this respect a shadow of the heavenly, as the apostle testifies: "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." Chap. 9:23, 24.

The heavenly Sanctuary is like the earthly in the following respects: 1. It has a service and a priesthood, but its service is performed by a high priest who cannot die, and his priesthood is not Levitical, but the Melchisedec priesthood. Chap. 8:1-5; 9:24; 10:20. 2. It had two holy places or apartments, the holy and the most holy. Chap. 9:24; Ex. 26:31-36. (Compare these texts with Rev. 4:1, 2, 5; 5:8; 8:2-5; 11:19; 15:5.) 3. It must be cleansed with blood. Dan. 8:14; (This text must necessarily refer to the heavenly Sanctuary, because the earthly was destroyed a long time before the 2,300 years ended.) Heb. 9:11, 12, 23, 24. 4. It contains the law of the testimony of God. Ex. 25:21, 22; Rev. 11:18; 15:5. 5. When the glory of the Lord fills the Sanctuary, the ministration ceases. Ex. 40:34, 35; 1 Kings 8:10, 11; Rev. 15:8.

The testimony was the ten commandments. Ex. 31:18. The tabernacle of the testimony was the sanctuary, or building, wherein these commandments were preserved. Num. 1:50, 61. Consequently the temple or tabernacle of the testimony in heaven can be nothing else than the building wherein the ten commandments are kept, and of this temple the earthly sanctuary was a shadow.

The most holy place was entered only on the great day of atonement. The service performed on that day was called the atonement. To make an atonement for the sanctuary and to cleanse it, denote precisely one and the same thing; to wit, the service of the high priest on the great day of atonement, when he sprinkled blood on and before the mercy-seat, to make an atonement for the sanctuary and for the sins of the people.

From Rev. 15:1 we learn that when the plague threatened by the third angel are poured out, the service in the Sanctuary ceases, and Christ is no longer a high priest, but comes with judgment as King of kings and Lord of lords. Then probation has ceased, and the eternal kingdom begun.

The Bible plainly teaches that the atonement is something different from the sacrifice. It is the ministration of the priest performed in the sanctuary; and the pouring out of the blood of the sacrifice must always precede the atonement.

If the whole congregation of Israel sinned through ignorance, they were to offer a young bullock for a sin-offering, and the elders of the congregation should lay their hands on the head of the bullock before the Lord, and the bullock should be killed before the Lord. Then the priest was to dip his finger in some of the blood, and sprinkle it seven times before the Lord, and make an atonement for them, and then their sins should be forgiven them. Lev. 4:13-30. And if any person became guilty in any sin, and confessed that he had sinned, then the priest was to make an atonement for him for his sin, and it should be forgiven him. Chap. 5:5, 10.

When the priest had in this manner served or made an atonement in the sanctuary through the whole year for the sins of the people, the whole service was finished at the close of the year by making atonement for the sanctuary and for the sins of the people, in the most holy place. "Then shall he kill the goat of the sin-offering, that is for the people, and bring his blood within the veil, and do with that blood as he did with the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it upon the mercy-seat, and before the mercy-seat; and he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins." Chap.

16: 15, 16. "And this shall be a statute forever unto you; that in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month," etc. Verse 25. "And he shall make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, and he shall make an atonement for the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar; and he shall make an atonement for the priests, and for all the people of the congregation." Verse 31.

Christ does not enter the most holy place once every year, but at the close of his high-priestly service in the heavenly Sanctuary he enters the most holy place once for all, and there performs in reality the work which answers to the shadow that was seen in the earthly sanctuary, in the old covenant. Christ and his service in the heavenly Sanctuary constitute the great antitype, which corresponds to the old type.

This is precisely the work which Jesus commenced in 1844, when he closed the door of the holy so that no one can open it, and opened the door to the most holy, which no man can shut. Then he cries unto his people, who in the last days are fighting the fight of faith in great weakness: "I know thy works: behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it: for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name." Rev. 3:8.

From Heb. 9:23 we see plainly that the heavenly Sanctuary at the close of the prophetic days or years will be cleansed in the same sense and in a similar manner to the cleansing that was performed in the earthly sanctuary on the great day of atonement: "It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these."

How long this solemn work will continue in the heavenly temple is not revealed to us, but we see that the corresponding work is carried forward in the earth, while the kingdom of God is preached in the most remote corners of the world, and the last message is sounding with great power. This rejoices our hearts, and with solemn interest we look forward to the time when the high-priestly work of Jesus will be finished and the Lord will come the second time, to take his people unto himself. We long for his appearing, as we lift up our heads and look up, knowing that our redemption is drawing nigh. Luke 21:28.

In connection with the cleansing of the Sanctuary, or the finishing work of Christ as a high priest in the heavenly Sanctuary, the Investigative Judgment is held. Every person who would not afflict himself on the great day of atonement, was to be cut off from his people. Lev. 23:29. So likewise every one who does not humble himself before God and repent of his sins, will be excluded from the first resurrection and eternal life. Thus the Investigative Judgment (Dan. 7:9, 10) is most intimately connected with the atonement and the cleansing of the Sanctuary. May the Lord help us to give heed to these solemn truths, and prepare for the great day of the Lord.

ITEMS OF ADVENT EXPERIENCE DURING THE PAST FIFTY YEARS.—NO. 3.

BY WASHINGTON MORSE.

AFTER the final disappointment in the autumn of 1844, the many thousands who had embraced the message of the close of time and the coming of Christ, were greatly perplexed to understand that wonderful movement. They could not find it in their hearts to renounce it as not in the order of God, and they were certain that they had been sincere in their adherence to the cause they had espoused. It was but natural that the masses should look to those who had been leaders in the work, for a consistent and conclusive explanation of the same, since the great central event that had been predicted, had not occurred. The leaders most keenly realized the situation in which they were placed, and many of them proceeded with diligence and earnest devotion to the task of obtaining the correct solution of the question.

It is not my purpose to consider the various interpretations that were given by different individuals, as time passed on. Suffice it to say, that the explanations were varied, and each new theory advanced had more or less adherents. We were in much the same situation that the disciples were, after Christ's crucifixion and burial. They knew not what to do. Upon one occasion, several of them were together, when Simon Peter said, "I go a fishing;" the others replied, "We also go with thee." And so it was with the disappointed Adventists after the time passed. Some went in one direction, and some in another; some adopted one line of interpretation of the movement and its result, and some another.

But standing forty-four years this side of that memorable date, there is an explanation of that entire movement, that appears to me harmonious, consistent, and conclusive,—an explanation that enables those who passed through that remarkable experience to comply fully with the exhortation of the apostle: "Cast not away therefore your confidence." Heb. 10:35. I fully believe that it is the will of God, that we should not cast away the confidence that was had in that movement by those who were in it; but that we should cherish it, knowing that our work was in the order of God, and that the faith we exemplified, "hath great recompense of reward."

A brief statement of the interpretation that I have referred to, may be of interest at this point, although I doubt not most of the readers of the Review are already familiar with it.

1. In Rev. 10:5, 6, is this testimony: "The angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth lifted up his hand to heaven, and swore by him that liveth forever and ever, who created heaven, and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer." As is the case in several other instances in the Bible, I understand the angel here mentioned, to symbolize a dispensation of God's providence, carried forward in the earth by chosen agents at a particular period of time, for the accomplishment of specific purposes. The work here brought to view, is the proclamation, upon the authority of the Creator himself, that "there should be time no longer." It is susceptible of the clearest demonstration, that prophetic time is here intended. The great Advent movement of 1840-44 was in exact fulfillment of this prophecy. We proclaimed the close of the 2300 prophetic days, this being the longest specified period of prophetic time brought to view in the Scriptures, and a period reaching to a later date than any other that is given. There cannot be found in God's word a period of prophetic time, accompanied by data for ascertaining its beginning and close, that extends this side of 1844. Our proclamation was made upon the authority of the immutable word of God, and stands upon record as the only proclamation of the kind regarding the close of the 2300 days that had been made, up to that time.

2. The angel brought to view in Rev. 14:6, 7, had a world-wide message, "saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come." This was emphatically the burden of our proclamation. We called upon men in a most earnest manner, with a veritable "loud voice," to "fear God," for the time of his judgment would come with the close of the 2300 days. And that was just what did begin then, and what was signified by the cleansing of the sanctuary, in the statement of the angel, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Then commenced the investigative judgment,—the work of examining the cases of all who, since the foundation of the world, have entered the kingdom of grace. This work is for the purpose of ascertaining who of all that vast number are entitled to have their sins blotted out, and their names retained in the Lamb's book of life. This work commenced upon the cases of the dead, and will pass to the living when the cases of the dead are disposed of. It was God's purpose that the world should be warned of the commencement of this great work of judgment, and such a warning had to be given, in order to fulfill the prophecy of Rev. 14:6, 7. It has always been God's plan to warn mankind regarding any great work that is to be accomplished, in which they are concerned.

3. In Dan. 7:9-13, the opening of the investigative judgment is brought to view, and other features are mentioned thus: "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days." By the "Ancient of days," we understand is meant God the Father, who presides during the investigative judgment; and the coming of Christ to him signified the entrance of our Saviour upon his work as our great high priest in the holy of holies of the heavenly sanctuary—the work of cleansing the sanctuary, that commenced in 1844, at the close of the 2300 days. This work of cleansing the sanctuary decides who are to be the subjects of Christ's everlasting kingdom. That is it seen that a literal "coming" of Christ occurred at the close of the prophetic time, just as was preached. The "coming," however, was to the investigative judgment, and not to this earth.

4. In Rev. 14:8 a message is represented as going forth to the world, the burden of, which is, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen." This message was to "follow" the one that proclaimed the hour of God's judgment at hand. By the term "follow,"

I understand is meant that it would be subsequent to, and also that the work here brought to view would cover practically the same territory as that covered by the work previously mentioned. In Rev. 18:1-5, the proclamation of the fall of Babylon is again referred to; and here the exhortation is added, "Come out of her, my people." Precisely such a work as is here indicated, commenced in the early summer of 1844. The preaching of the judgment-hour message and the proclamation of Christ's second advent near, had been going forward for several years, and opportunity had been afforded the world to see that God was in the movement; that he set the seal of his Spirit to it. But the religious world rejected the message, and began to indulge in scoffs, sneers, and jeers at those of their brethren who had embraced it. Within a few months after the cry of "Babylon is fallen, Come out of her my people," commenced, fully 50,000 Advent believers severed their connection with the various religious denominations with which they were connected, and stood a united band on the special doctrines of the close of time and the coming of Christ. Such another proclamation, accompanied by such an exodus from the religious denominations, is not upon record. We affirm that the movement was in the order of God, and in direct fulfillment of prophecy.

5. In the parable of the ten virgins (Matt. 25:1-13), those who went forth to meet the bridegroom are represented as slumbering while the bridegroom tarried. Afterward, a cry was made at midnight, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps." It would be difficult to conceive of a more complete fulfillment of this parable, than was witnessed in the experience of the Advent believers in 1844. By the slumbering, was signified our failure, up to about the middle of the summer of 1844, rightly to comprehend the reckoning of the time. We had computed the time as ending with the close of 1843, Bible reckoning, which was March 21, 1844. It was not until July that we discovered that the decrees to restore and build Jerusalem did not take effect until the autumn of the year of its ruinance, and that consequently the 2300 years would not end until the autumn of 1844. Our eyes had been bidden, that we should not see that point until God's own good time. When we did see it, we made that identical cry, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him." The wonderful awakening that then occurred, the renewed activity with which the Advent believers engaged in their work, was fitly symbolized by the words of the parable, "Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps."

6. The angel whom John saw proclaiming that time should be no longer (Rev. 10:1-6), had in his hand a little book. The one who was represented as receiving the little book from the hand of the angel was told to eat it; and that it should be sweet as honey in his mouth, but very bitter in his belly. Did space permit, I might adduce conclusive evidence, showing that the little book here mentioned was none other than the book of Daniel. It was from that book that we obtained a knowledge of the ending of the 2300 prophetic days, whereby we were led to believe that Christ's coming was to occur in 1844. That doctrine was very precious to us; and the completeness, energy, and devotion with which we espoused the cause, was fitly characterized by the illustration of eating the book. It was bread and meat to our hungry souls, and the joyful anticipations that we experienced could not be better expressed than by the term, "sweet as honey." But when we had fully partaken of that precious experience, there came the disappointment that was indeed "bitter" to our souls. I fully believe that our experience was in exact fulfillment of the prophecy regarding the little book.

With these explanations of the features that I have mentioned, all that pertained to that great movement is easily accounted for. It was necessary that prophecy should be fulfilled. When Christ was making his triumphal entry into Jerusalem, and the disciples began to shout, "Blessed be the king that cometh in the name of the Lord!" the Pharisees wanted them rebuked for making such a disturbance. Christ replied, "If these should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out." Luke 19:37-40. The Lord will see to it, that the inspired predictions of his prophets are all fulfilled. If they are not fulfilled by one agency, he will raise up another.

The fact that Christ's disciples did not understand that he was to be crucified, does not prove that they made a mistake in following him; neither does the fact that we did not perceive the precise nature of the event that was to transpire at the ending of the 2300 years, prove that our work was not of God in proclaiming the end of time and the coming of the Saviour. It must be evident to all candid observers, that had we fully and clearly understood the nature of the event that was to transpire at the close of the time, we could not have gone forward in a manner to fulfill the prophecies. No proclamation, short of the one that was given, could have arrested the attention of the world as it was needful that it should be secured, in view of the importance of the prophetic time that then closed, and the work of the investigative judgment that then commenced.

But those who began the proclamation of the first and second angels' messages—for the great movement of 1840-44 was only the commencement of those proclamations—did not then realize that they were fulfilling prophecy. Had they realized it, their work would have been merely mechanical, devoid of the life and energy that characterized it. Had Christ's disciples realized that they were fulfilling prophecy, they could not have shouted as they did when he made his entry into Jerusalem, riding upon the humble beast. The very fact of our misconceptions in the matters wherein we erred, was in the order of God. Upon no other hypothesis can they be explained. Had we not at first stumbled in computing the time, there could not have been the "Midnight Cry." Had we known the precise nature of the coming of Christ that was to occur at the close of the time, there would have been no disappointment, and Rev. 10: 9, 10, concerning the eating of the little book, the sweetness in the mouth, and the after bitterness, would not have been fulfilled. Had our eyes not been holden from an understanding of the third angel's message of Rev. 14: 9, we never could have begun the proclamation of the first and second. Had we been permitted to read and understand Rev. 10: 11, "Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings," we could not have fulfilled previous portions of the same chapter.

RH Sept 25, 1888

- 3 - W.M.

I bless the Lord that it is not necessary to cast away our confidence in that great movement. We can adopt the language of Peter, "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." 2 Pet. 1: 16. Likewise of 2 Tim. 1: 12: "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day."

Mankato, Minn.

OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY.

LESSON 15.—THE TABERNACLE.

(Sabbath, April 13, 1889.)

INTRODUCTION.—The construction of the tabernacle, as a central place of worship and sacrifice for the Israelites, very naturally followed the proclamation of the divine law, every violation of which constituted some act of sinfulness on the part of the transgressor. It resided on the first day of the second year after the departure from Egypt.

Questions, with Scripture Texts, and Notes.

1. What was the object of the sanctuary which the Lord told the children of Israel to build?

"And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them." Ex. 25:8.

In this text, as in others that mention the building of a house for the Lord, particular stress is laid upon the purpose; viz., that the Lord might dwell among the people. The New Testament idea is that our bodies are the temple of God, and that the work of sanctification should be so full and complete that the Lord may dwell with us continually. In Heb. 3:6 Paul states by what means we may be the house of God; viz., by holding fast "the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end." The Lord wants us to be steadfast; he does not want a dwelling-place for his Spirit that is fickle-minded, and liable to thrust its tenant out at any and all times.

2. Was this an entirely new thought to them?

"Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. The Lord is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation; he is my God, and I will prepare him a habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt him." Ps. 115:1, 2.

What more appropriate sentiment could have been obtained by the children of Israel, after their wonderful deliverance, than to prepare a habitation, an abiding place, for their Deliverer? Hereby was indicated their desire that the Lord would continually abide with them. When we reflect upon God's goodness to us, we should be moved to seek that preparation of heart and life-conduct that will render our whole being a fit temple for the dwelling of God's Holy Spirit.

3. Of what was the frame-work of the tabernacle made?

"And thou shalt make boards for the tabernacle of shittim wood standing up." Ex. 26:15.

4. How many boards were there on each side?

"And thou shalt make the boards for the tabernacle, twenty boards on the south side southward." "And for the second side of the tabernacle on the north side there shall be twenty boards." Verses 18, 20.

5. What were the dimensions of each board?

"Ten cubits shall be the length of a board, and a cubit and a half shall be the breadth of one board." Verse 16.

6. Then what was the length and the height of the tabernacle?

The tabernacle, when constructed according to the Lord's instructions to Moses, was certainly symmetrical in form. May this not suggest to us that the Lord is well pleased to have us develop symmetrical characters, in our endeavors to provide habitations for his Spirit to dwell in? What more praiseworthy efforts can one make in his Christian life, than to seek to ascertain what his idiosyncrasies are,—at least those that are objectionable, —and then strive to eliminate them from his character? The apostle Peter's exhortation is pertinent in this connection: "Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, . . . acceptable to God by Jesus Christ."

1 Peter 2:5. By "lively stones" is meant those that are fitly prepared, and polished so as to be ornamental as well as useful. It is only by the help to be had from Jesus Christ, as the text states, that we may develop symmetrical characters. He was a character perfect in each and every particular.

7. How were these boards kept in an upright position?

"Two knobs shall there be in one board, and in order one shall be under another: thus shall thou make for all the boards of the tabernacle." "And thou shalt make forty sockets of silver under the twenty boards; two sockets under one board for his two knobs, and two sockets under another board for his two knobs." "And thou shalt make bars of shittim wood; five for the boards of the one side of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the other side of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the side of the tabernacle, for the two sides westward. And the middle bar in the midst of the boards shall reach from end to end." Verses 17, 19, 26-28.

8. Describe the west end of the tabernacle.

"And for the sides of the tabernacle westward thou shalt make six boards. And two boards shall thou make for the corners of the tabernacle in the two sides. And they shall be coupled together beneath, and they shall be coupled together above the head of it unto one ring; thus shall it be for them both; they shall be for the two corners. And they shall be eight boards, and their sockets of silver, sixteen sockets; two sockets under one board, and two sockets under another board." Verses 29-35.

9. With what was all the sound-work covered?

"And thou shalt overlay the boards with gold, and make their rings of gold for places for the bars: and thou shalt overlay the bars with gold." Verse 24.

10. How was the east end inclosed?

"And thou shalt make a hanging for the door of the tent, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine-twined linen, wrought with needlework. And thou shalt make for the hanging five pillars of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold, and their hooks shall be of gold: and thou shalt cast five sockets of brass for them." Verses 36, 37.

11. What formed the ceiling of the tabernacle?

"Moreover thou shalt make the tabernacle with ten curtains of fine-twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet: with cherubim of cunning work shalt thou make them." Verse 1; see also verses 2-6.

12. What covering was above this?

"And thou shalt make curtains of goats' hair to be a covering upon the tabernacle: eleven curtains shalt thou make." Verse 7; see also verses 8-13.

13. What further protection did the tabernacle have above?

"And thou shalt make a covering for the tent of rams' skins dyed red, and a covering above of badgers' skins." Verse 14.

14. How many apartments were there in the tabernacle? what were they called? and how were they separated?

"And thou shalt make a veil of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine-twined linen of cunning work: with cherubims shall it be made: and thou shalt hang it upon four pillars of shittim wood overlaid with gold: their hooks shall be of gold, upon the four sockets of silver. And thou shalt hang up the veil under the inches, that thou mayest bring in thither within the veil the ark of the testimony: and the veil shall divide unto you between the holy place and the most holy." Verses 31-33.

13. How was Moses guided in building this tabernacle?

"And let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them. According to all that I show thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it." Ex. 25:8, 9.

In the Lord's instruction relative to the construction of the ancient tabernacle, may be discovered a general principle that holds good in the erection of churches, and the preparation of places of worship. Great care was required in the construction and finishing of the tabernacle, and its ornamentation was quite elaborate. While discretion and consistency should always prevail, we should ever be thoughtful in this matter, and not suffer places dedicated to the worship of God to appear untidy, or neglect to keep them in proper repair. It is nothing less than a mark of disrespect to God himself, to be negligent in this matter.

14. Was this tabernacle the real dwelling place of God?

"But will God indeed dwell on the earth? behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded." 1 Kings 8:27.

"Howbeit the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands; as saith the prophet, Heaven is my throne, and earth is my footstool: what house will ye build me? saith the Lord: or what is the place of my rest?" Acts 7:48, 49.

"Thus saith the Lord, 'The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool: where is the house that ye build unto me? and where is the place of my rest? For all these things hath mine hand made, and all those things have been, saith the Lord: but to this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word.'" Isa. 66:1, 2.

The meaning of both Solomon and Stephen in the texts here given, says Dr. Clarke, is that "the majesty of God could not be contained, not even in the whole vortex of nature; much less in any temple which human hands could erect." God dwelt among the Hebrews by a visible symbol of his majesty, in the form of the cherubim above the mercy seat.

15. What were these "holy places" which Moses made?

"It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these. For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." Heb. 9:23, 24.

16. Then where are the true holy places?

17. Is there a real sanctuary, a special dwelling-place, for God in heaven?

"Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such a high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. 8:1, 2.

"The Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven: his eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men." Ps. 11:4.

"And hearken thou to the supplication of thy servant, and of thy people Israel, when they shall pray toward this place: and hear thou in heaven thy dwelling place: and when thou hearest, forgive." 1 Kings 8:30.

20. In the type, what were pictured on all the curtains within?

"Moreover thou shalt make the tabernacle with ten curtains of fine-twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet: with cherubims of cunning work shalt thou make them." "And thou shalt make a veil of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine-twined linen of cunning work: with cherubims shalt thou make it." Ex. 26:1, 31.

21. What were these to represent in the reality?

"And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne and the beasts and the elders: and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands." Rev. 5:11.

22. For what purpose are these angels round about the throne of God in the heavenly sanctuary?

"The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all. Unless the Lord, ye his angels, that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word." Ps. 103:19, 20.

"Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" Heb. 1:14.

"And I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened." Dan. 7:9, 10.

OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY.

LESSON 16.—THE ARK—ITS USE AND SIGNIFICANCE. (Sabbath, April 20, 1889.)

INTRODUCTION.—This lesson is a direct continuation of the subject of the preceding.

Questions, with Scripture Texts, and Notes.

1. Name the articles of furniture that were in the tabernacle.

"And they shall make an ark of shittim wood: two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof." "Thou shalt also make a table of shittim wood: two cubits shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof." "And thou shalt make a candlestick of pure gold: of beaten work shall the candlestick be made: his shaft, and his branches, his bowls, his knops, and his flowers, shall be of the same." Ex. 25:10, 23, 31.

2. According to what were they fashioned?

"And look that thou make them after their pattern, which was showed thee in the mount." Ex. 25:40.

3. Of what were they representations?

"Moreover he sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry. And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission. It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these." Heb. 9:21-23.

4. Have any of these articles been seen in the true tabernacle in heaven?

"And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament: and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail." Rev. 11:19.

"And I turned to see the voice that spake with me. And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks." Chap. 1:12. "And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne." Chap. 8:3.

B. Describe the ark.

"And they shall make an ark of shittim wood: two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof. And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, within and without shalt thou overlay it, and shalt make upon it a crown of gold round about. And thou shalt cast four rings of gold for it, and put them in the four corners thereof; and two rings shall be in the one side of it, and two rings in the other side of it." Ex. 25:10-19.

6. Tell what the covering of the ark was called, and describe it.

"And thou shalt make a mercy-seat of pure gold: two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof." "And thou shalt put the mercy-seat above upon the ark; and in the ark thou shalt put the testimony that I shall give thee." Verses 17, 21, first part.

7. What was upon the mercy-seat, or cover of the ark?

"And thou shalt make two cherubims of gold, of beaten work shalt thou make them, in the two ends of the mercy-seat. And make one cherub on the one end, and the other cherub on the other end: even of the mercy-seat shall ye make the cherubims on the two ends thereof. And the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy-seat with their wings, and their faces shall look one to another; toward the mercy-seat shall the faces of the cherubims be." Verses 18-20.

8. In what part of this tabernacle was God's presence specially manifested?

"And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy-seat, from between the two cherubims which are upon the ark of the testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel." Verse 22.

"And when Moses was gone into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with him, then he heard the voice of one speaking unto him from off the mercy-seat that was upon the ark of testimony, from between the two cherubims: and he spake unto him." "And the Lord spake unto Moses." Num. 7:89; 8:1.

9. What do we read of the real throne of God?

"The Lord is in his holy temple, the Lord's throne is in heaven: his eyes behold, his eyelids try, the children of men." Ps. 11:4.

"The Lord reigneth; let the people tremble: he sitteth between the cherubims; let the earth be moved." Ps. 99:1; see also Ezekiel 1.

10. Since the tabernacle was a figure of the true sanctuary in heaven, what must have been signified by the ark with its covering, from which God spake? Ans.—The throne of God in heaven.

"The cover of this sacred chest [the ark] was the mercy-seat, made of solid gold. On each end of the mercy-seat was fixed a cherub of pure, solid gold. Their faces were turned towards each other, and were looking reverentially downward toward the mercy-seat; which represents all the heavenly angels looking with interest and reverence to the law of God deposited in the ark in the heavenly sanctuary. . . . The ark of the earthly sanctuary was the pattern of the true ark in heaven. There, beside the heavenly ark, stand living angels, at either end of the ark, each with one wing overshadowing the mercy-seat, and stretching forth on high, while the other wings are folded over their forms, in token of reverence and humility."—Great Controversy, Vol. I.

11. What was placed in the ark in the earthly sanctuary?

"And thou shalt put into the ark the testimony which I shall give thee." "And thou shalt put the mercy-seat above upon the ark; and in the ark thou shalt put the testimony that I shall give thee." Ex. 25:10, 21.

"And he wrote on the tables, according to the first writing, the ten commandments, which the Lord spake unto you in the mount out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly; and the Lord gave them unto me. And I turned myself and came down from the mount, and put the tables to the ark which I had made; and there they be, as the Lord commanded me." Deut. 10:4, 5.

12. Remembering that everything about the earthly sanctuary was a representation of things in the heavens, what must we conclude from the fact that the tables containing the ten commandments were placed in the ark, from above which God spake? Ans.—That the law of God—the ten commandments—is underneath the throne of God in heaven.

13. What statements have we to this effect?

"Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne: mercy and truth shall go before thy face." Ps. 89:14.

"Clouds and darkness are round about him: righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." Ps. 97:2.

In the Hebrew translation of the Old Testament

RH Apr 9, 1889

-2- Bible Study

Scriptures, the most accurate, probably, of any translation of the original Hebrew, the words "prop" and "support" are used in place of the word "habitation" in the King James Version. The Revised Version uses the word "foundation" in the same place. The language appears to be figurative rather than literal.

14. What are the commandments of God declared to be?

"My tongue shall speak of thy word: for all thy commandments are righteousness." Ps. 119:173.

15. Whose righteousness are they?

"Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath: for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner: but my salvation shall be forever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished. Hearken unto me, ye that know righteousness, the people in whose heart is my law; fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their reviling." Isa. 61:8, 7.

16. Since the law of God is the foundation of his throne, how enduring must it be?

"Thy mercy, O Lord, is in the heavens; and thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds. Thy righteousness is like the great mountains; thy judgments are a great deep: O Lord, thou preservest man and beast." Ps. 36:5, 6.

"The works of his hands are verily and judgment; all his commandments are sure. They stand fast forever and ever, and are done in truth and uprightness." Ps. 111:7, 8.

"Thy word is true from the beginning: and every one of thy righteous judgments endureth forever." Ps. 119:160.

17. To what would the abolition of the law of God be equivalent? Ans.—To the overthrow of the government of God.

18. Then is it conceivable that the law can be abolished or changed?

It is absolutely inconceivable that the law of God should be abolished, or changed in the slightest particular. It is the righteousness of God, and that cannot be different from what it is. It is his will, and God changes not. It is the foundation of his throne, his government; and that cannot change, because he is "from everlasting to everlasting." There is just one thing that the Bible declares that God cannot do: "He cannot deny himself." He cannot be other than he is. And so it is absolutely impossible for the omnipotent God himself to change or abrogate his law, for in so doing he would deny himself; he would change his character, his will, and his government, and would cease to be God. But this is inconceivable; and so we repeat that it is absolutely inconceivable that the law of God should be abolished or changed.

BIBLE READING ON THE SANCTUARY.

What the Sanctuary is.

1. To what event do the 2300 days of Dan. 8: 14, bring us?

One of the divine beings whom Daniel heard conversing together on this subject, supposed to be our Lord himself (Dan. 10: 5), turning and addressing him, said, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

2. Before we can decide what this cleansing of the sanctuary is, what other question must first be determined?

We must ascertain what constitutes the sanctuary, and what purpose it is designed to serve.

3. In regard to the question as to what the sanctuary is, what views do we find set forth?

There are four objects which are claimed by different ones to constitute that sanctuary which the Bible declares is sometime to be cleansed. These are, 1. The earth; 2. The land of Canaan; 3. The church; and, 4. The tabernacle of Moses, with its antitype in heaven.

4. In attempting to decide between these views, what considerations must guide us?

The definition of the word "sanctuary," the use to which the sanctuary was put, and the general testimony of the Scriptures concerning it.

5. What is the definition of the word?

It means a holy or sacred place; some place which is not only holy in itself, but is put to sacred uses.

6. Whose dwelling-place was the sanctuary to be?

God said to Moses concerning the children of Israel, "And let them make me a sanctuary that I may dwell among them." Ex. 25: 8.

7. In how many places does the Bible have something to say about the sanctuary?

The original Hebrew and Greek terms from which the word "sanctuary" is translated, occur two hundred and two times. They are translated sanctuary in our common version one hundred and forty-four times. See complete list in the work on the sanctuary, pp. 343-346.

8. Out of this large array of texts, what solitary passage is referred to in proof that the earth is the sanctuary?—Isa. 60: 13.

9. What are the objections to such an application of the text?

In the first place the passage does not refer to the earth in its present state, which is the subject of inquiry, but to the earth in its renewed and immortal condition; and, secondly, even then it does not call it the sanctuary, but only the "place" of the sanctuary. The next clause calls it the place of his feet. The same process of reasoning which would make the earth the sanctuary, would make it the Lord's feet also. And the earth is not a holy or sacred place.

10. What text is offered in behalf of the land of Canaan as the sanctuary?—Ex. 15: 17.

11. In what sense does Moses evidently use the word "sanctuary" here?

In addition to its primary meaning, the word "sanctuary" has a secondary definition of "an asylum, a place of refuge and defense;" just as we say that civil and religious liberty has found a "sanctuary" in America. It is evidently in this relation to Israel that Moses speaks of Canaan in the text before us. The preceding context speaks of their deliverance from their enemies; and the Lord had prepared that land for them as a place of refuge and defense.

12. What is the next occurrence of the word "sanctuary"?—Ex. 25: 8.

13. What contrast is noticeable between this passage and Ex. 15: 17?

The latter, God had already "established"; the other the people were to build.

14. According to David, what was the relation between the land of Canaan and the sanctuary?

The land of Canaan, or more specifically, Mount Zion, was the "border" of, or space around about, the sanctuary; but the sanctuary itself was something "built" in that place. Ps. 78: 54, 60.

15. What text is quoted to prove that the church constitutes the sanctuary?—1 Ps. 114: 1, 2.

16. What lack in this proof-text is at once apparent?

It is too limited. If the church is the sanctuary, it of course takes all the church to constitute it. The text, however, only says that when Israel came out of Egypt, Judah was his sanctuary. But Judah was not all the church, but only one-twelfth part of it. Why, then, is Judah called the sanctuary?—Simply because within the borders of that tribe, the sanctuary was to be built; just as the same tribe is called "Mount Zion," simply because that sacred mountain was a part of their territory. 1 Ps. 78: 68, 69.

17. With what is the sanctuary of the prophecies (as Dan. 8: 14) inseparably associated?

With the two covenants. Heb. 9: 1.

18. What was the sanctuary of the first covenant?

Paul in Heb. 9: 1-5, gives a definite description of the tabernacle built by Moses, and its furniture, and says positively that that was the sanctuary of the first covenant.

19. How is this shown to belong to the covenant, since "covenant" in verse 1 is a supplied word?

It is "covenant" a supplied word in the verse before; but no one will question for a moment that Paul is there talking about the covenant. So Meyer, the great German commentator, says that "covenant" is the only word to be supplied in Heb. 9:1; and the sanctuary there spoken of, is the sanctuary of that covenant.

20. How long did the first covenant continue?

Until it was superseded and taken out of the way by Christ on the cross, to make way for the second. Heb. 8:13; 10:9.

21. What decisive bearing do these facts have on the different views above referred to?

They forever demolish the claim that either the earth, or Canaan, or the church, is now, or ever has been, the object which the Bible sets forth as the sanctuary; for if either of them ever was the sanctuary, it was such from Moses to Christ; but Paul explicitly describes another object (the tabernacle of Moses), and says that that was the sanctuary of that dispensation. Nor can either of them be the sanctuary of this dispensation; for Paul plainly shows in the book of Hebrews that the sanctuary of this dispensation, is but the antitype of the sanctuary of the Mosaic or typical dispensation.

22. Where is the tabernacle of Moses described?

Exodus 25 and onward.

23. According to what was it built?

According to a pattern shown by God to Moses in the mount. Verse 9.

24. From what was this pattern derived?

From something in heaven. Heb. 8:5.

25. How was the tabernacle of Moses constructed?

Of separate and detachable parts,—boards, bars, rings, and covering curtains,—so that it could be easily taken down and set up again. Ex. 26:15-30.

26. To what did this give place in the days of Solomon?

To the permanent structure of the temple at Jerusalem. 1 Kings 7:51; 8:1-11.

27. Why was the tabernacle first constructed as a movable building?

To adapt it to the circumstances of the children of Israel, as they were journeying from Egypt to Canaan. They transported it with them, taking it down at every move, and setting it up again at every stopping-place.

28. What was common to both the tabernacle of Moses and the temple of Solomon?

Only this feature—two apartments, a holy and a most holy place. The boards, bars, rings, and covering curtains of the tabernacle, were not reproduced in the temple.

29. Was the temple made after a pattern, the same as the building erected by Moses?

It was. David declares that God gave him the pattern of the sanctuary as embodied in the temple. 1 Chron. 28:11, 12, 19.

30. In what, therefore, did the resemblance of both the tabernacle and temple to the heavenly pattern, consist?

In only this feature: two apartments, a holy and a most holy place. The heavenly building is certainly not composed of boards, bars, rings, and covering curtains, like the tabernacle; nor can we suppose it to be, either in material or workmanship, like the temple of Solomon. Yet if the glorious heavenly temple had two apartments adapted to, and designed for, certain special purposes, any building erected here on earth, having like apartments, used for like purposes, however constructed, and however diminutive in size, would be a figure of it. And this is the only feature which the earthly building and heavenly pattern have in common. Those, therefore, who say that the heavenly sanctuary has only one apartment, a most holy place, as some do, are plainly at variance with the Scriptures.

BIBLE READING ON THE SANCTUARY--NO. 2.

Its Furniture and Uses.

1. What furniture was placed in the first apartment of the sanctuary?

In Ex. 25:23-40; 30:1-10, we find a full description of how the furniture in the first apartment was constructed; but in chapter 40:22-27, Moses presents a summary of the different articles as follows: "And he put the table in the tent of the congregation, upon the side of the tabernacle northward, without the veil. And he set the bread in order upon it before the Lord; as the Lord had commanded Moses. And he put the candlestick in the tent of the congregation, over against the table, on the side of the tabernacle southward. And he lighted the lamps before the Lord; as the Lord commanded Moses. And he put the golden altar in the tent of the congregation before the veil; and he burnt sweet incense thereon; as the Lord commanded Moses."

2. For what was this furniture used, and what did it signify?

The texts quoted above indicate the use of these several articles. The seven lamps of the candlestick were kept continually burning, signifying the illuminating influence of the Spirit of God. Rev. 4:5. The table contained the shew-bread, signifying the heavenly manna by which the souls of believers are fed and sustained in the divine life. 1 Cor. 10:21. The altar before the veil was used for the burning of incense, which signified the grace by which our prayers are made acceptable to God. Rev. 8:3.

3. What furniture did the second apartment, or most holy place, contain?

In Heb. 9:3-5, Paul answers: "And after the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all; which had the golden censer, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant; and over it the cherubim of glory, shadowing the mercy-seat." By the side of the tables in the ark was placed the golden pot of manna, showing that there is also good spiritual food connected with the law.

4. For what only purpose was the ark prepared?

Wholly and solely to contain the tables of the decalogue. After telling the brazenites that they should make a sanctuary, the very first object the Lord introduces, and gives instructions for making, is the ark of the covenant, showing it to be the article of first importance connected with the sanctuary. Ex. 25:10-23.

5. What name was consequently given to the ark?

"The ark of the covenant," or "testament" (Heb. 9:4), the same word being translated both covenant and testament.

6. Could it have been so called if the law of God had not been contained therein?

It could not; for it was the "testimony," or the tables of the law, which God gave Moses, that gave it its name. Ex. 25:10, 23.

7. What may therefore be known to exist always and everywhere, when "the ark of God's testament" is brought to view?

The law of God, in the precise form in which it was spoken from Sinai, and written with the finger of God upon the tables of stone; for if that was not holds of it, it could not be truthfully called, the ark "of the testament."

8. What is seen in heaven under the sounding of the seventh trumpet, near the close of the gospel dispensation?

"And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. 11:19. The force of this tremendous fact forever pulverizes every argument which is brought forward to prove that the law has been abolished, or to the slightest degree changed. Just before the kingdom of this world become the kingdom of our Lord (Rev. 11:16), we are assured that the law of God exists in the ark in heaven, just as God proclaimed it from the summit of Sinai. And there it waits in silent majesty to be the test of all men as they come to judgment.

9. What was the nature of the sanctuary of the old covenant, and its services?

They were figures, types, or shadows. Heb. 8:5; 9:8, 9; 10:1.

10. In what dispensation and in whose work is found "the body," or antitype of all the shadows and figures of the former dispensation?

"Which are a shadow of good things to come; but the body is of Christ." Col. 2:17. "But Christ being come a high priest of good things to come." Heb. 9:11.

11. What relation does Christ sustain to these "good things to come"?

He is high priest of them. "But Christ being come a high priest of good things to come." Heb. 9:11. The good things therefore pertain to his priesthood.

12. Through what does he exercise this priesthood?

"By a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building." Heb. 9:11.

13. Where is this greater and more perfect tabernacle in which he ministers?

"We have such a high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. 8:1, 2.

14. By what terms is the relation between the earthly and the heavenly sanctuary expressed?

The earthly is called "a figure for the time then present," "patterns of things in the heavens," and "figures of the true." Heb. 9:8, 9, 23, 24.

15. When was the ministration in the earthly sanctuary superseded by the ministration of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary?

Just before his crucifixion Christ said to the Jews, "Behold, your house [the earthly sanctuary] is left unto you desolate;" and on the day of the crucifixion, to show that its services were ended, "the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom;" and Paul to the Hebrews shows how Christ, when he ascended, entered upon his priesthood, pleading his own blood before God for us. Matt. 26:28; 27:51; Heb. 9:11, 12; 10:11, 12.

16. What finally became of the earthly sanctuary?

It was involved in the general destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70, though Titus made superhuman efforts to save it on account of its marvelous magnificence and glory.

17. Has there been any sanctuary on the earth connected with God's work since that time?

There could not be, as it would be a rival to the sanctuary in heaven.

18. What rival sanctuaries has Satan maintained in opposition to God's sanctuary?

Many; prominent among which may be mentioned the temple of Dagon among the Philistines, the temple of Belus at Babylon, the Parthenon at Athens, the Pantheon at Rome under paganism, and under the papacy, the Vatican, the seat of the beast.

19. What articles of furniture belonging to the heavenly sanctuary were shown to John?

The candlestick, the altar of incense, the golden censer, and the ark. Rev. 4:6; 8:3; 11:19.

20. What three witnesses, then, have we to the existence of the heavenly sanctuary, and what is the nature of their testimony?

1. Moses, who says that the earthly sanctuary was made according to a pattern; 2. Paul, who tells us that that pattern was in heaven; and, 3. John, who was permitted to look into heaven and behold it there. What other class of evidence it would be possible to bring, we are at a loss to conceive.

21. How long will the heavenly sanctuary continue in use?

Till probation ends, and Christ takes his position as King.

BIBLE READING ON THE SANCTUARY.—NO. 2.

The Service of the Sanctuary, and What it Accomplished.

1. WHEN the Bible speaks of the sanctuary, how do we know whether the testimony applies to the earthly sanctuary or the heavenly?

As the sanctuary, taken as a whole, exists in two divisions, type and antitype, and covers two dispensations, the Mosaic and the Christian, existing in its earthly form during the former, and in its heavenly during the latter, we have only to ascertain in what dispensation any testimony applies, and then we know of a surety to what sanctuary it belongs. Thus in Dan. 9:17, the prophet prays, "Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate." This occurred 588 B. C., or 589 years before the old dispensation ended; hence Daniel had reference to the sanctuary of that dispensation—the earthly sanctuary. But in Dan. 9:14, we read: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." But those days did not expire till we had come down over 1800 years into the Christian dispensation; hence this testimony applies to the sanctuary of this dispensation—the heavenly sanctuary.

2. As Dan. 8:14 applies to the heavenly sanctuary, how can we ascertain what this cleansing is?

The only way we can ascertain this, is to look at what the cleansing of the sanctuary was in the type. For, as was the shadow, so, in all essential features, must be the substance; as the type, so the antitype.

3. For what was the earthly sanctuary used?

For the purpose of performing a remedial ministry in reference to the sins of the people. Leviticus 1, and onward.

4. By whom was this ministry performed?

By a class of men duly set apart and consecrated as priests. Ex. 28:1, etc.

5. What was the ministration of the sanctuary designed to secure?

The forgiveness and removal of sin.

6. When a person desired pardon for his sins, what was he required to bring to the officiating priest, to the door of the sanctuary?

Some animal, such as the law prescribed (see Leviticus 4, and onward), to be offered as a sacrifice.

7. Before the victim was slain, what service did the person who had brought it, perform over it?

Laying his hands upon its head, he confessed over it his sins. Lev. 4:29, 30. These texts do not speak of the confession of the sin; but in reference to the scapegoat, it is expressly stated (Lev. 16:21) that when the high priest laid his hands upon its head, he confessed over him the sins of the people. We can infer, therefore, nothing less than that confession of sin in all cases, accompanied the act of laying on of hands.

8. What was signified by this act?

That the sin and guilt of the individual were transferred from himself to the offering. (See Lev. 16:21, second clause.)

9. Who slew the victim?

The sinner himself. Lev. 4:29.

10. Of what was the blood of the victim then considered as the equivalent?

As the blood is the life (Lev. 17:11, 14), and the offering was taken in place of the sinner, the blood represented the life of the sinner which had been forfeited to the law by transgression.

11. Where was the blood of a sin-offering for a priest, and for the whole congregation carried?

Into the sanctuary, and sprinkled before the veil. Lev. 4:5-7, 18, 19, 27.

12. What offerings were especially typical of the offering of Christ?

Those the blood of which was ministered in the sanctuary for sin. Heb. 10:11.

13. When the blood had been sprinkled in the sanctuary, in what condition did it leave the sinner with reference to his sin?

Free from sin, which had been transferred first to the victim, and then through its blood and the ministry of the priest, to the sanctuary.

14. Where was the sin then considered to be?

In the sanctuary, not yet finally disposed of, but waiting for the atonement.

15. What thus accumulated continually in the sanctuary?

The sins for which the people through their offerings had sought forgiveness.

16. What did it therefore become necessary to do in reference to the sanctuary?

To perform some service by which these sins could be removed from the sanctuary, and destroyed; for they could not be allowed to accumulate forever and remain in the sanctuary.

17. How often, in the type, was the service to remove sins from the sanctuary, performed?

Once a year, on the tenth day of the seventh month. Lev. 16:29, 30; Heb. 9:7; 10:2.

18. What was the day called on which this service was performed?

The day of atonement. Lev. 25:27, 28.

19. What was the service itself called?

Cleansing the sanctuary. Ex. 40:18. (See marginal reference.)

20. What is this called in Ex. 40:20?

"Reconciling" the house.

21. In what other place is the same word used?

"And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place and the tabernacle of the congregation." Lev. 16:20.

22. What is the word here used?

The word "kaphar" from which, with its cognate "kippurim," the word "atonement" is invariably translated.

23. What, then, was done, in the type, in reference to the sanctuary, every year on the tenth day of the seventh month?

The sanctuary was cleansed, reconciled, or justified; that is, was made free from the sins which had accumulated therein; and this was making the atonement.

BIBLE READING ON THE SANCTUARY.—NO. 4.

The Cleansing of the Sanctuary.

1. Where was the service on the day of atonement performed?

In the second apartment, or most holy place, of the sanctuary; and this work of making the atonement, or cleansing the sanctuary, was the only work that was performed therein. Lev. 16:2; Heb. 9:7.

2. What did the high-priest first do, before making an atonement for the people?

He made atonement for himself and his house. Lev. 16:5, 6.

3. Why was this?

Because being himself a sinner, he must first become free from his sins, before he could properly typify Christ in making an atonement for the sins of the people.

4. Does this part of his work find any counterpart in the antitype?

It does not; for Christ being ever without sin, has no occasion to present an offering for himself. Here is one of the features in which the law had a shadow of things to come, but "not the very image of the things." Heb. 10:1.

5. What did the high-priest then do?

He presented two goats which he had received from the congregation, for a sin-offering, before the Lord, at the door of the sanctuary, and cast lots upon them, setting apart one for a sacrifice, and the other for a scape-goat. Lev. 16:7-10.

6. The goats having been set apart by lot to their respective offices, what did the priest then do?

He killed the goat that was for the Lord, a sin-offering for the people, and carried his blood into the most holy place, and sprinkled it upon the mercy-seat and before the mercy-seat. Verse 15.

7. What was the effect of this service?

It reconciled, or cleansed, the place, and made an atonement for all the people with respect to their transgressions in all their sins. Verses 16, 20.

8. What was the mercy-seat upon which the blood was sprinkled?

The cover of the ark, beneath which reposed the tables of God's holy and immutable law. Ex. 25:21.

9. Why was it called "the mercy-seat"?

Because there mercy and truth met together, and righteousness and peace kissed each other. Ps. 85:10. There mercy had its seat. The blood sprinkled upon it testified to the law that its claims had been met; and through that blood consequently the sinner found mercy. It was not the seat of the high-priest. The expression we so often hear that "Christ is still upon the mercy-seat," betrays a great misconception of the mercy-seat and its uses.

10. With reference to what was the service in the most holy place performed?

With reference to the law of God beneath the mercy-seat in the ark. That law had been transgressed, and consequently had claims upon the people as sinners. The service was to satisfy these claims, and let the people go free.

11. What was done in the holy place of the sanctuary, while the priest was in the most holy place?

Nothing; for no man was to be in that apartment while the work of atonement was going forward in the most holy. Lev. 16:17.

12. How, then, did a person find mercy for sins committed on the day of atonement?

By complying with the conditions (Lev. 23:27) they secured an interest in the special offering of that day, which the priest presented in the most holy place, and which was for all the people. Heb. 9:7.

13. When the high-priest had completed his atoning work in the sanctuary, what did he next do?

Having satisfied by the atoning blood the claims of the law in reference to all the sins in the sanctuary, the priest bore them out to the door of the sanctuary, where the live goat was, and placing both his hands on the head of the goat, confessed over him these sins. Lev. 16:20, 21.

14. Where did this place these sins?

The last text quoted says expressly that it put "them upon the head of the goat."

15. How long had these sins been accumulating?

Through the entire year.

16. Had the people been pardoned of these sins? Certainly they had.

17. What does this fact show relative to the effect of pardon upon sin?

It shows that pardon does not destroy sin. Pardon is simply the removal of sin from the sinner, so that it no longer stands to his account. But it still remains to be expiated by some other party than the sinner. We can easily trace this process in the type. Thus a person broke God's law, and thus became guilty of sin. He then brought his offering, and confessing over him his sin, transferred it to the victim. In the blood of that victim it passed into the sanctuary. From the sanctuary it passed to the priest when he made the atonement on the tenth day of the seventh month; and the priest bore it from the sanctuary, and placed it upon the head of the scape-goat.

18. Who received the benefits of the service on the day of atonement?

Those who complied with the conditions, and afflicted their souls. Lev. 23:27, 29.

19. The live goat having received the sins of the people, what was done with him?

He was sent away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness, and there left to perish. Lev. 16:21, 22. With the goat the sins also perished, and that made an end of them.

20. In what condition did this leave the sanctuary and the people?

Free from sin. Their sins had then been atoned for, remitted, and put away.

21. How often was this round of service completed?

Once a year.

22. What was its nature?

It was only a type or shadow. The blood of animals could not take away sin; hence no sin was really removed by any or all of that ceremonial service in itself considered. But that was a means ordained of God through which men were to manifest their faith in a Redeemer to come; and a faithful compliance with this arrangement secured to them an interest in Christ's work, just as much as a compliance with the conditions of the new covenant secures it to us. To say, therefore, that the old covenant made no provision for the forgiveness of sin, is to deny the relation of its offerings to Christ, as type to antitype.

23. Unto what did Paul say that the priests connected with the earthly sanctuary served?

"Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Heb. 8:5.

24. Whose ministry, then, did the ministry of these earthly priests prefigure?

That of Christ in the greater and more perfect tabernacle in heaven. Heb. 9:11, 12. That is, as far as human services can represent the work of the Saviour, so in every essential particular he performs a work answering to that of the priests on earth, in connection with the earthly sanctuary. He receives confession from the penitent sinner; he pleads for him his blood; he transfers his sin to the sanctuary on high; and he carries on his work till finally he enters the most holy place, makes the atonement, and cleanses the sanctuary of which he is minister above, as the priests cleansed the sanctuary here on earth. Then the work of salvation being done, he will take his position as king, and establish that kingdom of which there shall be no end.

LETTER TO THE HEBREWS.

LESSON 14.—HEBREWS 7:27 to 8:2.
(Sabbath, Jan. 4, 1890.)

Questions, with Scripture Texts and Notes.

1. Why were there many priests of the order of Aaron?

2. Why is there but one of the order of Melchisedec?

3. How often did those priests offer up sacrifice?

"Who needeth not daily, as those high-priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself." Heb. 7:27.

4. For whom did they offer sacrifice? Id.; see Lev. 9:7.

5. How often did the High priest of the new covenant offer sacrifice? Heb. 7:27.

6. What sacrifice did he offer? Id.

7. Did he make any offering for himself? Id.

8. Why did he not offer for himself, as the other priests did? Id., and verse 26.

9. What kind of high-priests were made by the law of Moses?

"For the law maketh men high-priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, who is consecrated forevermore." Verse 28.

10. What is meant by their having infirmity? Ans.—They were frail, imperfect, not enduring.

11. What kind of priest was made by the oath? Verse 28.

12. What was the oath to which the apostle refers?

"The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Ps. 110:4.

13. What were the main points of difference between the two orders of priesthood? (See note.)

14. How does Paul sum up his argument?

"Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high-priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens." Heb. 8:1.

15. What does he mean by "such an high-priest"? Ans.—Such as has been described in chapter 7.

16. Where is our High-priest? Chap. 8:1.

17. Of what is he a minister?

"A minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Verse 2.

18. In what scripture do we first learn of the sanctuary?—Ex. 25:1-8.

19. Who was to make the sanctuary? Id.

20. What was the object of the sanctuary?

"And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them." Verse 8.

21. How many apartments, or rooms, had the sanctuary?

"And thou shalt hang up the veil under the tabernacle, that thou mayest bring in thither within the veil the ark of the testimony; and the veil shall divide unto you between the holy place and the most holy." Chap. 26:33.

22. What were these rooms called? Id.

23. What was put in the first, or holy place? Chap. 26:35; 40:22-27.

24. What was in the second, or most holy?

"And thou shalt hang up the veil under the tabernacle, that thou mayest bring in thither within the veil the ark of the testimony; and the veil shall divide unto you between the holy place and the most holy. And thou shalt put the mercy-seat upon the ark of the testimony in the most holy place." Chap. 26:33, 34.

"And the priests brought in the ark of the covenant of the Lord into his place, into the oracle of the house, to the most holy place, even under the wings of the cherubim." 1 Kings 8:8.

25. According to what was it built?

"According to all that I show thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it." "And look that thou make them after their pattern, which was showed thee in the mount." Ex. 25:9, 40.

RH Jan 14, 1890

Bible Study

LETTER TO THE HEBREWS.

LESSON 17.—HEBREWS 8:8-18.

(Habbakuk, Jan. 25.)

1. With whom was the old covenant made? Jer. 31:31, 32.
2. With whom did the Lord say he would make a new covenant? Heb. 8:8.
3. Have Gentiles any part in the covenant? Eph. 2:11, 12.
4. What were the promises of the old covenant?
5. What did the people really bind themselves to do?
6. Wherein was that covenant faulty?
7. What made the promises faulty?
8. In what was the second covenant better than the first? Heb. 8:6.
9. Repeat the promises of the new covenant? Verses 10-12; Jer. 31:33, 34.
10. Who makes these promises?
11. What is the order of their fulfillment? (See note.)
12. What is meant by putting the law into the minds of the people? Ans.—So impressing it upon their minds that they would not forget it, and causing them to delight in it, and acknowledge its holiness. Rom. 7:12, 23.
13. What is meant by writing it in their hearts? Ans.—Making it the rule of their lives, the spring of all their actions. In other words, making it a part of them.
14. What is said of those in whose hearts the law of God is? Ps. 119:11; 37:31.
15. Whom will such a one be like? Ps. 40:7, 8.
16. What will be the characteristic of those who have the law written in their hearts? Titus 2:14.
17. Is not this the object set before the people in the first covenant? Ex. 19:5, 6.
18. Then wherein is the great difference between the first covenant and the second? Ans.—In the first covenant the people promised to make themselves holy; in the second, God says that he will do the work for them.
19. In order that this work may be done, what must men do? James 4:7, first clause; 1 Pet. 5:6; Rom. 6:13.
20. Why is it that many who profess to desire righteousness do not obtain it? Rom. 10:3.
21. If they would humble themselves and submit to God, what would he do for them? Isa. 61:10.
22. Through whom alone can this righteousness be obtained? Rom. 5:17, 19.
23. What is the condition on which it is given? Rom. 8:22.

NOTES

The first of the blessings of the gospel is the forgiveness of sins. The term for this in the quotation in Hebrews is, "I will be merciful to their unrighteousness." The next is the writing of the law in the hearts of the people. Then comes the final blotting out of sins: "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." And then comes the close of probation, and the eternal inheritance, when "they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord." Jer. 31:34. Then all the people will be taught of the Lord. Isa. 54:13.

Israel were indeed called the people of God; but his dealings with them abundantly prove what the New Testament plainly declares, that only the faithful are really Israel, and no others were truly his people. The Lord sent word to Pharaoh, saying, "Let my people go, that they may serve me." Again he said, "Israel is my son, even my first-born." He also said he had seen the affliction of his people, and had come to deliver them, and to bring them into the land of Canaan. He did indeed deliver them out of Egypt, but of all the host that went out, only two were brought into the land of Canaan. The rest fell in the desert because of their unbelief. When they rebelled against God, they cut themselves off from being his people. And as he said in the prophecy, and in the text we have been considering, when they refused to continue in his covenant, he regarded them not. To be the people of God in truth, we must have his law in our hearts.

LETTER TO THE HEBREWS.

LESSON 18.—HEBREWS 8:6-18.
(Sabbath, Feb. 1.)

1. In what does the difference between the old covenant and the new consist? Heb. 8:6.

2. What were the promises of the old covenant?

3. What are those of the new?

4. Was there any promise of pardon in the old covenant? (See Ex. 19:3-8; 24:3-8.) These scriptures contain the complete record of the making of the old covenant, but they contain no hint of pardon, or of any help through Christ.

5. Then how did people under the old covenant find salvation? Heb. 9:14, 15.

6. Was there actual forgiveness for the people at the very time they sinned? or was forgiveness deferred until the death of Christ? Ps. 32:5; 78:38. Enoch and Elijah were taken to heaven, which shows that they had received the same fullness of blessing that those will receive who live until the Lord comes.

7. Since there was present and complete salvation for men who lived under the old covenant, and forgiveness of the transgressions that were under the first covenant came only through the second, what must we conclude? Ans.—That the second covenant really existed at the same time as, and even before, the first covenant.

8. Tell again what is included in the blessings of the second covenant?

9. What will be received by those whose transgressions are forgiven through the new covenant? Heb. 9:15, last clause.

10. Whose children are all they who are heirs of the eternal inheritance? Gal. 3:29.

11. Of how many is Abraham the father? Rom. 4:11, 12.

12. Did Abraham have righteousness? Gen. 26:5.

13. How did he obtain this righteousness? Rom. 4:3; Gal. 3:6.

14. Through whom did Abraham receive this righteousness? Gal. 3:14, first part.

15. Then could the covenant with Abraham have lacked anything? Ans.—No; having Christ, it had all that can be desired—"all things that pertain to life and godliness."

16. Since all the blessings which people receive through the new covenant, they receive as children of Abraham, can there be any difference between the second covenant and the covenant with Abraham?

17. How long before the old covenant was the covenant with Abraham made? Gal. 3:17.

18. Then why was that "first" covenant made? (See notes.)

NOTES.

The question has often been asked, How could any be saved under the old covenant, if there was no pardon in that covenant? That there was no pardon in that covenant is readily seen: 1. There is no hint of pardon in the covenant itself, as recorded in Ex. 19:3-8, or in the ratification and ratification of it in chap. 24:3-8. 2. In the sanctuary service there was no blood offered that could take away sin. Heb. 10:4. There was, therefore, no chance for pardon in that covenant. But to say they were under that covenant settles nothing as to what was in the covenant. All were under that covenant who lived while it endured. But that was not all. They were "beloved for the fathers' sake." As children of Abraham, they were also under the Abrahamic covenant, of which their circumcision was the token. John 7:22; Gen. 17:9-14. This was a covenant of faith already confirmed by the word and oath of the Lord, in Christ, the Seed, and it was not disannulled by any future arrangement. Gal. 3:15-17. All who were of faith were blessed with faithful Abraham. Verses 9-9. Overlooking this plain fact, which indeed lies at the very foundation of gospel faith in the new covenant, which is but the development of the Abrahamic, some have ascribed salvation to the covenant at Horeb. But, according to both Scripture and reason, if salvation had been possible in that covenant, there was no need of the second. Heb. 7:11; 10:1, etc.

Though much dissatisfaction is expressed by commentators with the received rendering of Heb. 9:1, their suggestions do not make it very greatly different. The first covenant is said to have had ordinances of divine service and a sanctuary of this world. But these were superadditions, not at all necessary to the covenant, but quite necessary as types of the sacrifice and priesthood of the new covenant. They all recognized the existence of sin; but no sin was taken away by them. Heb. 10:3, 4. As a sanctuary of this world, and offerings that could not take away sin, were connected to that covenant, these things themselves were but recognitions of the fact that there was no pardon in that covenant. By those things the people expressed faith in the mediation of the new covenant. If any pardon had been contained in that covenant, we must conclude that some means would have been devised to make that fact manifest. But there was not.

The word "sanctuary" means a holy place, or the dwelling-place of God. Indeed, the same word is often used in the Hebrew for sanctuary and holiness. All can see that it is derived from a verb which signifies to sanctify or make holy. The sanctuary being a holy dwelling, and being divided into two rooms, each of course was a holy place. And each is called the holy. (See Lev. 16:2.) Here the word "holy" is used, and we learn only by the description—within the veil before the mercy-seat, which is upon the ark—that the inner holy is meant. Inasmuch as in the second was placed the ark, containing the tables of stone on which were the commandments,—the most sacred things committed to them,—it was called the most holy, or, properly according to the Hebrew, the holy of the holies.

What was in the ark? Few subjects have occasioned more perplexity than this description of what was in the ark. The apostle specifies as being in the holy place, only the candlestick and the table upon which was the bread; whereas it is certain that the golden altar of incense was also therein. Moses had direction to put the two tables of testimony in the ark. Ex. 25: 16, 21. This order he obeyed. Ex. 40: 30; Deut. 10: 5. But we do not read of his putting anything else in the ark, or of his being ordered to do so. In 1 Kings 8: 9 it is distinctly said that "there was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone, which Moses put there at Horeb, when the Lord made a covenant with the children of Israel." This was spoken of the time when the vessels of the sanctuary were brought into their appropriate places in the temple built by Solomon. Dr. Clarke says:—

As Calmet remarks, in the temple which was afterward built, there were many things added which were not in the tabernacle, and several things left out. The ark of the covenant and the two tables of the law were never found after the return from the Babylonish captivity. We have no proof that, even in the time of Solomon, the golden pot of manna, or the rod of Aaron, was either in or near the ark. . . . We need not trouble ourselves to reconcile the various scriptures which mention these subjects, some of which refer to the tabernacle, others to Solomon's temple, and others to the temple built by Zerubbabel, which places were very different from each other.

That changes took place is evident. If Paul wrote of the tabernacle in the days of Moses, then the rod of Aaron and the pot of manna had been removed from the ark before the time of Solomon, which some suggest might have occurred while the ark was in the hands of the Philistines. Or, otherwise, Paul was speaking of things as they existed some time after Solomon, of which we have no account in the Scriptures. Which is the case, is not at all material.

None should allow themselves to be confused by the terms first covenant and second covenant. While the covenant made at Sinai was called "the first covenant," it is by no means the first covenant that God ever made with man. Long before that he made a covenant with Abraham, and he also made a covenant with Noah, and with Adam. Neither must it be supposed that the first or old covenant existed for a period of time as the only covenant with the people before the promise of the second or new covenant could be shared. If that had been the case, then during that time there would have been no pardon for the people. What is called the "second covenant" virtually existed before the covenant was made at Sinai; for the covenant with Abraham was confirmed in Christ (Gal. 3:17); and it is only through Christ that there is any value to what is known as the second covenant. There is no blessing that can be gained by virtue of the second covenant that was not promised to Abraham. And we, with whom the second covenant is made, can share the inheritance which it promises only by being children of Abraham. To be Christ's is the same as to be children of Abraham (Gal. 3:29); all who are of faith are the children of Abraham, and share in his blessing (verses 7-9); and since no one can have anything except as children of Abraham, it follows that there is nothing in what is called the second covenant that was not in the covenant made with Abraham. The second covenant existed in every feature long before the first, even from the days of Adam. It is called "second" because both its ratification by blood and its more minute statement were after that of the covenant made at Sinai. More than this, it was the second covenant made with the Jewish people. The one from Sinai was the first made with that nation.

When it is demonstrated that the first covenant—the Sinaitic covenant—contained no provisions for pardon of sins, some will at once say, "But they did have pardon under that covenant." The trouble arises from a confusion of terms. It is not denied that under the old covenant; i. e., during the time when it was specially in force, there was pardon of sins, but that pardon was not offered in the old covenant, and could not be secured by virtue of it. The pardon was secured by virtue of something else, as shown by Heb. 9:15. Not only was there the opportunity of finding free pardon of sins, and grace to help in time of need, during the time of the old covenant, but the same opportunity existed before that covenant was made, by virtue of God's covenant with Abraham, which differs in no respect from that made with Adam and Eve, except that we have the particulars given more in detail. We see, then, that there was no necessity for provisions to be made in the Sinaitic covenant for forgiveness of sins. The plan of salvation was developed long before the gospel was preached to Abraham (Gal. 3:8), and was amply sufficient to save to the uttermost all who would accept it. The covenant at Sinai was made for the purpose of making the people see the necessity of accepting the gospel.

CHRIST AND HIS WORK.

BY ELD. R. A. UNDERWOOD.

(Mansfield, Ohio.)

(Continued.)

Prophet and Priest.

"Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus; who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." Phil. 2:5-8. In this text the mind is carried back into the eternity of the past, when Christ occupied the position of creator and lawgiver. From this point we are carried forward to the time when Christ humbled himself, and became poor for our sakes. We behold the Son of God disrobed of the glory he enjoyed with the Father. We see him become of no reputation, denying himself, toiling amid weariness, reproach, and mockery, suffering, and finally dying, as a criminal upon the cross. These are exhibitions of that boundless love that led Christ to leave heaven to come to this world, to seek and to save that which was lost. Luke 19:10.

Before Christ could become a perfect mediator, he must take man's nature upon himself, and be subject to all the human weaknesses and temptations to which fallen man had become heir. In this position he is by precept and example a teacher as well as a prophet. He "went about doing good." "He opened his mouth and taught them saying, Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.

Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled," etc. Matthew 5. No great excitement, no great display, yet how he drew the multitude! There was life and healing power in his words. Language cannot express the power that attended his ministry. Even the officers that were sent to take him could only say as they returned, "Never man spake like this man." John 7:46. "Christ pleased not himself: but, as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me." Rom. 15:3. "And being made perfect [perfect through suffering], he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him." Heb. 5:9. "Seeing then that we have a great high-priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. For we have not an high-priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." Heb. 4:14-16.

Christ stands now as our advocate and mediator between God the Father, who represents the law, and man, the law-breaker. Our pardon and acceptance with God the Father can be secured only through Christ. The priesthood of the old dispensation was changeable and faulty. The blood of animals could not take away sin. But not so with the priesthood of the new covenant.

"But this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood. Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing that he ever liveth to make intercession for them. For such a high-priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; who needeth not daily, as those high-priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's; for this he did once, when he offered up himself." Heb. 7:24-27.

The priesthood of Christ is efficacious not only for those who come to God through Christ under the new covenant, but also for those who lived under the old covenant: "My little children, these things write I unto you that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous. And he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world" (1 John 2:1, 2); "And for this cause he is the mediator of the new testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance." Heb. 9:15. It could not be said of any one man that he was the mediator of the old covenant. In one sense there was no mediator of the old covenant. Moses and the high-priesthood were typical of Christ. Moses was the middle-man between God and the people in making the old covenant. Ex. 19:3-8; Deut. 5:2-5, 24-28. The high-priest stood between God and the transgressor to make an atonement for sin. Lev. 4:27-31. "For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord." Lev. 16:30.

But this, as we have already seen, was only in figure. Those who would in any manner represent a mediator under the old covenant, were sinful men. Their priesthood was changeable, faulty, and unable to remove sin by virtue of any act of their own. Not so with Christ. His priesthood is unchangeable, holy, undefiled, separate from sinners. He does not need to offer sacrifice for his own sins as the priests under the old covenant did, but he is consecrated forevermore, and made higher than the heavens. "Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." Heb. 7: 25. "There are priests that offer gifts according to the law: who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. . . . But now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises." Heb. 8: 4-6.

Notice the promises of the new covenant: 1. "I will be merciful to their unrighteousness;" 2. "I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts;" 3. "I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people;" 4. "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more;" 5. "All shall know me, from the least to the greatest." The promises of pardon of sin, the writing of the law in the heart, our adoption as sons and daughters, and the blotting out of our sins, are all promises based upon conditions elsewhere stated by Christ, while confirming or establishing the new covenant. The fourth promise is fulfilled in the removal of all the sins forever of all who have accepted the terms of the new covenant. The last promise sweeps into eternity, and is unconditional—"All shall know me [the Lord], from the least to the greatest."

Those who have refused to accept of the terms of salvation, must suffer the penalty of the law, which is death, leaving in God's universe only such as are in harmony with the law of righteousness. They shall all be righteous from Adam to the last one that accepts of Christ and his righteousness, through faith in him and obedience to his word. To lead men to have faith in Christ as a personal, present Saviour from sin, has been the object of all the divinely appointed services made necessary by man's fall and his redemption from Adam down to the present. "And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all." 1 Cor. 12: 5, 6.

The means by which man has showed his faith in Christ has been different in different ages. While the administrations have been different, there was the same Holy Spirit and the same Jesus Christ, the same gospel in all ages, the same moral law and rule of righteousness. "We praise God that there has been no respect of persons with him. "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth: for in these things I delight, saith the Lord." Jer. 9: 23, 24. Divine aid, ample, free, and full, has been offered to all. "Then Peter opened his mouth, and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him. The word which God sent unto the children of Israel, preaching peace by Jesus Christ: (he is Lord of all): . . . to him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." Acts 10: 34-43.

In the gospel we see a divine plan worthy of a perfect God, a merciful Saviour, a perfect priest and mediator. The principle that one must suffer with another to give him an experience that enables him to enter into the feelings and experiences of the soul that is overwhelmed in distress, was recognized and acted upon by Christ in redeeming a lost world. "For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham. Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high-priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted." Heb. 2: 16-18. "For we have not an high-priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." "Who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity." Heb. 4: 15; 5: 2.

In view of this blessed truth, that our High-priest has borne our griefs and sorrows, and understands our needs before we approach the Father through him, "let us . . . come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." Not only has our High-priest walked among men as a man, suffering with men that he might be a merciful mediator and priest, but he has chosen those to be associated with his priesthood who were also men of infirmities like unto us—men resurrected, or translated to heaven from the earth. Rev. 5: 8-10; Matt. 27: 52, 53; Eph. 4: 8, margin. Angels, or beings that have never had man's fallen nature to contend with, would not be fitted for such a place. Doubtless Enoch, Moses, and Elias are among those associated with Christ's priesthood. There were twenty-four associate priests (1 Chron. 24:5, 6; Luke 1:8-10; Heb. 8:5) in the type, which must correspond to the real. These redeemed men now associated with Christ's priesthood, have been tempted, and know the weakness of man's fallen nature. They also know by experience the mighty power in the gospel to save to the uttermost all that come to God through Christ. These redeemed associate priests are represented as falling before the Lamb, offering up the incense which is said to be the prayers of God's dear, penitent people. Rev. 5:8.

The great apostle Paul, after reviewing the past glory of Christ,—his voluntary humility, suffering, and death, to prepare himself to enter into the sorrows of a lost race and redeem them by his own life,—exclaims: "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such a high-priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens." Heb. 8:1. With such an Intercessor, who will bear our sins, forgive and love us freely, none need fail. Look up by faith to Jesus, trembling sinner. Look up by faith, fainting, weary pilgrim. We can be more than conquerors through Him that loved us.

THE VALUE OF THE PROPHETIC PERIODS
IN THE STUDY OF PROPHECY.—NO. 2.BY HENRY T. BOURDEAU.
(South Stetley, F. C.)THE 2300 DAYS AND THE CLEANSING OF
THE SANCTUARY.

DAN. 8:13, 14: "Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifices, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden underfoot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

The 2300 days being connected with prophetic symbols, are themselves symbolical, each day representing one year, according to the scriptural rule by which to interpret symbolic days: "I have appointed thee each day for a year." Eze. 4:5, 6. The symbol with which this period is especially connected, is a little horn which Daniel had seen come out of one of the four horns of a rough goat, which had overcome a ram having two horns, one of which "was higher than the other, and the higher came up last." Dan. 8:3-13.

In explaining these symbols, Daniel says: "The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia. And the rough goat is the king of Grecia; and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king. Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power. And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressions are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power; and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practice, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes, but he shall be broken without hand." Verses 20-25.

This is so plain that it needs but little comment. The ram represents the united kingdom of Media and Persia; the goat, the Grecian kingdom; the first horn, the first king in that kingdom, namely, Alexander the Great; the four horns, the four divisions of the Greek kingdom, or monarchy, after the sudden death of Alexander, namely, Macedonia, Thrace, Syria, and Egypt; the little horn that came out of one of the four Grecian horns, pagan and papal Rome. Rome conquered Macedonia in B. C. 108.

We say that the little horn represents both pagan and papal Rome, because it does the work that those powers accomplished. It stands up against the Prince of princes. Pagan Rome did this through Herod the Great, its representative in Judaea. It destroys the holy and mighty people. This did pagan and papal Rome. It "shall be broken without hand," or through divine agency. This will be true of papal Rome when Christ shall destroy it by the brightness of his coming. 2 Thess. 2:8. By the expressions, "the daily," or "continual," and "the transgression of desolation," are meant paganism and the papacy. Verse 13, etc. The word "sacrifice" is in italics, and is not in the original.

This little horn treads the sanctuary and the host (the true Church) underfoot, and it is with regard to it that the question is asked, "How long shall be the vision?" etc., and the answer is returned, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

The 2300 days are not explained in this chapter; for at its close Gabriel, having explained all the symbols introduced, but the time, says of the vision concerning the evening and the morning (the 2300 days), "Shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days;" and Daniel says, "I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it." Verse 27. Yet Gabriel had been told to make Daniel understand the vision. This he does the same year, in the vision of the seventy weeks contained in chapter 9, by saying, "Seventy weeks are determined [Hebrew, cut off]." Verse 24. "Cut off" from what?—From a longer period, of course. And the only period that had been given him in the previous vision was the 2300 days. This period is longer than the seventy weeks, or 490 days, which should be cut off, or subtracted, from it.

One object of the Lord in giving Daniel the vision of the seventy weeks, was "to seal up the vision" of the 2300 days; by which is meant, to make it sure; to show when it begins and when it ends. Without this knowledge concerning the 2300 days, those days are of no account, and might just as well have been left out of the Bible. The seventy weeks are therefore a key to the 2300 days, showing when those days began. We have already seen that the seventy weeks began with the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem, in the fall of A. C. 457; and consequently ended in the fall of A. D. 54. Now let us cut off, or subtract, the seventy weeks, or 490 year-days, from the 2300 year-days. Thus: 2300-490=1810. But the seventy weeks, or 490 years, ended in A. D. 54. Therefore, to ascertain when the 2300 days ended, we have but to add 1810 years to the fall of A. D. 54, and we have, as a result, the fall of 1864, when the 2300 days ended, if Christ is the true Messiah. And who can doubt this in the light of the following facts: Christ appeared as the Messiah, or the Anointed, at his baptism, in the fall of A. D. 27, and in the midst of the week of years following, in the spring of A. D. 31, he was cut off, and the Jewish sacrifices virtually ceased; for those sacrifices were of no account after the true Sacrifice had been offered on the cross of Calvary. See Dan. 9:24-27.

THE VALUE OF THE PROPHETIC PERIODS
IN THE STUDY OF PROPHECY.—No. 2.

BY MR. D. T. BOWDLER.
(South Hants, P. G.)

The 2300 Days and the Cleansing of the Sanctuary.
(Concluded.)

WE might those who started out in the proclamation of the near coming of Christ over forty years ago, consider their position on time as their Gibraltar. Even their ablest opponents had to acknowledge that their argument on time was correct, and that those who attacked them on time attacked them on their strongest point. And at this point we cannot suppress the relation of a circumstance that occurred in connection with our labors in Europe about ten years ago. As we were laboring at an important point in Switzerland, we were attacked on the sanctuary and the 2300 days by a Hebrew scholar and an author, who had justly earned laurels at a renowned university. He asserted that the little horn of Daniel 8 was Antiochus, who, as he claimed, had caused the Jewish sanctuary at Jerusalem to be trodden underfoot just 2300 literal days after which the sanctuary was cleansed. He appealed to the first book of Maccabees. In our reply we showed, among other things,—

1. That his argument was a departure from God's plan of uniformity in chains of prophetic symbols, which required that we should treat those times as symbolic that are introduced in series of prophetic symbols.

2. That Antiochus was only one of the twenty-six kings that composed one of the four Grecian horns; that though he figured for awhile, yet he himself had to pay tribute to Rome. (See Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge; Dictionnaire General de Biographie et de Histoire, etc., by Dézobry, Bachelet, and a learned French society, 7th edition, etc.) He was therefore smaller than Grecia, and smaller than the horn of which he was only the twenty-sixth part; whereas the power represented was to be "exceeding great," when compared with the Grecian kingdom, which was simply called "great." Dan. 8:9, 4.

3. That the Jewish sanctuary was trodden underfoot in the times of Antiochus only from "the fifteenth day of the month Casleu, in the 145th year" "of the kingdom of the Greeks," to "the five and twentieth day of the ninth month, which is called the month Casleu, in the 148th year" of the same kingdom. 1 Maccabees 1:54, 10, etc.; 4:52, 43-52, etc. This would make only 1090 days for the treading down of the sanctuary. Quite a difference between 1090 days and 2300 days! While Antiochus did act a part in treading the sanctuary underfoot, he did not pollute it during one-half of the period of the 2300 literal days; much less did he pollute it during 2300 years.

4. That if the 2300 days from which the seventy weeks are cut off, are literal, then the seventy weeks, also, are literal. And the same is also true of the sixty-nine weeks which were to reach unto Messiah. According to this theory, Messiah was due more than 400 years before Christ! And in that case we would be shut up to the conclusion that Christ is not the true Messiah! Of course, we Christians believe that Christ is the true Messiah, because he came at the end of the sixty-nine weeks. And if the seventy weeks ended in A. D. 34, the 2300 days must necessarily have terminated in 1844.

Having made these and other points in our reply, there came a fearful thunder-storm. The minister who had attacked us was present. We asked the audience whether we had not better go on with our reply, as the people were hedged in by the storm. The reply was, "Go on." Before we proceeded, our noble opponent arose and said, "I withdraw from the arena of discussion, and shall no more attack Mr. Bowdler." We felt to praise God not only for a clear and consistent theory of truth, but also for the honesty that we saw in our opponent.

Let us now pause, and notice some of the great events that transpired at or near the termination of this interesting period, the longest of the kind in the Bible. At that time, thousands of honest searchers after truth, true to the sure word of prophecy, were proclaiming a time message to every nation under heaven, as based upon the ending of this very period. Rev. 14:6, 7. They also embodied in their preaching scores of prophecies which had recently been fulfilled, or which were then in process of fulfillment.

And since the ending of this period, other prophecies have been rapidly fulfilling. And we can now safely say that many more prophecies have been fulfilled since the attention of the people was first called to the termination of the 2300 days, and to kindred truths, by the proclamation of the near coming of Christ, than were fulfilled from the birth of John the Baptist till the destruction of Jerusalem. And why all this prophetic light now shining upon our pathway?—Simply because the coming of the Lord, to which all these prophecies point, is a most important event, and because the Lord, foreseeing that the doctrine of the near coming of Christ would meet with studied and most determined opposition, designed to have it so guarded and so fortified that it would appear especially precious to its friends, and that even its enemies would be found without excuse in the day of final reckoning.

And what shall we understand by the cleansing of the sanctuary to take place after the termination of the 2300 days? This cannot mean the cleansing of the old Jewish sanctuary at Jerusalem. No such sanctuary existed there in 1844, and it would be inconsistent to talk of cleansing a sanctuary that did not exist. The Lord must, therefore, refer to the new-covenant sanctuary, in which Christ has officiated as a priest since his ascension to heaven. Heb. 8:1, 2, etc. The cleansing of the sanctuary is not a physical but a spiritual cleansing, and consists in the removal of all the sins of God's people from that sanctuary, at the close of Christ's work as a priest. It is the blotting out of those sins that have been transferred by God's people, through faith in Christ, to the heavenly sanctuary. Acts 3:19, 20; Heb. 9:28. It involves the judgment of God's people; for it is impossible for God's people to have their sins forever removed from the heavenly sanctuary, unless their cases are first examined, and unless a judicial decision is passed in their favor.

Hence it is that the time message which is based on the termination of the 2300 days, is a judgment message. It says "to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people," "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come." Rev. 14:6, 7, etc. Hence it is that we are taught in Holy Writ that when the end of all things is at hand, judgment begins with the people of God. 1 Pet. 4:17, etc.

The cleansing of the earthly sanctuary also sheds light upon this subject. That sanctuary was cleansed the tenth day of the seventh month, which was a judgment day to Israel. That day the high-priest removed from the sanctuary, in figure, all the sins that had been transferred to it through the blood of personal and national sacrifices during the year. As the high-priest on that solemn occasion appeared before God in the most holy place to perform this momentous work, he wore upon his breast the breastplate of judgment, on which were written the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. Thus he bore all Israel in judgment before God that day. Leviticus 16, etc. And to this day the Jews who keep the tenth day of the seventh month understandingly, with that idea attached to it that was embraced in its observance under the type, will say to you, as they have said to us, "This is to us the most solemn day in the year. It is a judgment day." (See the large work on the sanctuary and the 2300 days.)

NAMES WRITTEN IN HEAVEN.

BY ELIZ. R. F. COTTRELL
(Battle Creek, Mich.)

Those who believe and obey the gospel have the greatest cause of rejoicing; because believing that God loves them, and trusting with full assurance that he is able, and more than willing, to fulfill his promises, it is their privilege to rejoice in hope of his salvation. It is not only their privilege, but a duty they owe to Him who loved them and bought them with his own precious blood.

Hence Paul, speaking of many things which characterize those who have consecrated themselves to God, says, "Rejoicing in hope." Again he says, "Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord." Again, "Rejoice in the Lord always; and again I say, Rejoice." Again the apostle says, "Rejoice evermore." He emphasizes it as a matter of importance. While rejoicing and praise glorify God, they are a means of grace to the believer. The apostle Peter also, speaking of Christ, says, "Though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

The true ground of rejoicing is not that God has clothed us with miraculous powers, but that we are acknowledged of God as his children. Whatever God enables us to do, the glory all belongs to him. It is said of the seventy, whom Jesus had sent out to preach the gospel and heal the sick, that they "returned again with joy, saying, Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name." But he said to them, "Notwithstanding, in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven." Written in heaven? In what?—The book of life. Said Paul, "Help those women which labored with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellow-laborers, whose names are written in the book of life." It is called the Lamb's book of life. Of the first beast of Revelation 13, it is said that "all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

So there are two classes. One class have their names written there, the other have not. It is reasonable to suppose, then, that when one is truly converted, has given his heart to God, and is accepted, his name is registered in heaven. He has now enlisted in the spiritual war. His name is entered on the list to run the race for the prize of eternal life; and if he is faithful to the end, it is not an uncertain race, in which one only can obtain the prize. He may so run as to obtain. "So run that ye may obtain."

But his name is to remain in the book of life on condition of enduring steadfast to the end. Says Jesus, "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels."

Moses and the prophets were not ignorant concerning this book. When Israel had sinned, Moses pleaded for their pardon in this way:

"Oh, this people have sinned a great sin, and have made them gods of gold. Yet now if thou wilt forgive their sin—; and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written. And the Lord said unto Moses, Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book." Said the Lord by Ezekiel, "And mine hand shall be upon the prophets that see vanity, and that divine lies: they shall not be in the assembly of my people, neither shall they be written in the writing of the house of Israel, neither shall they enter into the land of Israel." In Psalm 69 is a prophetic prayer against the murderers of Jesus Christ. This application is right; for it is said, "They gave me also gall for my meat; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink." (See John 19:28-30.) Of his religious murderers it is said, "Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and not be written with the righteous." The book of the living is, doubtless, the book of life.

The prophecy of Malachi 3 applies to the gospel dispensation, from the mission of John the Baptist to the time when the jewels of the Lord are made up by the decisions of the investigative judgment; and chapter 4 opens with the final event of the great day of wrath. In chapter 3 the Lord reproves the people for their apostasy. He says, "Even from the days of your fathers ye are gone away from mine ordinances, and have not kept them." This might truly apply to the Jewish Church in and after the days of Malachi. But it is certainly true of the professed Church of to-day. These hundreds of years since the great Roman apostasy, the Church in general have not returned to the ordinances of the Lord; and if ever a people robbed God in tithes and offerings, it is the present generation. In this state of apostasy it is said, "And now we call the proud happy; yea, they that work wickedness are set up; yea, they that tempt God are even delivered. Then when apostasy has reached this climax they that feared the Lord spoke often one to another. And the Lord hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels." The investigative judgment will decide who are the Lord's jewels; and when this is finished, we shall clearly "discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not." Then the day will follow which shall "burn as an oven."

The prophet Daniel had a view of that part of the judgment which takes place in heaven before the coming of Christ and the resurrection. He says, "I beheld till the thrones were cast down [or placed], and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool; his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him. The judgment was set, and the books were opened." Dan. 7:9, 10.

This judgment scene transpires in heaven before the Son receives his kingdom and returns to earth to execute its decisions by giving the rewards. (See Dan. 7:13, 14; Luke 19:11-15; Rev. 22:11, 12.) When he returns, his people receive the reward of immortality, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye (1 Cor. 15:51-53; 1 Thess. 4:16); therefore their cases must have been decided before the advent.

The thousands that stand before the throne are not men, but angels that minister unto him and take a part in the judgment as those who have been ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation. This same number "round about the throne" are mentioned in Rev. 5:11, and declared to be angels. "The books were opened,"—"the book of life," in which are registered the names of the candidates for immortality, and the "book of remembrance," in which is recorded what they have done. Jesus is still a high-priest, and here the sins of the faithful are blotted out. They are "accounted worthy" to obtain that [the future] world, and the resurrection from the dead," i. e., the "first resurrection." Luke 20:35. Sins are not blotted out at conversion, but forgiven on condition of faithfulness. (See Matt. 18:23-35; Exo. 18:24; 33:12.) The time of blotting out is just before the coming of Christ. Acts 3:19-21: "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you; whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution."

Said Jesus, "Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven." Matt. 10:32, 33. While the Ancient of days is sitting in judgment, and all the host of the holy angels are present, Jesus, our great High-priest, will confess those who have confessed him, and deny those who have denied him. He will blot out the sins of the faithful, and the names of those who professed his name but failed to overcome. "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels."

Those whose names are retained in the book of life will be saved in the time of trouble at the coming of the Lord. Dan. 12:1: "At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince that standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book." But those whose names are not found in the book of life will be excluded from the city of God. Rev. 21:27: "And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." Chap. 22:19: "And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book."

Reader, is your name in the book of life? Have you enlisted in the army of the Lord? Have you registered in the list for the race for immortality? If so, persevere to the end, and your name shall be blotted out and your name confessed before the Father and his holy angels. But if your name is not registered in the book, if you have not confessed Christ and entered his service, still there is room for you; but there is no time to be lost. Probation still lingers; Christ still pleads for all who will come to God by him; but his work of intercession at his Father's throne soon will cease. Soon all his people will be sealed for eternal life, their sins all blotted out; and he will come to "give every man according as his work shall be." Now is the accepted time. Come to Christ ere it be too late.

SIN AND THE ATONEMENT.

THE transgression of God's law demands the death of the transgressor. "Sin is the transgression of the law;" and "the wages of sin is death." The guilty human pair in the garden of Eden, awaking to the consequences of their disobedience, found themselves confronted by this terrible and inexorable decree of justice, demanding not only their own death, but that of all their posterity. A release from this penalty was possible for man only upon one condition,—the presentation of a substitute. Of this substitute justice demanded two things. It would not be just to compel any being to suffer death in man's stead, therefore the substitute must be voluntary; and God's law being infinite in its righteousness and holiness, the substitute must be of like character, that its claims might be fully met and its honor and dignity preserved. The Son of God was the one being in whom these conditions could be realized.

As Adam's fall involved all his posterity, an atonement was demanded of sufficient breadth to cover the whole world. Such is the nature of the atonement which Christ makes. He became "the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." 1 John 2:2. His sacrifice opened to all the world the way to God's pardon and favor.

Yet not all the world have their sins removed by virtue of this great sacrifice. The wicked and finally impenitent meet at last the result of their evil doing, and receive the wages of sin, in the second death. The death of Christ paid the full penalty of the divine law for all the human family. In no other way could provision be made for all, as it was necessary should be made. But this act did not make a final disposition of their sins, compelling all to be saved. It only placed salvation within their reach, making it contingent upon the exercise of faith in their divine Sacrifice, and the acceptance of the free salvation set before them. It rendered possible the escape of the sinner from the penalty of his sins, not by obliterating those sins, but by providing a means through which they could be removed from him.

The death of Christ in itself did not make any disposition of sin. Had it done so, the popular idea would be true that the atonement was made on the cross, and it would have followed that all men, independent of their own choice, were to be saved. But God could not, consistently with the principles of his government, save men in this way. To do so would be to ignore the exercise of man's free will, without which no act of service from his creature could be acceptable to him, either in this world or in the world to come.

By virtue of the blood of the divine Sacrifice, the sins of the righteous are transferred from them to their Substitute, and by their great High-priest are borne into the heavenly sanctuary. But while provision continues this transfer of sin is not final. The penitent sinner receives pardon and the favor of God as fully as though he had never sinned; but if he again forsakes God, and remains impenitent, the sins which have been pardoned will be put back upon him in the judgment, as though no pardon had ever been granted. In this sense they still stand against him, until the work of the judgment makes their removal absolute and final.

In the cleansing of the sanctuary, which is synonymous with the judgment, the sins of the righteous are "blotted out." So far as the latter are concerned, they are then obliterated. But they are not obliterated in fact. When the atonement has been completed, all these sins are placed upon the antitypical scape-goat, Satan, the author and instigator of all sin, who must bear their terrible load during the thousand years in which the earth lies desolated. At the end of the thousand years Satan and all the hosts whom he has seduced into sin meet their end in the lake of fire, and with their destruction sin passes out of existence. It exists so long as its originator exists, and perishes when he perishes.

But while the sins of the righteous are thus placed upon the head of Satan, and receive in his destruction their final obliteration, it is not less true that the penalty of these sins was borne by Christ upon the cross. The demands of infinite justice over the great law which these sins had violated, were met in the death of Christ. They could not be met in the death of Satan. His life could not be accepted as satisfaction for the violation by man of God's great law. Satan does not become in any sense man's substitute, or take any part in the work of man's atonement.

The death of Christ paid the penalty for man's sins, and was the only means by which that penalty could be paid on the principle of substitution. It satisfied the demands of justice with respect to his sins, and could therefore be accepted in place of the death of the sinner. The law of God, violated and dishonored by man, was, in respect to those same sins, honored and vindicated by the sacrifice on the cross. The sins made this sacrifice necessary in order to man's salvation; but the sacrifice did not obliterate the sins. That result is only accomplished by the final destruction of all sinners, with the great originator of sin, in the purifying fires of the day of God.

L. A. S.

THE JUDGMENT.

1. Is there a time appointed for the judgment?

"Because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead." Acts 17: 31.

2. How many must meet the test of the judgment?

"I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work." Eccl. 3: 17; see also Rom. 14: 10.

3. Will any besides the human family be judged?

"And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day." Jude 6.

4. With which class will the judgment begin?

"For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?" 1 Pet. 4: 17.

5. Who constitute the house of God?

"But Christ as a son over his own house; whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end." Heb. 3: 6.

"Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" 1 Cor. 3: 16.

"What! know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own?" Chap. 6: 19.

6. Upon what class then will the judgment commence?—Upon the righteous dead.

"And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth." Rev. 11: 18.

7. Out of what will they be judged?

"And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before him; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." Chap. 20: 12.

8. Where does the judgment take place?

"I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. . . . The judgment was set, and the books were opened." Dan. 7: 9, 10.

9. How many assist in that work?

"A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened." Verse 10.

10. Who else is brought before the Father at this time?

"I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days [God the Father], and they brought him near before him." Verse 13.

11. How many books are there besides "the Lamb's book of life?" Rev. 20: 12.

"And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." Verse 15; see also chap. 21: 27. (This is at the end of the thousand years.)

12. Whose names are in the book of life?

"He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels." Chap. 3: 5.

13. Are their works also recorded in a book?

"Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another: and the Lord hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord and that thought upon his name." Mal. 3: 16.

14. What takes place with the living righteous at the second coming of Christ?

"Behold, I show you a mystery; We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." 1 Cor. 15: 51-53.

15. How far will this investigation of cases extend?

"For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." 2 Cor. 5: 10.

"For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil." Eccl. 12: 14.

16. What further positive evidence shows that this judgment must take place before the second coming of Christ? (See Jude 14: 15; Rev. 22: 12; Act 3: 19; Dan. 8: 14; Rev. 3: 5.)

N. PAQUETTE.

THE JUDGMENT AND THE PAPACY.

BY ELDER W. H. LITTLEJOHN.
(Butte Creek, Mich.)

In Dan. 8:13, 14 is found a most remarkable prediction. It reads as follows: "Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden underfoot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." It will be observed that in this passage is recorded a question which one angel propounded to another angel in the hearing of the prophet. The question itself is simple and direct, and relates to the period during which the church of God was to be subjected to oppression from certain hostile powers. For some unexplained reason, the answer to the question propounded, if given at all, was given to Daniel instead of the angel who uttered the interrogatory.

We can readily perceive that there may be good reasons why the angel addressed, should make his reply to the prophet, but it would look very much like discourtesy on the part of one angel toward another, had the one appealed to, refused or neglected to respond either directly or indirectly to his questioner. As Daniel represented the church in all ages, and as the conversation that took place was especially designed for the enlightenment of that church, it was in the highest degree proper that the instruction given should be addressed to Daniel personally.

Taking it for granted, therefore, that our text does really contain an answer to the question relating to the duration of the time during which the saints were to be trodden under-foot, we are shut up to the conclusion that the answer sought for, is found in these words: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

To the casual reader, it might be difficult to discover in this language an answer to the angel's question. I fancy that I hear him say, "It is true there is an allusion to time in the passage, but the 2300 days spoken of are said to reach to the cleansing of the sanctuary, which event, whatever it may be, certainly can in no wise be connected with the persecution of the people of God." Such, we say, would be the view that the average reader would take of the subject.

But before accepting that view as conclusive, it would be well to examine it a little more critically. If the premises are correct, the conclusion is sound. If not, the conclusion may be faulty. The premise is that the cleansing of the sanctuary could have no connection with the oppression of the saints. The conclusion is that the sentence in which it stands, could not have been designed as an answer to the question propounded in reference to that oppression. Before adopting such a conclusion, it would be well to inquire of the one offering it, whether he is quite sure that he understands exactly what is meant by the term "cleansing of the sanctuary." Unless he differs widely from the average reader, we would risk nothing in venturing the assertion that the subject is one to which he has never given any thought; or at least, one that he does not comprehend. Possibly, therefore, investigation might reverse his premise, and consequently, his conclusion. In other words, if it can be shown that in connection with the cleansing of the sanctuary, events will transpire of such a nature that they might properly mark the termination of the long and bloody period of persecution through which the saints were to pass, then a reference to that work would furnish an answer to the angel's question, both intelligible and pertinent.

What, then, we inquire, does the cleansing of the sanctuary signify? To answer this question intelligently, one must first understand what the term "sanctuary" is applied to in the Scriptures. The first mention of it is found in Ex. 25:1-8. In these verses Moses is instructed that the people should make for the Lord a sanctuary that he might "dwell among them." The sanctuary, therefore, is nothing more nor less than a dwelling place for God. In Heb. 9:1-5, Paul describes the sanctuary of the first covenant; i. e., the sanctuary with which Daniel was familiar and therefore the one to which allusion was no doubt made by the angel. Should it be suggested that the tabernacle of Moses had given place before Daniel's time to the temple of Solomon, it is sufficient to reply that they were substantially one and the same thing, though varying somewhat in external form. The furniture of both was practically identical, since both contained an ark, a candle-stick, a golden altar, a censer, a table of show-bread, and the tables of the covenant on which were written the ten commandments.

Thus much by way of defining the term "sanctuary." The next inquiry should relate to what is meant by the "cleansing of the sanctuary." The writings of Moses will, we think, furnish the desired information. From them we learn that on every day in the year, except the last one, the victims were slain, and their blood brought by the priests into the first apartment of the sanctuary, and sprinkled in front of the veil that separated that apartment from the most holy place, where the ark was situated that contained the law of God that the sinner had broken.

To sum up as briefly as possible, this procedure signified that the transgressor wished to con-less his sins and secure pardon for them through the blood of Christ, which blood was typified by the blood of the victim that the sinner had slain with his own hands, after confessing over it his sins. John 1:29; 1 John 1:7. We repeat that on all except the last day of the year this work went on in the first apartment of the sanctuary. On the last day of the year, which was called the day of atonement, the high priest alone entered the most holy place where he made an atonement for the sins of the people and cleansed the sanctuary, performing certain very solemn rites and sprinkling the blood of a bullock and of the Lord's goat, so called, upon the mercy seat and in front of the ark, agreeably to the provisions of the Mosaic law. Lev. 16:31-34.

In the 9th chapter of Hebrews the apostle Paul enters into an extended discussion of this subject, and shows most conclusively that the services performed in the tabernacle of Moses were simply typical and incapable of actually cleansing from sin. Heb. 9:6-28. He also demonstrates the fact that the blood of Christ will do that which the blood of bulls and goats could not accomplish; i. e., purge the "conscience from dead works." Putting these two facts together, the conclusion is reached that the high priest of the Mosaic ritual simply performed a service that symbolized a work that Christ, the antitype of the high priest, should do for his people at some future time.

To locate that time, it is only necessary to examine the type a little more fully. Remembering that the round of service in the tabernacle of Moses covers the whole year and was repeated each year, it is readily perceived that it was designed to typify a work that would be co-extensive with the history of the race, and that the day of atonement, or last day of the year, must have symbolized a service that Christ, our High Priest, will perform for his people in the very close of time. The nature of that service at once becomes apparent. It must necessarily be performed in connection with the judgment, as it represents the final and unconditional disposition of the sins of Christ's people; a thing that cannot be accomplished until the close of probation. Acts 3:10-21.

Thus much by way of defining what is meant by cleansing the sanctuary. From the facts adduced, it is discernible that the cleansing of the sanctuary was but a symbol of the judgment. Such being the case, we shall do no violence to the sense, if, in the reply of the angel we substitute the word "judgment" in the place of the expression "cleansing of the sanctuary." The passage would then read as follows: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the judgment take place."

But says one, you have simply changed the form of expression without helping us to understand its connection with the termination of the persecution of the people of God, spoken of by the angel. I answer, Very true; but if you will follow us a little further, all will become plain. In a former prophecy, Daniel had been shown that the session of the judgment would be the signal for the final overthrow of the papacy. In Dan. 7:25, 26 we read, "And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and shall think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time. But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end." The "little horn" which the connection proves to be the power alluded to in these verses, is admitted by nearly all Protestant commentators to represent the pope of Rome. Here, therefore, is a brief outline of the bloody history of that apostate power. For 1260 years ("until a time and times and the dividing of time") the saints were to be delivered into his hand. At the expiration of that period, they were to be taken out of his hand, and subsequently to that event his dominion was to be taken away and consumed to the end; i. e., he was to be utterly shorn of the authority which had so long enabled him to put to death the saints of God. While his dominion remained, he could terrify the church. Deprived of that dominion, he could no longer harm any one. But when was that dominion to be taken away? The text says at the time of the "judgment." Putting these things together, the import of Dan. 8:13, 14 becomes obvious to all. The angel had inquired, how long the "daily" (paganism) and transgression of desolation (the papacy or the Roman power) should tread under-foot the sanctuary and the host. The answer in substance was, as we have seen, that the host, or church, should be trodden under-foot until the judgment should sit. This answer Daniel could not fail to comprehend when he recollected the fact that the cleansing of the sanctuary and the work of the judgment were the same, and that the "little horn" was to lose its dominion when the judgment should sit. Dan. 7:25, 26.

There was one thing in the connection, however, that the prophet did not comprehend then and there. That thing was the time of the commencement of the 2300 days which were to reach to the final complete deliverance of the saints in the taking away of the dominion of the papacy. Subsequently he was enlightened upon this point also. Now if it is possible to find the termination of the days in question, and if, when found, it can be made to appear that the dominion of the papacy was taken away to be consumed to the end, and that from that time to this the pope has been powerless to oppress the saints, then the exegesis offered above will be so fully confirmed that no man ought to doubt its accuracy. It does not come within the scope of this article to enter into an exhausted discussion of the teachings of the 8th chapter of Daniel as a whole, or even of any part of it. For such a discussion, the reader is referred to a work entitled "The Sanctuary and Its Cleansing," published at the Review and Herald Office.

In the vision of the 8th of Daniel, there was something which at its close, the prophet did not comprehend. The thing in question must have been the starting point of the 2300 days, since everything else was satisfactorily explained. In confirmation of this theory, the reader's attention is called to Dan. 9: 22-27. There the angel who had been sent to give Daniel "skill and understanding" requests him to "understand the matter, and consider the vision." This done he addressed him as follows: "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city." You will observe that the allusion is to the matter of time. The word translated "determined," signifies "cut off," in the original. Do you ask what the seventy weeks were cut off from? The answer is, there is nothing from which they could be cut off save the 2300 days of the previous chapter. In other words the passage teaches that the first seventy weeks of those days were devoted to the Jews as a people; the balance was to cover the Gentile period. The Jews were cast off in A. D. 34; and about that time Paul was converted and sent to preach to the Gentiles. Acts 9: 1-17. Seventy weeks (490 years) measuring backward from A. D. 34, would reach to A. C. 457, marking that point as the commencement of the 2300 days (years). Twenty-three hundred years, measuring from A. C. 457, would reach to A. D. 1844, when, if the view here advocated is correct, the cleansing of the sanctuary, or the judgment, must have been entered upon.

Do you inquire what sanctuary there was in existence at that time, since both the tabernacle of Moses and the temple of Solomon had been destroyed long ages before? The reply is, God has a sanctuary, or temple, in heaven, which is the great antitype of the Jewish buildings. In proof of this position, consult the following texts: Ps. 11: 4; 102: 19; Heb. 8: 1, 2; Rev. 15: 5; Heb. 9: 23, 24; 8: 4, 5. In 1844, from the premises introduced, it is argued here that the investigative judgment, or the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, was entered upon by our great High Priest, the Lord Jesus Christ. To this proposition it is idle to oppose worldly wisdom. God knows his own times better than we do. In such things it is only safe to follow the teachings of his word. The angel said that at the end of the 2300 days, or 2300 years, since in the prophecies of Daniel a prophetic day stands for a literal year, the sanctuary should be cleansed. As there was no sanctuary save that in heaven which existed at the end of that period, that must have been the one to which he referred.

If the interpretation of a prophecy be absolutely correct, events will in process of time, confirm that interpretation. Though we believe that no solid argument from the Scripture standpoint can be forged against the explanation of Dan. 8: 13, 14, heretofore set forth, it would be very satisfactory could it be made to appear that it is confirmed by the facts of history. A few words on this point, and the subject will be left with the reader.

About 1844 there was an unusual development in Italy, of factions hostile to the pope and his rule. The populace clamored more and more for Italian unity. The pope was in the way of the realization of that scheme. In 1848 he was driven from Rome. Subsequently he returned to that city. Never after that did he sit firmly and easily upon his throne. In 1870 he called the Ecumenical Council, that uttered the decree of papal infallibility. In July of the same year the cannon of Victor Emmanuel thundered at the gate of Rome, and the pope was virtually made a prisoner in his own palace; his temporal power was revoked, and he was deprived of the territory of the papal states. In other words, his dominion was wholly taken away. To-day he dare not lay so much as his finger roughly upon the shoulder of the meanest peasant residing within the limits of his former domain. The thunders of the Vatican are not feared, because they are not attended as formerly, with the lightning of the temporal power in any part of the world.

Thus, candid reader, in two significant directions does history confirm the fact that the judgment is now in session, first, by the blasphemous claims of the pope, which we all have heard in the matter of the papal infallibility dogma (Dan. 7: 8-11); secondly, by the record of those startling events by which the pope has been gradually but surely bereft of his political power and influence. Dan. 7: 25, 26. In the face of these facts, who will venture to deny that in Dan. 8: 13, 14 there is found the question of an angel respecting the length of the persecution that the people of God were to suffer from papal Rome, and a clear and definite answer to the same in the words, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days: then shall the sanctuary be cleansed"?

AM April 19, 1892

L.A.S.

THE SUPREME COURT.

"I BEHELD till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened." Dan. 7:9, 10.

In these words of the inspired prophet we are enabled to get a glimpse of a scene the most awful, solemn, and sublime, of any which the incidents of our own or any other world have ever afforded. It is a picture of the session of the great court of all courts,—the supreme tribunal of the universe.

In this awful and indescribable scene, the central figure is the great Judge,—the "Ancient of days." Invested with infinity in all the attributes of his being, there is none to question his right to the judgment-seat or dispute the validity of his decrees. No associate justices share with him this universal authority; for omniscience has no need of counsel, nor omnipotence of aid. Forth from his presence issues the all-devouring element by which his sentences are to be carried into execution. The judgment-seat is the throne of God; the court room, the temple which "was opened in heaven" (Rev. 11:19) wherein was seen the "ark of his testament" containing the divine law which has been transgressed. This temple is "the sanctuary," the "true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched" (Heb. 8:2) and a pattern of which was shown to Moses in Mt. Sinai.

The great court room is filled with an audience; and never such an audience were gathered within the precincts of any earthly event. Their very number lends sublimity to the scene. "Ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands" (Rev. 5:11),—no human eye could measure such a multitude. Not as a vast concourse of idle spectators, drawn thither by curiosity, are they assembled about the throne; not as a turbulent mob, whose sympathies are against the administration of justice. Throughout the entire scene there is perfect universal harmony of thought and actions. The great audience are animated by one feeling; they are of one mind with the great Chief Justice who presides.

An advocate is there, to plead the cause of those who have been cited to appear as transgressors of the holy law. Invested with the robes of his mediatorial office, he stands in the presence of the infinite Majesty upon the judgment-seat. Heb. 9:24. For his responsible position he is perfectly qualified. He understands every claim of the law, and knows exactly what steps to take in behalf of those whose cause he represents. There is not the slightest danger that he will make any mistake in conducting the case. He is the one Advocate who never makes mistakes,—the one and only one who is qualified with the attributes of divinity.

This mighty advocate is the Son of God. He pleads before his Father in behalf of the sinner, but he is not there to clear the guilty. Ex. 34:7. He does not seek to evade the claims of the law; he resorts to none of the subtleties so common to earthly tribunals. There are no technicalities mentioned, but every case is tried upon its merits. Every one who is entitled to be cleared will be cleared, and not one who is not so entitled will escape his punishment; and of the justice of each decision there will be no doubt.

In the suits tried before this bar each transgressor appears alone as the party defendant, with God and all the hosts who are concerned in the extinction of sin, as parties plaintiff. The defendant appears in court by the entry of his name upon the heavenly record, and this record is the book of life. The witnesses for or against him are the writings which have been entered by the heavenly recorder in one of the great ledgers of heaven, and which give a faithful transcript of his life and character.

This appears from the language of the inspired prophet, who says, "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." Rev. 20:12. Each one is tried for a capital offense, that of treason against the royal government of heaven, and for each the decision is one for life or death.

From the fair pages of the book of life, an angel voice calls a name, and the individual is thus brought before the great assize. He is a descendant of Adam, and therefore by nature a transgressor of the law. Then the great ledger is opened in which are recorded the words and deeds of his life. Then from the ark of the testament, from beneath the overpowering glory of the divine presence shines forth in awful characters the holy law which he has transgressed; and while the record of his life is examined, the law appears as his accuser, demanding his death. The most intense interest ever seen or felt in earthly courts is not to be compared with that felt by the vast angelic assembly during this investigation. If at the close it appears that he has confessed and forsaken his sins, professed faith in Christ and relied wholly upon his merits, the great Advocate at the bar raises his hands before the omnipotent Judge, pleads the merits of his own blood

In satisfaction of the claims of the law, and asks that he be accepted and numbered among those to whom immortality will be brought at the appearing of the Lifegiver. He acknowledges the claims of the law, but offers a plea in bar, which cannot be denied. Then the sins of the individual are blotted out from the heavenly records, and a thrill of joy pervades the angelic host that another soul is added to the number that shall sing the song of the redeemed. But if the record shows that he had fallen from his justification,—that he had ceased to exercise living faith in Christ and to trust wholly in him,—the divine Advocate is silent, and a thrill of sadness runs through the great assembly, while an angel hand blots out his name from the book of life, and all his good deeds from the pages of his life history. The dark record of his sins is left, to be passed over to the second and final judgment, while the immutable unsatisfied law, shining out in letters of burning fire, declares his eternal doom. Matt. 10:32; Luke 12:8, 9; Rev. 3:6.

Thus is the issue of life or death determined for all those who, by the entry of their names in the book of life, have announced that they have accepted the great sacrifice made for man and are candidates for immortality. In the case of all others, the fact that their names have not been entered upon its pages, signifies that the sentence of death for their transgressions has never been suspended, that they were never candidates for immortality, and that there is therefore no question as to what must be their end. They are passed over to the great final judgment, in which the saints will themselves take part, and in which angels as well as men will receive sentence for their sins. 1 Cor. 6:2, 3; Rev. 20:4.

In this tremendous scene all living souls have an interest and doubly so from the fact that it is a scene which Heaven presents to-day. The Supreme Court of the universe is now sitting, and it will sit but once. Here its session is concluded, the case of every soul will have been decided. It did not begin its investigative work unannounced. The holy prophet, looking forward in vision to its great inaugural day, beheld an angel flying "in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come." Rev. 14:6, 7. He heard and saw, as it were, the angelic court orier, announcing to all the world that the great supreme tribunal had begun its session. This announcement was first sounded nearly fifty years ago, and from that time has been steadily going to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people, upon the earth. For nearly fifty years therefore this great investigation and decision of cases has been going on in the Supreme Court above, and who can say how near it now is to its completion?

It is court week in heaven, and every individual has a case pending. If he has professed Christ, his name has been entered in the book of life, and will be named before the great Judge and the innumerable company of angels. The moment must come when his name will be spoken there, while every thought is centered upon him among the infinite assembly, waiting with intensest interest the decision of his case. With many this moment must come while they are alive upon the earth; for the great work must be near to its completion; and who, when it comes, would wish it to find him in a trifling, careless mood? Who but would be awed into the most awful solemnity, did he know that his name was about to be spoken, his case investigated and forever determined, in the judgment scene above? Who but would then feel as he never felt before, the need of an all-powerful advocate and the worthlessness of any merits of his own?

From this hour of final reckoning there is no escape. There will be no pleading to the jurisdiction of this court, for it has both original and appellate jurisdiction in all cases and for all causes. There will be no postponement of the trial, no change of venue, no appeal from the decision of the court. If the individual has professed faith in Christ, his case will be individually examined and decided; and if he has made no such profession, his case will, when this court shall have closed its session, be just as conclusively determined. That closing will be announced by the solemn words, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still,"—indicating that all cases, so far as any change of character is concerned, have been irrevocably settled. Rev. 22:11.

The decisions of this great court are unerring and conclusive; there will be no minority decisions to be rendered; and when its solemn work is concluded, many a final judgment of the lower, earthly courts will have been forever overruled and reversed.

L. A. S.

SANCTUARY.

1. WHAT did the angel say to Daniel? Dan. 8:14.
2. Where was God's sanctuary in the old dispensation? Ps. 102:19.
3. Where is it in this dispensation? Heb. 8:1, 2.
4. What did God tell Moses to do? Ex. 25:8.
5. How did Moses know how to make it? Ex. 25:8, 9, 10; Heb. 8:5; 9:23.
6. Give a description of the sanctuary that Moses made? Heb. 9:1-5; Ex. 26:33.
7. Are there two places in the heavenly sanctuary? Heb. 9:24. Then if the places made with hands are the figures of the heavenly, there must be two places there.
8. How many under priests assisted in the earthly sanctuary? 1 Chron. 24:4, 5.
9. Is this order recognized in the heavenly sanctuary? Rev. 4:4, 5. In Smith's Bible Dictionary the term "priest" is thus defined: "The English word is derived from the Greek presbyter signifying an elder."
10. Were these elders recognized as priests? Rev. 5:8-10.
11. Were there seven golden candlesticks in the earthly sanctuary? Heb. 9:2; Ex. 25:37.
12. What else did Moses make? and where did he place it? Ex. 30:1, 40:26, 27.
13. Do we find the same in the heavenly sanctuary? Rev. 4:5; 8:3, 9:13.
14. Moses made an ark also; where did he place it? Ex. 25:10, 11; 17:18-20; 26:33, 34.
15. What was the ark called, and why? Ex. 26:33; 25:16, 21.
16. Is the ark of which this was a pattern in heaven? Rev. 15:5; 11:19.
17. Is the same language used in speaking of the ark in both sanctuaries? (Compare Rev. 15:5 with Num. 9:15.)
18. What did God want Moses to build a sanctuary for? Ex. 25:8.
19. In the earthly sanctuary where did God dwell by the symbol of his presence? Ex. 25:22.
20. Where is God's throne in heaven? Ps. 99:1. Christ is set down on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens, and is a minister, or priest, of the sanctuary in heaven. Heb. 8:1-4. Then the throne of God is in the sanctuary in heaven, and John was looking into the heavenly sanctuary when he saw the seven lamps of fire, the altar of incense, and the ark of the testimony.
21. What was the testimony that Moses put into the ark? Ex. 31:18; Deut. 10:8-5.
22. Did God have a law before the tables of the law were given to Moses? Gen. 26:5; Ex. 18:9; 16:4; 18:16.
23. How long after the manna was given in Ex. 16:4, before the law was spoken from Sinai? Ex. 12:2, 8, 9, 10; 16:1; 19:1, 15, 16; 15:24-26. One month and two days before the law was formally proclaimed from Sinai, the manna was given to prove them if they would walk in God's law. Now that we have found that God had a law before he spoke it from Sinai, we must conclude that the law given to Moses on tables of stone was only a copy, or pattern, of the law of God in heaven. As the ark in the earthly sanctuary was called the ark of the testimony because it contained the copy of God's law given to Moses, so the ark in the heavenly sanctuary is called the ark of the testimony, because it contains the law of God.

24. In the earthly sanctuary, did the priests minister in both apartments? Heb. 9:6, 7.
25. What was the daily sacrifice in the first apartment? Ex. 20:38, 39, 42.
26. What was the manner of transferring the sin from the sinner to the sanctuary, and securing his forgiveness? Lev. 4:27-30; 4:14-18; 5:6-9; 10:16-18.
27. What were the services in the second apartment? Lev. 16:29, 30, 33.
28. What was the manner of removing the sin from the earthly sanctuary? Lev. 16:5-22. The service of the priest in the earthly sanctuary represented the service in the heavenly. Heb. 8:4, 5; 7:21-27.
29. Both the earthly and the heavenly sanctuary are cleansed with blood. Heb. 9:22-24, 12.
30. We are told that the sins of God's people will be blotted out. Isa. 43:25.
31. When will this be done? Acts 3:19-21. The time of the restitution of all things is when Christ comes the second time to this earth, and restores to his people what was lost through sin: Purity (Col. 1:13, 14); Life (Rom. 8:23; John 5:28, 29); The dominion (Micah 4:8).

RH April 3, 1894

Clarke

THE JUDGMENT.

BY JOSEPH CLARKE.

(Lowry City, Mo.)

As the investigative judgment comes nearer to its close, the hours seem more precious; the weeks and months are more heavily laden with the sad history of nations and empires and the experience of individual members of the great family of Adam everywhere upon the earth.

To those who appreciate the light thrown upon the present condition of our world, by the closing up of the 2300 days in 1844 (Dan. 8: 14; Revelation 10), the investigative judgment is pregnant with meaning,—full of joy to some, and bitter with sorrow to others.

The three messages of Revelation 14 are also connected, and closely follow the close of the 2300 days. The three messages are, in fact, one message in three divisions. The second message (verse 8) follows as a consequence of rejecting the first; and the third message (verses 9-13) is the final and last offer of salvation preached on the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus.

The first message clearly and pointedly sets forth the beginning of the investigative judgment, while the second and third messages, closely connected by the word "followed," show that probation continues for a time.

LESSONS; ON THE SANCTUARY.

Lesson 1.—The Sanctuary [of the Bible].

(Additional notes. Sabbath, Jan. 5.)

"SANCTUARY" belongs to a class of words derived from the Latin sanctus, to which sanctify, sanctify, and saint belong. Sanctus is defined, "rendered sacred, established inviolable." Sanctuarium (sanctuary) is defined, "a place for keeping sacred things."

Other terms are used for sanctuary, as tabernacles and temple, not because they are synonyms; but because the sanctuary on earth was at first located in a tabernacle or tent; and afterward in the temple, a permanent building. That which rendered the sanctuary a holy place was the presence and blessing of God. When that presence was withdrawn, its sacredness vanished, though in the minds of the people it might retain its previous character to some extent.

It is so with every place: God's presence renders it holy. To Moses at the burning bush the word came, "The place whereon thou standest is holy ground" because Christ was there. His presence sanctified the place; it was for that time a sanctuary. So with Mount Sinai when the Lord came down upon it. So it is now with the pure in heart, they see God: and God dwells with them. Their hearts are then sacred, and no unclean thing dwells there. The apostle alludes to this when he says: "Ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them." 2 Cor. 6:16. And, "the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are."

It was to represent this great spiritual truth and also to illustrate the true mediatorial work, that the earthly sanctuary was established. This was built in imitation of the heavenly sanctuary, the likeness of which was shown to Moses as a pattern, with strict injunctions to follow the pattern in his work.

This sanctuary of which the presence of God took possession was not only to remind them of the mediatorial work, and the imperfect state, it was also a strong reminder of that perfect state when it will be said, "The tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell [tabernacle] with them." In addition to the spiritual presence of God, which we may now enjoy, we shall then enjoy his visible presence. Not veiled in a cloud of glory impenetrable and unapproachable to mortals, but we shall be strengthened to behold not only the glory but the face within. There will be but one apartment in the heavenly state, for there will be no sin to separate between God and his people.

There is now a mysterious veil between God and the people. We only approach him through our High-priest, Christ Jesus: even as in ancient times only the High-priest could go into the inner presence. But in that future world we may see his face.

o. c. r.

LESSONS ON THE SANCTUARY.

Lesson 2.—Earthly Sanctuary.—Continued.

(Additional notes. Sabbath, Jan. 5.)

Just what the resources of the Israelites were for building the sanctuary does not appear. Their jewelry they had obtained of the Egyptians. Ex. 12:34, 35. They did not "borrow" these things, as we use the word, with the expectation or promise of returning them. They asked or demanded the jewelry. (See R. V.) It was their due. But it would seem that their supply of silk, wool, of timber, and implements must have been very limited. Doubtless they were. But what they had, was dedicated willingly, and the blessing of God made up the lack.

So it is now. The Lord never asks his people to do anything that he does not stand ready to make up their deficiency. We may be called upon to undertake a work that is too large for our straitened means; but if we go to work in faith, the Lord will see that our hands finish the work. Zech. 4:7-9.

In spiritual work the case is the same. The material, the strength, the skill, are all from God, and he it is who furnishes the pattern.

The planks that composed the walls of the sanctuary were very large. Their width was about thirty inches, and their length not less than sixteen feet. Six boards composed the west end, and doubtless the corner boards made up the width to ten cubits. These were spliced, or coupled, onto the side boards. It is supposed that the bars which run lengthwise of the building, five on each side, were in three rows; and that the middle one extended from end to end, while the other four ran only half way.

The east, or front end of the tabernacle, was closed by a curtain beautifully wrought and supported by five pillars overlaid with gold. The two apartments into which the sanctuary was divided, were called the holy place and the most holy. The latter was an exact cube of ten cubits each way. The tabernacle was no doubt strengthened by cords and stakes. Isa. 54:2.

cc. 7

LESSONS ON THE SANCTUARY.

Lesson 3.—Earthly Sanctuary.—Continued.

(Additional Notes, Sabbath, Jan. 12.)

Having studied of the walls of the sanctuary, we now consider its coverings. Of these there were four. Ex. 26: 1, 7, 14. The inner one of fine twined linen. Next to that one of goats' hair; then one of rams' skins; an outward one of badgers' skins. The inner curtain was very costly and beautiful. On a groundwork of blue, were wrought in purple and scarlet the images of heavenly beings. The length of this curtain, twenty-eight cubits, was such as to extend to within a cubit of the ground on either side; and its width of forty cubits would carry it nearly to the ground on the west end, besides leaving a width to fold back or keep up in front. From this some have supposed that the curtain was suspended inside the walls. But this is hardly supposable, since the golden lining of the walls was expressive of the glory of the heavenly places, as well as was the magnificent curtain whose cherubic figures represented the attendants in the heavenly sanctuary.

The appearance of this glorious place is thus described in "Patriarchs and Prophets," p. 349.

"No language can describe the glory of the scene presented within the sanctuary,—the gold-plated walls reflecting the light from the golden candlestick, the brilliant hues of the richly embroidered curtains, with their shining angels, the table, and the altar of incense glittering with gold; beyond the second veil the sacred ark, with its mystic cherubim, and above it the holy shekinah, the visible manifestation of Jehovah's presence,—all but a dim reflection of the glories of the temple of God in heaven, the great center of the work for man's redemption."

Above the inner curtain, which probably was drawn straight across from wall to wall, was the goats' hair curtain, two cubits longer, which it is thought, with the others, passed over an elevated ridge. But of this there is no positive knowledge, though the five pillars in front have been taken as an evidence that the center one was the tallest and supported a ridge.

Above and outside the goats' hair curtain were those of rams' skins and badgers' skins.

There is no doubt that while utility was aimed at in all these provisions, at the same time there was latent in them the mysterious significance of the great truths of redemption. In proportions, materials, and designs all bore testimony to the great work of expiation to which the sanctuary itself was devoted.

What these are have been the study of the curious and the devout. Without giving way to imagination there are many lessons of righteousness, of purity, and of glory to be learned by the humble student of the sacred Word.

G. C. T.

LESSONS ON THE SANCTUARY.

Lesson 4.—Earthly Sanctuary.—Continued.

(Additional Notes, Sabbath, Jan. 26.)

As before intimated, the sanctuary and its appurtenances were essentially typical of spiritual things. Not of one thing or of one system of services, but of a variety of objects. Primarily they represented the expiatory work of Christ, and were designed to educate the children of Israel, as object-lessons are now used to illustrate the lessons given to our children. The instructions thus given were designed to aid and strengthen their faith in the real work of Christ in their behalf.

Now that Christ has come, we may still study the sanctuary and its belongings, not only for what it taught them and for its more obvious signification, but also for the illustrations of sacred truth, which it was designed to convey, but which were not so easily grasped. Seen in the light of Christ and his teachings, the subject of the sanctuary has a meaning that it does not have without that radiant light.

The earthly sanctuary was a type of the heavenly. It was a type of Christ himself; it was typical of the church, and of individual Christian life. Emphatically and primarily it was designed to be a dwelling-place of God. And as the Father was in the Son, as God is manifested among his people, and as he dwells in the hearts of his children, so all these truths have their relation to the sanctuary.

God's presence is inseparably connected with his law. Therefore, in order that he might inhabit the sanctuary, his law must first be placed there. For this purpose the ark was built. Upon the tables of that ark the law was inscribed by God's hand. But in God's administration mercy unites with truth; there "mercy and truth are met together." Ps. 85:10. So to the ark was fixed the mercy-seat. God's government is unique in the respect that it perfectly combines justice and mercy without sacrificing the least consideration of either.

In the sanctuary, the ark was the central figure. It was within the inner apartment. It was the Acron of the sanctuary. The Saviour says, "Thy law is within my heart." And where God's law dwells, there his will is supreme. God "desireth truth in the inward parts." Ps. 51:6. There is where he placed his law in the sanctuary, not outside as a gazing-stock for the passer-by. So in our experiences he proposes to put his law in our inward parts, to write (not to have us write) his law in our hearts. Jer. 31:33. A profession of adherence to God's commandments is not what is meant. But it is the indwelling presence of God and his law which sanctifies the place and renders holy all that is connected with it. Without the shekinah the sanctuary was but a pretence. And when the ark was removed, God departed. But the divine presence brings truth, mercy, righteousness, and peace.

LESSONS ON THE SANCTUARY.

Lesson 6.—The Offerings for Sin.

(Additional Notes, Sabbath, Feb. 2.)

Four parties were recognized in the law regarding offerings for sin: The priest, the congregation, the ruler, and the common people.

In each case the offender (in the case of the congregation, the elders) placed his hand on the head of the offering. By this act the sinful condition was transferred from the real sinner to the substitute. And the innocent substitute who "knew no sin" became sin in the sight of the law. For that sin he died, and his innocence went to the offering sinner. See how this prefigures the wonderful facts stated in 2 Cor. 5:21.

The Disposal of the Sin-offering.—A portion of the blood of the sin-offerings of the priests and of the congregation was taken into the sanctuary, placed upon the horns of the altar of incense, and sprinkled seven times before the Lord, before the veil. The remainder of the blood was poured out at the foot of the altar. The fat was burnt upon the altar of burnt-offerings, and the carcass was burned without the camp. The priest occupied a holy and exalted place as a representative of the people at large. As occupying such a place, sin was more heinous in him. In his sins the whole congregation was involved, and they had a national significance. Accordingly they were treated as sins of the whole body were treated. A deeper sacrifice, so to speak, was demanded for them. Not only so, but the sins of this character being those of the community, there was not the representation of individual accountability that was manifested in the other classes.

Another consideration that makes the sin of the priest here referred to a community sin is the reading of the Revised Version, which is, "If the anointed priest [probably the high-priest] shall so sin as to bring guilt on the people." Dr. Clarke remarks that reliable authorities give this as the sense. So the sin becomes a national one, because it is one into which the priest leads the people.

Sin-offerings for Rulers and Common People.—A marked difference is made in the manner of disposing of these offerings from that in which the others were disposed of. None of the blood was carried into the sanctuary. A little was placed upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offering, and the rest was poured out at the bottom of that altar. The fat was burned upon the altar. But the flesh, instead of being burned without the camp, was eaten by the priest. And this was not as the eating of ordinary food, for the law declared that "whosoever shall touch the flesh thereof shall be holy;" and again, "It is most holy." Lev. 6:25-30; 10:18-20. In the latter text Moses is cited as saying to Aaron, "Wherefore have ye not eaten the sin-offering in the holy place, seeing it is most holy, and God hath given it you to bear the iniquity of the congregation." Thus the sinner transferred his guilt to the offering. The priest ate the offering, and thus bore the guilt in his own person, as he ministered before the altar. Here again is set forth in a lively manner the way in which we as individuals are represented before God in the person of his Son, who verily took upon himself the seed of Abraham, and bears our infirmities in his own body. It is in this sense that God looks upon us in the person of his Son. Not only was his blood split for us, but he took our nature, and can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities.

G. C. T.

Feb 5, 1895

G C Tenny

LESSONS ON THE SANCTUARY.

Lesson 7.—The Sanctuary in Heaven.

(Additional Notes, Sabbath, Feb. 16.)

The Heavenly Priesthood.—When man by sin lost the privilege of communion with God, the necessity of a mediator at once appeared. This necessity was met in Christ, who espoused the cause of the lost race. He was "slain from the foundation of the world." Christ fulfills in himself the office of sacrifice and mediator. He presents his own blood, which earthly priests could not do.

We need not infer that the little 19 x 30 sanctuary represents in actual size and appearance the heavenly. It was but a miniature of a vast and infinitely glorious place. The cherubim wrought in curtains and walls represent living ministers in the heavenly courts. The earthly was made after a pattern of something that already existed.

The Need of the Earthly.—It was not to open up a necessary way to God, but to illustrate to untutored men the already opened way, and reveal the real services on high. The earthly could not take the place of the heavenly. Its only office was to teach of the heavenly.

The Melchisedec and the Aaronic.—These are two lines of priesthood sometimes contrasted in the Bible. The former was a perpetual priesthood: the second, temporary. The Melchisedec was the antitype, the reality; the Aaronic, the typical and shadowy. Paul says: "For this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, . . . abideth a priest continually." Heb. 7:1-3. "Melchisedec" is not, in the Hebrew language, a proper name. It needs translation as much as does the other title, "King of Salem," which is only half translated.

Who was Melchisedec?—"Melchisedec" is made up from a Hebrew phrase, melchi-tsedek, meaning "king of righteousness." The other title, melchi-shalom, which is "king of peace." So that the personage who met Abraham was named King of Righteousness and King of Peace, not king of Salem, whatever or wherever that may have been.

We accept the statement made by sister White in REVIEW AND HERALD of Feb. 18, 1890, that "Melchisedec was not Christ." We also read in immediate connection that "he was the voice of God in the world, the representative of the Father." And it is impossible to read Hebrews 7, giving full force to the remarkable statements made there, without concluding that he was himself a heavenly personage of dignity, a priest of the Most High. He was not Christ, but he took his name from Christ, because he was of the heavenly order. He was called "Melchisedec," and "Melchi-shalom" because from the great King of Righteousness and of Peace he received his commission and his name. Christ is High-priest and as such the title Melchisedec applies primarily to him. Secondarily it may be applied to the priests of his order, as was the case with the holy one who appeared to Abraham, and who was doubtless sent to earth on that mission.

The Heavenly Priests.—If it were shown that Christ did not enter directly upon his own priestly work until after his mission to earth, we would not necessarily conclude that there were no priestly services in heaven until then.

G. C. T.

THE SANCTUARY AND ITS SERVICES.

Preached in the Tabernacle, Sabbath, Jan. 12, 1895.

BY PROF. W. W. PRESCOTT.
(Battle Creek, Mich.)

As our attention is called from week to week, in our Sabbath-school lessons, to the subject of the sanctuary, it seems a fitting time to dwell upon this theme, that, while it is thus in our minds, we may get all the help possible from the subject. The special lesson which we should learn will be this: What God did in type in the earthly sanctuary, he did in fact in the person of Jesus Christ, the representative of humanity, in order that God in Christ might do in fact in believers what he did in type in the sanctuary.

The very first idea suggested in the erection of the sanctuary was that God might have a dwelling-place. "And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them." Ex. 25:8. And this dwelling-place was to be made by the people. That is to say, there is suggested in this very first thought the idea that divinity and humanity meet in the tabernacle. The people were to make the tabernacle; God was to dwell in it. But in Christ, as set forth in 2 Cor. 5:19, we have the same idea. "To wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself." As God directed the people to build a sanctuary that he might dwell among them, so "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us;" and God provided for himself a dwelling-place in humanity. And as he revealed himself to his people then, in the sanctuary, so he revealed himself again to the world, in Jesus Christ. But God was with Christ and in Christ, in order that God with Christ and God in Christ, might be God with us and God in us. "Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel, which being interpreted is, God with us." Matt. 1:23. But as Christ is but a manifestation of God to the world, it is the same idea. The central thought of the gospel and of Christian life and experience is, "Christ in you, the hope of glory."

And as the earthly temple was God's dwelling-place, and as God was in Christ, and as he is in the believer, wherever he dwells, there is his sanctuary, there is his temple. So we read in 1 Cor. 3:16: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are."

And in 2 Cor. 6:16: "And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them." Idolatry includes more than the outward worship of objects of wood or stone or any other material. For instance, covetousness is idolatry. Now to exhibit in ourselves—the temple of God in which he dwells—those things which include the essence of idolatry, is just as much an insult to the God of heaven and his dwelling-place as it would have been if the priests of old had brought into God's sanctuary one of the idols of the heathen and set it beside the ark. It is polluting God's dwelling-place; it is insulting God; it is putting him on a level with the gods of the heathen. But he says he is not such a one. All the gods of the heathen are idols; but the Lord made the heavens. So we read the same thought in Eph. 2:19-22: "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord; in whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit." A dwelling-place was the first idea of the earthly sanctuary. It suggests the idea of the union of the human and the divine. The people made the sanctuary themselves; God dwelt in it. So Christ in the flesh was God's dwelling-place; for God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself. But God dwelt in Christ, and Christ was manifested in the flesh, in order that God in Christ and with Christ, who was a representative of humanity, might be God in us and with us; and that is the very center of the whole gospel work.

Further, as to the building of this tabernacle: "And thou shalt rear up the tabernacle according to the fashion thereof which was showed thee in the mount." Ex. 26:30. The earthly tabernacle was to be built according to the pattern showed in the mount; that is to say, it was to be an exact revelation of what was already in heaven. So Christ in the flesh was a revelation of what existed before. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. . . . And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." "All things are delivered unto me of my father; and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." And Christ was a revelation to the world of what was already in heaven, and the grace that was revealed in our Lord Jesus Christ was the grace which was hidden in him before the foundation of the world. But it was revealed. And the character of Christ was an exact pattern of the character of God, and he was made after the pattern of heavenly things. So it is with us. When God's work in building this tabernacle upon earth is completed, and when that work is fully wrought in complete sanctification, then we shall be exactly according to the Pattern that was shown Peter, James, and John in the mount. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." And the Scripture shows how completely this tabernacle, when completed, will be according to the Pattern shown to Peter, James, and John in the mount.

Of Him it is said, "His face did shine as the sun." Now this was the Son of man coming in his kingdom. In Matt. 13:43, speaking of the closing work, after the tares are gathered out and burned, and all things that offend are gathered out and cast aside: "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." It will be exactly according to the pattern showed in the mount. "The disciple is not above his master; but every one when he is perfected shall be as his master." Luke 6:40, Revised Version. When God finishes his work in the believer, and the believers are perfected, they will be as the Master; that is, they will be according to the Pattern showed in the mount.

(To be continued.)

THE SANCTUARY AND ITS SERVICES.

Preached in the Tabernacle, Sabbath, Jan. 12, 1895.

BY PROF. W. W. PRESCOTT.

(Bottle Creek, Mich.)

(Continued.)

THE glory of the Lord rested upon the earthly tabernacle, and could be seen by the people. Ex. 40:38, 34. And just as the glory of God rested upon the earthly tabernacle, and in token of acceptance of the work done, exactly so did the glory of God rest upon Jesus Christ in the flesh, who was himself a representative of humanity, and in the face of Jesus Christ could that glory be seen. "For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." 2 Cor. 4:6. This glory could be seen by all who believed.

Christ walked upon the earth and among men, and many did not see the glory of God, because they did not believe; but every one who believed was permitted to see in the face of Jesus Christ the glory of God. So Christ, at the close of his work, in his prayer recorded in John 17:22, says: "And the glory which thou gavest me I have given them." That is, it is the privilege of every believer that the glory of God should rest upon him in token of his acceptance with God, just as the glory of God shone in the face of Jesus Christ, and just as the glory of God rested upon the tabernacle in token of God's acceptance of that work. But this thought has more than ordinary meaning to us now, because the word which comes to us now is, "Arise, shine; for thy light is come; and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." That is the message for this time; "for, behold, the darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people; but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee." Just as his glory was seen upon the earthly tabernacle, just as his glory was seen upon the face of Jesus Christ, so now in a special sense it is time that the glory of God should be seen upon his people.

We read in Ps. 68:1, 2: "O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee; my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is; to see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary." That is, those who believe see God in the sanctuary. "Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father." John 14:8, 9. That is, those who believed were to see God in Christ, as they saw him in the sanctuary. But the same thing is to be true of the believer. "If therefore the whole church be come together into one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned, or unbelievers, will they not say that ye are mad? But if all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all; and thus are the secrets of his heart made manifest; and so falling down on his face he will worship God, and report that God is in you of a truth." 1 Cor. 14:23-25. That is, the character of God is to be so revealed, and the working of God is to be so revealed in the believer, that others who see the outward evidences of such working, will be convinced that God is "in you of a truth;" just as he was in the sanctuary, and they saw him there; just as he was in Christ, and they saw him there.

But the special work in the ministration of the sanctuary was preaching the gospel. "Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it. For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them." Heb. 4:1, 2. Observe the force of the way it is stated. With our ordinary views of their privileges of that time, we should be inclined to say, "For unto them was the gospel preached, as well as unto us." But the scripture does not say so, "For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them." How was it preached to them? What is the gospel?—"I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation." Salvation from what?—From sin. And the ministration of the service in the earthly sanctuary was preaching to the people all the time the gospel of salvation from sin. It preached to them in type; it preached to them in ceremony; it gave a grand object-lesson of the work of God to free man from sin.

Let us note more particularly of that work. We will read Lev. 4:27-31: "And if any one of the common people sin through ignorance, while he doeth somewhat against any of the commandments of the Lord concerning things which ought not to be done, and be guilty; or if his sin, which he hath sinned, come to his knowledge; then he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a female without blemish, for his sin which he hath sinned. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin-offering, and slay the sin-offering in the place of the burnt-offering. And the priest shall take of the blood thereof with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offering, and shall pour out all the blood thereof at the bottom of the altar. And he shall take away all the fat thereof, as the fat is taken away from off the sacrifice of peace-offerings; and the priest shall burn it upon the altar for a sweet savor unto the Lord; and the priest shall make an atonement for him, and it shall be forgiven him." Now that is simply one of the many ways in which, in the ministration in the sanctuary, the idea of forgiveness was taught, and the gospel of salvation from sin was preached. And the sanctuary in its service suggested continually the idea of a substitute, a sacrifice, freedom from sin through death, atonement, cleansing.

Read it in Lev. 16:30: "For on that day [the tenth day of the seventh month] shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord." An atonement, a cleansing, a being clean from sin; and for this work all the efficacy was set forth in the type as being in the blood. "And the bullock for the sin-offering, and the goat for the sin-offering, whose blood was brought in to make atonement in the holy place, shall one carry forth without the camp; and they shall burn in the fire, their skins, and their flesh, and their dung." Verse 27. That is, the efficacy for the atonement, the cleansing, was in the blood. The bodies of such beasts were treated as an accursed thing, carried outside, and burned; but the blood was carried into the sanctuary, and with it the atonement was made.

(Concluded next week.)

THE SANCTUARY AND ITS SERVICES.

Preached in the Tabernacle, Sabbath, Jan. 12, 1890.

BY PROF. W. W. PRESCOTT.

(Dedicated, Mich.)

(Concluded.)

TURN to this same line of thought in the work of Christ. There are many scriptures; we will refer to one only under each heading. "And ye know that he was manifested to take away our sins." 1 John 3:5. Notice the force of the statement. He was manifested to take away our sins. He appeared, he came to this world, he was put forth, he was manifested, to take away our sins. Now the lesson that God would teach his people in the sanctuary was the forgiveness, the taking away, of sin. So we read in Eph. 1:7: "In whom [Christ] we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." In Christ there is the forgiveness that was typified in the ministration of the earthly sanctuary. And just as in the sanctuary the idea of atonement is taught, so it is found in Christ. "And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement." Rom. 5:11. What was in type in the sanctuary is in fact in Christ; and by him we do receive the atonement, the atonement, which was typified in the ministration of the sanctuary. So in the cleansing; for what was typified in the cleansing of the sanctuary we receive. "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." And so what was taught then in type in the sanctuary we receive in Jesus Christ,—the cleansing power of his blood; and it is by his blood.

God's purpose in doing this in type in the sanctuary, and then in doing it in reality in Jesus Christ, was that it might be done in the believer, and that the service typified in the sanctuary might be accomplished in the believer, not by the blood of bulls and of goats, but by the blood of Jesus Christ. Heb. 9:13, 14. What was set forth in type in the sanctuary service is found in fact in Jesus Christ. Those offerings could not purge the conscience; yet we are to be purged, cleansed, by the blood of Christ, from dead works, to serve the living God.

The foregoing thoughts merely suggest lines of comparison, to show how that what God did in type in the earthly sanctuary, he did in fact in Jesus Christ, in order that what God did in type in the sanctuary may be done in fact in the believer; and thus the sanctuary was preaching the gospel, which was the very work of Christ. So we read in Mark 1:14: "Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God."

God preached the gospel in the sanctuary service; he preached the gospel in sending Jesus Christ here. And Jesus Christ was the gospel; not simply he told people about the gospel, but he was himself the gospel; for he was himself exactly what he preached to the people,—free from sin; and he was the power of God unto salvation himself. And all his life was simply a preaching of the gospel, and presenting in life, in humanity, exactly the lessons that were taught in the sanctuary; the same lessons were preached to the world again in Jesus Christ. All that is done that the same thing may be done in the believer. "Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart." 2 Cor. 3:3. That is, just as the gospel which was preached in the sanctuary became personality in Jesus Christ, and was in that way preached again to the world, so this same gospel is to become personality in the believer, and is to be preached to the world by every believer in Jesus Christ. This is preaching the gospel indeed.

But notice this: when the directions were given for the building of the sanctuary, the very first thing was to build the ark. In Exodus 25 the instructions begin with reference to the building of the sanctuary, and the very first thing was the building of the ark; and in verse 16 of this chapter, we read: "And thou shalt put into the ark the testimony which I shall give thee." In chapter 31, verse 18, we read what this testimony is: "And he gave unto Moses, when he had made an end of communing with him upon Mount Sinai, two tables of testimony, tables of stone, written with the finger of God." Now read further: "And thou shalt put into the ark the testimony which I shall give thee. And thou shalt make a mercy-seat of pure gold; . . . and thou shalt put the mercy-seat above upon the ark; and in the ark thou shalt put the testimony that I shall give thee." Chapter 25:16, 17, 21. The ark of God was the very center of the sanctuary service. In the ark of God was put the law of God, and above it was put the mercy-seat, and that law of God in the ark was put into the inner apartment.

Now when Christ came to this world, although he came to preach the gospel, and did preach the gospel, we shall find that the law was put in the innermost place. Ps. 40: 7, 8. "Then said I, Lo, I come; in the volume of the book it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart." There are the gospel and the law together as they belong. As the law was made the center of the sanctuary service, and was put in the sacred chest, and then in the inner apartment, so when Christ came, who, in his life, was a preaching of the gospel which was also preached in the sanctuary service, the law of God was in the innermost place; and that was the very center of his work. And that was done in order that the same thing might be done in the believer, under the new covenant.

"For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people." Heb. 8: 10. But the only way by which it was possible that the law of God should be written in our hearts was that it was first put into the heart of humanity in Jesus Christ. And so that makes the law of God the very center of the sanctuary service, as it was the very central thought in Christ's work. He came not to do his own will, but the will of him who sent him; and his law was in the heart. And that was done in humanity, in Jesus Christ, in order that it might be possible that that law might be in the heart of every believer and might be the very center of his life.

It is also true that the sanctuary service and the instructions given concerning the sanctuary service in that time, have a special application to the work of God just at this time. Let us read again: "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary; I am the Lord." Lev. 26: 2. That is, the Sabbath and the sanctuary are closely united; and with the instruction concerning the way that the sanctuary was to be treated was united the instruction with reference to the Sabbath. Keep the one, reverence the other, because they go together, and they both rest upon the same foundation. That is, it was the presence of God in the sanctuary that made the sanctuary what it was; it was the presence of God in Christ that made Christ what he was; it is the presence of God in the believer that makes the believer what he is; it is the presence of God in Christ in the Sabbath that makes the Sabbath what it is; and the Sabbath is the sign of the extent to which God dwells in the believer.

And so the Sabbath question and the sanctuary question are bound together. "Keep my Sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary."

Now the only thing toward which the sanctuary service pointed, and the lesson which it taught all the time, was freedom from sin, forgiveness, cleansing, atonement, separation from sin. When an individual is separated from his sin, then he becomes like Christ; and Christ was simply the manifestation of the character of God. But the special work that goes forward at this time, and the work which has given rise to this people, is the work set forth particularly in the fourteenth chapter of the book of Revelation, and is familiarly spoken of as the three messages. But the result of that work, and the work that is to be completed just before Christ comes,—because "I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the Son of man;" the very next thing is the coming of Christ,—the work which is aimed at in these three messages, is stated in verse 12: "Here is the patience of the saints; here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." When that is true, then the earthly temple has again been cleansed, and sanctification is complete; then that people are ready for the coming of Christ. But "here are they that keep the commandments of God;" and God's true Sabbath is the seal and the very keystone of these commandments. "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths," and the faith of Jesus; but there is nothing in the sanctuary service unless it be through faith in Jesus, and that for forgiveness, remission of sin, atonement, reconciliation, and sanctification. "Ye shall keep my Sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary." "Here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus." These two texts go together. When the people of that time really carried out that instruction of the Scripture,—to keep the Sabbaths, and to reverence the sanctuary,—it could only be through an inward work, wrought in them by the power of God unto sanctification; so now, the people of whom it can really be said, as it will be said, as it is God's design that it shall be said, "Here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus,"—that can be done only through an inward work, wrought in the heart by the power of God in Jesus Christ; and when that work is really done, sanctification is complete, and the very next thing is the Son of man coming to gather his own. So what was taught then in the instruction concerning the sanctuary, is taught us in the three messages; and the completed result is to be the same in both cases,—atonement, reconciliation, cleansing, a readiness for the Lord.

Does it appear to you from these scriptures, that, from this particular phase of this question, we may learn something of God's purpose concerning us, and something of what he designed to teach in the sanctuary? And shall we say that the earthly sanctuary, having passed away, is of no special interest or importance to us now, because we have Christ? But notice how God does his work. He first preached Christ in the sanctuary,—a great object-lesson. Then he preached Christ in the flesh—a life—presenting before men, under the very circumstances under which they lived, and in the same flesh in which they lived, the very ideas preached in the sanctuary service,—freedom from sin, and cleansing. Then God preaches to all this same gospel in his word; and he has given to us the record of what he taught them in the sanctuary service, in order that we might better understand and appreciate the life of Christ and the work of Christ, and in order that we might co-operate with God in the development of his plan of salvation just as understandingly, step by step, as the Israelites could co-operate with their high-priest in the sanctuary as he conducted his services; because they were to do then different things at different times, for different reasons, and above all on the day of atonement they were to do differently from what they did on any other day.

Now in the development of God's plan we have come to the day of atonement, and the people are to do differently in co-operating with their High-priest from what they have previously done on other days. God gives us the record of his gospel in the sanctuary, that we may understand the development of his gospel through to its close, and that we may be able, step by step, to co-operate with him intelligently in his work of salvation in our behalf, through Jesus Christ, our great High-priest. In the light shed upon the sanctuary question by the work of Christ, we ought to be able to get more out of it even than the people of that day could get out of it. Although the Scripture says that these things were a shadow of things to come, remember that there must always be a very strong light, in order to make a shadow; and it is the light from the cross of Jesus Christ shining upon these types that makes the shadow.

So instead of filling our minds with the idea that there is a shadow there, let us look there with the light shining upon it from the cross of Calvary, and see what it means; and just as in all God's dealings with us, and just as when the priests had completed their work in the sanctuary, they came out and blessed the people, so God has blessings for those, who, in the study of his work in the sanctuary question, are ready to co-operate with him, and go through the day of atonement.

Such are some of the teachings of the sanctuary and its services when studied in the light shed from the cross of Calvary.

WHEN DID CHRIST BECOME PRIEST?

BY J. E. EVANS.
(New Orleans, La.)

I DESIRE here to speak of the doctrine that Christ officiated as priest in the first apartment of the heavenly sanctuary from the time sin entered our world to his first advent, and that when he ascended, he began his work as high priest in the second, or most holy, apartment; that since then he has been engaged in the antitypical atonement work, or cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary. The desire has been the father of the thought in this case, and this has made necessity "the mother of invention." It is argued that the words "holy place" in Heb.

9:12 should read "holy places," but the change is not supported by the Revised Version in this or the 24th verse. Now if Christ entered as high priest into the most holy place at that time, it would be reasonable to conclude that he acted as priest in the holy place before his first advent; but this cannot be the truth, for the following reasons: First, the apostle Paul in Hebrews, chapters 8-10, makes an argument upon the priesthood of Christ, comparing the type with the antitype, and says nothing about any service being performed in the heavenly sanctuary previous to Christ's coming as a sin offering; but all the testimony goes to show that the Aaronic priesthood preceded that of Christ, and that the first was only "a shadow of things to come." The same writer also says, "Without shedding of blood is no remission." By virtue of the divine plan, Christ was looked upon as "slain from the foundation of the world;" but his blood was not yet shed, and therefore the heavenly sanctuary was not even dedicated until that blood was shed.

We next inquire, What was it that qualified those earthly priests for their work? Speaking of them this epistle says, "Who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity." Chapter 5:2. Going back to chapter two, we learn that he partook of our flesh and blood, and the reason why he did this is stated in verses 17, 18: "Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted." Therefore in chapter 4:15 he continues: "For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." If we can tell when it was that Christ was thus tempted, we can then tell when he was in every sense fitted for his work as priest.

The expression, "within the veil," of chapter 8:19, is by some made to teach that Christ entered the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary more than eighteen hundred years ago; but this is not necessarily so, for Paul speaks of a "second veil," and if there is a second, there must also have been a first. To use the plural of "place" in chapter 9:12, and say that Christ entered both by passing through the first into the second apartment when he ascended, is to leave the first apartment without any service whatever; for, as we have seen, he could not be priest until he came in the likeness of sinful flesh. Again: "If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, . . . what further need was there that another priest should arise?"

For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law." Heb. 7:11, 12. Speaking of the sacrifice which was made, he says, "For this he did once, when he offered up himself. For the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, who is consecrated forevermore." Verses 27, 28. The first four verses of the tenth chapter speak of the shadowy services, and of the blood of animals which was unable to take away sin; and the following five verses tell why, and at what point, those services were brought to a close: "Wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me: in burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure. Then said I, Lo, I come . . . to do thy will, O God. Above when he said, Sacrifice and offering and burnt offerings and offering for sin thou wouldst not, neither hadst pleasure therein; which are offered by the law; then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second." In the above quotation it will be seen that God had no pleasure in the sacrifices offered, only as they were offered in faith, and they were of value to him who offered only as he saw in that sacrifice the coming Saviour. And how could it be true that the "first" was taken away in order to establish the "second," if both ministrations had gone along parallel from the fall of man?

It is confidently stated that 1 Peter 4:17 proves that the judgment had begun when this epistle was written; but this does not agree with the language of Paul when he reasoned before Felix of a "judgment to come"; and such a view is not taught even in the language of Peter. Neither the Authorized nor the Revised Version justify us in drawing such a conclusion. To believe that the investigative judgment had then commenced, is to disregard all the facts in the case. It was consistent for Peter to speak of a coming judgment, and for Paul to reason of that "to come"; and John, in giving the language of the angel, regarding events then future, quotes him as saying, "The hour of his judgment is come." Rev. 14:7. We have a similar case in verse 18, where the angel said to one sitting on a cloud: "Thrust in thy sickle, and reap: for the time is come for thee to reap." No one would think of claiming that the time had come for the harvest when John wrote; for "the harvest is the end of the world." Matt. 13:39.

This theory is not only out of harmony with itself, but it also contradicts God's explanation of the matter, which is clear and consistent.

Being troubled about the things he saw in vision, Daniel asked a question concerning the sanctuary, and the answer came, "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8:14. The angel then explained to him the vision, except that part relating to time. Now verses 26, 27 state that the vision of the evening and morning was to be shut up for many days. Daniel fainted, was sick, and was astonished at the vision, but none understood it. Only verse 14 remained unexplained. The prophet then sought by prayer and fasting to know what this important statement made by the angel could mean. His prayer continues to the 20th verse of the next chapter. Here the same angel came to give a partial explanation of the period introduced. By reading the remainder of this chapter, with Ezra 6:14; 7:7-9, we learn that the command to rebuild Jerusalem dates from B. C. 457, which date is correct because that year is known to have been the seventh year of King Artaxerxes. The seventy weeks were "cut off," or allotted to the Jews, and the starting-point is definitely fixed. The twenty-three hundred days (or years) from the above date could not possibly end until A. D. 1844. Besides giving us a definite starting-point, and thus a certain ending, it was revealed just what events were to take place during the different periods into which the seventy weeks were divided.

God's word, therefore, is responsible for the doctrine which teaches that Christ entered the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary in the year 1844, and those who do not desire to have it thus, must settle the matter between themselves and God. From inspired testimony we have seen that the heavenly sanctuary followed the earthly; that the priesthood of Christ followed that of the family of Levi; and that the ministration in heaven followed that on earth.

THE HOUR OF HIS JUDGMENT.

There is only one gospel, and that is the gospel of salvation through the merits of a crucified and risen Jesus. And because Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, and to day, and forever, the gospel must always be the same gospel. It is the everlasting gospel. But there are times when there are special reasons for emphasizing particular phases of the gospel,—times when there are special truths to be presented in a special way. There are no changes in the gospel, but there are times when there are special reasons for emphasizing special phases of the gospel. When John the Baptist was giving his message, he had a special reason attached to it. He said, "Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Repentance was not a new idea, but he attached a special reason to his message of repentance at that time,—"for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

When Christ preached, he gave the same message and the same reason. "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." He was preaching the gospel, as we read: "Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God." But in preaching it he emphasized that special reason for repentance at that time,—that the kingdom of God was at hand.

After Christ's death and resurrection, the disciples went out to preach; and the point that they emphasized was that Christ, the Messiah, had been crucified, and had risen; and the resurrection was the phase of the gospel that was brought out with special emphasis in their teachings.

When Luther preached the gospel of the Reformation, in the sixteenth century, he was led, under the guidance of God, to emphasize this one phase of the gospel,—"Being justified freely by his grace." And justification by faith, which was as old as Adam, was brought out anew into the light, and especially emphasized, because there was need at that time that this special phase of the gospel should be emphasized in the preaching.

Not to multiply instances, we come to our own time. "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of the heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come." Rev. 14:6, 7. It is not a new thing to fear God and give glory to him,—that has been the gospel all the time,—but here is a time when there is a special reason for emphasizing this phase of the gospel, and that special reason is that the hour of his judgment is come. We are now to carry this special message to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people, and we are to say to them, with that power that is represented in the words, "with a loud voice:" "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come."

In the eighteenth chapter of Revelation, beginning with the tenth verse, the judgment of God is spoken of. They who stand "afar off for the fear of her torment," say, "Alas, alas that great city Babylon, that mighty city! for in one hour is thy judgment come." That is not Babylon judging somebody else; Babylon is being judged. "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come,"—the hour when he is judged is come. There is a scripture in the ninth chapter of Hebrews where the same form of expression is used, though not the same words. Speaking of the work of Christ as a priest and as the offering, I read, in verse 25: "Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others; for then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." It is the same form of expression, "by his sacrifice," as is suggested in the margin of the Revised Version. Referring to Babylon, the people will say, "Within one hour is thy judgment come." That judgment is the time when Babylon is judged. "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come." He is being judged.

In Rom. 3:1-4 we read: "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision? Much every way: chiefly, because that unto them were committed the oracles of God. For what if some did not believe? shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? God forbid: yea, let God be true ["let God be found true," R. V.], but every man a liar; as it is written, That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged."

This is quoted from the fifty-first psalm. Let us read from that psalm, beginning with the first verse: "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving-kindness: according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions. Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. For I acknowledge my transgressions: and my sin is ever before me. . . . Against thee [or before thee], thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight: that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest." Take this as it stands, and this quotation in the third of Romans makes it evident that God alone judges. He judges by being judged himself. "That thou mightest . . . be clear [overcome or prevail] when thou judgest." But when the Holy Ghost gives the same scripture by the mouth of Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, he talks thus; and it says, "That thou mightest overcome when thou art judged." Several translations put it in the passive voice,—"That thou mightest overcome, and be clear when thou art judged,"—but it is no matter, because both are right. He judges, and he is judged in judging.

Let us see that further. In chapter 17 of the book of Acts, Paul is speaking at Athens to those who worship graven images, and who are given over to open and grave idolatry. In verses 30, 31, he says: "And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent; because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness in that man [rather than "by," although the idea is the same, but using the word "in" emphasizes the thought] whom he hath ordained." That man, of course, is Jesus Christ. Now he has appointed a time when he will judge the world, and he will judge the world in righteousness, in Jesus Christ, that man. Is this he is a man, and it is so spoken of purposely. He hath appointed a time in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, in that man whom he hath ordained; that is, the world will stand or fall according as Jesus Christ stands or falls when he is judged.

In his humiliation, his judgment was taken away. Now, the hour of his judgment is come. He was not judged as the Son of God, the righteous one. He was judged as the representative of the sinner. It was not his judgment that put him to death; it was our judgment. It was because he stood there to be judged for the world, and he was condemned as a sinner. Read in Mark 14:63: "Then the high priest rent his clothes, and said, What need we any further witness? Ye have heard the blasphemy." What was the blasphemy? "The high priest asked him, and said unto him, Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed? And Jesus said, I am." The same voice that spoke to Moses out of the bush, and said, "I AM," spoke to the high priest, and said, "I am." "Ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death." But was he?—Not he, but we. In his humiliation his judgment was taken away, and our judgment put in its place; and instead of being declared the righteous one that he was and is, he was declared to be guilty of death, and was put to death.

In John 12:37, we read: "Now is my soul troubled; and what shall I say? Father, save me from this hour: but for this cause came I unto this hour." What hour was that? Read in Luke 22:52, 53: "Then Jesus said unto the chief priests, and captains of the temple, and the elders, which were come to him, Be ye come out, as against a thief, with swords and staves? When I was daily with you in the temple, ye stretched forth no hands against me: but this is your hour, and the power [or authority] of darkness." Shall I say, "Father, save me from this hour?" Shall that be my request? "But for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name. Then came there a voice from heaven, saying, I have both glorified it, and will glorify it again. The people therefore, that stood by, and heard it, said that it thundered: others said, An angel spake to him. Jesus answered and said, This voice came not because of me, but for your sakes. Now is the judgment of this world: now shall the prince of this world be cast out." Christ's judgment was taken away ("Now is the judgment of this world"); and he stood forth in behalf of the world, and was judged by the world, and the judgment of the world put him on the cross because, "The wages of sin is death," and he was made "sin for us, who knew no sin." So when the judgment of this world was come, it put Christ on the cross; and it puts every one else on the cross who accepts his work. When the hour of his judgment is come, it will put him on the throne, and it will put every one on the throne with him who is found in him. And now "the hour of his judgment is come."

The whole question, from the very beginning of this great controversy between sin and righteousness, is whether the Lord is right or not. There is where it began. Concerning the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, the Lord said, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die;" but the devil said, It is not so; "Ye shall not surely die." And these two statements have stood there ever since. He who is just can afford to wait. God has waited, he has put himself on trial; instead of coming forward and arbitrarily declaring, "I am right," he has waited. He has always known that he is right, but he is waiting for others to declare it. The devil has maintained, from the very first, contrary to God's statement, that God was wrong. That question is still waiting to be decided, and God has left it to the universe to decide whether or not he is right. In the meantime he has made before the universe such a display of his character as to give men the fullest opportunity to decide, each one for himself, whether God is right, or whether Satan is right. You and I are witnesses, we are on record, and the trial is on. The hour of his judgment is come, and the witnesses are being called.

THE HOUR OF HIS JUDGMENT.

(Concluded.)

THE Lord ordained a government, upon righteous principles, on the earth. The foundation of it was in that statement which covers the whole gospel, "God is love." But Satan said: He is not love. He knows that in the day you eat of this tree, you will be as gods, knowing good and evil. That is why he does not allow you to eat of it. God is not love. But God has gone right straight forward, making such a display of his love as would give the universe the fullest opportunity to decide whether he is love, and then he calls them to witness. The devil has gone right straight forward in the work of claiming that God is not love, but rather, that he is an arbitrary ruler. He said he would show man what a righteous government is, and so he started in, and set up his government in the earth. God might have blotted out, with the breath of his mouth, Satan and every sympathizer with him throughout all the universe; but in that case God would have been deciding whether he was just or not. But God is so gracious that he leaves it to those who rebelled against him to say whether he is love or not, and he says, "Ye are my witnesses." Isa. 43:8-12.

Satan said: "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north: . . . I will be like the Most High." Very good. God says: Now bring out your witnesses. We will have it decided. Bring out your witnesses, that I may be justified in this statement; let them hear what I have to say, and declare it is true. I will leave it to the witnesses to decide who is right. Let them bring forth their testimony, that you may be justified, or let them say that I am God, and beside me there is none else. I will leave it to the universe to decide.

Now the question is, Is he right?—"Yes, let God be true, and every man a liar; as it is written, That thou mayest be justified in thy sayings [words] and mightest overcome when thou art judged." In order that God might judge the world in that Man whom he had ordained, he sent that Man here; and he came, and put himself exactly under our conditions, and took our weaknesses, and bore our flesh, and put himself under the same condition of temptation that man was in,—not in the same condition that man was in before he fell, when God gave his just and righteous law, but in the condition in which man was after he had fallen. Christ took on him sinful flesh, and was "in all points tempted like as we are." He was tempted of the devil in a special way, and demonstrated, before the whole universe, that it is possible, as God has said, for every human creature to be perfect; it is possible for him, by the grace that God will furnish, to live in harmony with his righteous government and his law of love. But the devil said: It cannot be done. Look at it—it cannot be done. And Christ came here as a man, and did it; and all the universe looked on, and it was done.

That day on which the world was judged, and Christ was condemned to be guilty of death, was the day when he triumphed. It was the crowning day of that demonstration that God is right. When he gave man his just and righteous law, the first Adam failed to obey it; he believed what the devil said,—believed that the devil was right rather than the Lord,—and thus brought sin into the world. But the second Adam came in, and took his place, and kept the law, thus demonstrating before the universe that God is right, that he is not arbitrary, that when he says, "God is love," that is true, and that all he does and says is for the blessing of mankind.

But he did not keep the law simply as an illustration, simply as a grand object-lesson before all the universe; he did it for us, and we, in him, did it. Now, do you really believe it? Are you ready to acknowledge that Christ did this for you?—to say that the first Adam failed, all you have from the first Adam is a failure, and God is right, and the devil wrong? Will you say, I will give up, I will separate myself from the first Adam, I will go to the second; I will take him; he did it?

When the hour of his judgment is come, (and it is come), the question is, Is Christ right? Was he obedient? Did he meet fully God's mind in regard to obedience to his rule of government in the earth? Do you think he did? Did he do it for you? Are you willing to accept it that God is right? Will any one stand longer, and witness that the devil is right, and God wrong? "The hour of his judgment is come." What do you say? Is God right? He says he is. He says he is righteous, and he says, "There is none righteous, no, not one." He is God alone. When the young man came to Christ, and said, "Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?" Christ said, "Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is, God." And so Paul says, There is no good in me.

What is the standard of the judgment? "So speak ye and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty." The standard of judgment is the law of liberty in Jesus Christ; and he puts himself forth, and is willing to be judged by the world, and take their evidence. We read, in Deut. 32:29-31: "(1) that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!

How should one chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, except their Rock had sold them, and the Lord had shut them up? For their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges." That is just where God leaves his case. When we were enemies, Christ died for us; and he called us as witnesses when we were enemies. Before man repented, when the world was involved in guilt, he said: I will put my case out to my enemies, they shall be the judges. But before that time, I will give them a fair opportunity to see the truth.

So we have the judgment. God does not set up Jesus Christ, the Son of God, merely as a heavenly being, but he takes him as a man, and he says that all shall stand or fall together with him. He says: My government shall hang upon him, for he comes from the world that sinned, and is declared by the whole universe to be righteous; we will stand together. That was for us.

What is it to be righteous by faith (because this is the message of righteousness by faith)? — It is to say: God is true. I accept his statement of things. I will go from the very first verse of his book to the very last verse of his book, and I will say, It is true, every word of it. I will stand where it puts me. If it says, You are a sinner, I will say, I am. If it says, You are righteous, I will say, I am.

Now see what the work of the Holy Ghost is: "And when he is come, he will reprove (rebuke, or convict) the world." He will convict the world. He is the representative of Jesus Christ in the world. Christ says: I will send him to you. And when he is come, he will convict the world; he will secure a conviction against the world, through you. You are my witnesses. You stand for me. My Spirit shall be my representative in you, and your life shall be my life by the power of the Spirit; and through you, by the Spirit, I will convict the world. I will convict the world of sin, then I will convict them of righteousness, then I will convict them of judgment; "of sin, because they believe not on me." Every one out of me sinned. I will convict them of sin, so that they themselves will admit it, and all the world, including the devil, will admit it. "Of righteousness, because I go to my Father. . . . Of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged."

There are only two that are judged,— Christ and the prince of this world; it all hangs on that. We stand or fall with the one that we choose and the side that we take. If the devil is right, all the children of the devil are right. If God in Christ is right, all the children of God are right. Now when we believe that God is right, that makes us right. Then when he is declared right, we are, because we are in him. It will be decided, his enemies themselves being the judges, that he is right; but we must make our decision before the end. That is, we must, through faith in his word, acknowledge that he is right, before his enemies do. In the day of probation ("To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart"), to-day, is the time to declare to all the world that he is right, and to stand by him, no matter what happens to us. But when he is right, I am right; when, by faith in him, I acknowledge that he is right when he says that I am a sinner, I say that he is right. When he says that all the world is guilty before God, I say that he is right. When he says that he is the only true God, I say that he is right. When he says that there is none righteous, no, not one, I say, It is so. When he says that God is good, I say, That is right. When he says all that he does is good, I say that he is right, and I will not wait to see whether it works out good, but I will say it before the end; I will say it in my experience, and at the end. That is righteousness by faith.

"Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come." The time is here, and the trial is on, and the witnesses are being called, and it may be our turn next. Now what is our witness? What do we say to-day before all the world, before all the universe? Shall we take his word, his statement of things, without twist or turn, and say: Lord, I do not know all you say, I do not know very much of what you mean; but you are right, and just as fast as I find it out, I shall know more of your righteousness, which will be my righteousness? That is righteousness by faith; that is preparing for the judgment. "The hour of his judgment is come."

If this view of God's work and God's love in Jesus Christ will not move the heart to faithfulness and praise, I do not know what will. He has hung everything on it, himself with us, and we stand or fall with him. But let us remember that we do not go down unless he goes down. If we are in him, then when he is judged, we are judged. Those who believe in him do not come into judgment, but have passed out of death, into life, in him. "Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come."

CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.

BY ELDER G. E. FIFIELD.
(Worcester, Mass.)

In this brief paper no attempt will be made to treat fully the great theme introduced by the heading; for this would be impossible in the space allowed. Neither will time be taken to restate the beliefs which Seventh-day Adventists hold in common, and with which the writer fully agrees. I simply wish to give, if possible, a new glimpse of glory which has come to my mind and heart, and which has helped me to see, as never before, the perfect unity of God's work in this universe.

In the eighth chapter of Daniel we read of the "little horn," or the persecuting Roman power, these words: "It waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. And an host was given him against the daily by reason of the transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it practised, and prospered."

Who is the "Prince of the host" here spoken of? I think no one will deny that it is the Son of God, Prince Emmanuel, the "Captain of our salvation," the one whom God has given for a "leader and commander unto the people." It was the persecuting Roman power, which combined with the same spirit in the Jews to crucify the Christ. It being settled that the "Prince of the host" is Christ, the even more interesting question follows, Who are the host,— "the host of heaven"? It is certainly true that this host of heaven includes the numberless throng of the angels who wait around the throne to give the Saviour glad obedience. It is probable that it also includes all the countless intelligences of the other worlds untouched by sin; for these most surely own Christ as Prince and King. But are these all that the "host of heaven" includes? — Most surely not, for the Prince of this host is the Captain of our salvation, the one whom God has given to be a leader and commander unto the people. He is therefore "Prince of the host" to which the Christian belongs, and it is therefore sure that God counts all his trusting children as belonging to the host of heaven. Paul says: "You hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins; wherein in time past ye walked. . . . But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, . . . and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus."

God sees the full-grown plant in the little germ. This is true of both sin and righteousness. He sees murder in hatred, and adultery in lust. When also the heart, with the embryo, or germ, of the Christ-life which God has implanted in all men, is yielded to him, or as the Bible puts it, is "planted together with him," or sown as corn upon the ground to die,— when this is done, God sees the end from the beginning here, too. He sees us, not as we are, but as we are to be, when his work is completed in us. He sees the full-grown Christ-life in the planted germ, and counts us righteous in him. But he not only sees us as we are to be when he is done with us, but he also sees us where we are to be when he is done with us. The persecuted Christian may think that he is only one of a small minority, and feel, with Elijah of old, that he is almost alone; but God counts him in with the "host of heaven." Did not Paul speak of the "whole family in heaven and earth," and has not the word been spoken unto us, "Believers below, and believers above, are one company, and the songs of praise we begin to sing here, are taken up and echoed by the heavenly choir"? Earth, after all, is not so far from heaven but that God counts every part of it where one of his children dwells as a part of the camp around the sanctuary. In the age of types and figures, the sanctuary was pitched in the center, and God's people were camped around, three tribes on each side. This all represented the heavenly sanctuary and the camp of the saints. When, back there, the Philistines rushed in, and slaughtered the Israelites, and took the ark, the great heart of infinite love mourned that his people were cast down, and his sanctuary trampled underfoot. Even so now, when God's people are persecuted, and driven out, and his truth is cast to the ground, while iniquity practises and prospers, God says the host of heaven is cast down, and his sanctuary is trampled underfoot.

Then came the question, "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden underfoot?" This cry voiced by the angel is the old call of earth's mighty wrongs, to the just and merciful Judge, for deliverance. Edward Robert Bulwer-Lytton (Owen Meredith) puts the complaint in these forcible words:—

"I have nourished my numbers of nations
On a hope that has never been blest;
And the ghosts of my gone generations
Vex me yet with reproachful unrest.
Worn by long, unrequited endeavor,
As I roll through my ages of pain,
I have listened, I listen forever
For a word that is waited in vain.
In temple and palace
The bread and the chalice,
Bitter with brotherless pride,
Are eaten and drunken by Murder and Malice.

Crowned, mitered, and mantled, and magnific
While brute-born Hunger, in hoard and den,
Is smiting and biting the bones of men,
In whose bodies their souls have died,
One misery goeth in gold,
And one misery goeth a cold;
And there is no difference beside,
However their that he dress;
For the flourishing evil is and
Because it is evil at best;
And the fading good is not glad,
Because it is good oppress.
My altars gurgle with groans,
Soaked black are my temple stones
With the blood of my whitest ones,
Surely, surely, O Lord,
It is time to utter the word,
And deliver thyself and thy sons."

It is the old plaint, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground." "The hire of the laborers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth." The souls under the altar, whose blood has been shed for the witness of Jesus, crieth, saying, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and revenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" It is the same cry, How long shall the truth be cast down to the ground? How long shall error and falsehood practise and prosper? "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden underfoot?"

Daniel was one of the Hebrew captives, whose captivity and persecution stand as the type of all the oppression of God's people by earthly powers, till the "ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy." Historically, he was familiar with the triumph of error and the crucifixion of truth in the past; and prophetically, he saw that of the future, till wickedness should magnify itself even to the Prince of the host of heaven, and should crucify him a million times in the persons of his followers. What wonder that he was interested in the cry, How long, O Lord? how long? The answer came: "Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." These days, as we all know, ended in 1844. If there is any connection between the preceding verses and the fourteenth verse,—in other words, if there is any connection between the circumstances which gave rise to the question, and the question itself, on the one hand, and the answer to that question on the other hand,—this period of time must not only mark the beginning of a work in heaven, but also of a corresponding work on the earth. Not only does it mark the time when Christ, our great High Priest, shall enter the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary, but it also marks the time when the truth which has been cast down to the ground while error practised and prospered, shall be uplifted, and the host of heaven shall begin to be delivered from the bondage and oppression of earth. Notice, he does not say, I will make thee to know what shall be at the end of the indignation; but what shall be in the last end;" that is, there is a period of time here, beginning with 1844, and ending only with God's finished judgments on sin, in which the angel says, I am going to make known to you the work of God. God's work is one in heaven and in earth, and his children whose names are being considered, though they are tempted, tried, and persecuted in this world, are counted as the host of heaven, standing around the throne.

This is in perfect harmony with the type. On the tenth day of the seventh month, when the high priest went into the most holy place, the people were without, afflicting their souls and confessing their sins. It was plainly stated that whosoever should not afflict his soul and repent on that day, should be cut off. The children of Israel were always becoming more or less contaminated with the heathenisms that surrounded them. God always warned his people against this, yet when they disregarded his warnings, and corrupted themselves, he did not instantly repudiate them or cut them off. But when the great day of atonement came, all these things which had crept in during the year must be purged out. Whosoever refused the call of the Spirit to repentance at that time, was cut off.

Even so in the cleansing of the sanctuary down here: God's people, whom he regards not as afar off, but as camped around his throne, have through the centuries become contaminated with paganism. God has always protested against this, but still it has been tolerated until now. Now the great day of atonement is here,—the time of the cleansing of the sanctuary has come. It is no excuse, now, that good Christian people in the past have kept Sunday, and believed in inherent immortality, and sprinkling, and a hundred other paganisms. The High Priest now has entered the most holy place for judgment; and whosoever, when the word shall come to him now, shall refuse to afflict his soul and repent, will be cut off. Solemn indeed is this fact. God is sifting his professed children. Those who will repent of all evil, and yield themselves to be wholly his, are being drawn nearer by his Spirit of love and truth, and confirmed as members of the host of heaven. Those who, when the word comes to them, refuse to repent and leave their heathenisms and their sins, are being cut off, and left to the last great delusion. This is a part of the work of the great day of atonement,—a part of the cleansing of the sanctuary. The preaching of the threefold message is not one thing, and the cleansing of the sanctuary another and entirely separate thing. God has not two separate works to be done,—one in heaven, and the other upon earth,—but God's work is one, both in heaven and in earth. The great work of God for this solemn hour is the cleansing of the sanctuary, and this includes his work in heaven and in earth. When this work is fully accomplished, God will have a clean sanctuary, with every record of sin blotted out; and he will have a clean host,—the mighty company of the redeemed from every nation, kindred, and tongue, — his splendid church triumphant bowing reverently around the throne, and chanting the anthems of immortal victory and eternal praise.

He who will confess and forsake his sins, and be numbered with the host of heaven here, even while it is trampled underfoot and persecuted, will surely be of that same host "when the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads." "They shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Reader, may you and I be there.

RH Nov 23, 1897

W. Moore

A LETTER

Tell it to your children, that they may tell it to their children, that this 29d day of October, 1897, is the fifty-third anniversary of the great and memorable event of the end of the prophetic period of Daniel 8:14; namely, the 2300 days. At that date the investigative judgment began in heaven, as declared in Rev. 14:7. It was at that point of time that the great guide-board was erected, pointing us to the heavenly sanctuary as the one to be cleansed at the end of the 2300 days, and not the earth, as was supposed. Then was fulfilled Dan. 8:9-14; Matt. 25:10; and Rev. 11:19. It was at this time that we beheld, by faith, our Saviour going into the holy of holies in the heavenly sanctuary; and all who accept the third angel's message go in as truly as we did in 1844.

It is in this investigation that our names or our sins will be blotted out, as spoken of in Rev. 8:5; Matt. 10:32, 33; 2 Tim. 2:12; and Luke 12:8. It was at this point of time that we were commanded, in Rev. 11:1, to rise and measure the temple in heaven,—that part of it where our Saviour is,—the holy of holies. It is our work now to show to the world the great work of the judgment now going on. All will be measured by the measuring-rod—the ten commandments.

Truly the angel of Rev. 18:1 has come down, and the earth is lighted with his glory. Truly those who accept and obey those truths are those living in the flesh, spoken of in 1 Peter 4:6. The time when judgment began with the house of God, the righteous dead (verse 17), we see was at the time when the seventh trumpet began to sound,—Oct. 22, 1844. Rev. 11:15; 10:7.

Truly no one need be in doubt that this work is of God. The evidences of its being of God are as marked as were those given by the Saviour to tell John the Baptist. We can say, as his disciples said, "Lo, now speakest thou plainly." John 16:29.

Our hearts are filled with joy as we open and read the good Review. Especially did we enjoy the one under date of October 5, which contained the article entitled, "All Things Are now Ready." The reports of how the work is prospering all along the line cheer our souls. Our hearts beat in unison with this work. We are truly out in the highways and hedges with this compelling message. The work here is progressing gloriously. Precious souls are being brought to obey the truth, and are made to rejoice in the light. We are very happy to live to see this last message going forth with some of the power that was seen and felt by those who lived under the first message. "Amen. Even so come, Lord Jesus," is the language of our hearts.

WASHINGTON MOORE.

THE CLEANSING OF THE SANCTUARY.

WASHINGTON MORSE.
(Peterborough, Ontario.)

"And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." Dan. 8:14.

Much ink has been spent in commenting on this text. Perhaps there is not another verse in the Bible that has been so widely discussed as this one; and perhaps no other passage has proved, and will prove, the downfall of so many nations who reject its plain teachings. The Saviour pronounced the most severe woes upon the Jews, because they knew not the "time" of their visitation. That time was the seventy weeks of Dan. 9:24, cut off from the two thousand three hundred days, or years, and was the first four hundred and ninety years of that period. As we came down to that generation where is seen the end of the longest prophetic period in the Bible, and the only one for which we have a Bible date, God, through his servants, sent forth the message of Rev. 14:6, 7, announcing, "The hour of his judgment is come." The time was the moving principle. It was a searching test to those living in that generation.

I was permitted to take part in that blessed work from its beginning. In great power God set his seal to it by his Holy Spirit. The doors of the churches were thrown open for Brother Miller and others to preach the coming of Christ; and thus when this truth was preached, a great harvest of converts was added to the churches. This work continued until Jan. 1, 1844. At that time a change took place, as the majority believed that the prophetic periods all ended there. From that time until spring, we had no freedom nor liberty with our former brethren in the churches to which we belonged. But we understood that the twenty-three hundred days did not end until the spring of 1844; and it was with great solemnity that we came to that period. Some of our brethren could not go forward, and put in their crops, while others did so reluctantly. We felt sure our reckoning was correct, and that the Saviour would come at that time. While standing in that waiting position, the light of the second angel's message flashed upon us; and a voice came like a rushing mighty wind, "Come out of her, my people." No one knew who raised the cry first; but as we heard from our brethren north, south, east, and west, all had the same experience, and immediately left their respective churches. Yes, and we all left our ecclesiæ, or what had before been our differences. Right there we formed the Philadelphia state of the church,—a church of brotherly love.

Probably from sixty to one hundred thousand persons came out from the Protestant churches within a month; and O, how God blessed this act! Right there we ran out of all our published time, and practically went to sleep on time, according to Matt. 25:5. This we saw was the tarrying time. We read, "Though it [the vision] tarry, wait for it." In this position we continued until about the middle of July, 1844. Here we discovered a discrepancy in our reckoning, and found that the decree of Artaxerxes for the restoration of Jerusalem, which formed the starting-point for the twenty-three hundred days, went into effect in the autumn of the year B. C. 457, and not at the beginning of the year, as had been formerly believed. Reckoning from the autumn of 457, the twenty-three hundred years terminated in the autumn of 1844.

Arguments drawn from the Old Testament types also pointed to that autumn as the time when the event represented by the cleansing of the sanctuary must take place. Under the Mosaic system the cleansing of the sanctuary, or the great day of atonement, occurred on the tenth day of the Jewish seventh month, when the high priest, having made an atonement for all Israel, and thus removed their sins from the sanctuary, came forth and blessed the people. So it was believed that Christ, our great High Priest, would appear to purify the earth by the destruction of sin and sinners, and to bless his waiting people with immortality, on the tenth day of the seventh month, the great day of atonement,—the time of the cleansing of the sanctuary,—which in the year 1844 fell on the 22d of October.

This was regarded as the time of the Lord's coming. This position was in harmony with the proofs already presented that the twenty-three hundred days would terminate in the autumn, and the conclusion seemed irresistible. In the parable of Matthew 25, the time of waiting and slumber is followed by the coming of the bridegroom. This was in accordance with the arguments just presented, both from prophecy and from the types. They carried strong conviction of their truthfulness, and the "midnight cry" was heralded by thousands of believers. It went from city to city, from village to village, and into remote country places. None knew where it started. It arose simultaneously. There was fervent prayer and unreserved consecration to God. At the call, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him," we all arose and trimmed our lamps. We studied the word of God with greater interest than we ever had studied it. It was not the most talented, but the most humble and devoted, who were to hear and obey the call. Farmers left their crops standing in the fields, mechanics laid down their tools, merchants left their merchandise; and all went forth with tears and rejoicing to give the warning. Here is where the "midnight cry" came in to give power to the second message. Those who had formerly led out in the cause were among the last to give the warning.

As time was the moving principle, we did proclaim, with all that positiveness brought to view in Rev. 10:5, 6, that time should be no longer. We had no "ifs" in our faith: we believed God's word just as he designed we should. If we had seen the third angel's message then, we could not have given the first angel's message. We gave up the world, with all its pleasures and charms,—our property, our reputation, our all. No one whose faith was genuine could do any other way. The world saw that we believed just what we preached. We gave up all; yes, we consecrated all we had and were, to God. We were the happiest people that ever lived this side of the apostolic days.

In six months,—I might say three months,—that message was carried to every missionary station on earth. All over the world God raised up those who gave the warning. If men were not allowed to preach it, little children four or five years old gave the message. We did give glory to God, just as the message declares. Many tons of the paper called the Midnight Cry were circulated. At that time there were many toll-gates between Burlington, Vt., and Boston, Mass., but they were all thrown open, free of charge, so far as my knowledge goes, for those proclaiming this message. The wicked world was so convicted of the truth that in some instances business was suspended. And we are happy to know that the third and last message is to exceed in power the loud cry of that message.

In Rev. 10:1 we have the first angel's message, the same as in chapter 14. In the tenth chapter we read, he was "clothed with a cloud," and so it was. There was a cloud which covered the third message from our view, while in chapter 18, verse 1, it is said, "The earth was lightened with his glory." This is the loud cry of the third angel's message. Here is no cloud, but all is light and glory. For the last forty years the message to us has been, "Be zealous therefore and repent;" put away all your faults, and let the righteousness of Christ cover all your sins. "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." Now here is a certainty: God has led a people all through these messages, and is leading them yet.

It is through the light upon the sanctuary question that we know and understand the work of the judgment that has been going on in heaven since the end of the twenty-three hundred years of Dan. 8:14. And as we near the time when the cases of the living will come up, there will be a corresponding work going forward upon earth. Hence this is a time of supreme importance to every living soul. We do not know just when our names will be called. Now is the time for us to be free from sin, let Jesus have the whole heart, make no reserve. We are to be like "men that wait for their lord, when he will return from the wedding." Luke 12:36. No one can be said to wait until he is ready. Now is the time to watch, lest coming to our cases suddenly, he find us not prepared.

RH June 12, 1900

THE HOUR OF GOD'S JUDGMENT IS COME.

LUTHER J. BUNGLES.

(Chicago, Ill.)

We all know that the twenty-three hundred years of Daniel 8:14 ended in the year 1844, and since that time it could no longer be said, The judgment will come; but he who preaches the gospel in truth must say, The hour of God's judgment is come. In other words, the books are now open, and all cases, both of the dead and of the living, are to be decided for eternity before Christ can close his work in the sanctuary, and return to the earth to bring the promised deliverance and reward to his servants.

The Lord has kindly sent us this message, not that we should be left to wonder when the judgment will begin with the living, or when our case will appear, but that we may "come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need."

God is not an arbitrary ruler or judge, but in all his dealings with men he invites man to co-operate with God in his work, as it is written, "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets." And thus in the matter of the judgment, the Lord has sent a message to his people, in order that they may know of the work that is being done, and that they may come and present their cases before the throne, and have them decided at once for eternity.

The first angel's message is not given for the dead, but that the living may recognize their great privilege to come and present their cases for judgment after having made preparation.

There are but three steps necessary to prepare us to come before the judgment seat with perfect confidence, and with the assurance that the verdict will be satisfactory:—

First, acknowledge the claims of God's law. "So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty." James 2:12.

Secondly, recognize our own unrighteousness. "But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags." Isa. 64:6.

Thirdly, accept of the perfect righteousness of Christ. "And this is his name whereby he shall be called, THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS." Jer. 23:6.

After having taken these steps by faith, we are ready to pray the prayer, "Save me, O God, by thy name, and judge me by thy strength." Ps. 54:1. And the verdict will come back at once, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." Rom. 8:1.

"Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us."

When we have received this message by faith, we can go on our way rejoicing, with our "faces lighted up and shining with holy consecration;" for we shall realize that we have "passed from death unto life."

The Lord is waiting for us to receive this precious truth in all its fullness, which will be followed immediately by the showers of the latter rain.

IMPORTANCE OF AN UNDERSTANDING OF CHRIST'S WORK IN THE HEAVENLY SANCTUARY.

We can not place too high an estimate upon an understanding of the work of our High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary. The parables that refer to the work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary make the salvation of souls depend on the relation sustained to Christ and his work during the investigative judgment. Matt. 22:11-14; 25:10-13; Luke 12:86-87.

There are repeated warnings that have direct reference to this time. The day of atonement was the most important day of all the year for Israel, and those who did not afflict themselves on that day were cut off. The words of Moses to Israel were, "For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord. It shall be a Sabbath of rest unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls, by a statute forever." Lev. 16:30, 31. "Also on the tenth day of this seventh month there shall be a day of atonement: it shall be an holy convocation unto you; and ye shall afflict your souls, and offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord. And ye shall do no work in that same day: for it is a day of atonement, to make an atonement for you before the Lord your God. For whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people. And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy from among his people." Lev. 23:27-30.

"All business was to be laid aside, and the whole congregation of Israel were to spend the day in solemn humiliation before God, with prayer, fasting, and deep searching of heart."—"Great Controversy," page 420. They had complete control of their appetite, and all selfish interests were under control.

The antitype of this day is referred to by Christ in Luke 21:34-36: "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth. Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." We are also directed to the same time in the parables of the ten virgins and the talents, in Matthew 25.

In most of the instruction given by Christ, both in his parables and in his direct teachings, the mind is carried to the time when the name of each person will come up in review before God. This is the time when they will be accounted worthy or unworthy of the resurrection from among the dead. It is the period of the investigative judgment, and the salvation of souls depends upon the relation that each individual sustains to the work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary.

So important is this work that in the Spirit of Prophecy reference is frequently made to it. On pages 59 and 64 of "Early Writings" we read as follows: "But such subjects as the sanctuary, in connection with the twenty-three hundred days, the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus, are perfectly calculated to explain the past Advent movement and to show what our present position is, establish the faith of the doubting, and give certainty to the glorious future. These, I have frequently seen, were the principal subjects on which the messengers should dwell."

Again: "The great plan of redemption, as revealed in the closing work of these last days, should receive close examination. The scenes connected with the sanctuary above should make such an impression upon the minds and hearts of all that they may be able to impress others. All need to become more intelligent in regard to the work of the atonement, which is going on in the sanctuary above. When this grand truth is seen and understood, those who hold it will work in harmony with Christ to prepare a people to stand in the great day of God, and their efforts will be successful. By study, contemplation, and prayer, God's people will be elevated above common, earthly thoughts and feelings, and will be brought into harmony with Christ and his great work of cleansing the sanctuary above from the sins of the people. Their faith will go with him into the sanctuary, and the worshippers on earth will be carefully reviewing their lives, and comparing their characters with the great standard of righteousness. They will see their own defects; they will also see that they must have the aid of the Spirit of God if they would become qualified for the great and solemn work for this time which is laid upon God's ambassadors."—"Testimonies for the Church," Vol. V, page 575.

From this quotation it will be seen that our success in spiritual things depends upon a thorough understanding of the work going on in the sanctuary above.

Many who embraced the third message had not had an experience in the two former messages. Satan understood this, and his evil eye was upon them to overthrow them; but THE THIRD ANGEL WAS POINTING THEM TO THE MOST HOLY PLACE, and those who had had an experience in the past messages were POINTING THEM THE WAY TO THE HEAVENLY SANCTUARY. Many saw the perfect chain of truth in the angels' messages, and gladly received them in their order, and followed Jesus by faith into the heavenly sanctuary. These messages were represented to us as an anchor to the people of God. Those who understand and receive them will be kept from being swept away by the many delusions of Satan."—"Early Writings," page 119.

S. N. H.

THE SANCTUARY QUESTION FROM THE STAND- POINT OF THE BOOK OF HEBREWS.

Importance of the Subject.

ELDER S. N. HASKELL

—We cannot overestimate the importance of the sanctuary question. "The subject of the sanctuary and the investigative judgment should be clearly understood by the people of God. All need a knowledge for themselves of the position and work of their great High Priest. Otherwise, it would be impossible for them to exercise that which is essential at this time, or to occupy the position God designs them to fill. . . . All who have received the light upon these subjects are to bear testimony of the great truths which God has committed to them. The sanctuary in heaven is the very center of Christ's work in behalf of men. It concerns every soul living upon the earth. It opens to view the plan of redemption, bringing us down to the very close of time, and revealing the triumphant issue of the contest between righteousness and sin. It is of the utmost importance that all should thoroughly investigate these subjects, and be able to give an answer to every man that asketh them a reason of the hope that is in them."

It is by this subject that we obtain a clear insight into the mysteries of redemption. The salvation of men is at an infinite expense to heaven, and the sacrifice made is equal to the broadest demands of the broken law of God. The sanctuary question reveals this. There is no one book in the Bible, except the books of Moses, that can be studied with greater profit upon this subject than the book of Hebrews, which is a divine commentary upon the sanctuary and its services. It was the last general call the Spirit of God ever made to the Jewish people. It was written when the judgments of God were hanging over the city, six years before Titus came with his army. It to them was a special judgment warning.

The Holy Spirit associates this event with the second coming of Christ. "Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and He that shall come will come, and will not tarry." Heb. 10:35-38.

In the final overthrow of Jerusalem the destruction of the world was symbolized. This book therefore becomes a book written expressly for the time in which we live. It not only presents the manner of giving the sanctuary question, but also the spiritual application of the truths of the sanctuary, its ceremonies and offerings, with the history of the people connected with it. Every offering made in the Jewish economy, every ceremony connected with the sanctuary service, centered in Christ, and it is by an individual faith in its virtue that victory is gained over Satan's power. "And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony." "Christ being come a high priest of the good things to come, through a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, . . . entered once into the holy places, having obtained eternal redemption by His own blood." — Whiting's Translation. In this lies the relation between His work in heaven and His people on earth.

Upon His work rests the salvation of every human soul. "For there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved." It is His blood alone that can atone for sin. It is His work alone in heaven, made manifest in the lives of His people on earth, that connects any soul with God. He not only becomes the central figure in heaven and earth, but He connects heaven with earth, and earth with heaven. It is those whose hearts correspond with the heavenly work who are benefited thereby. None others can be saved in the kingdom of God. To understand this work is of great importance, and it cannot be understood unless thought be given to the subject, aided by the Holy Spirit. As the book of Hebrews was written while the destruction of Jerusalem was pending, it becomes a symbol of the world, hardened in sin, unbelief, and rebellion, hastening to meet the retributive judgments of God.

The prophecy which Christ uttered concerning the destruction of Jerusalem had a twofold meaning. It foreshadowed the destruction of Jerusalem, and also prefigured the terrors of the last great day. The language of Christ in reference to the destruction of Jerusalem has an application to the people of God in the last days. The professed people of God in the present day are in the same condition as were the Jews before the destruction of Jerusalem. They rejected Christ, and because of their rejection of Christ, they were destroyed. The Lord said, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge: because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee." The knowledge which they lacked was the spiritual application of the sanctuary question, which centered in Christ. The sanctuary question was to reveal Christ, His work in the heavenly courts, and as it would be carried on in the hearts of His disciples. It is thus apparent that the work in the hearts of the people must correspond with that of Christ in heaven.

There are three temples brought to view in the Bible, and all should be blended into one study. The first one was a typical sanctuary built by Moses in the wilderness, afterward rebuilt by Solomon, again rebuilt by Zerubbabel. This temple and its services shadowed forth the work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. The work of Christ in heaven is also to go forward in the living temple of His people on the earth; so while there was a sanctuary on the earth, and still one in heaven, the most important of the three is His people; for the object of the earthly sanctuary was to teach man how to know and believe the actual work done for him in the heavenly sanctuary. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" 1 Cor. 3:16. All the work revealed by the typical temple shadowing the real work of Christ in heaven is for the purification of His Church on the earth, and consequently a neglect of a knowledge of these truths will leave men unprepared for the impending judgments of God, as really as the Jews were unprepared for the destruction that came upon them.

THE SANCTUARY QUESTION.

The Manner in Which the Apostle Introduces the Subject of the Sanctuary.

ELDER S. N. HASKELL.

(Continued.)

"Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." Heb. 8: 1, 2. The seven preceding chapters in the book of Hebrews prepare the way for the apostle's coming directly to the sanctuary question and its service in heaven. "This is the sum" of what he has previously stated, that "we have such an High Priest." It is such a Priest as the apostle has described in the previous chapters, and this High Priest is "set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man."

Let us consider some of the leading thoughts in the preceding chapters. The first chapter presents Christ—His character and position. He is the brightness of the Father's glory and the "express image of His person, and upholding all things by the word of His power." He is better and much more exalted than the angels, "as He hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they." He is the Son of God, and therefore has inherited every name which is applied to God, the Creator of the heavens and the earth. He also is the Creator, and is called God. "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever." Again, "Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of thine hands." Here Christ is presented on an equality with the Father, not created as were the angels, but the Creator of the angels—the great "I AM," He who inhabiteth eternity. It is thus the apostle introduces us to the subject of the sanctuary. It is not to such and such dimensions, to the material of which the earthly sanctuary was made, but to Christ its minister, and to the Father, to whom the sanctuary belongs. The High Priest is ours, but the sanctuary is God's. We are the worshipers in the sanctuary.

The second chapter is introduced by showing the importance of these truths. Even the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward. "How [then] shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation; which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard Him?"

This subject brings to view the gospel of Christ as no other, and the preaching of this gospel has been established "by signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost." The apostle then presents man as he was when first created, and also his present condition, and how Christ stepped down from His high and exalted position, made himself lower than the angels, and even took man's fallen nature, for the suffering of death, that through death He might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their life subject to bondage. He was made like unto His people, that with His human arm He might encircle the human race, and take His people as far above angels as He himself was above angels before He came to the earth. In this humiliation He was tempted, and suffered, so that He might be able to succor them that are tempted. O what a High Priest is this! It is thus heaven and earth are connected.

The third chapter of this book presents Christ as an apostle, a high priest, and refers to Moses, who was faithful in all his house, to illustrate the greatness of our High Priest. It was Christ who originated the Jewish economy, and He is worthy of more glory than was Moses, as he who hath builded the house hath more glory than the house. Christ is over His people, who are His house, or living temple. Paul then presents the fact that Israel had the promises made to them, and because of their unbelief they failed. If they had seen the light that flashed from the Levitical service, they would have become living temples, fit for the indwelling of the Holy Ghost. The apostle then proceeds to quote from David, "To-day if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts." Had they listened to His voice, they would have entered into His rest, and their carcasses would not have fallen in the wilderness. The land of Palestine would have become a second garden of Eden, and a training-school for missionaries, who would have gone forth to the world bearing the message of God. But their carcasses fell because of unbelief, and became a warning to all candidates for the heavenly Canaan.

The fourth chapter carries the mind still further, and shows there are still promises for the people of God. The rest is still in the future. A spiritual rest by faith can now be obtained, which is a foretaste of the real rest that remains for the people of God. This rest is in Christ, and as a pledge in the seventh-day Sabbath; for God placed it in the Sabbath at the creation of the world. The proper observance of the Sabbath, therefore, brings to the soul that spiritual rest of Christ that bears witness to acceptance with God, and becomes a foretaste of that real rest which awaits the child of God in the kingdom of God. The last portion of this chapter shows where this rest lies, and how it is obtained. The word of God is living and powerful, sharper than a two-edged sword. As the sinner in the law of Moses separated the fat, which represented sin, from the parts of the animal, so an unqualified belief in this word would enter the very joints and marrow and into the very thoughts and intents of the heart. Christ is present as our great High Priest, and is passed into the heavens; and as He has become one with humanity, He can sympathize with man in his fallen condition; and because of this we are exhorted to come boldly to the throne of grace, to find grace and help in time of need.

The fifth chapter develops the subject still further. The apostle draws a contrast between the Aaronic priesthood and the Melchisedec priesthood. The Melchisedec order is Christ's position. He learned by obedience and suffering how to be a High Priest after the order of Melchisedec, and only those who can appreciate these truths will be able teachers in the word of God: "for every one that useth milk is unskillful in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe." But those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil can appreciate these truths, and partake of the strong meat, or the blessings promised in them.

The sixth chapter shows the importance of gaining a richer and deeper experience in the things of God. It also reveals the fact that there is an experience, attainable by the people of God in this world, which may be lost by not progressing in the things of God. If these blessings and privileges, given them of God, are viewed from a common and ordinary standpoint, the soul will become like the soil which bears only thorns and briars, which are finally rejected, and whose end is to be burned. The most common way of sinning against the Holy Ghost is in not realizing the sacredness of the work of Christ. This chapter concludes with a statement concerning the certainty of the promises of God, which promises and hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which enter into that within the veil, whither our Forerunner has entered. A forerunner implies that some are coming after, and thus the attention of all heaven is turned to those who follow the forerunner, Christ Jesus.

The seventh chapter further discusses the character of the Melchisedec priesthood, and reasons that confining the tithing system to the Levitical priesthood was not according to the Melchisedec order; hence the necessity of a change in the law of Moses. So the Levitical priesthood was changed to give place for the Melchisedec order. The priests on earth after the Levitical order died, for they were made after the law of a carnal commandment. But the Melchisedec order was after the power of an endless life. Thus it is shown that there was no perfection in the Levitical law of itself; but the bringing in of a better hope, which was of the Melchisedec order, brought perfection. This priesthood that Christ represents is an unchangeable one because of its nature and of His position in heaven, and His relation to God the Father and to fallen humanity, and of His faithfulness upon the earth. And on account of the unchangeableness of His priesthood, "He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession" for us. He is made higher than the heavens, and it is not necessary that He offer up sacrifices daily, as did the earthly priest, first for his own sins, and then for the people's, for Christ offered a sacrifice once, when He offered up himself; but He is consecrated forever without any infirmity in heaven. Such is the apostle's argument on the priesthood, directing the mind from the earthly sanctuary to the heavenly.

It is thus by seven successive steps, each one revealing Christ as He is, the apostle is prepared to say, "Now of the things we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man. For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer. For if He were on earth, He should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law; who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when He was about to make the tabernacle: for, See, saith He, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount."

All who present the sanctuary subject as directed by the Spirit of God in these chapters, will present Christ as exalted above all angels, one with the Father, yet partaking of flesh and blood and suffering death that He might deliver us, then as entering heaven as the forerunner of the human race. The attention and work of all the heavenly host are centered upon the heirs of salvation, those who are presenting their bodies as living temples for the indwelling of the Spirit of God; for they are the company of whom He is the forerunner.

THE SANCTUARY QUESTION.

Three Ways of Sinning Against the Holy Ghost.

ELDER S. N. HASKELL.

(Continued.)

THE dangers that threatened the Hebrew people just prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, are in the pathway of many who now think themselves in a good cause. The apostle states three distinct ways in which the sin against the Holy Ghost may be committed. As the messages borne to that people are also borne to us, it might not be out of place to notice them.

In the sixth chapter of Hebrews we read: "It is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame." That it may be better understood how it is done, it is illustrated by nature. "The earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God." The Holy Spirit rests upon individuals, not because they are right, but that they may respond in Christian graces. Those who do this are represented by the earth that bringeth forth herbs meet for man. But those who bear only thorns and briers, notwithstanding the rain may come upon them, are rejected, and are nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burned.

It is utterly impossible to remain stationary in Christian experience, especially in this time in which we live. Christ, in behalf of His people, is confessing their sins in the heavenly courts; but if their sins are not confessed on earth, they cannot be confessed in heaven. If the heart is not daily examined and errors and sins confessed; they never will be blotted out in the court of heaven. Those who make no advancement in the divine life, becoming no better and purer in God's sight, will in the end find themselves bearing only thorns, and will be burned. A crisis of the world is pending. The day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision. It will come suddenly, and upon the careless and indifferent its coming will be fatal. To lightly esteem God's mercies hardens the heart and blinds the mind, and those who do this, place themselves where mercy cannot reach them.

The second manner of sinning against the Holy Ghost is described in the tenth chapter. It is sinning willfully after receiving a knowledge of the truth. To deliberately attribute the power of God to Satan is doing what the Jews did on a certain occasion. Mark 3:28-30; Matt. 12:22-32. To such there remains no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries. This was shown by those who despised Moses' law and died without mercy. But it is far worse deliberately and willfully to transgress the law of God. Such a one counts the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace. To all such the Lord says, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." They who trample under foot the blood that is offered for them in the sanctuary above by our High Priest, or even compare that blood in its saving power to any other blood on earth, count themselves unworthy of eternal life, and fall into the hands of the living God.

The third illustration of sinning against the Holy Ghost is spoken of in the twelfth chapter of Hebrews, beginning with the fifteenth verse: "Looking diligently lest any man fall from the grace of God [margin]; lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby many be defiled." Bitterness permitted to exist in the heart will result in an entire separation from God. It leads to hasty words, to hasty conclusions, speaking without thought. Such are represented by Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright. There were commendable traits of character in Esau, but he was a passionate man. He did not control himself. What he wanted he determined to have, at any cost. He lost all reason, so that he could see only the desire of a passionate heart. "Feed me, I pray thee," said Esau, "with that same red pottage; for I am faint." Jacob said, "Sell me this day thy birthright." Esau reasoned, "Behold, I am at the point to die; and what profit shall this birthright do to me?" So the bargain was made, and the birthright was sold for a mess of pottage—for the gratification of appetite. There are those to-day who, like Esau, will sell their birthright for the gratification of their appetite, or some other passionate lust. This determination to have those things that please the fancy, irrespective of what the Lord says, will seal the doom of many.

These three ways of sinning against the Holy Ghost will be committed by many of those who profess to love God at the present day. Some will walk over one of these roads, and some over another. Such dangers, with such terrible results, should arouse the feelings of every candidate for the kingdom of God. All hearts should be aroused to prepare to meet God, to watch with all faithfulness lest when their cases come up in the judgment, they be unprepared.

The sanctuary question reveals the importance of people's controlling their appetite in the day of atonement. "For whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people. And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy from among his people." Lev. 23:29, 30. Every man was required to afflict his soul while this work of atonement was going forward. All business was laid aside, and the entire congregation of Israel were to spend the day in solemn humiliation before God, with prayer, fasting, and deep searching of heart.

Important are the truths concerning the sanctuary in this typical service. If it was so important in the type for the Lord's people to afflict their souls and control their appetite during the entire day, it is a hundredfold more important in the antitypical day that the soul be afflicted and the appetite controlled. Our Saviour said, "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." The only safety in the antitypical day of atonement will be in giving heed to our Saviour's words, "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness," — eating improper food, and being overcharged with the cares of this life, — "and so that day come upon you unawares." It was never right to sin, but certain things under certain circumstances, such as times of our ignorance, God might have passed by; but now the light has come, and it is important that we should have knowledge upon these points. Two things we as a people need: First, light to know what and how to do; second, a heart to walk in that light. It is in this that our salvation lies.

These are a few of the important truths made prominent in the book of Hebrews.

A SOLEMN FACT.

ELDER G. B. THOMPSON.

(Rome, N. Y.)

ON the tenth day of the seventh month, Oct. 22, 1844, the long prophetic period of twenty-three hundred days ended, and the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary, or work of the investigative judgment, began. This date is as fixed and certain as the nativity of Christ. It is marked by well-known events, rendering a mistake impossible. Unbelievers of every kind have sought for half a century to overthrow this mighty fact, but the pillars remain; the temple of truth is unmoved.

Fifty-seven years have passed by with stately and measured tread since this solemn, searching work began at the tribunal of the universal Judge. "The Judgment" was set, and the books were opened. "And the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works." With nations and with individuals the Lord has kept a faithful and impartial account. Our record is on high. The deeds, the thoughts, the motives of the heart, are all faithfully written down.

The judgment begins at the house of God. 1 Peter 4:17. "Another book was opened, which is the book of life." Ponderous volume! In it are recorded the names of all who have had life by believing on the Son. When the judgment was set, this book was opened, and an investigation of the character of those composing the "house of God" was begun. For nearly three-score years this solemn work has been in progress, and name after name and page after page passed by. What a court is this! The Ancient of days is there; the Redeemer, your Advocate and mine, is there; ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands of angels are there; there is no appeal from its decisions; the verdict in each case is just and final.

How far has this judgment work progressed? What generation is now passing in review before the scrutiny of Him who sits upon the throne? Have the generations of long ago been judged, and the verdict recorded? Are those who lived when Christ was on earth being examined? Or has the work of judgment passed down through the world's midnight—the Dark Ages—and numbered the true Israel of the Most High? Or during the nearly six decades, has that work come down into the century just closed, and have the records of this momentous cycle of time been investigated? Are the events of the century just born, the lives of men now living,—your record and mine,—being reviewed? Just how far this work has progressed no man knows; but in the typical work the allotted time was comparatively brief, and we know that the last pages in the great church roll—the book of life—will soon be reached, and the fiat of Rev. 22:11 go forth, fixing irrevocably the destiny of every soul.

How sober this fact should make us! What searching of heart it should create in us! We know not when our name will come up. Who is ready to have his case called up and the final verdict rendered? Is everything just as we should desire to have it if we knew that our names were the next in order?

Some are carrying strife, hatred, and envy in their hearts, even against their brethren, expecting sometime to fix matters up. Well, now is the time. You haven't a moment to lose. Delay is dangerous. You must gain the victory on this point or lose heaven. Some are sure the Lord has a work for them to do in His vineyard, and sometime they hope to get their secular business so arranged that they can do it. Now is the time to "cut loose," and labor for perishing souls.

Others are robbing God in tithes and offerings, promising their darkened soul that when they get out of debt, they will give the Lord His own. It is time we took our hands out of the Lord's treasury, and ceased to rob the One who is on the throne, who is our Judge, and who is about to pass final sentence upon us. Can we afford to rob Him under such conditions as these? To the writer it seems terrible that, at this advanced stage of the message, the Judge at the door, the judgment almost over, it is still necessary to plead with those who know these things to cease robbing the Lord! When will the power of this wicked covetousness be broken in every heart?

Others are clinging to secret sins, some darning indulgence, hoping sometime to get the victory. Delay no longer. To-day is the time. The judgment hour hastens to its close. Men born since the Saviour entered the holiest of all are whitening with age; the last generation is hoary. If ever there was a time when men should be seeking the Lord with all the heart, that time is now.

"When the Judge shall weigh our motives
For eternal gain or loss,
Shall we stand as gold before Him?
Or as vile and worthless dross?"

THE JUDGMENT.

ELDER B. L. HOWE.
(Honolulu, H. I.)

THE prophetic message that announces the entrance of Christ upon the atonement work, as represented in the cleansing of the sanctuary, is called the judgment message. Judgment is defined as "the act of judging; the mental operation by which facts are weighed, comparisons and deductions made, and conclusions reached; the faculty by the exercise of which deliberate conclusion is reached. Psychologically considered, it is the process or form of comparison in which conceptions or notions are compared, and their logical agreement or disagreement apprehended, and mentally asserted."

By these definitions it is evident that the term judgment is not, as it has come to be theologically considered, merely the rendering of a decision, but it has in it the thought of a progressive work, in which facts are considered, evidences are studied, testimony is weighed, and conclusions are reached, preparatory to the rendering of a final decision, which brings us to the definition of the term as used in law.

When the Lord decided that the earth should be overflowed by water, He centered all the energies of heaven in the work of warning the people and preparing a way of escape. He connected every faithful man and woman with Him in this work.

When the time came for the revealing of God in Jesus Christ to the world, the angel came to Mary and said, "Thou shalt call His name Jesus: for He shall save His people from their sins." When Christ was born in Bethlehem of Judea, a multitude of the heavenly host came to make it known. The shepherds spread the tidings abroad.

When Jesus was baptized, the Father spoke from heaven, "This is my beloved Son." All heaven was doing everything in its power to turn the thoughts of the people on earth to the subject in which it was interested.

The time came for the judgment message to go to the world. The prophet Daniel had a view of the opening of the judgment. The Father and Christ were both engaged in the work, and—not a multitude of the heavenly host, but the entire host—"ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands." Every one in heaven is interested in the judgment work. All have a part to act in it.

This wonderful interest in heaven does not, however, satisfy the mind and purpose of God. The exile on Patmos saw a mighty angel flying through the midst of heaven, crying with a loud voice, "Fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come." This time was reached in the fall of 1844. The judgment was set, the books were opened, and every member of the family in heaven was concerned about the work. But the work of the judgment especially concerned the people on earth. The cases of the dead were to be investigated, but it was the travelers, somewhere on the road between birth and the grave, that the Lord was especially anxious to have connected with the work of the judgment. God is now holding an open court into which He invites all. So the call to come into court is sent down from heaven. It travels by land and by sea, and through the day and night the cry sounds, "Fear God, and give glory to Him; for the hour of His judgment is come." At the going forth of this message a solemn earnestness settled down upon the people everywhere. In the places where the older people were not allowed to preach the message, the Spirit of God came upon the children, and they preached with such power that backsliders returned to the Lord, and sinners were converted.

In the type every one who was called under the name of Israel was interested and had a part to act in the service of the day of atonement. Although the decision was not reached until the close of the day, every individual had a part to work out for himself, from the beginning to the end of the judgment day. So the work of the final judgment is not all in the decree which says that every man must remain just as he is.

The hour of God's judgment came at the conclusion of the prophetic period of twenty-three hundred days, in the fall of 1844, and every one who has heard the certain sound of the trumpet since that time, and has accepted the message, has become a living, active part of that open court, which the Judge of all is conducting.

The Judge and all His associates in heaven are devoting their thought and energy to weighing the evidences for and against the applicants for eternal life. Are we overcoming, or are we being overcome? Are our sins all confessed, and pardon written over against the very last one? We need not concern ourselves as to whether the judgment has begun with the living. If we are living this side of 1844, we cannot be living in any other time than the time of the judgment.

The work of the day of atonement in the type demanded the most solemn service and best energies of all the living people; so the judgment message for to-day is sent to living, active people, that they may know, and live, and act as though standing before the throne of the Eternal. Only those who receive this message as a living reality, and walk with God, as Enoch did, will meet their Lord at His coming without tasting death.

We now have a case in the open court of heaven, for the Lord has raised us up together with Christ, and we are sitting with Him, in the sanctuary, in heavenly places. "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ." Blessed life! hidden with Christ in God, nothing is seen but God's own life.

With what earnestness, with what gladness, we should press forward, for the glad day is just about to be ushered in, in which the last foul stain of sin is to be forever blotted from the universe.

"The great day of the Lord is near, it is near and hasteth greatly." God help us all, and make us stand now, that we may stand then.

RH Oct 28, 1902

Washington Morse

Early and Late Experiences

ISLAND F, MUSKOKA LAKE, ONTARIO,
Oct. 15, 1902.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS: Do we realize that one week more brings us to the fifty-eighth anniversary of the ending of the prophetic periods, Oct. 22, 1844? To me this day is a memorable day, and I wish to express sincere thanks to God that I am still alive to bear my testimony to the power and glory which accompanied the judgment-hour message fifty-eight years ago to-day. I was among those proclaiming that there should be time no longer. Rev. 10:7. And that was true at that date; Oct. 22, 1844, prophetic time did end; we thought it was probationary time. In that we were mistaken. Now we have light showing us that for fifty-eight years we have been passing through the time when the cases of the righteous dead have been and are being examined in the courts of heaven.

For the last two months I have been laboring upon Island F, Muskoka, Ontario, with much of God's blessing, and I am happy to see some fruit. One lady who is a millionaire has supplied herself with reading on present truth, and has subscribed for some of our periodicals. She is a dear child of God. To-day she leaves for her home in Pittsburg, Pa. To me this is a remarkable case, and I feel to thank God that he has given me the blessed privilege of presenting some of these glorious truths. Last evening was our last meeting with this lady and her daughter and husband. We talked until ten o'clock, and none seemed to desire me to stop. The boat has just gone taking these dear Christian souls, and we parted with such love and hearty greetings as I hardly ever witness. She expressed many thanks that they had been led to see such light upon the Bible. With a heart full of love, I close.

Your brother,
WASHINGTON MORSE.

The Sanctuary—No. 1

MRS. S. N. HASKELL

THERE are three sanctuaries brought to view in the Bible. The heavenly sanctuary is the dwelling-place of the eternal God (Ps. 102:19), where he sits enthroned in glory beyond the conception of mortal minds. 1 Tim. 6:16.

We have the blessed assurance that the faithful, beyond the reign of sin and death, shall behold his face, and his name shall be in their foreheads. Rev. 22:4; Matt. 5:8. They will then dwell in his presence.

When the children of Israel came out of the darkness of Egyptian bondage, they were unable to comprehend the exalted work of God and Christ in man's behalf in the heavenly sanctuary. In order to lift them above this low plane, God directed that an earthly sanctuary be built after the pattern of the heavenly sanctuary (Ex. 25:8, 9), and that men divinely appointed by God officiate as priests in this shadowy temple. Heb. 8:4, 5. He also directed that the life of innocent animals be taken, illustrating the death of the Lamb of God.

The Lord's presence was manifested in this structure by the bright light overshadowing the mercy-seat. Ex. 25:22. Before this visible presence of God, the priests presented the blood of the offerings in type, illustrating how our great High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary would plead his blood before the Father in man's behalf.

The work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary, and the work of the priests in the earthly temple, had one end in view,—that fallen man would open his heart to the gentle knocking of the Saviour, and let the Spirit of Christ enter and sit enthroned in the soul temple of the human body. "What? know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's." 1 Cor. 6:19, 20.

We are under just as much obligation to glorify God in our body as in our spirit. In order to do either we must recognize the fact that we are not our own; but that we are bought with the precious blood of Christ. One can not be a Christian and deny the fact that God, when the individual surrenders to Christ, requires the body temple as his dwelling-place. "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." Rom. 12:1.

This work can only be accomplished by a heart surrender to God. A wicked person can not be the dwelling-place of God. "He that hath the Son hath life" (1 John 5:12), but no "murderer hath eternal life abiding in him." 1 John 3:15. He that hungereth and thirsteth after righteousness will be filled. It is the one who, hearing the voice, opens the door, whose body becomes the temple, or dwelling-place, of the God of heaven.

The Sanctuary—No. 2

MRS. S. W. HASKELL

EVERY sacrifice slain pointed two ways. As the priest acted out the great kindergarten lesson of the sanctuary service before the people, God designed that the people should comprehend the work of our great High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary. He also designed that from that service they were to understand what the Lord required of them, that they might become the temple of the Holy Ghost. Like the sword with two edges, every sacrifice pointed two ways, and taught these two great truths.

If in the study of the sanctuary, we see only the work done by Christ for man, and fail to comprehend what God requires of us, we lose much.

Christ is a faithful witness for humanity in the courts of heaven, and the study of the sanctuary reveals this more fully than does any other subject. God designs that we shall be faithful witnesses of divinity in this world of sin, and the study of the sanctuary subject reveals how we may represent him.

For a few moments in imagination we will place ourselves three thousand years ago in the temple court. A sinner enters with a lamb. When he reaches the door of the sanctuary, he lays his hands on the head of the innocent lamb, and confesses his sin, thus acknowledging that he is a sinner worthy of death. The knife is raised, and in the very act of taking innocent life, he accepts Christ as his substitute. This places him in direct connection with the priest, and as the priest passes with the blood from his sight within the veil of the holy place, the sinner believes the blood is presented in his behalf.

There is still an important work to do. The body of the sacrifice is to be carefully dissected, and every particle of fat removed by the sinner's "own hand," and given to the priest, who burns it upon the altar. Lev. 4:27-31; 7:29-31. The priest stands waiting until every portion of the body is searched faithfully for the fat, and when it is delivered to the priest, he burns it upon the altar. The psalmist saw in this the type of the destruction of sin and sinners. Ps. 37:20; 73:12-14. It was a sweet savor to the Lord; for it represented the burning of sin without the sinner.

Have any of us who have come to Christ and accepted him as our sacrifice kept him waiting for us to separate from our body every wrong habit and appetite? Is he waiting for us to deliver over our appetite for meat, tea, coffee, etc? If so, why not present our bodies a living sacrifice wholly acceptable unto him?

The Sanctuary—No. 3

MRS. S. N. HASKELL

THE service in the typical sanctuary on the day of atonement in an especial sense represented the work of Christ and mankind in carrying out the plan of salvation.

Before the opening of this day's service every sin was confessed. But if a soul rested upon that fact, saying, "There is no need of my afflicting my soul to-day, for my sins are all confessed, he was cut off from among his people." Lev. 23:27-31.

The work done by the high priest in the temple did not save the individual, unless he co-operated in the work by carrying out faithfully the part given him to do upon that day.

We are living in the antitypical day of atonement, and our salvation depends upon our co-operating with our great High Priest; and while he, in the heavenly sanctuary, pleads his blood before the Father in our behalf, he expects us to do the work typified by the work required in the shadowy service. If we fail to do this, we shall be cut off just as surely as the individual was cut off in the type.

Four things were required of the individual on the typical day of atonement:—

1. There was to be a holy convocation.
2. He was to afflict his soul.
3. He was to offer an offering.
4. All work was to be suspended.

No one who in his heart believes that we are living in the hour of judgment will neglect the holy convocation. We are admonished not to forsake "the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another; and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching." Heb. 10:25. If we have no taste for the religious assembly, it is because our spiritual eyesight is blinded, and we do not see the day approaching.

In "Great Controversy," page 420, we are told that afflicting the soul consisted in "prayer, fasting, and deep searching of heart." Any one who realizes that the judgment is set in the heavenly sanctuary, and that one by one all who have ever named the name of God will pass through the close scrutiny of that court, will spend much time in prayer and deep heart searching, that every sin may go beforehand to judgment.

But why this fasting? For twenty-four hours they partook of no food. The appetite was held in complete control. There was no question as to which was the master. The individual in the type who afflicted his soul was the master of his appetite; for he partook of no food whatever on that day. If he failed to be the master of his appetite, he was cut off. If this means anything to us, it must mean that during the antitypical day of atonement the individual who allows his appetite to control him will lose his place with the people of God.

In Luke 21:34-36, when the Saviour was speaking of the time when the faithful would be "accounted worthy" to escape those things which are coming on the world, he admonished all to take heed to themselves lest they be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness. Surfeiting refers to the quantity of food partaken of, while drunkenness refers to the quality.

Some may say, "I know my sins are confessed, and that Christ intercedes for me, but I have no faith in preaching health reform. A man's religion is not affected by what he eats and drinks." In the type it meant death to disregard this instruction. In the antitype the soul who disregards the plain instruction given by the Lord in regard to eating and drinking, will find that, too late, he is cut off from among God's people.

Other offerings besides the regular sin offering of the day of atonement were made on the tenth day of the seventh month. Num. 29:7-11. We are to present our offering, the precious Lamb of God, and through his blood gain the victory over every besetment, every sin.

In the type the day was a sabbath, all work was laid aside for a fit type of the admonition given by the Saviour to those living in the time of the judgment: "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged . . . with cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares." Our business is to be held secondary, and the work of God occupy the first place in our heart's affection.

*The Sanctuary

It has been suggested that during this conference the truths which made us a separate and distinct people should be presented, as the present generation of Seventh-day Adventists know but little of the way in which the truth that makes us a peculiar people was first developed. The truth has come to us as a system. Many of us have embraced it because our fathers believed it, others because it appeared so clear when it was first presented to us. But few realize how the truth of the third angel's message was brought out link by link from the Bible.

When the time passed in 1844, there were none who believed the truth as we now hold it. All believed the prophecies that brought us to that time. Then began a greater searching of the Bible than had ever been, probably, at any time since the days of the apostles. They went over and over the old arguments concerning the prophecies that pointed to 1844, and after most thorough examination they could see no other conclusion than that the prophetic periods terminated at that time. As they studied, they began to see one link of truth after another; and as these truths unfolded to the pioneers,—I have reference to such men as Elders James White, J. N. Andrews, Uriah Smith, and J. H. Waggoner,—they did not dare present that truth to the people until they had made it a special subject of prayer and the spirit of prophecy set its seal to it. That was the way the foundation was laid, step by step, until they found they had a system of truth, and understood the third angel's message as it has been brought to us. At the present time there is but little realizing sense of this, and, in fact, it seems to me that we have been drifting away from the old landmarks, and are in such a condition that, when the test comes, as it surely will, many will be shaken out.

I will call your attention to the eighth and ninth chapters of Daniel. The application of the prophecy contained in these two chapters at one time stirred the world. They were the basis of the preaching of Joseph Wolf in Asia and Europe and in the islands of the sea, of Edward Irving in England, of William Miller in America, and of others who led out in different parts of the world. Unknown to one another, these men preached the central truth that made a separate and distinct people. The truths which they presented from the prophecies of the eighth and ninth chapters of Daniel, have been lost sight of to a certain extent. I have been told by some that they had been taught that we no longer need these prophecies; we need simply faith in Christ.

Now, my friends, let us see if we do not need these prophecies. When Moses brought Israel out from the land of Egypt, his last work was to recount the dealings of God with his people.

About six years before Jerusalem was destroyed, Paul wrote to the Hebrews not to cast away their confidence, but to remember the days when they were illuminated,—to learn the history of the past, and to "call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions."

And so it has been again and again. When God has raised up a people, and they have lost the spirit of the message that made them a distinct people, he has called upon them to review the past.

In that eighth chapter of Daniel we have a wonderful prophecy. If I should simply go over the theory of it, you would say, We all understand it. And doubtless you do. You know what Daniel saw in the eighth chapter—a ram having two horns, and the higher came up last; a rough goat, with a notable horn between his eyes, and the goat came close to the ram, and stamped him under his feet. Then Daniel saw that horn broken, and four stand up for it, and out of one of them came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, and put Christ and the saints to death. The angel's explanation is so plain that any child ten years old can understand it. The angel Gabriel said the ram represented the kings of Media and Persia, the rough goat, the king of Grecia, and the great horn the first king. And then he spoke of the little horn that grew out of one of the four that came up when that notable horn was broken. This little horn represented the power that would put the saints to death, and it waxed exceeding great.

I wish to consider the thirteenth and fourteenth verses of the eighth chapter: "Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days: then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." "Well," says one, "that pertains to the past." I think it does, and also to the present.

* A sermon preached by Elder S. N. Haskell at College View, Neb., Sept. 17, 1904.

Let us notice carefully two or three texts of scripture. In the seventeenth verse of the eighth chapter I read, "Understand, O son of man: for at the time of the end shall be the vision." When will this vision be understood?—In the time of the end. Shall we ever pass the time of the end before the Lord comes?—No. Then will there be something in this vision that is present truth until the second coming of Christ?—I think so. [Elder Johnson: "The Danish Bible says it belongs to the time of the end."]

We will now read the twenty-sixth verse: "And the vision of the evening and the morning which was told, is true: wherefore shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days." That is, there will be many days before the vision will be understood; or in other words, when Daniel lived, there were many days before the time of the end.

In the ninth and tenth verses of the twelfth chapter, we read: "And he said, Go thy way, Daniel: for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end. Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly: and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand."

Now I wish you to notice these three verses which I have read. Concerning the vision in the eighth chapter, the angel Gabriel said it would be understood after many days, in the time of the end. In the twelfth chapter we read that the words the angel spoke to Daniel were closed up and sealed till the time of the end.

How many wicked persons will understand the eighth chapter of Daniel in the time of the end?—None. Do you believe that not a single wicked person on the earth will understand the eighth chapter of Daniel?—Yes. How many of the wise will understand it?—All. Now suppose I should put the question another way, How many of you are trying to understand what is unfolded in the eighth chapter of Daniel, that you have not previously understood? Does our salvation depend on our understanding something there that the wicked do not understand? Will it ever, then, become a past truth, and not a present truth? The wise—the really wise before God—will get something out of that book that no wicked person will ever get; and when they get it, they will get salvation. Then, should we not study the book of Daniel? There is something in the eighth chapter of Daniel that is practical, that will give one an experience in the things of God, and we can not be safe without it. No other conclusion can be drawn from these expressions, and if we had no other expression to show the importance of the study of the eighth chapter of Daniel, it seems to me that every Seventh-day Adventist should be aroused to know what there is there that we have not understood.

What experience can I get out of that chapter, and where does it lie? It is not simply in the fact that the ram represented Media and Persia, the rough goat Grecia, the great horn the first king, that when it was broken four stood up for it, and a power was to arise that would put the saints to death and continue down to the end. I will tell you what there is in that chapter that is not explained by the angel, and that is the sanctuary question, not only the sanctuary question, but the time of cleansing the sanctuary.

I remember the time when the book of Daniel was opened, and those two verses were quoted. It sent a thrill through the congregation. All felt that there was life in it, and that there was salvation in it, and it opened up a vein of thought that brought to their souls peace, life, and light; and I remember more than that. When I began to observe the Sabbath, in 1853, we had a great burden to go where there were First-day Adventists, and hang up the chart and preach to them. When we visited the sick, we hung up the chart and preached to them the third angel's message. One case in particular comes to my mind. While visiting a sick woman, I became interested in explaining the sanctuary question. When I had finished, the tears were running down her face, and she said, "I shall keep the law of God." Many thus embraced the Sabbath in those days, and when men embraced the Sabbath in that way, they did not give it up. They did not become discouraged; they had something that kept them. They saw the Sabbath question from a different standpoint than simply the fact that the Bible teaches it from Genesis to Revelation. They saw truth in it.

I do not know that I need to say much in reference to the time. The ninth chapter is an explanation of the time. A question has been raised about the connection between the eighth and ninth chapters. Now I do not know any ground for any argument whatever to disconnect them, because the reading itself establishes their connection. Let me put two or three texts together, and I think all will see it. In the eighth chapter and sixteenth verse the Lord says to the angel, "Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision." The one who gave the command was no other than the Lord Jesus Christ. Notice what Daniel says in the twenty-seventh verse: "And I Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days; afterward I rose up, and did the king's business; and I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it." Then, did Gabriel explain that vision so it was understood?—No, he did not.

Let me read in the ninth chapter and twenty-first verse what the angel said to Daniel when he came to him: "Yea, while I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. And he informed me, and talked to me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding." Daniel did not understand the vision at this time. Gabriel's name is mentioned only twice in the Old Testament,—when Christ said, "Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision," and when Daniel, after praying and seeking God, said, "The man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision," etc. Does that not identify him—the very one I saw in the vision, the very one whom the Lord told to make me understand the vision? And Gabriel says, "I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding." Now I do not know how to present this subject any clearer than it is set before us in those two chapters taken together.

That is not all. Notice what he says further. "At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am come to show thee; for thou art greatly beloved: therefore understand the matter and consider the vision." The first thing he would naturally think of would be the point he did not understand. Now, says the angel, think of the vision. Why?—For "I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding."

The first words of explanation were, "Seventy weeks are determined," or cut off, "for thy people." Cut off from what? There is only one period in all the book of Daniel from which they could be cut off. Seventy prophetic weeks would be four hundred and ninety days, and a day standing for a year, and seven days for a week, seventy weeks would be four hundred and ninety years. Four hundred and ninety years are cut off. All scholars agree that the Hebrew word signifies "cut off." Then there must be a longer period from which it is taken. The angel said to him, I have come to give thee skill and understanding. The first words are, Seventy weeks are cut off for thy people—cut off from the twenty-three hundred days. How do you know it is twenty-three hundred days?—Because it could not be cut off from nothing, and that is the only period given in the Bible from which it could be taken. To my mind it would be folly to raise a question whether those chapters are connected or not.

Seventy weeks are cut off for thy people. During this time they were to have special advantages, and the gospel would be given to them. At the end of seventy weeks, it would go to all the world. Sixty-nine weeks reached to Messiah the Prince; that is, sixty-nine of the seventy. There is one week at the end of sixty-nine to make up the seventy, and in the midst of this week—the seventieth week—he will cause the sacrifice and oblations to cease. Now what caused their sacrifices and oblations to cease?—The death of Christ.

Notice we have three periods given: (1) the seventy weeks, at the end of which the gospel will go to the world; (2) sixty-nine weeks, which reach to Messiah the Prince; (3) the seventieth week, in the midst of which the Saviour was crucified.

The starting-point of the twenty-three hundred days is given in the twenty-fifth verse of the ninth chapter. "Know therefore and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks. The streets shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times." If I can find when the gospel went everywhere to the Gentile world, then I can find every date, for they all have the same starting-point; and the seventy weeks are to reach to the time when the gospel was to go to the world, and be no longer confined to the Jewish nation. If I find that date, then I can subtract that year of our Lord from the 490 years; that will give me the starting-point. If I can find when Christ became Messiah the Prince,—so recognized in the New Testament,—I can go back and find the same starting-point. If I can find when he was crucified, going back the same way I can find the starting-point. Or if I can find the date of the commandment to restore Jerusalem, that will establish all the other dates. A harmony here seals up the vision and establishes the twenty-three hundred days.

I will read two or three texts which I know must be familiar to many of you. "Therefore they that were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word." Acts 8:1-4. You will notice your marginal date is A. D. 34. If I subtract A. D. 33½ from the seventy weeks, or four hundred and ninety years, I will have 456½ A. D. It is very simple.

In the first chapter of John we find that the word "Messiah" means "the anointed one." "Messiah" is the Hebrew and "Christ" is the Greek form for the English word "anointed." In the tenth chapter of Acts and the thirty-eighth verse we read that Jesus was anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power, and went about doing good. Then when did he receive the Holy Ghost?—At his baptism. Now turn to the third chapter of Luke or Matthew, to the record of his baptism, and you will find in the margin the date A. D. 27. Take 26½ from 483 years—or sixty-nine weeks—and you have just the same date, 456½.

When did the commandment go forth? You will find a record of it in the seventh chapter of Ezra, and the date in the margin is 457, or in other words, 456½. Ezra 7:9 shows that half of the year had passed when the decree went into effect. That date is established by more than twenty eclipses, and seven historical facts given in Luke 3:1-3 show when John began to preach, which was six months before the Saviour entered upon his ministry. To question the position taken in 1844 is to deny the plain facts given in the Scripture; for when you subtract 490 from 2300, you have only 1810 left, and adding 1810 to A. D. 34, you have 1844.

(To be concluded)

The Sanctuary*

(Concluded)

Did anything happen in 1844 that marked the ending of the twenty-three hundred days? How many are there in the room who believed in the coming of the Lord in 1844? [Several hands were raised.] Was there anything in that message that gave you an experience different from what you had had before? — Yes. I remember that in the city of Worcester there was once a very profane man with whom I was acquainted. One day he said, "I want you to tell me why you keep the Sabbath." We sat down together, and I went over just what I have gone over with you now in a few words, about the coming of the Lord as preached in 1844, and then about our seeing the sanctuary question and the Sabbath. When I looked up, tears were running down his face, and the thought occurred to me that he once believed it. I said, "Did you believe that the Lord would come in 1844?" "Yes," he said, "and I would to God that I had the same experience now." There was something in the experience of the people of God then that they could not forget. It continued with them; and wherever you find them to-day, there is still a responsive chord in their hearts. It brought a peace to their souls that they could not forget. When God does something, he leaves an impression that will last as long as the Spirit strives with men.

"Well," says one, "the Lord did not come." That is very true, and I suppose that the time argument was studied over by the disappointed ones more than ten thousand times to see where the mistake was, and it came out 1844 every time. Why did they think the Lord would come in 1844? They reasoned that the sanctuary was the earth, and the cleansing of the sanctuary, the cleansing of the earth; that the earth would be cleansed by fire, and the cleansing would take place at the coming of the Lord. They made the text read, Unto two thousand and three hundred days, or years, then shall the Lord come; and they believed it.

Did you ever hear people laugh about it, and say that men back there sold their farms? I have heard them say so, and that they would not be such fools as that. The only question is whether if they really believed it, they would act as if they did. The believers did sell their farms, and left their crops unharvested in the fields. One man in New Hampshire, Leonard Haslings, said, "I thought the Lord would come in the autumn of 1844, and I did not dig my potatoes. The neighbors talked about putting a guardian over me, but they finally concluded that as I was comparatively an old man and good citizen, it would be a disgrace, so they did not do it. That year the potatoes rotted in the cellars, and my neighbors who dug their potatoes lost them. But I waited until the time passed, and the potatoes in the ground were all sound, and I had potatoes to sell to the very ones who were going to put a guardian over me." Wonderful experiences could be told with reference to that time.

God did not leave our enemies to find out our mistake. That is a wonderful thing; because the word "sanctuary" occurs in the Bible one hundred and forty-seven times, and it is not once called the earth; but we did not know it, and the Lord did not let the devil tell any one of it either. When our mistake was talked about, Professor Bush, of New York, said, "Those who attack William Miller on the time question attack him on his strongest point." Why did he not see the sanctuary question? Because they had not found it out.

Finally a man by the name of O. R. L. Crosier, wrote in the Day Star an argument that the sanctuary was in heaven, as straight as it has ever been published since, and that Christ entered the most holy place of the sanctuary to cleanse the sanctuary from the sins of God's people in 1844, and that the day of investigative judgment began at that time.

But did we catch it up, and herald it to begin with? — No. When I first began to keep the Sabbath, I gathered letters that were written at this time by Elder James White and his wife, and I have them in a book. I was looking them over the other day, and I saw in a letter something like this: That they had made it a subject of prayer before they dared to advocate that the sanctuary was in heaven. Finally the testimony came through the Spirit of God that the view taken in regard to the sanctuary was correct. Then they began to preach it. How different from the course followed by those who think they have new light at the present day. They were careful not to introduce anything that had not a solid foundation in the Bible. They were laying the foundation for the structure of a faith that would gather souls from every part of the earth. God gave them a spirit of carefulness that they might not weave into the structure any error. We have never had to renounce one position thus taken.

* A sermon preached by Elder S. N. Haskell, at College View, Neb., Sept. 17, 1904.

I could relate circumstances of like nature by the hour. The book "Early Writings" was largely a compilation of testimonies to prove positions taken after much fasting and prayer. To my certain knowledge, nearly every point made in "Early Writings" was made after some new point of truth had first been searched out, and had been made a subject of prayer. Then the Spirit of God set his seal to it that it was truth.

"But," says one, "is there no new light?" Of course there is new light, and I expect we shall get new light throughout eternity. Just as long as life lasts, there will be an unfolding of the truths of the Bible. But new light will never upset the past truth. It makes it more clear. I see these faces before me, and as I see them, I can not help thinking how you would rejoice if you could only see what God is unfolding, but do not get switched off from the old truths by some new-fangled notion. Let me quote you a text in the third chapter of Genesis and the fifteenth verse, when man was first driven from the garden of Eden: "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." How much of the gospel is in that? Is it not all there? Well, if you get all the gospel there, why do you need anything more? The whole Bible is an unfolding of that scripture, and every prophet has been unfolding that precious truth. Has it denied that truth?—No, indeed. But it has made that truth clearer and clearer, and it will continue to do so until Satan's head is bruised, and he and all who sympathize with him go into the lake of fire.

It has been thus in every reform that has ever been. How much of the gospel of the first advent of Christ may be rejected in these last days?—Not a word of it. How much has changed?—None at all. When the great apostle saw this, he exclaimed: "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" And so the third angel's message is the same old story, it is "the everlasting gospel." It is a resetting of eternal truths. It is a taking up of the old gospel truths and placing them in the framework of truth. You can never mix the third angel's message with error. You never can mix the work of God with the world.

Let me illustrate it. We believe in baptism, and we have the same formula as the Baptists. Both baptize in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Suppose I go into a Baptist church and preach baptism. When I preach baptism, I would have to preach what sin is, and then I would have to preach the law. How long would they let me stay there and preach the law? You can not return to the truths that are held by different denominations, and be saved by them. You can not take the truth out of the framework of truth, and go back to your former experience, and be saved. Why?—Because God has placed it in the framework of truth, and now salvation is in a system of truth.

I wish to tell you how happy we were when we received the light on the sanctuary question. It converted me. I want to tell you who have grown gray in the third angel's message to cling to the fundamental principles that made us a separate and distinct people. What has made us a separate people?—The chief corner-stone is the sanctuary question.

"Well," says one, "I got the Sabbath from the Bible." I want to tell you, If you do not clinch your argument in that sanctuary question, you will be shaken out. I have seen scores give up the Sabbath,—simply keeping the Sabbath outside of the framework of truth will not save you. Now you may think that is strong language, but you have only to look over the past. Noah built his ark for the saving of himself and house. Don't you suppose there were other people who offered sacrifices back there? But could they make a profession loud enough to save them if they did not have an interest in that ark? Could they have faith enough to save them? I want to tell you that when God gives a message, he walls that message all around, and it is all right. It will prove salvation to every one who takes it. You may take certain truths out of it, and you may think you are going to be saved by them, but you prepare yourself for some delusions.

You remember when David undertook to move the ark? The thirteenth chapter of First Chronicles tells about it. He talked it over with the leaders, and all of them united heartily, and said, Let us move the ark. All Israel sang praises. The Philistines put it on the new cart with a gold offering. They let the milch kine start off, and they went right toward Israel in an opposite direction from their calves. God accepted the Philistines, and so David thought that if all Israel were to unite with him, and the ark was put on a cart, just as the Philistines did, it would be right. God excused the poor Philistines because they did not know any better. But when the oxen stumbled, and the ark shook, and it seemed that it would go over, Uzzah thought he would steady it, and God smote Uzzah. David did not dare take that ark home. He thought he had better go home and repent, and he did. That mistake made him afraid to take the ark home, lest he should die, as Uzzah did. But after he repented, then he undertook to move the ark. He said that the Lord visited them because they did not seek him after due order, and that they would put the ark on the priest's shoulders, and then David composed that sweet song which was sung as they entered Jerusalem: "Lift up ye gates, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in." An answer comes back from within the walls, "Who is this King of glory?" Will that song ever be sung again? It was sung when Christ took with him to the heavenly courts that company that he took from their graves. When you and I are taken to heaven, it will be sung again. I want to tell you that when God does something, he does it forever, and it stands forever.

When the people of God looked over the sanctuary question, and found there was a sanctuary in the heavens, and saw the temple of God open in heaven, they saw something else. By faith they lifted the cover of the ark, and saw the ten commandments. When one sees the ten commandments that way, he has hold of something. They began to study the Bible to see if the first day was the Sabbath, and to their surprise they found that the Bible taught all the way through that the seventh day was the Sabbath. But they got it out of the sanctuary, and that is where we must get it, and where we must see it. The Seventh-day

Baptists have the seventh-day Sabbath, but it will not save them. They do not see the Sabbath in the sanctuary. Many among us are keeping the Sabbath only on the same arguments used by the Seventh-day Baptists. All such will be shaken out unless their Sabbath-keeping is anchored within the veil of the heavenly sanctuary.

Some may ask, Was not the ark in the heavenly sanctuary always open?—No, indeed. Under the sounding of the seventh angel, the prophet says that the temple of God was open in heaven, and there was seen the ark of his testament. The investigative judgment has begun already. It began in 1844. If that judgment has been going on sixty years, why are we not interested in it? and what will it lead us to do?—It will lead us to examine our own hearts to see if our thoughts, if our sympathies, if our interests, are with God and his work on earth. If so, we shall wish every sin confessed and lodged in the heavenly courts; for Christ is about to bring all sins out and lay them on the head of the scapegoat,—the devil,—and he will bear them away. If you do not confess them, they will never go there, and you will never gain the experience that comes to those who confess their every sin, and consecrate their entire being to the service to God. It is worth more than your farms. It is worth more than your bank stock. It is worth more than any interest in this world to have your interest centered in Jesus Christ as he pleads before the ark in the heavenly sanctuary.

I have heard a great deal said in our meetings about the Holy Spirit. We need it; but do you know what comes first? It is overcoming every besetment. If you wait for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit to give you the victory over your besetments, you will fail. I verily believe, my friends, that because we are drifting away from the old landmark, the heavenly sanctuary, we have lost the spirit of confessing our sins and getting just right before God. I feel in my own soul that not one who lives until the time of trouble will be saved unless he makes it his special business to get right with God and have every sin confessed and blotted out by the Lord Jesus Christ.

There is something in this sanctuary question that should interest every soul. The spirit of prophecy, in "Early Writings," page 119, says: "Many who embraced the third message had not an experience in the two former messages.

Satan understood this, and his evil eye was upon them to overthrow them; but the third angel was pointing them the way to the heavenly sanctuary." Those who follow as he points the way will have something that will hold them in the time of trouble.

We need something more than simply a surface experience. You may talk about the Lord's coming as flippantly as you please, you may believe that Christ forgives your sins, but unless there is a heart-searching, unless there is a deep changing of the very habits and passions of the soul, and your impulses go out continually after God, you will make a failure. Shall we make a failure? May God forbid. We want to make a success in life. My friends, we want to make a success, and to do it, we must overcome our besetting sins. You may say, How can I do it? Did not Jacob do it? You never hear any more about Jacob's trickery and treachery after he prevailed with God that night.

We need that humbling of soul before God, that laying hold of him, that can come only as we realize that our sins must be lodged in the heavenly sanctuary in order for Christ to bring them out and lay them on the head of Satan. Shall we fail? Probably there is no audience, meeting together as we meet here, that does not contain some who will be subject to the seven last plagues; for there are those who never will take pains to study into these things and seek what is necessary. The Lord forgives our sins, but faith must take in what Christ is doing in heaven for us personally. He is doing something for me personally. He is confessing my sins to the Father, just as I confess them here on the earth, and I wish to emphasize the fact that it will not be safe to rely on any experience that does not come from the sanctuary and the work of our High Priest in heaven. Nothing else will answer.

May God bless you, my brethren and sisters, and give you his Holy Spirit. O that we could see a real breaking down and putting away of our sins right here now! We want to make an effort such as we have never made to be in closest sympathy with our Lord Jesus Christ. "Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you." May God help us to have an experience that is founded upon his Word, and then finally when the work is over, when probation ends, may God grant that we may be saved with an everlasting salvation in the kingdom of God.

The Sanctuary*

As far as I know, we are the only people in the world who believe that the sanctuary is in heaven. There are others who believe that the most holy place is in heaven. There are those who have some views concerning the sanctuary, but I do not know of any people in the world who believe that the sanctuary service in heaven is antitypical of the service that was carried forward in the sanctuary here upon the earth, except the Seventh-day Adventists, and, as I understand the question, a correct understanding of the sanctuary will rectify every error that may be brought to bear upon the people of God in these last days. In fact, a genuine Christian experience in connection with the work of God comes from the sanctuary question, whether you realize it or not; it comes from the sanctuary where God dwells.

Now, this I propose to show you by reading a few texts of Scripture. I can not give all the scripture that I would like, but will call your attention to a few things concerning the importance of the sanctuary question. When Satan came into the garden of Eden in the form of a serpent, Eve listened to him, and from her Adam also partook of the forbidden fruit, and both were taken captive. In every sense of the word they were taken captive; they saw as Satan saw, and they heard the words of Satan, they felt as he felt, or as he would have them feel. They were wholly under the control of the devil until the Lord put enmity in the heart of man against Satan. Christianity, or true conversion, is restoring that which was lost by the sin of Adam in the garden of Eden. I think all can readily see this. I will read you one expression that states the condition of man after he had partaken of the forbidden fruit: "But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die: for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." Gen. 3:3-5. Now notice: "And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes" etc., was it good for food? If it was, God was withholding something good from man. What made her see that it was good for food?—It was the devil in her; and she saw as the devil would have her see. "She took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her: and he did eat;" and their eyes were opened. She was a captive, and Satan had her see as he saw, had her feel as he would have her feel, for he had perverted her judgment. Sin is an awful thing! When sin is harbored in the soul, it always perverts a man's judgment. Satan enters the citadel of the heart, and perverts the judgment of man so he can not see any differently from what the devil would make him see; for the devil is in his heart. Is not that true? Is such a man the temple of the Holy Ghost?—No; he is the temple of the devil, and so is every man that harbors sin. God is seeking an entrance into every man's heart. If man opens his heart to Christ, and lets him enter, then he becomes the temple of the Spirit of God, and God takes possession of the citadel that was formerly occupied by the devil. I think everybody can see that.

I am going to read you some texts to show that all the strength that men have to overcome the devil comes from the sanctuary, also that all the intelligence, all the wisdom, men need to render acceptable service to God comes from the sanctuary where God dwells. He is the author of wisdom, knowledge, and life. It all emanates from him, and the devil hates the doctrine that reveals it. In Ps. 20:1, 2, we read, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble: the name of the God of Jacob defend thee; send thee help from the sanctuary, and strengthen thee out of Zion." Where will he get his help?—From the sanctuary. If we had no other text, it seems to me this would be sufficient to settle the question that all our strength and help come from the sanctuary. But turn to Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple. Eight times in that prayer, Solomon said, "Lord, hear thou in heaven." Did you ever stop to think where they were to turn their faces when they prayed? They were to turn their faces toward old Jerusalem, to the sanctuary. If Israel, when in trouble or in need of help, said Solomon in his prayer, "shall pray unto the Lord toward the city which thou hast chosen, and toward the house that I have built for thy name: then hear thou in heaven thy prayer and their supplication, and maintain their cause." 1 Kings 8:44, 45; 2 Chron. 6:38, 39. Do you see the lesson in that?

* A sermon preached by Elder S. N. Haskell, at College View, Neb., Sept. 18, 1904.

The sanctuary was built under the direction of God upon the earth, and when they were in affliction or needed strength or wisdom or any help from God. Solomon said in his prayer, Turn thy face toward this place. The old prophets did, and when they turned their faces toward Jerusalem and pleaded that promise, they always had victory. Read from the Bible where Jehoshaphat said, Lord, "when evil cometh upon us, as the sword, judgment, or pestilence, or famine, we stand before this house, and in thy presence, . . . and cry unto thee in our affliction, then thou wilt hear and help," and the Lord said, "Stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord." God wrought for them. 2 Chron. 20: 5-25.

Turn to Ps. 68: 24, "They have seen thy goings, O God; even the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary." What are the "goings of God?"—The ways of God. Does it not show his character, his work, and what he does? Where did they find his character, his work, and the manifestation of his power? Where?—In the sanctuary. There is where God dwells. Again in Ps. 77: 12, 13: "I will meditate also of all thy work, and talk of thy doings. Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary: who is so great a God as our God?" Now, we can not see the workings of God, but I want to tell you, dear friends, if we take the Bible for a guide, we shall find the ways and workings of God, the foundation of strength and wisdom, in the sanctuary. "Well," says one, "we see them everywhere." Not according to the Bible. The word "sanctuary" occurs one hundred and forty-seven times, and always refers to something that exists. God once is called a little sanctuary, and the people of God, but in every other instance it refers to some particular place where God dwells—his habitation (Ps. 33: 13, 14), his dwelling-place. 2 Chron. 6: 39.

I will give you another text, Ps. 73: 13: "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. . . . Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end." Where did the psalmist get that information?—In the sanctuary. Paul understood the strength in the sanctuary when he wrote, "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil." Heb. 6: 19. Where are we to have our anchor cast?—Within the veil. Where is the veil? In the earthly sanctuary there was a veil at the outer door, and a veil at the inner door, dividing the holy from the most holy place. Christ has gone within the veil, and he is our anchor. Do you believe it? "Well," says one, "I do not know anything about it." Be careful that you do not find yourself swept away by and by. We need a knowledge of Christ, and of the nature of the work that he is doing for the human family, and in proportion as we understand the nature of his work and believe in it, we shall have a Christian experience. It is the devil's business to upset the faith of God's people, and to get them to believe in nothing in particular only that they must be good and have a sort of religion. There are thousands and tens of thousands of professed Christians to-day who hold simply to that view. They say, "God has forgiven me my sins." Is it not necessary to believe God has forgiven your sins? Of course it is, but there is something else also necessary. This idea of throwing away all the exhortations that God has ever given us simply because we profess to be a Christian is a great mistake. It is a trick of the devil. If God has given you judgment and a mind to comprehend, he wants you to understand something about the science of redemption, and that you have a Saviour who has gone into the heavens to intercede at the right hand of the Father for us.

(To be continued)

The Sanctuary*

(Continued)

Now I pass this part of the subject, and turn to some familiar texts in Exodus. In the eighth and ninth verses of the twenty-fifth chapter we read: "And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them. According to all that I show thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it;" again, in the same chapter and the fortieth verse: "And look that thou make them [all the furniture] after their pattern, which was showed thee in the mount." "Let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them." Could not he dwell among Israel unless they made him a sanctuary? If that text reads all right, I do not think he could. "Let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them." Did he not dwell with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob? — Yes. We will see if we can find why he did not dwell with Israel. If Jacob's sons had not sinned, and their judgment become so perverted that they could sell Joseph, they never would have gone into Egypt, but because their minds were blinded by sin, and they fell so far from appreciating God, he permitted them to go into Egypt, and when they got down to Egypt and saw before them continually the worship of the gods of Egypt, they became permeated with those principles of heathen worship, and God could not dwell with them until it was cleansed out of their heart. God took three steps to do it. The first one was to demolish the gods of Egypt, and show there was no power in them. The ten plagues that came upon the Egyptians were directed against their gods. God showed by those plagues that there was no power or salvation in their gods to withstand the judgments that he brought upon them. Ex. 12:13; Num. 33:4.

Next the Lord brought them to Mount Sinai, and spoke the ten commandments to them. Let me read you a few verses to show the effect it had on them at that time: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Go unto the people, and sanctify them to-day and to-morrow, and let them wash their clothes, and be ready against the third day: for the third day the Lord will come down in the sight of all the people upon Mount Sinai. And thou shalt set bounds unto the people round about, saying, Take heed to yourselves, that ye go not up into the mount, or touch the border of it: whosoever toucheth the mount shall be surely put to death: there shall not an hand touch it, but he shall surely be stoned, or shot through; whether it be beast or man, it shall not live: when the trumpet soundeth long, they shall come up to the mount." Ex. 19:10-13; see also Ex. 20:18, 19.

Now what kind of impression would that make on Israel? — It would teach them that God was holy, and in his presence sin could not exist. The mount became so holy that the man or beast that touched it would die. Would not that give them an experience, a realizing sense of the character of God, of his holiness, of his righteousness? When they heard God speak the ten commandments, they said to Moses, "Speak thou with us, . . . but let not God speak with us lest we die." Why would they die? — Because of sin in their hearts. When a man gets a genuine experience, it affects him — heart, head, and body — spiritually, mentally, and physically. True holiness includes physical cleanliness. 2 Cor. 7:1. They were to build the sanctuary to perfect holiness. It was that the Lord might dwell among them. It would give them an experience in the hatred of sin, and an exalted idea of the holiness of God.

In all their typical arrangement, in their eating, their clothing, in cultivating the soil, there was something to impress their mind with the sacredness of Jehovah. And so repeatedly he says, "Ye shall be holy: for I the Lord your God am holy." If an unconsecrated person even touched or looked upon the ark, he was smitten. When that ark was taken by the Philistines, over fifty thousand men were slain for looking into it, and they exclaimed, "How can we dwell with such a holy Lord God?" The priest was consecrated to his office by blood placed upon the tip of his ear, showing that his ear should be consecrated to God, and upon the thumb of his right hand, that he would not engage in anything but the service of God, and upon the toe of his right foot, that he would run in the way of the commandments of God. This was the impression the building of the sanctuary would have upon Israel, — it was that God was holy, and those that approached God and approached his services must consecrate themselves to God. In all the services of the sanctuary there was a penalty of death if they did not do as God directed. Why? — Because God had come down to dwell with them, and this represented God's dwelling-place in heaven.

* A sermon preached by Elder S. N. Haskell, at College View, Neb., Sept. 18, 1904.

Now I want you to see that the building of that sanctuary would give them an experience far different from what they had ever had before. It would require a heart consecration. It would give them a genuine experience, and in that building God dwelt. Over and over again he commanded them to do this and to do that, that they might be holy. Here was a marked distinction between the people and the sanctuary and its services that made them holy. They never were the sanctuary. And while there is a sense that man becomes a temple of the Holy Ghost, man never becomes the antitypical sanctuary. It is contrary to all the Scripture teaching. The Israelites were required to be holy. And what made them holy? — It was a faith in the sanctuary and its service; and those services which they performed were only a shadow, to show them how they could approach the God in heaven.

It pointed to the real sanctuary which was above.

I might read you scripture here by the hour to show you that every ceremony given was that they might be holy. There was a transforming power in their faith in God's dwelling in that building on the earth that imperceptibly transformed their character and made them holy. Can you not see why they were to build a sanctuary? "Let them build me a sanctuary; that I may dwell among them." It would wipe out of their hearts the last vestige of heathenism. Language fails me in expressions to show the importance of believing in a God that is something, and that dwells somewhere. The devil well knows the power of such a faith, and every idol temple is but a counterfeit of the true.

Fifteen hundred years later Christ went up to heaven. I read from Heb. 8:1, 2: "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: we have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man." You might just as well say that Christ turned to nothing when he went up to heaven, as to say that he did not take his place on the right hand of the Father in the tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man. What happened when he got there? Turn with me to John 16:7:

"Nevertheless I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." It was necessary for Christ to go away in order that the Comforter might come to them. Read John 15:26. "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me." Again, Acts 2:33: "Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear."

Where did Christ go to receive the Holy Spirit? — To the Father. Then when he took his position at the right hand of the Father, as an high priest in the heavenly sanctuary, there was the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. Was not there an experience that was far greater than they had when they built the sanctuary? Did they not get something there which made them a separate people, and which they carried with them until the gospel went to the ends of the earth? The Saviour said, "And greater works than these shall ye do because I go to my Father" in the heavenly sanctuary. And when he took his place at the right hand of the Father, they received the baptism of the Holy Ghost. This greater work was a manifestation of the Spirit in the conversion of souls because Christ had taken his place at the right hand of the Father. And when they received the Spirit, it continued with them.

When Paul came to those brethren at Ephesus, he said, "Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." It gave them a realizing sense of sin they had never experienced before. See Acts 19:2-6, also Acts 8:13-24. It is to the opening of the temple of God in heaven, and the entering of Christ into the most holy place, before the ark of his testament, that we owe our existence as a people. God has something now for his people, as he had for the believers in Ephesus. They said, "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." He said unto them, "Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, Unto John's baptism. Then said Paul, John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus. When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied." They believed that they had received something, and they had something.

So when Peter went down to preach to Cornelius, they received the Holy Ghost. "While Peter spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word." The Holy Ghost came upon them just as it had come upon the believers on the day of Pentecost.

The experience of receiving the Holy Ghost took hold of men's thoughts. When Peter said to Simon, "Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter: for thy heart is not right in the sight of God. Repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God, if perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee," Simon was frightened, and said, "Pray ye to the Lord for me, that none of these things which ye have spoken come upon me."

If we had more of the Holy Ghost, there would be a power that was manifest in the early experience of this work. We lack the Spirit of God. Why did the early Christians have it?—It was because of their faith that grasped the Saviour at the right hand of the Father in the heavenly sanctuary. That experience would have been worth nothing had they not believed in the special work at that time. It was their faith in Christ's position in heaven that brought them the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. It made them a separate company. It originated the gospel church. There on the day of Pentecost, when they had confessed their sins and put them away, God set his seal to the work as Christ took his position at the right hand of God.

When Brother Butler suggested that we might obtain sixty-five thousand dollars during the week of prayer, I thought that one hundred thousand dollars would be a small sum if we had the same experience that we had when we first believed. If we were to receive the experience that God has for us, as I shall presently show you, from Christ's entering into the most holy place, we could raise five hundred thousand dollars. How much urging had to be done to get the early Christians to give for the gospel work? Their faith in Jesus Christ, who went to the heavenly courts at the right hand of the Father, laid hold of their pocketbooks. It gave them an experience in God. It gave them a far greater experience than Israel obtained in the wilderness. Why?—Because they had reached that stage when Christ took his place at the right hand of the Father. We read about apostolic times, but it will take more zeal to go through to the kingdom than they had in that time.

(To be concluded)

The Sanctuary(Concluded)*

Now I want to read you another text: "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament." Rev. 11: 19. This brings us to another point in the history of the sanctuary question. When was this?—Under the sounding of the seventh angel. Then the temple of God was opened in heaven. There is a temple of God in heaven, and in that temple there is the ark of God's ten commandments. When that most holy place was opened in heaven, there was seen by the people on earth the ten commandments. This brings us to a special work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. Let me read you a few other verses that cluster around this. Turn with me to Acts 3: 19-22: "Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you: whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Repent and be converted, for what purpose?—"That your sins may be blotted out." When are your sins blotted out?—"When the times of refreshing shall come." The time of the blotting out of the sins is the cleansing of the sanctuary at the end of the twenty-three hundred days of Dan. 8: 14. Christ entered the most holy place to cleanse the sanctuary from the sins of God's people, and will blot them from the books, and bring them out and lay them upon the scapegoat. This will give a deeper experience than when Christ ascended on high. When he took his position at the right hand of the Father, it was that men might repent and be forgiven of their sins. But now the Saviour bears them out from the heavenly courts.

From our present spiritual condition, I verily believe that many will pass through the loud cry of the third angel's message and the blotting out of sins without knowing that that event had happened. Many are not near enough to God to catch his voice and to know the moving of his Spirit. O my soul, can it be that we are sixty years in the investigative judgment since Christ entered the most holy place, and at the same time we have no deep moving of the Spirit of God in this time of the loud cry of the message? A friend asked me, since I have been here, "When shall we hear the loud cry of the message?" I did not know what to say. I thought to myself, Poor soul! we may go through the loud cry, and you never know it. "Well," says one, "will there not be more of an outpouring of the Spirit?" I expect there will be, far greater than anything we have seen as yet, but if you wait for that outpouring of the Spirit of God to save you in the time of trouble, you will never be saved. This is taught both from the Bible and from the spirit of prophecy.

There is another text I want to read you, and that is in Isa. 43: 25. How many times within the last few years I have heard that quoted with the statement that it proves that our sins have been blotted out. When Christ covers our iniquities with his own blood, he pledges himself that those sins will be taken away; and if we prove faithful, they all will be taken away; but they are not blotted out yet. Here is the text: "I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins." Notice the next verse: "Put me in remembrance: let us plead together: declare thou, that thou mayest be justified." What! put God in remembrance! How could we put him in remembrance if we did not know anything about the heavenly sanctuary? Did we not show you that every soul that will be saved in the time of the end will understand something about the sanctuary question, and that not a wicked person will understand? What does it say here?—"Put me in remembrance." Then we shall understand about that blotting out, that it takes place in the heavenly courts; and in view of the blotting out, we shall confess our sins, we shall examine our hearts more thoroughly than we have ever examined them before. We shall seek God that he may discover to us our sins, that we may confess those sins, and ask him to blot them out. Then what?—"Declare thou." Declare what?—When we confess our sins, it is our privilege to believe that God forgives our sins. And when Satan comes to your heart and tries to make you believe that God has not forgiven your sins, it is your privilege to declare that God has forgiven them. But tell me how you can do that if you do not know anything about the blotting out. If your faith is not revived in the sanctuary question and in the work of our High Priest, and if you do not get an experience out of it, I fear you will never go through. We must have an experience in this work of our High Priest.

* A sermon preached by Elder S. N. Haskell, at College View, Neb., Sept. 18, 1904.

How is it that you have the school buildings erected here? Why is it that you have representatives from different parts of the world at this meeting? Why is the work going in every part of the world to-day, and especially in Russia and in the countries where every plan is laid to intercept the work of God, and God's providence is so manifestly over it? Why do you hear, in the reports that come from Africa, India, and from China and different parts of the world, of the conversion of souls to-day, to present truth? It is because of the experience that comes to us from a belief in the most holy place in that heavenly sanctuary. You take that out of it, and you have no business to be a separate people. If there is not a transforming power in a belief in Christ's work in the heavenly sanctuary, our entire position is wrong. "Well," says one, "I do not see it." Did you see it in the type? Now think a moment. When they brought the lamb, laid their hands on its head and confessed their sins, and the lamb was slain, and the priest took the blood and went in to the sanctuary, did anybody see the priest? Did they see what the priest did with that blood?—No one ever saw it. He went in, and the veil shut him from their view. But the sinner believed that the priest was presenting the blood before God, and sprinkling it upon the altar of incense. On the tenth day of the month when they brought those two goats, and the blood was carried into the most holy place, who saw the priest offer it before the Lord?—No one. It was a work of faith, and faith grasped the fact that the priest had made an atonement for them. They might have confessed their sins and brought a lamb three hundred and sixty-four days, but if they had neglected the work of the atonement, the tenth day of the seventh month, they would have been cut off. You may have had a good experience in the past, but unless you have an experience in the work of the High Priest in the most holy place, it will not stand the test in the shaking time. Put wheat in the sieve and shake it; no two kernels will stick together. They will all be shaken apart, but the wheat will remain in the sieve. It is high time we have an individual experience in the things of God. We need the baptism of the Holy Spirit that we may be able to stand in the coming storm.

I read the following from "Early Writings": "Now is the time to lay up treasure in heaven, and to set our hearts in order, ready for the time of trouble. Those only who have clean hands and pure hearts will stand in that trying time. Now is the time for the law of God to be in our minds, foreheads, and written in our hearts. The Lord has shown me the danger of letting our minds be filled with worldly thoughts and cares. . . . Time has continued a few years longer than we expected, therefore they think it may continue a few years more, and in this way their minds are being led from present truth. In these things I saw great danger. . . . I saw that many were neglecting the preparation so needful, and were looking to the time of "refreshing" and the "latter rain" to fit them to stand in the day of the Lord, and to live in his sight. O, how many I saw in the time of trouble without a shelter! they had neglected the needful preparation, therefore they could not receive the refreshing that all must have to fit them to live in the sight of a holy God. Those who refuse to be hewed by the prophets, and fail to purify their souls in obeying the whole truth, and who are willing to believe that their condition is better than it really is, will come up to the time of the falling of the plagues, and then see that they need to be hewed and squared for the building. But there will be no time then to do it, and no Mediator to plead their cause before the Father. Before this time, the awful, solemn declaration has gone forth, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; . . . and he that is holy let him be holy still." I saw that none could share the refreshing unless they obtained the victory over every besetment, over pride, selfishness, love of the world, and over every wrong word and action. We should, therefore, be drawing nearer and nearer to the Lord, and be earnestly seeking that preparation necessary to enable us to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord. Let all remember that God is holy, and that none but holy beings can ever dwell in his presence."

There is a work for us to do when our High Priest is in the heavenly sanctuary, right at the present time. If there was ever a time when there should be a careful searching of hearts, it is now. Have you temptations that every now and then get the better of you? In the strength of God, master them. We need the baptism of the Holy Spirit to come upon us in our work. The devil has his eye on the persons, at the present time, that have not had an experience in the early work of the former messages, because they do not know what an experience the people of God had in the early times.

We should come so near to God that he can speak to us, by his Holy Spirit. If there is anything that would lead us to search our hearts, it is faith in the work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. You may pass along, day after day, week after week, and hide your sins, but God will have a people that will un-earth every wrong, and confess their sins, so that he may forgive them, and they will be blotted out. Shall you and I be prepared to be saved? God grant that this company may be among that number. Do you think it will make men sell their farms? It did in 1844. In the old Signs Office in Boston, Mass., I was told by the editor of the old Advent Signs, that on that counter men brought thousands and thousands of dollars just before the tenth day of the seventh month, and with tears begged them to take it; but they had enough to publish all they wished until the tenth day of the seventh month. May God forbid that that shall be the experience of a single individual in the audience to-night. Let us begin at once to examine our hearts, and see if our case is clear before God. May the Lord add his blessing and save us in his kingdom for his name's sake.

RH Dec 15, 1904

SU Haskell

The Sanctuary*

THE Scriptures plainly state several things respecting the work of our High Priest in heaven which it would be well for us all to remember. First, Christ is on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in heaven, a minister of holy things, and of the tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man. Heb. 8:1-3, margin. If he is a minister of holy things, how many holy things do we receive that he does not minister to us? He is a minister of holy things at the right hand of God in heaven. David says that the sanctuary is in the heights of heaven, and "from heaven did the Lord behold the earth." Ps. 102:19.

"The Lord looketh from heaven; he beholdeth all the sons of men. From the place of his habitation he looketh upon all the inhabitants of the earth." Ps. 33:13, 14. "Then hear thou from the heavens, even from thy dwelling-place, their prayer and their supplications, and maintain their cause, and forgive thy people which have sinned against thee. Now, my God, let, I beseech thee, thine eyes be open, and let thine ears be attent unto the prayer that is made in this place." 2 Chron. 6:39, 40.

In these quotations there are several statements which I will notice. One is that the words "tabernacle" and "sanctuary" and "habitation" and "dwelling-place" all refer to the place from which Christ ministers. It is the place where God dwells in heaven.

In each instance where these words occur, the location is in heaven, and the truth is taught that forgiveness comes from God's dwelling-place. I call your attention to these expressions because some have questioned me about my statement in my last sermon, that "a genuine Christian experience in connection with the work of God comes from the sanctuary question."

You will notice that Christ is on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in heaven, a minister of every holy thing that ever comes to this earth. To Israel the condition of God's hearing up in heaven was that they make prayer and supplication toward the house that Solomon built. This is stated seven times in Solomon's prayer. They must recognize that which God recognizes on earth as a representation of that which is in heaven. Then, does not forgiveness come from God's throne in heaven? Does not every blessing that men receive day by day come from the courts above?

The genuineness of our Christian experience will largely depend upon the knowledge we have of the work of Christ in heaven in our behalf, because every ray of light comes from our Lord Jesus Christ. It comes from the throne of God in heaven.

I will mention a few expressions that speak of God's throne. It is the throne of the Majesty in heaven. Heb. 8:1, 2. It is called the throne of grace (Heb. 4:16), and that throne is said to be in the temple of God (Ps. 11:4), between the two cherubim. Ps. 80:1. David plainly states that the Lord prepared that throne for judgment. Ps. 9:7. When do you think he prepared it for judgment? Jeremiah gives a key to this in the seventeenth chapter and the twelfth verse. "A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary." When is the beginning? Let the Gospel of John answer in the first two verses: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God."

The beginning is before the creation. At a general meeting I was asked when the beginning was, and for a full hour they discussed that first text in John; and when they finished, they concluded they were right where they were at the beginning—they did not know. Now let this book (holding up a book) represent seven thousand years measured out of eternity. I go back seven thousand years, and I step into eternity. Is there any measurement back there?—No. There is where God was. I go over the seven thousand years, I step again into eternity. Any measurement there?—No. All I know of time is the seven thousand years measured out from eternity. Then where was the beginning?—Back there where God was. What was back there?—A glorious high throne. And that was the place of God's sanctuary. Then the sanctuary was from the beginning, and it will continue forever and ever,—there will be no end to it. It will be on the earth made new. Eze. 37:25-27; Rev. 21:1-4. But what that ministration would have been if man had never sinned is not revealed. All I know is this, that man did sin, and the service of the sanctuary was for the salvation of the human family, and was made manifest after man sinned. In the Levitical law God has given us light about Christ's work in heaven for the salvation of man; and when I think of it in that light, it seems to me that if there ever was a people that should be interested in this question, it is Seventh-day Adventists. Here is a representative people, the last generation, which is supposed to live when the Lord will come. This is the work that God inaugurated before man sinned. He prepared a throne for judgment; he prepared a sanctuary, and when man sinned, he turned all its services to accomplish the redemption of man.

The Sanctuary*

(Continued)

In the law there were many offerings, — the sin-offering, the trespass-offering, the peace-offering, the thank-offering, and the various offerings, and every offering centered in Christ. The different ceremonies illustrate how the sinner is met in the varied circumstances in which he finds himself in this world. Christ was the antitype of every offering; all were fulfilled in him. Each offering represented different phases of the work of the gospel. I wish to take one offering, and if possible in a few words show you how sin was transferred to the sanctuary.

I read, "For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law: who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things." Heb. 8:4, 5. Then the work of the priest represented the work done by the Saviour in heaven for us.

"If any one of the common people sin through ignorance, while he doeth somewhat against any of the commandments of the Lord concerning things which ought not to be done, and be guilty; or if his sin, which he hath sinned, come to his knowledge: then he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a female without blemish, for his sin which he hath sinned." Lev. 4:27, 28. Notice that there are several things omitted in this record that are mentioned in those of other offerings that were made. For instance, "He shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a female without blemish."

Now I will put another expression with this, "If his offering be a burnt sacrifice of the herd, let him offer a male without blemish: he shall offer it of his own voluntary will at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord." Lev. 1:3. The people were to be perfectly free to do as they chose. This is the way Christ deals with the human family. He does not force any one, but he sets before us the true light, and those that are saved will voluntarily accept him. We must choose, believe, and accept him, with all the sacrifices and afflictions it will bring. Then joy will beam out in our souls because we can suffer for him and with him.

"And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin-offering, and slay the sin-offering in the place of the burnt offering." Lev. 4:29. Compare this with Num. 5:6, 7: "Speak unto the children of Israel, When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the Lord, and that person be guilty: then they shall confess their sin which they have done: and he shall recompense his trespass with the principal thereof, and add unto it the fifth part thereof, and give it unto him against whom he hath trespassed." At the same time he was to confess his sin on the head of the offering, not to the priest, but on the head of the offering, and "he shall bring the trespass-offering at the same time." When God does something for men, it will cause a spirit of liberality to spring up in their hearts, and they will want to do something. They will manifest some appreciation. This was shown in the offering. They were to pour the blood at the bottom of the altar, thus typifying the blood of Christ, which would from the life that is not in harmony with God's law, his will, and his work. Paul refers to this when he says, "For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow." The Word of God will do this; that is, the Spirit in the Word. We need to examine the Word to see if our lives are strictly in harmony with it.

In Isa. 43:23, 24, this thought is brought out still more distinctly: "Thou hast not brought me the small cattle of thy burnt offerings; neither hast thou honored me with thy sacrifices. I have not caused thee to serve with an offering, nor wearied thee with incense. Thou hast bought me no sweet cane with money, neither hast thou filled me with the fat of thy sacrifices; but thou hast made me to serve with thy sins, thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities." Because they had not separated the fat, they made the Lord serve with their sins. Do you grasp the force of this expression, "Thou hast made me to serve with thy sins, thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities"?

"I, even I, am he that blot out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins. Put me in remembrance: let us plead together: declare thou, that thou mayest be justified." If we would have our sins blotted out, they must be confessed. There must be no fat remaining on the offering that is brought, but the fat must be removed, the sin must be taken away. There must be an earnestness on the part of the child of God to go to the very depths of his heart and discover what there is there that is not right with God. This will give peace. "If in anything ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you." It is not a fanciful idea that we have a Saviour who has made these promises: he is in the heavenly courts to take all our sins, and finally bring them out and lay them on the head of the scapegoat. But he can never bring them out unless we voluntarily confess every sin. To those who take no special interest in studying the Word, the Lord will never discover many things that are in their hearts. There must be a revival of the study of the Bible by every one of us. God takes the Word, and sends it home to the heart by his Holy Spirit. I can trust in God if I make the Word my daily study. If I do that, then the Lord will do his part, and will discover to me what stands between me and God.

* A sermon preached by Elder S. N. Haskell, at College View, Neb., Sept. 26, 1904.

As in the type the priest stood ready to receive the fat from the hands of the sinner, so Christ stands ready to take our sins as soon as we are ready to separate from them. In the type the ashes that accumulated at the altar were removed by the priest into a clean place. Can you see any connection between this and the text that says, "They shall be ashes under the soles of your feet in the day that I shall do this"?

You can see by this service that even the children were taught. Ashes are always thrown among the refuse, and seeing them placed by the priest carefully in a clean place would call forth questions from even the children, and in explaining why they were in a clean place, the beautiful lesson of the earth finally cleansed from all sin would be taught. Everything redounds to the glory of God.

(To be concluded)

The Sanctuary(Concluded)*

THE lamb offered had two lives. It was as innocent when it was before the priest as when it was gamboling upon the mountainside. But when the sinner confessed his sin upon its head, it was transferred in the type to the animal. The sinful life was imputed to the animal. So he had two lives,—the life of innocence, and the life of sin that had been transferred to him by the confession of the sinner.

So Christ had a divine life when he came to this earth. He was as sinless when he hung upon the cross as when he came to this world, and yet he bore our sins in his own body on the tree. From the cross he entered heaven with his own blood, there to appear in the presence of God for us. He died for us in our stead, that he might pay the penalty for all. By faith the sinner sees him within the veil. The sins are carried there. The life of faith transfers the sin. Christ is the Lamb of God that takes away the sin of the world. Christ is our life. He is our salvation. Ever since man fell, he has been bearing the sins of the people, but the time comes when, in the investigative judgment, he will bring out these sins. When I think of it in this light, I feel like falling, trembling, before God and lifting up a prayer that he would discover to me everything that is unlike my Saviour, because I see plainly that unless I have an interest in this work and meditate upon it, I am likely to pass over wrong traits of character that will be seen by God, but not by me. I am anxious to have my sins forgiven, every one of them. Let me give you a text in the New Testament on confession: "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment: but I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire. Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee: leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison." Matt. 5: 21-25. If, when I pray, I remember that my brother has aught against me, even if I have given him no occasion to have anything against me, it is my duty to go to him and make everything right. If we do not do our part, the Lord will straighten it out. When it is left entirely with the Lord, and the Lord begins to take the matter up, he will come closer and closer until there will be a crisis in that soul, and the sooner we can learn to humble ourselves before God, the sooner we shall be brought into the place where God can magnify himself through us.

When the Saviour was reviled, he "reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously." Let God manage matters; and if there is a wrong on either side, the Lord will bring it around all right, and there will be a confession. He will come closer and closer until a man will find himself cast into prison, and he can not get out until he confesses everything, and then God will forgive the sin, and bring him into favor with himself.

In the sixteenth of Leviticus we have the typical work illustrating the final disposition of sin. The sinner brought two goats. One of them was the Lord's goat, and was to be slain for the people; the other was called the scapegoat. The scapegoat was to bear off the sins on the day of atonement, which was a type of the day of judgment. An individual might have served the Lord faithfully the three hundred and sixty-four days in the year, but when the tenth day of the seventh month came, he must afflict his soul, with fasting and prayer, and must examine his own heart. He must also refrain from doing any work on that day. His appetite must be brought under complete control. It must be a day of holy convocation. In the New Testament we have a warning given to us in the closing of this work when our High Priest is in the heavenly sanctuary. He urges us not to forget the assembling of ourselves together, but to exhort one another, and so much the more as we see the day approaching.

* A sermon preached by Elder S. N. Haskell, at College View, Neb., Sept. 24, 1904.

How is it in our churches, when our prayer-meeting comes? Do we forget the assembling of ourselves together? Has our love grown cold? I want to tell you, my brethren, our love must be revived. We are to repent and do our first works, and be more earnest as we near the approaching day.

Well, says one, what about eating? Does not the Saviour warn the people against eating and drinking as they did before the flood? In the twenty-first chapter of Luke, when he speaks of the time of the day of atonement, he says, "And take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares." We are not to let the cares of life take the time we should spend in serving God. The testimony of the spirit of prophecy says that God can make twenty acres more productive than a hundred. Why not try it? Why not be in earnest in studying the Bible and in having our case presented to the Father, so that we shall take more time for the service of God than we have in the past? There needs to be a reviving in the service of God. I can not tell you how happy we used to be when we obtained a knowledge of these things in the time that I received them. About fifty years ago, I remember one time a little boy was in a meeting that we were holding in a private house, and a report of the work of Elder Andrews, in Maine, was being read, and when about half-way through, the reader stopped. This little fellow was listening with intense interest. Finally he said, "How many Sabbath-keepers were there?" He was watching to see what had become of the pennies he had given to support the ministers, and he wanted to know the results. We want to know the results, and we want to realize the blessing of God.

This deep searching of heart must come first right home to ourselves; and when we get a fresh experience continually, and learn the art of trusting in God and hiding in him, we shall have something sweet in the third angel's message. We shall find that our great High Priest, who is ministering in the court of heaven, will regard us; for I read that he sees every soul on earth, he numbers the hairs of our head, and knows every sorrow, and every tear that is shed. May God help us, brethren and sisters, that we may get a fresh hold upon heaven.

Now, I have made up my mind that if I fail of going through to the kingdom, it will be because I lose my interest, which I never mean to do. Well, says one, what do you do when difficulties come?—Hide under the shadow of the wings of the Lord; try to get a little closer to the Lord; commit all troubles to him. Lay the cross and perplexities at his feet, and leave them there; and when I do that, I find that God takes care of it all. Most wonderful answers to prayer we have had when difficulties came, and it seemed as if every way possible was hedged up. We would take the matter to the Lord, and what appeared to us to be miraculous openings would come all at once. We have a God that is in heaven, and at his right hand is our Saviour, who ministers in holy things. He has a tender care for his people. I wish I could tell you how, at times, it seems that the love of God has been manifested to us. Of all the people on the face of the earth, we ought to be thankful. Thank the Lord for trials. You would not know whether you trusted in God or not if you did not get into straightened places where it required an infinite arm to lift you out. I need strength every moment of my life. I need a blessing continually to keep me on the way to heaven, but I know we have a High Priest in heaven.

Now let me suggest one more thought: Some of the most remarkable instances of answer to prayer that are to be found in the Bible, were when prayer was offered toward the sanctuary, as mentioned in the twentieth chapter of Second Chronicles. Why was Daniel cast into the lions' den?—For praying with his windows open toward the sanctuary in Jerusalem. He turned his face to the Saviour, who sits at the right hand of the Father, by recognizing the sanctuary on earth. Do you have temptations that you are not strong enough to withstand? Go with them to the Lord. Turn your face to the Saviour of the world, who sits at the right hand of the God of the universe.

A Personal Saviour and a Real Work in a Definite Place

THERE was a work to be done to prepare the way for the first advent of Jesus. John the Baptist was raised up to do this work as the forerunner of Jesus. His message was based upon the prophecies, and especially upon the prophecy of Isaiah. Here is the fundamental text of his message: "The voice of one saying, Cry. And one said, What shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth, because the breath of Jehovah bloweth upon it; surely the people is grass. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth; but the word of our God shall stand forever. O thou that tellest good tidings [the gospel] to Zion, get thee up on a high mountain; O thou that tellest good tidings [the gospel] to Jerusalem, lift up thy voice with strength; lift it up, be not afraid; say unto the cities of Judah, Behold, your God! Behold, the Lord Jehovah will come as a mighty one, and his arm will rule for him; behold, his reward is with him, and his recompense before him."

"All flesh is grass. . . . The grass withereth. . . . But the word of our God shall stand forever. . . . Behold, your God! Behold, the Lord Jehovah will come." Such was the message of the voice in the wilderness.

In the mouth of John the Baptist this prophetic declaration became the preaching of repentance for sin and faith in the revealed Saviour. He repudiated all confidence in the flesh and fleshly descent. To the Pharisees and Sadducees who came to his baptism he said: "Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. And even now the ax lieth at the root of the trees: every tree therefore that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire." In a time when formalism had taken the place of genuine religion, when human tradition had superseded the divine command, and when men were feared and revered rather than God, the greatest confidence being placed in the flesh, the words of the old prophet were interpreted (not merely quoted) to the people with an authority which caused hardened hypocrites to tremble: "All flesh is grass. . . . Behold, your God!" And this was the message to prepare this same people to receive Jesus as the divine Son of God when he should be manifested in the flesh.

When Jesus appeared among men to begin his ministry, God gave to John a token of his Messiahship, and he immediately testified, saying, "Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world! This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man who is become before me: for he was before me. And I knew him not; but that he should be made manifest to Israel, for this cause came I baptizing in water. And John bare witness, saying, I have beheld the Spirit descending as a dove out of heaven; and it abode upon him. And I knew him not; but he that sent me to baptize in water, he said unto me, Upon whomsoever thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and abiding upon him, the same is he that baptizeth in the Holy Spirit. And I have seen, and have borne witness that this is the Son of God." In the man Jesus of Nazareth, whose flesh was the same as the flesh of other men, John the Baptist was led to recognize God manifested in the flesh, and in giving his message, "All flesh is grass. . . . Behold, your God!" he pointed definitely to one in the flesh, and gave to Isaiah's cry the setting demanded by the time and the circumstances. When Immanuel, "God with us," was among men, the message of Isaiah, "Behold, your God!" had a definite interpretation and a personal application in the words of John the Baptist as he pointed to Jesus here upon the earth, and said, "Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world!" He did not call attention to trees and grass and flowers, in which the power of God is manifested, and say, "All flesh is grass.

... Behold, your God!" but he designated a person, and emphasized the special work of that person in the gospel plan. "Behold, the Lamb of God," means that the Son of God was come in the flesh, "manifested to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." To those who were familiar with the gospel as taught in the sacrificial offerings, the words, "Behold, the Lamb of God," would be an interpretation both of the services of the sanctuary and of the mission of Jesus. They would indicate to them that the true and efficacious offering for sin was the Son of God, who had taken the flesh in order that he might give himself a ransom for many. His person, his work, and his place were all made clear. Thus the people were directed to a personal Saviour and a real work in a definite place.

The cry of Isaiah's voice, which was the basis of the message of John the Baptist to prepare the way for the first advent of Christ, is the basis of the message in this generation to prepare the way for the second advent of Christ. The full statement now is, "All flesh is grass. . . Behold, your God! Behold, the Lord Jehovah will come. . . Behold, his reward is with him." "Behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to render to each man according as his work is." Those who proclaim this message must put it into the divine setting intended for it,—in order to give to it such an interpretation as will enable it to accomplish its work in this last generation. This setting is found in the threefold message of Revelation 14,—a message concerning the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus in this judgment hour, when, according to the prophecy, the sanctuary will be cleansed. In the light of this threefold message those who interpret to the world Isaiah's words as a message of preparation for the coming of the Lord will not make it the burden of their work to direct attention to the trees and the grass and the flowers in which the power of God is manifested, and to say, "Behold, your God!" but, following the example of John the Baptist, they will point to a personal Saviour and a real work in a definite place. They will point to Jesus, not now upon earth as the sacrifice for sin, and not as being everywhere in general but nowhere in particular, but in the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary, engaged in the antitypical work of the great day of atonement. They will call upon the people to repent of their sins, and they will preach a crucified, a risen, an ascended Christ, a great High Priest, an all-sufficient Saviour and the coming King. "Behold, your God!" "Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world!" "We have such a high priest, who sat down on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, a minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, not man." "Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him." And soon this will change into the glad shout, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is Jehovah; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation." "Behold, your God!"

Before leaving the subject we ought to state that this pointing to Jesus in his work in the most holy place of the heavenly sanctuary not only prepares the way for his visible coming with clouds, but also for his coming in the person of the Holy Spirit to dwell in the heart of the believer, and thus to make him the temple of the living God. This same Jesus who dwells in the highest heaven dwells also in the heart of the humble penitent who will receive him. When we cry, "Behold, your God!" and point to Jesus our great High Priest in the heavenly sanctuary, we are not proclaiming "an absentee God." On the contrary, in this third angel's message will be found the only antidote for that perversion of the truth which seems to bring God so near while it really makes him "an absentee God," dissipated into nothingness, and substitutes for him an Infinite Energy having a personality according to the definition of science, but entirely distinct from the Biblical teaching of a personal being. The third angel's message is diametrically opposed to pantheistic or spiritualistic teachings in any of their many forms.

Many discouraged souls need to behold Jesus as a personal Saviour doing a real work for sinners in a definite place.

